The hopes of peace being troubled by the departing of the Biſhop of Gurci (although the Pope had ſent vnto him foure dayes after the Biſhop of Murrey the Scottiſh Embaſſadour, to debate of peace with the French King,) the cauſes that had ſo long hindered Iohn Iaques Triuulce, ceaſſed, who thirſted, in an honeſt ambition, to do ſomething worthy his vertue and ancient glory, and by the which the King might know, how hurtfull it is to recommend the gouernment of warres (a matter aboue all other humane actions moſt painfull and hard, and moſt requiring diſcretion) not to Captaines able and trained, but to yong men vnexperienced, and of whoſe vertue there is no other thing to giue teſtimonie then fauour. Therefore continuing in his firſt reſolutions, notwithſtanding the footbands of the Griſons were not yet arriued (for the Generall of Normandie, vpon whom depended the expeditions, had deferred to ſend men to leuie them, both hoping that the peace would go forward, and alſo ſeeking to pleaſe the King by auoiding expences) he brought the campe afore Concordia in the beginning of May, containing twelue hundred Lances, and ſeuen thouſand footmen, which he took the ſame day, for as much as the townesmen being terrified with the firſt execution of the artillery, had ſent Embaſſadors to render it, and in that reſpect were leſſe carefull to looke to their guard, the footmen of the army entring the towne, ſacked it. After the taking of Concordia (to the end to giue no occaſion to ſuch as enuied him, falſly to accuſe him, and to ſay he reſpected more his own profit then the Kings) he left Mirandola behind him, and drew towards Bonport, a village vpon the riuer of Panaro, to approch ſo neare the enemy, as by cutting off their victuals either to conſtrain them to diſlodge, or to fight out of their campe. As he was entred into the countrey of Modena and lodged in the village of Canneſſe, he ſent Gaſton de Foix with three hundred footmen and fiue hundred horſemen, to do an enterpriſe vpon Iohn Paul Manfron that lay at Maſſa neare to Finalo, with three hundred light horſemen of the Venetians, who hearing of their coming, put himſelfe in battell array vpon a bridge: but the valour of his ſouldiers not anſwering his vertue and courage, he was abandoned of them, and taken priſoner with a very ſmall companie. After this the armie drew neare to Bonport, and Triuulce had an intention to caſt a bridge there where the channell which is drawne from aboue Modena out of the riuer of Panaro, entreth into the riuer: but the enemie, to giue impediment to his paſſage, was already incamped in a place ſo neare, that they diſtreſſed him with their artilleries, wherewith Captaine Perault a Spaniard and commander in the Church army, was killed as he walked along the ſhore of the riuer. In that place the banke is very high, and therefore it was eaſie for the enemy to hinder him: by reaſon whereof Triuulce taking another courſe, caſt his bridge ſomewhat higher, the ſpace of a mile. Hauing paſſed the channell, he drew towards Modena, marching along vpon the banke of Panaro, ſeeking out a place where he might moſt eaſily caſt his bridge: but becauſe he ſaw alwayes afore him bands of horſemen and footmen of his enemies, who were incamped neare to Frankeaſtle vpon the way of Romagna (but in a place enuironed with banks and waters) he came by the ſame way to the bridge of Foſſalto within two miles of Modena, and there turning on the left hand towards the mountaine, he paſſed without impediment the foord of Panaro, which in that place hath his channell and courſe very large, and without banks: and hauing paſſed Panaro, he incamped in a place called the Greue of Panaro, three miles from the army Eccleſiaſticke. The day after he drew towards Plumace, being furniſhed of victuals from them of Modena by the conſent of Vitfruch: and the ſame day the army Eccleſiaſticke, which durſt not ſhew themſelues in plaine field, ſuppoſing it very neceſſary to draw neare to Bologna, the better to preuent all mutinies and ſtirres in that Citie, the rather for that the family of the Bentiuoleis followed the French army, went and incamped at the bridge of Caſalecquo, three miles aboue Bologna,

a place very ſtrong and ſure, hauing his ſituation betweene the riuer of Rene and the channell, and by the commoditie of the mountaine at his backe, it defends Bolognia from all priuation of the reliefe of the channel, which coming from the riuer, paſſeth into that Citie: this is that place where in the dayes of our anceſtors Iohn Galeas Viſcount the moſt puiſſant Duke of Millan, farre ſtronger then his enemies, obtained a moſt great victory againſt the Florentines, the Bolognians and other confederates. The day following Frankeaſtle was rendred to Triuulce, who, after he had remained three dayes in the lodging of Plumace, both for the impediment of the raines that fell, and to prouide victuals for his people, whereof they had then but ſmall ſtore, he came to incampe vpon the high way betweene Samoggia and Frankeaſtle, where he ſtood in great doubt what he were beſt to do for many difficulties that appeared to him in all deliberations. For he knew well enough that it would be to no purpoſe to aſſaile Bolognia, if the people made no tumult within: and if he ſhould approch neare to it in hope of popular emotions, he feared he ſhould be conſtrained to retire as Monſieur Chaumont had done, with diminution of his reputation. He knew that it would be a matter of greater perill and indiſcretion to go fight with the enemies incamped in places of ſtrength and of aduantage: and to make his approch to Bolognia on that ſide below, there was no hope, vnleſſe haply the enemies might remoue for feare leſt he ſhould aſſaile Romagna, whereby might be offered ſome occaſion, either to him to fight, or to the people of Bolognia to make ſome tumult. Neuertheleſſe, in the end after he had reſolued to make triall, if either the vniuerſall diſpoſition of the Citie, or the particular intelligences of the Bentiuoleſs, would ſtand him in any ſtead, he led the army (the vantguard whereof was guided by Theodore Triuulce, the maine battell by himſelfe, and the reareguard by Gaſton de Foix) to incampe at the bridge of Laine, which is a place vpon the high way fiue miles from Bolognia, famous for the memory of the enteruiew of Lepidus, Marcus Antonius, and Octauius, who (as hiſtories do witneſſe) vnder the name of Triumuirat, eſtabliſhed in that place the tyrannie of Rome, together with that proſcription which can neuer be diſcommended and deteſted enough. The Pope was not at this time in Bolognia, who, ſince the departure of the Biſhop of Gurci, being perplexed in varietie of thoughts and counſels, ſometimes courage and ſometimes feare bearing dominion in him, as ſoone as he heard that Triuulce began to march (notwithſtanding the Spaniſh Lances were gone) he went from Bolognia to the army, to the end by his preſence to encourage the Captaines to giue battel to the enemies; to the which he could neuer diſpoſe them, either by his letters, or labour of his Embaſſadours. He went with intention to lodge the firſt day at Cento, but he was compelled to lodge within the towne of Pieua; for that a thouſand of his footmen which were entred within Cento, refuſed to depart till they were ſatisfied of their payes: wherewith haply being angry, or elſe looking more deeply into the danger, he altered his reſolution, and returned the next day to Bolognia, where his feares ſo much increaſed for that Triuulce approched, that determining to go to Rauenna, he ſent for the Magiſtrates of Fortie, to whom he declared, that by the benefite of the ſea Apoſtolike, and by his meanes and labour, they had ſhaken off a yoke of moſt grieuous tyrannie, and had obtained libertie with many exemptions, beſides many graces both publike and priuate which they had receiued and were to receiue of him in particular: by which meanes, whereas before they were holden oppreſſed with moſt hard ſeruitude, and ſo embaſed and troden downe by tyrants, that in other parts of Italy there was no reputation of them, now they were raiſed vnto honour and riches, their Citie repleniſhed with all ſorts of trades and merchandizes, and ſome of them eſtabliſhed in right worthy and high dignities: ſo that now they were generally eſteemed, free of themſelues, abſolute Lords of Bolognia and the whole territorie thereof, the offices and honours being in their hands, and the publike reuenues of their Citie in their free diſtribution; the Church hauing almoſt nothing but the name, which keepeth there, onely for ſigne of ſuperioritie, a Legate or Gouernour, who without them cannot deliberate of any matter of importance; and euen thoſe cauſes that are committed to his arbitration, he ordinarily referreth to their aduice and will: That if for theſe benefites and proſperities, there remained in them any deſire to defend their proper libertie, they ſhould be no otherwiſe ſuccoured and defended by him, then the Citie of Rome, ſtanding in the like neceſſitie: That though the importance of the preſent affaires conſtrained him to go to Rome, yet, he neither did nor would forget to prouide for the ſuretie and ſafetie of Bolognia: That for that regard, he had giuen direction, that the Venetian bands which lay on the other ſide Po with Andrew Gritti, and who to that end caſt the bridge at Sermida, ſhould

ſhould come to ioyne with his army: That theſe prouiſions were very ſufficient to defend them; but that he could not content himſelfe, nor remaine ſatisfied and in reſt, if withall he deliuered them not from the troubles of the warre: and therefore to driue the French men into neceſſitie to returne to defend their owne things, there were already leuied ten thouſand Swiſſers to deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan: and for their better prouiſion and expedition, he had ſent twentie thouſand duckats to Venice, the Venetians preparing the like ſumme. Neuertheleſſe, if they had rather returne vnder the ſeruitude of the Bentiuoleis, then to enioy the ſweetneſſe of the libertie of the Church, he deſired them to expreſſe frankly what minds they bare, which he himſelfe would alſo follow: onely he told them that if they had any reſolution to defend themſelues, the time was now very conuenient not onely to expreſſe their vertue, but alſo to make the ſeat Apoſtolike bound to them for euer, together with himſelfe, and all the Popes that ſhould ſucceed him. To this forme of perſwaſion, pronounced (according to his cuſtome) with more feruencie then eloquence, after they had debated among themſelues in councell; the Preſident of the gouernment made anſwer in the name of the whole, not forgetting with words of great boaſting, to magnifie their faith, their thankfulneſſe for benefites receiued, and their infinite deuotion to his name: That they were not ignorant of the happie eſtate wherein they ſtood, and how much, ſince the expulſing of Tyrants, their wealth was augmented, together with the glorie of their Citie: That whereas before their liues and goods were miſerably ſubiected to the mercie of others, now being without all feare, they liued in peace and eaſe, participating both in the gouernment and in the reuenues: and that there was not one amongſt them, who had not particularly receiued of him many graces and honours: That they ſaw renewed in their Citie the dignitie of Cardinalſhip, and many of their Citizens furniſhed with Prelatſhips & principal offices in the Court of Rome. For which innumerable graces & ſingular benefites, they bare minds diſpoſed to conſume all their goods, to hazard the honor and ſafetie of their wiues and children, and to loſe their owne liues, rather then to forſake him and the ſea Apoſtolike: That he might therfore depart happie and glad, without either feare or iealouſie touching the things of Bolognia; for that he ſhould ſooner heare that all the channell ſhould ſwim with the bloud of the people of Bolognia, then ỹ Citie ſhould call vpon any other name or obey any other Lord then Pope Iulio. Theſe words gaue to ỹ Pope a greater hope then was conuenient; who leauing there the Cardinall of Pauie, he went to Rauenna, not by the right way, although he was accompanied with the Spaniſh Lances which returned to the realme of Naples; but for feare of the Duke of Ferrara, he tooke the way of Furly, which is further about. After Triuulce was come to the bridge of Laine, the Citie of Bolognia began to be in a great tumult, and the minds of men to be full of diuers thoughts: for that ſome being accuſtomed to the libertie of tyrannie, and to be fed and entertained with the goods and moneys of others, and which deſired vehemently the returne of the Bentiuoleis, hated the gouernment Eccleſiaſtike: others for the harmes they had already receiued, and which they feared to receiue, ſeeing two ſuch armies vpon their lands, and ready to cut down their harueſt, being for that cauſe brought into great deſpaire, deſired any thing whereby they might be deliuered from ſuch harmes: others, afore whoſe eyes ſtood yet the memory of the French inſolencies, executed in their Citie vnder Monſieur Chaumont, and fearing now leſt by their well ſpeeding, the Citie drawing into tumult, might come to be ſacked, ſeemed not to care into what gouernment or iuriſdiction they fell, ſo that in it they might be aſſured to be deliuered from ſuch dangers: and a very few, that afore had declared themſelues enemies to the family of the Bentiuoleis, fauoured the iuriſdiction of the Church, but more in ſhew then in good meaning. So that all the people being drawne into armes, ſome for deſire of innouation and change, and ſome for their proper ſafetie, all things were full of feare and confuſion: and the Cardinall of Pauie and Legate reſident in Bolognia, had neither courage nor counſell ſufficient for ſuch a danger: there being in a Citie ſo great and populous, no more but two hundred light horſemen and a thouſand footmen, and being at that time more then euer at variance with the Duke of Vrbin, who lay with the army at Caſalecqua, he had either at aduenture or by deſtiny entertained fifteene Captaines of the Citizens, to whom, together with their companies and with the people, he had committed the guard of the towne: the moſt part of whom (he hauing vſed no regard in the election of them) being much affected to the Bentiuoleis, but principally Laurence Arioſto, who, being firſt impriſoned and racked at Rome for ſuſpition of conſpiracie with the family of the Bentiuoleys, uoleis, ſuffered afterwards a long impriſonment in the caſtle S. Ange. When theſe had gotte̅ their weapons in their hands, they began to aſſemble themſelues, and make ſecret conuenticles, ſpreading through the towne ſcandalous bruites: ſo that the Legate began too late to ſee into his owne indiſcretion; and to auoide the perill whereinto he had brought himſelfe, he appointed that the new Captaines with their bands ſhould go to the army, faining that the Duke of Vrbin would haue it ſo. But they anſwering that they would not abandon the guard of the towne, he aſſayed to bring in Captaine Ramaſſote with a thouſand footmen, which the people would not ſuffer: by reaſon wherof the Cardinal being quite diſcouraged, & remembring that his gouernment was very hateful to the people, & that he had many enemies among ỹ Nobles, for that not long afore, (by the Popes cōmandement, as he ſaid) proceeding therein with regal power, he had cut off the heads of three honorable Citizens: ſtealing out of the pallace in the night by a ſecret way, in a diſguiſed habit, he retired into the Citadell, and that in ſo great haſte, that he forgot to carry with him his Iewels and money; which he ſent for ſodainly, and hauing receiued them, went out by the gate towards Imola, accompanied with an hundred horſe, and Guido Vaine who had maried his ſiſter, and was Captain of the horſemen appointed for his guard: and a litle after him went out of the Citadell Octauian Fregoſa without any other company then a guide. The flying of the Legat was no ſooner knowne in the towne, then the name of the people was cried and called vpon throughout the whole Citie with great tumult and emotion: which occaſion Laurence Arioſto not willing to loſe, together with Francis Rinuchi one of the fifteen captains, and affected to the Bentiuoleis, being followed by many of the ſame faction, they ranne to the gates of S. Felix and Lama, moſt conuenient for the campe of the French men, which they brake open with barres and hatchets, and being poſſeſſed of them, they ſent immediatly to call the Bentiuoleis: who hauing receiued of Triuulce many French horſemen to ſhun the right way to the bridge of Rene, which was guarded by Raphael de Paſſi one of the Captaines of the Church, they paſſed the riuer more low, and approching the gate of Lama were preſently let in. To the rebellion of Bologna was added the flight of the army: for, about the third houre of the night, the Duke of Vrbin whoſe bands of ſouldiers ſtretched out from the bridge of Caſalecqua vnto the gate of Saragoſſa, hearing of the flying of the Legate and mutinies of the people, left the moſt part of his tents and pauilions pitched, and in great haſte went away with the whole army, except thoſe that being appointed for the guard of the campe, were on that ſide the riuer towards the French men, to whom he gaue no aduertiſement of his diſcamping. But the Bentiuoleis being now entred the towne, hearing of the breaking vp of the campe, gaue preſent notice to Triuulce, and ſent out of the towne part of the people to purſue them; by whom and by the paiſants which deſcended from all parts with infinite cries and clamours, their campe that paſſed along the walls was aſſailed, and their artilleries and munitions taken from them, with the moſt part of their baggage, although the French that by this time were come to the medley, tooke from the people and paiſants the moſt part of the things they had gotten. By this time alſo Theodore Triuulce with the vantguard was arriued at the bridge of Rene, where Raphael de Paſſi fighting valiantly, made head a long time againſt his enemies, but being ouercharged with multitude, he was at laſt taken priſoner, hauing giuen by the reſiſtance he made, a notable oportunitie to the Church ſouldiers to ſaue themſelues. But the Venetian companies and the bands of Ramaſſote which lay vpon the hill aboue S. Luke, hauing but very late knowledge of the flying of the Duke of Vrbin, ſought their ſafetie by the wayes of the mountaines, by the which notwithſtanding receiuing great harmes, they got at laſt into Romagna. In this victory, wonne without fighting, were taken fifteene peeces of great artillery, and many of leſſer ſort, belonging as well to the Pope as to the Venetians, the Popes owne ſtandard, with many other enſignes, a great part of the baggage Eccleſiaſticke, and almoſt all that of the Venetians, certaine men at armes of the Church ſpoiled and ſtripped, together with an hundred and fiftie of the Venetians, and almoſt all the footmen of both the one and the other army diſperſed. There remained priſoners Vrſin de Mugnagno, Iulio Manfron, with many other Captaines of meaner condition. Within Bologna there was not a man ſlaine, nor any violence done, either to the Nobles or to the Commons, onely there were made priſoners the Biſhop of Cluſo together with many other Prelates, Secretaries, and officers which were about the Cardinall and remained ſtill in his pallace, for that he had made none of them priuie to his departing. The ſame night and the day following, the people fell vpon an image of braſſe, being the Popes picture, which they trailed along along the market place in great ſcorne and deriſion, which inſolencie was referred either to the guard of the Bentiuoleis, or elſe for that the people wearied with the trauels and harmes of the warre (being by nature vnthankfull and deſirous of nouelrie) bare an hatred to the name and memory of him that had bene the cauſe of the libertie and felicitie of their countrey. The day after, which was the two and twentieth of May, Triuulce ſtayed at the ſame place, and the day following, leauing Bolognia behind him, he drew to the riuer of Adice, and afterward ſtayed at the borough of S. Peter, which is a frontier of the territories of Bolognia, to expect before he marched further, what would be the intention of the French King, whether to paſſe further againſt the ſtate of the Pope, or elſe contenting himſelfe to haue aſſured Ferrara, and taken from the Church the citie of Bolognia, which had bene gotten by his meanes, to ſtay there the courſe of his victory. By reaſon whereof Iohn Saſſatella the Popes Captaine, who had chaſed out of Imola the Gibeline faction, commanded that citie as chiefe of the Guelfes, hauing ſecretly made an offer vnto him to put the citie of Imola into his hands, he refuſed to accept it till he had the Kings anſwer. There reſted onely the Citadell of Bolognia, wherein was the Biſhop Vitelli, a Citadell large and ſtrong, but furniſhed after the maner of the fortreſſes of the Church, containing but a very ſlender ſtrength of footmen, very ſmall prouiſion of victuals, and almoſt no munitions: whereinto, whileſt it was holden beſieged, Vitſruch being certified of the ſucceſſe of Bolognia, was come from Modena by night, to perſwade the Biſhop with great promiſes and offers to deliuer it to Ceſar. But the Biſhop hauing compounded the firſt day with them of Bolognia, that the liues and goods of ſuch as were within ſhould be ſaued, and receiued obligation that within a certaine time they ſhould pay him three thouſand duckats, deliuered it vp into their hands: and they were no ſooner poſſeſſed of it, then they ranne by heapes to diſmantle and reuerſe it, the Bentiuoleis ſtirring them to that action, not ſo much to winne fauour with the citizens, as for feare leſt the French King would withhold it, ſome of his Captaines hauing already counſelled to demand it: but Triuulce would neuer giue his conſent, for that he thought it would be againſt the Kings profite if it ſhould be thought that he had a deſire to make himſelfe Lord of Bolognia. By the occaſion of this victory, the Duke of Ferrara recouered beſides Cento and Pieua, Cotignola, Lugo, and the other townes of Romagna, expulſing at the ſame time Albert Pio, who poſſeſſed them in common with him.

The Pope (as he had iuſt cauſe) was much diſcontented for the loſſe of Bolognia, not onely for that the Citie of moſt importance through the whole ſtate Eccleſiaſticke next to Rome, was taken from him, and that he ſuffered priuation of that glory which he had gotten in conquering it, which was great with the world, eſpecially in his owne conceit; but alſo for feare leſt the cõquering army ſhould follow their victory. Againſt the which knowing it was not poſſible for him to make reſiſtance, and ſeeking to remoue all occaſions that might prouoke them to paſſe further, he ſolicited that the remainders of the Venetian ſouldiers already reuoked by the Senate, ſhould embarke at the port of Seſena, and for the ſame cauſe he ſent to haue reſtored to him the twentie thouſand duckats which remained yet in Venice, being ſent thither afore to cauſe the Swiſſers to march. Moreouer he gaue order, that the Cardinall of Nants a Britton by nation, ſhould as it were of himſelfe ſolicite Triuulce to peace, perſwading that it was a very fit time to worke it: who made him this anſwer, that it was not meet to proceed in that generalitie, but that it was neceſſary to come expreſly to particularitie: That the King if he deſired peace, had propoſed the conditions, and that the Pope muſt now do the like, the eſtate of the affaires being ſuch, that it appertained to him to require it. The Pope proceeding in this ſort, more to auoid the preſent danger, then for any deſire he had to haue peace, feare, obſtinacie, hatred and diſdaine ſtriuing together in him: and at the ſame time hapned another accident, which redoubled his ſorrowes: There were brought to him many accuſations againſt the Cardinall of Pauie, ſome of infidelitie, ſome of cowardiſe, and ſome of ignorance: who being come to Rauenna to make his iuſtification, as ſoone as he was arriued, ſent to the Pope to ſignifie his comming, and to demand audience of him: wherewith the Pope, who loued him entirely, reioycing much, made anſwer that he ſhould come to dine with him. But as he was going to the Popes pallace, being accompanied by Guido Vaine and with the guard of his horſemen; the Duke of Vrbin, for an ancient hatred he bare him, and alſo for deſpite, as he ſaid, that the reuolt of Bolognia hapned through his fault, which was the occaſion of the flying of the army, followed him with a small traine, and thrusting in amongst his guard of horsemen; who for reuerence sake made him way, with a poyniard he slue the Cardinall with his owne hands; who haply for the degree he held, ought not to haue bene so outragiously abused, but in respect of his infinite vices, he deserued most cruell punishment. The report of the death of the Cardinall of Pauie being presently brought to the Pope, he began to lament with great cries and lamentable complainings, being moued out of measure for the losse of a Cardinall so deare to him, and much more for that such a dignitie had bene violated, almost afore his eyes, by the hands of his owne Nephew, and with an example not vsuall: a matter so much the more grieuous to him, by how much he made profession to preserue and exalt the authoritie Ecclesiastike. Not able to beare this griefe, and much lesse to temper his furie, he departed the same day from Ruetina to retheate to Raine: and that he might at one time be enuironed on all parts with infinite calamities, he was no sooner arriued at Rentiny, then he had aduertisement that within Modena, within Bologna, and in many other cities, there were fixed and set vp many placards in publike places, by the which was denounced to him the conuocation of the Councell, citing him to go thither in person. For though the Bishop of Gurce, after he was gone from Modena, had trauelled certaine dayes by baste iourneys, expecting the answer of the Scottish Embassadour, who went from him to Bolognia for affaires which the Pope himselfe had propounded: yet he being returned with answers very vncertaine, the Bishop of Gurce dispatched immediatly to Millan in the name of Cæsar three Proctors, who, ioyning with the Cardinals and with the Proctors of the French King, published the Councell to be celebrated the first day of September next in the Citie of Pisa. The Cardinals made choise of Pisa, as a place no lesse conuenient by the oportunitie of the sea, for many that were to be present at the Councell, then of speciall suretie, for the confidence the French King had in the Florentines: and for that many other places, which though they might haue bene capable of such an assembly, yet were either inconuenient or suspected of them, or at least the Pope might refuse them with iust colour. For there had bene no conueniency to assigne it in Frabee or in any other place of the Kings obedience; and Constance one of the free townes of Germany recommended by Cæsar, seemed very vnfit, notwithstanding it had bene made famous by the memory of that worthy Councell; wherein three that called themselues Popes were deposed, and the schisme rooted out that had continued fortie yeares in the Church: and Thurin was also suspected to both parties, for the neighborhood of the Swissers and the estates of France: Bolognia afore it was out of the obedience of the Church, was not sure for the Cardinals: and now it stood in the like case in regard of the Pope. Moreouer, the election of the Citie of Pisa for the Councell, did in part presage good lucke, for the memory of two Councels which had bene there happily celebrated: the one, when almost all the Cardinals who abandoned Gregorie the twelfth and Benet the thirteenth, who quarelled together for the Popedome, celebrating the Councell in that Citie, chose Pope Alexander the fift: and the other which was a long time before celebrated in the same place, about the yeare 1136 by Innocent the second, at such time as Peter Leon Antipape of Rome was condemned, who causing himselfe to be called Anacletus the second, with such a schisme had not onely much troubled Innocent, but also all Christendome. The Florentines had afore granted Pisa to the French King, who required it of them, giuing them to vnderstand, that Cæsar, no lesse then he, was the author of the conuocation of the Councell, and that the King of Aragon had consented thereunto: wherein they deserued to be praised, more perhaps for their silence, then for their wisedome or courage. For, either not hauing the courage to denie the King the thing that was grieuous vnto them, or not considering how many difficulties and dangers might grow vpon them by a Councell which was celebrated against the Popes will, they kept that deliberation so secret that was made in an assembly or Councell of more then an hundred and fiftie citizens, that the Cardinals, to whom the French King gaue hope thereof, were not well assured that they had accorded, neither had the Pope any knowledge of it. The Cardinals pretended that the Councell might be iudicially called by them, without the authoritie of the Pope, for the most apparent necessitie (as they said) that the Church had to be reformed, not onely in her members, but also in her head, meaning the person of the Pope: who (as they affirmed) being hardened in Simonie, and manners infamous and damnable, not fit to gouerne the Papacie, and author of so many warres, was notoriously incorrigible, to the vniuersall scandall of all Christendome, for the safetie whereof, there was no other medicine sufficient, then the conuocation

tion of a Councell: whereof seeing the Pope had no care, that the power of conuocation thereof was lawfully diuolued to them, specially the authoritie of the elect Empour being adioyned, and the consent of the right Christian King, together with the Cleargie of Germanie and France concurring. They added, that often to vse this medicine, was a meanes not onely profitable but necessary for the diseased bodie of the Church, both to roote out the old errors, and to suppresse such as should newly spring; to explane & interpret the doubts which daily happned, and to correct such things, which in the beginning being well ordained, sometimes by experience proued hurtfull: That for these reasons the ancient Fathers in the Councell of Constance had wholesomly decreed, that alwayes afterwards the Councell should be celebrated and holden from ten yeares to ten yeares. For what other bridle then this was there to keepe them in the right way? And considering the great frailtie of men, and the many enticements which prouoke vs to do ill during our life, how can we otherwise dwell in safetie, if he that hath all libertie, be well assured that he shall neuer giue a reckoning of his doings? On the other side, many debated these reasons, who adhering more to the doctrine of the Diuines, then of the Canonists, alledged that the authoritie to call Councels rested onely in the person of the Pope, yea though he were infected with all vices, so that he were not suspected of heresie; and that if it were otherwise interpreted, it would be in the power of a few, (which ought neuer to be consented vnto) either for ambition, or for particular hatreds, couering their wicked intentions with false colours, daily to alter and change the peaceable estate of the Church: That all medicines were wholesome; yet if they were not ministred with due proportions, and in times conuenient, they were rather poison then medicine: and therefore condemning all those that had another opinion, they called this assembly not a Councell, but a meanes to deuide the vnitie of the Sea of Rome, a seminary of sedition in the Church, and a hellish conuenticle.

THE TENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

After the taking of Bolognia, the French armie returneth to the Duchie of Millan. The Pope falleth ſicke, and is thought to be dead, whereof ariſe ſome ſtirres. He recouereth, and followeth his purpoſe to chaſe the French out of Italy, and to that end maketh a league with the Venetians and with the king of Spaine. Contention betweene the Cardinals that were to go to Piſa, and the Florentines. The opinion that was had of this Councell, which is transferred to Millan, where many ſtirres happen. The Popes armie beſiegeth Bolognia. The French men take Breſſia. The deſcription of the battell of Rauenna, whereof the victorie remained to the French, but dearely bought with the death of their Generall. Rauenna ſacked by the victors. The Cardinals being aſtoniſhed, perſwade the Pope to hearken to peace. The King of Aragon is of a contrary mind. The Pope is in doubt, and Iulio de Medicis doth ſettle his mind, ſo that he reſolueth rather to abandon Rome, then to make peace, for which he is ſought vnto by the King. He publiſheth the Councell of Latran. And afterwards the affaires of the French begin to decline.

THE moſt part of Chriſtendome, but principally all Italy, expected (in great doubt of mind) what the French King would deliberate after he had gotten the victory. For, euery one ſaw clearly, that it was in his power to make himſelfe Lord of Rome and the whole ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, for that almoſt all the Popes regiments were diſperſed and diſſolued, and much more thoſe of the Venetians; and for that there remained not in Italy any other armies able to make reſiſtance againſt the furie of the victor: and it was likely that the Pope being defended onely with the name and maieſtie of the Papacie, ſtood in all other regards reduced to the diſcretion of fortune. And yet the French King, either the reuerence which he bare to religion retaining him, or elſe fearing to ſtirre vp other Princes againſt him if he proceeded any further, when he had determined not to vſe the oportunitie of his victory, (with a counſell perhaps more religious then profitable) he commanded Iohn Iaques Triuulce to returne with the armie to the Duchie of Millan, leauing Bolognia to the Bentiuoleis, and making reſtitution of all other peeces which he occupied of the Church. To theſe actions ſo gracious and affable, he added moſt courteous words and demonſtrations. For, he forbad to make any publicke ſignes of gladneſſe in his realme; and proteſted oftentimes in the preſence of many, that notwithſtanding he had committed no fault either againſt the Sea Apoſtolike, or againſt the perſon of the Pope, nor done any thing but by prouocation and conſtraint; yet, for the reuerence he bare to that Sea, he would humble himſelfe and ſue for pardon; perſwading himſelfe that the Pope, knowing by experience the difficulties of his conceits and purpoſes, and being aſſured of the ſuſpition which he had of him without occaſion, would with all his heart come to deſire peace, the negociation whereof had neuer bene altogether giuen ouer, ſeeing the Pope, ſince he parted from afore Bolognia, had for that occaſion ſent to the King the Embaſſadour of the King of Scots, continuing to ſolicite the ſame points, which by the ſame Biſhop had bene begun to be debated with the Biſhop of Gurce. In this diſpoſition to peace ioyned alſo the family of the Bentiuoleis, who notwithſtanding they followed the authoritie of the King, yet they ſignified to the Pope, that they would not be diſobedient and rebellious to the Church, but continue in the ſame ſubiection wherein their fathers had continued ſo many yeares: in token whereof they had not onely ſet at libertie the Biſhop of Cluſe, but according to the ancient vſage, lodged him in the Pallace as Lieutenant to the Pope. Then Triuulce departed with the armie, and drew neare to Mirandola to recouer it, notwithſtanding at the requeſt of Iohn Francis Piqua, Vitfruch was entred, tred, vnder colour to hold it in the name of Cæſar, and by proteſtation had ſent to require Triuulce, that becauſe it was of the iuriſdiction of the Empire, he ſhould abſtaine from all violent action: but in the end finding that his vaine authoritie was not ſufficient, he went his way, Triuulce giuing him onely certaine promiſes, more honorable for Cæſar in ſhew then in effect: the like did Iohn Francis, after he had obtained ſafeconduct for goods and life; and Triuulce hauing no other expedition to follow, ſent to the guard of Verona fiue hundred Lances, and thirteene hundred Lanceknights vnder Captaine Iacob; and reſeruing to himſelfe fiue and twentie hundred Gaſcons vnder the regiment of Captaine Molard and Mangiron, which, with the companies of the men at armes, he ſent diſperſed into the townes of the Duchie of Millan, he diſmiſſed all the other bands of footmen. But the will and intention of the Pope was not anſwerable to the deſire and hope of the King, for that riſing into new courage by the reuoking of the armie, and being euery day more and more hard and obſtinate by the things that in all likelihood ſhould haue made him more tractable, chiefly ſith that at Riminy where he yet remained, he lay tormented with the gout, in the midſt of ſo many perplexities he propounded more like a Victor, then one that was vanquiſhed, by the working of the ſame Scottiſh Embaſſadour, That the Duke of Ferrara ſhould pay to him hereafter the tributes which he was wont to pay before the diminution which had bene made vnto him by Pope Alexander: That the Church ſhould hold a Vicedomino in Ferrara, as the Venetians did before: and that there ſhould be rendred to him Lugo, with the other townes which Alphonſo d'Eſte poſſeſſed in Romagna. Theſe conditions although they were very offenſiue to the King, yet he had ſo great a deſire to be at peace with the Pope, that he made anſwer, that he was cõtent to conſent to the moſt part of thoſe demands, ſo farre forth as the conſent of Cæſar might alſo concurre in them. But the Pope being now returned to Rome, had altered his mind, the perſwaſions of the King of Aragon helping no leſſe then his owne naturall lightneſſe and mutabilitie. For, the King of Aragon, whom the late victory of the French king had confirmed in a very great ſuſpition, had ſodainly laid aſide all the great preparations which he had made to paſſe in perſon into Africk, where he maintained continuall warres with the Moores: and hauing called home from thence Peter of Nauarre with three thouſand Spaniſh footmen, he ſent him to the realme of Naples, to the end at one time both to aſſure his owne eſtates, and to giue courage to the Pope to be ſo much the more eſtranged from peace. The Pope then made anſwer, that he would not heare of peace, vnleſſe the Venetians might be accorded with Cæſar: vnleſſe Alphonſo d'Eſte, ouer and beſides the firſt demands, made him ſatisfaction for all the expences which he had defrayed in the warre: and vnleſſe the King would be bound not to hinder him in the recouery of Bologna; which Citie, as a rebell to the Ghurch, he had already excommunicated: and, to make ſpoile of the corne of their countrey, he had ſent into Romagna Marke Anthonie Colonno and Ramaſſote, who notwithſtanding were eaſily repulſed by the people, being ſcarcely entred into the frontiers. Notwithſtanding this anſwer, the Pope ouercome by the petitions of the Cardinals, as ſoone as he came to Rome, conſented to the deliuery of the Cardinall of Achx, hauing bene till that day kept priſoner within the caſtle of S. Ange: but it was with this condition, that he ſhould not go out of the Pallace of Vatican till all the Prelates and officers that were taken within Bologna were ſet at libertie, and that afterwards he ſhould not depart from Rome, vnder paine of fortie thouſand ducats, for the which he was to giue ſufficient caution: and yet not long after he ſuffered him to returne into France, with charge, not to be at the Councell, vpon the like paine. The Popes anſwer moued ſo much the more the mind of the King, by how much he was perſwaded that he would conſent to the conditions which he himſelfe had offered: and therefore determining to withſtand him in the recouerie of Bologna, he ſent thither immediatly a new ſtrength of foure hundred Lances, and not long after he tooke into his protection the citie with all the family of the Bentiuoleis, without receiuing of them any couenant to miniſter either men or money. And knowing that the alliance of Cæſar was now more neceſſarie to him then euer, whereas afore he bare ſome inclination not to giue him thoſe ſupplies of men which he had promiſed him in the capitulation made with the Biſhop of Gurci, if he paſſed not in perſon into Italy (that being the couenant and condition of his promiſe;) he gaue preſent order that from the Duchie of Millan the bands that had bene promiſed ſhould march thither vnder the gouernment of Monſieur de la Paliſſa, for that Triuulce whom Cæſar had required, refuſed the iourney.

The French king takes Bologna into his protection.

By this time Cæſar was come to Inſpruch, hauing on the one ſide a great deſire to make warre vpon the Venetians, and on the other finding himſelfe confuſed with many thoughts. For, conſidering that in the end all that he ſhould do, would be to ſmall purpoſe if he tooke not Padua, and that that enterpriſe required ſo great forces and ſo mightie preparations, as was almoſt impoſſible to be gathered together: ſometimes he ſuffered himſelfe to be carried with a deſire to agree with the Venetians, whereunto the King Catholike vrged him much: and ſometimes ouer-ruled with his owne conceits, he thought to march to Rome in perſon with his armie, to occupie (according to his ancient deſire) all the eſtate of the Church; wherein he laid his plot to leade thither a mightie army of Almains, beſides the French companies. But by reaſon of his diſabilities and diſorders, the execution of things was not anſwerable to his imagination, ſo that he conſumed the time without putting any thing to action, ſometimes promiſing from day to day to come in perſon, and ſometimes to ſend men: and therefore it ſeemed grieuous to the King to take vpon him alone to ſuſtaine ſuch a burthen: which reaſon, conformable to his nature, which was ſparing, could oftentimes do more with him then the perſwaſions that many made to the contrary, that if Cæſar were not mightily ſuccoured by him, he would at laſt ioyne with his enemies; whereby it would happen, that beſides his neceſſitie to be at a greater charge, his eſtates in Italy would fall into very great dangers. Amid theſe doubts and difficulties, the tumults of temporall armes began to grow cold: but thoſe of the ſpirituall grew daily more hot, as well on the part of the Cardinals that were authors of the Councell, as on the Popes behalfe, who vſed all his endeuour to ſuppreſſe ſuch an euill afore it became greater.

The Councell, as you haue heard before, was denounced and ſignified vnder the authoritie of the Emperour and the French King, the Cardinals of S. Croſſe, S. Malo, Baieux, and Coſenſo interpoſing therein, the Cardinall alſo of S. Seuerin conſenting manifeſtly, and ſucceſſiuely, the Proctors of both the one & ỹ other King were preſent at the counſels & deliberations that were made: but the fiue Cardinals, authors of this peſtilence, added by way of intimation, to giue it the greater authoritie, the names of other Cardinals, of whom Cardinall Albert a French man durſt not diſobey the cõmandements of his King, although he conſented thereunto very vnwillingly: and touching the others that were named by them, Cardinall Adrian and the Cardinall of Finalo proteſted openly that that matter was wrought wholly without their appointment or conſent. So that more then ſixe Cardinals not declaring themſelues for this buſineſſe, the Pope, hoping to draw them to a voluntary renouncing of the matter, dealt with them continually, offering to pardon them the errors that had bene committed, and that with ſuch ſuretie, that they ſhould not need to feare that any trouble would happen vnto them: whereunto the Cardinals gaue a diſſembled eare. But the Pope for all this abſtained not from more powerfull remedies, in ſo much as following the counſell (as was ſaid) of Anthonie du Mont de ſaint Sanſouin, one of the Cardinals of his laſt creation at Rauenna, ſeeking to purge himſelfe of negligence, he aſſigned an vniuerſall Councell in the towne of Rome, within the church of S. Iohn de Latran, for the firſt day of May next coming: by which conuocation he pretended that the Councell called by his aduerſaries was broken, and that in that which he had publiſhed was iudicially contained the power and authoritie of all, notwithſtanding the Cardinals alledged, that although it had bene true in the beginning, yet ſeeing they had preuented it, the Councell that had bene inſtituted and called by them ought to take place. The Councell being publiſhed, and the Pope repoſing more then euer in his right, and withall deſpairing to be able to reconcile the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, who through ambition to be Pope, had bene a chiefe mouer of this alteration; and likewiſe the Cardinals S. Malo and Coſenſa (for touching the others, he was not without hope to reduce them to his obediẽce) he publiſhed againſt thoſe three a threatning monition, vnder paine of priuation of the dignitie of Cardinall, and of all their Church rights and benefites, if within threeſcore and fiue dayes they made not their appearance afore him: and the better to diſpoſe them to the Popes will, the Colledge of Cardinals ſent to them an Auditor de la Rote to perſwade and pray them, that leauing their priuate contentions, they ſhould returne to the vnion of the Church, offering to giue them ſuch forme of ſecuritie as they deſired. The Pope at the ſame time, either for that he was in doubt and vnreſolued in his mind, or elſe puſhed on by ſome other cauſe, hearkned continually after the practiſe of peace with the French King, the which was ſolicited in his owne Court by the Kings Embaſſadours, and in the French Court by the Embaſſadour of Scotland and the Biſhop of Tiuoli the Popes Nuncio:

and on the other ſide he laboured to make with the King of Aragon and the Venetians a new confederation againſt the French. About this time alſo, the Pope ſought to render Montpulcian to the Florentines, not for any good he wiſhed to them, but for feare leſt the truce which they had with Sienna being expired, they would call into Tuſcane the French bands, to the end to be the better able to recouer that towne. And albeit it was grieuous to the Pope that the Florentines ſhould recouer Montpulcian, and that to hinder them he had already ſent to Sienna Iohn Vitelli entertained with an hundred men at armes by the Siennois and himſelfe, and Guido Vaine with an hundred light horſemen: yet afterwards conſidering better, that by how much the difficultie appeared great, by ſo much the more would the Florentines be induced to call them, he determined, to the end to take from the King all occaſions to ſend armed bands into a place ſo neare Rome, to prouide for this danger by a contrary way; Pandolfe Petrucci conſenting to it, whom the Florentines nouriſhed artificially in the ſame ſuſpition. The matter was debated many dayes, for that (as ſmall things are oftentimes no leſſe difficult to be reſolued, then ſuch as be farre greater) Pandolfe to auoide the hatred of the people of Sienna, would the proceeding ſhould be ſuch, that it might ſeeme there was no other remedie to aſſure him from the warre, and not to alienate the Popes mind. Moreouer, the Pope and he would, that at the ſame time there ſhould be made betweene the Florentines and the Siennois a confederation for the defence of their owne eſtates: and yet they feared on the other ſide, leſt they of Montpulcian perceiuing their practiſe, would preuent them, in rendring themſelues voluntarily, winning by that meanes the fauour of the Florentines, who atchieuing their intention, might afterwards refuſe to make the confederation. For this cauſe Iohn Vitelli was ſent to remaine within Montpulcian, and the Pope ſent thither Iames Simonnet the Iudge of his Court, called certaine yeares after to be Cardinall, to the end that by his meanes, the affaires of Montpulcian might be accommodated: ſo that in the end, there was made at one time a confederation for fiue and twentie yeares, betweene the Florentines and the Siennois: and Montpulcian returned into the hands of the Florentines, Simonnet interpoſing for the pardon, and confirmation of the ancient exemptions and priuiledges.

The Emperour and the Venetians carried themſelues for certaine moneths more peaceably the one towards the other then had wont to be: for that the Almaines being neither ſtrong in men, nor prouided of money, thought they did a ſeruice of no ſmall importance, if they kept Verona: and the Venetian armie wanting ſufficient forces to take that Citie, were retired betweene Soaue and Lonigue, from whence they made a ſally one night, and burnt both on this ſide and beyond the riuer of Adice, a great quantitie of the corne of the inhabitants of Verona; notwithſtanding being aſſailed in their returne, they loſt three hundred footmen. But as ſoone as they heard that Monſieur de Paliſſa approched Verona with twelue hundred Lances and eight thouſand footmen, their armie retired betweene Vincenſa and Legnague, into a place of ſtrength, bearing almoſt the forme and ſituation of an Iland, by reaſon of certaine waters and trenches that they had cut vp: in which place they tarried not many daies, for that Monſieur de Paliſſa arriuing at Verona with a great part of his armie, and without expecting the reſidue, taking the field preſently together with the Almains, they retired almoſt in maner of flying to Lonigue, and afterward with the ſame feare abandoning Vincenſa and all the other townes, together with Poleſins de Rouigna, which ſometimes was pillaged by the Venetians, and ſometimes preyed vpon by the Duke of Ferrara, they withdrew themſelues into Padua and Treuiſa: for the defence of which cities, many yong Gentlemen of Veniee came thither, as they had formerly done to Padua. The armie of the French and Almaines ſacked Lonigue: and Vincenſa which was become a miſerable prey to thoſe that were the ſtrongeſt in the field, yeelded vnto them. But all theſe enterpriſes and conqueſts were of ſmall conſequence for the ſubſtance of the warre, ſo far forth as the Venetians held Padua and Treuiſa: for that by the opportunitie of thoſe Cities, as ſoone as the French ſuccours were deuided from the Almaines, they recouered without difficultie the peeces they had loſt. By reaſon whereof, after theſe proceedings and aduancements, the armie ſtayed many dayes at the bridge of Barberano, expecting there either the arriuall or the reſolution of Cæſar, who being come betweene Trent and Rouero, deuiſing at one time how to follow his pleaſures in hunting wilde beaſts according to his cuſtome, and to ſend bands of footmen to the armie, he promiſed to come to Montagnana, ſometimes pretending to vndertake the enterpriſe of Padua, ſometimes that of Treuiſa, & ſometimes to go take Rome. But in all theſe actions he ſhewed himhimſelfe variable, by reaſon of his inconſtancie, and found difficulties therein by reaſon of his extreme pouertie, and no leſſe in the attempt of Rome then in the other enterpriſes: for that to march thither with thoſe forces of the French, ſeemed to him an action both againſt his dignitie and ſuretie: and the feare leſt in the abſence of that armie the Venetians would aſſaile Verona, compelled him to leaue there a ſtrong garriſon. Beſides, the French King made difficultie to ſeparate his people from the Duchie of Millan by ſo great a diſtance of countreys, for the ſmall hope he had to haue accord with the Swiſſers: who beſides the inclinations they expreſſed to the deſires of the Pope, ſpake openly to the Embaſſadour of the French King, that the peoples of their Nation were not a litle grieued with the ruines of the Venetians, for the communitie that their commonweales had together. At laſt the plots and great diſcourſes of Cæſar came, according to his cuſtome, to reſolue into effects vnworthy his reputation: for that on the one ſide, hauing increaſed the armie with three hundred men at armes Almaines, and on the other ſide, giuen audience to the Venetian Embaſſadours, with whom he debated continually, and had cauſed Monſieur de Paliſſa to come firſt to Longaro neare Vincenſa, and afterwards to S. Croſſe, he ſolicited him to go take Newcaſtle, which is a paſſage below Eſcalo drawing to Friul, within twelue miles of Feltre, to make his deſcending the more eaſie on that ſide. Therefore Monſieur de Paliſſa marched to Montbellono ten miles from Treuiſa, from whence hauing ſent fiue hundred horſemen and two thouſand footmen to open the paſſage of Newcaſtle, they went to Eſcalo. About which time the light horſemen of the Venetians who ouerran all the countrey without impediment, ouerthrew neare to Moroſtiquo, about ſeuen hundred footmen and many horſemen, both French and Italians: who, to paſſe in ſuretie where the armie was, went from Verona to Soaue, to ioyne with three hundred French Lances, who being come after Monſieur de Paliſſa, expected in that place his direction. And albeit in the beginning, things ſucceeded well with the French men and Almaines, and that Count Guido Rangon leader of the Venetians was taken, yet many paiſants deſcending in fauour of the Venetians, and many occaſions riſing to their aduantage, they remained in the end victorious, about foure hundred of the French footmen being left dead, and their Captaines Mangiron and Rochemaro detained priſoners. But now the reſolutions which before had bene debated and ſet downe, grew more and more to ſlacken and calme, for that the French King ſeeing that the preparations of Cæſar were not anſwerable to his promiſes and offers, withdrawing himſelfe out of Italy, he returned from Dauphiney where he had remained many days, to Bloys: and Cæſar being now retired from Trent, with a mind to go no more to the armie, in ſtead of reconquering all that the Venetians held in the firme land, or elſe Rome with the whole eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, gaue direction that the Almains ſhould enter into Friul, and vpon the countrey of Treuiſa, not ſo much to vexe the Venetians, as to conſtraine the townes of the countrey to giue him money to free themſelues from pillage: and to the end his people ſhould not be hindred, he appointed the French men to paſſe further, beſtowing two hundred Lances within Verona, where the plague was very hote: for that (hauing an intention to aſſaile Friul) there could not be aſſigned to that ſeruice other of his bands, then ſuch as were reſerued for the guard of the Caſtles. Monſieur de Paliſſa conſented to all theſe things, with whom being ioyned Monſieur d'Aubigny Captaine of the three hundred Lances which were at Soaue, he went and incamped vpon the riuer of Piaue. Beſides this, for a greater ſuretie of Verona, the Almaines left two hundred horſemen within Soaue, who lying very negligently, vſing neither watch nor ward, were one night almoſt all ſlaine or taken, by foure hundred light horſemen and foure hundred footmen of the Venetians. During all this yeare the warres, according to the cuſtome, had gone on diuerſly in Friul, Iſtria, and in the quarters of Trieſte and Fiumo, both by land, and by ſea with ſmall veſſels, thoſe wretched countreys being now ranſacked by one partie, and then by the other. Afterwards the armie of the Almains were entred into Friul, and as ſoone as they had made their approach before Vdina, the principall place of that prouince, and where the Venetian Magiſtrates were reſident, who fled away very cowardly, by reaſon whereof the towne yeelded immediatly, and afterwards by one courſe of victory all the countrey of Friul did the like, euery towne being taxed to a proportion of money according to their abilities. There remained onely Gradiſquo, ſituated vpon the riuer of Liſonce, wherein was Lewis Moſſeniguo Treaſurer of Friul, with three hundred horſemen, and many bands of footmen: which being beaten vpon by the artillery, when it had made defence againſt the firſt aſſault, was yeelded vp by the importunitie of the ſouldiers, the Treaſurer remaining priſoner.

Friul taken againe by the Almaines.

ſoner. From Friul the Almaines returned to ioyne with Monſieur de Paliſſa encamping within fiue miles of Treuiſa, to which Citie they made their approch all together, for that Cæſar made great inſtance that they would aſſay to take it: but finding it well fortified on all ſides, and wanting pioners, munitions, and other neceſſary prouiſions, and therefore being out of all hope to be able to take it, they retired. A litle after, Monſieur de Paliſſa by the Kings direction, departed to returne to the Duchie of Millan, for that the feare of new confederations and the riſing of the Swiſſers increaſed continually. In retiring he had alwayes at his backe the Venetian eſtradiots, who hoped to diſtreſſe him, at the leaſt at the paſſage of the riuers of Brent and Adice, neuertheleſſe he paſſed both ſafely, hauing ſtripped (before he paſſed Brent) two hundred horſemen of the Venetians which were lodged without Padua, of whom Peter de Lungaro their Captaine remained priſoner. His departing left the Almaines not a litle confuſed, for that when they could not obtain ℔ 300. other French Lances ſhould remain for the guard of Verona, they were conſtrained to retire thither, leauing in prey to the enemie all they had gained that Sommer. By which occaſion the Venetian army, whereof Iohn Paul Baillon was Gouernour by the death of Luke Maluezzo, recouered immediatly Vincenſa, and entring afterwards into Friul, they razed Cremonſa, and tooke in the whole countrey, except Gradiſqua, which they could not take, although a few dayes after certaine bands of footmen leuied in the countrey of Tyrol, tooke Codora, and in like ſort ſacked Bellona. The Venetians recouer Friul.

In this ſort, with like effects and ſhort, were determined (for this Sommer) the actions and enterpriſes of armes, with leſſe profite then ignominie to the name of Cæſar, but with ſpecial reputation to the Venetians, who for the ſpace of two yeares inuaded by the armies of Cæſar and the French King, came at laſt to retaine their owne forces and their owne iuriſdiction: Matters which albeit they were directly againſt Cæſar, yet they brought much more harmes to the French King. For, whileſt that fearing haply too much the proſperitie and greatneſſe of Cæſar, or following ill counſell, and not looking into the dangers that were at hand, or wiſedome being blinded with couetouſneſſe, he gaue not to the Emperour ſuch ſuccors as might enable him to obtaine the victory deſired, he gaue him occaſion, yea brought him almoſt into neceſſitie to open his eares to ſuch as ceaſſed not to perſwade him to ſeparate from him, keeping at one time the Venetians in ſuch eſtate, that they were able with greater forces to knit with thoſe that deſired to embaſe the Kings power: ſo that men began now to diſcerne, that in the mind of Cæſar new thoughts began to kindle, ſpecially in regard of the Councell, the buſineſſe whereof he embraced very coldly, chiefly ſince the publication of that of Latran: for neither did he ſend thither according to his many promiſes, any Almaine Prelates in the name of Germanie, nor any Proctors to aſſiſt in his name: neither did he once ſtirre for the example of the French King, who had ordained that in the common name of the French Churches, foure and twentie Biſhops ſhould go to Piſa, and that all the other Prelates of his Realme ſhould either go thither in perſon, or elſe ſend their Proctors. And yet either to excuſe theſe delayes, or that ſuch was his deſire indeed, he began at that time to make inſtance, that for the greater commoditie of the Prelates of Germanie, and for that he promiſed to be there in perſon, the Councell that had bene denounced at Piſa, might be transferred either to Mantua, to Verona, or to Trent: which demand being grieuous to all the other for many cauſes, and pleaſing onely to the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, who, burning in ambition to mount vp to the Popedome (to which end he had ſowne theſe diſcords) hoped that by the fauour of the Emperour (in whoſe good affection towards him he truſted much) he might eaſily be raiſed to that ſeate. Notwithſtanding for that the cauſe of the Councell would ſtand much weakned, and almoſt vnperfect without the authoritie of Cæſar, they ſent vnto him by common conſent the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, both to beſeech him that he would ſend away the Prelates and Proctors which he had ſo often promiſed, and alſo to giue him aſſurance on their behalfe, that as ſoone as they had giuen beginning to the Councell at Piſa, they would transferre it to the place which he ſhould appoint: declaring vnto him, that if they ſhould do it afore, it could not but be very preiudiciall to the common cauſe, and ſpecially for that it imported much to preuent the Conuocation which the Pope had publiſhed. Galeas the brother of the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, whom with a felicitie far different from the infelicitie of Lodowike Sforce his firſt Lord, the King had honored with the office of the Maiſter of his horſe, went with him to make the ſame inſtance to Cæſar on the Kings behalfe. But the King ſent him principally of purpoſe to confirme with new offers and plots, the mind of Cæſar, ſar, for whoſe inconſtancie he liued in no litle doubt and ſuſpition, although at the ſame time he was not without hope to conclude the peace with the Pope; the which being diſputed at Rome by the Cardinall of Nants and the Cardinall of Strigonia, and in France by the Scottiſh Biſhop and the Biſhop of Tiuoly, was reduced into ſuch termes, that almoſt all the conditions being accorded, the Pope had ſent to the Biſhop of Tiuoly power to giue it perfection: but there were inſerted in this commiſſion, certaine limitations, which gaue no ſmall occaſion to men to thinke that his intention was otherwiſe then were his words, ſpecially for that it was diſcerned, that at the ſame time he had to do with many Potentates in matters altogether contrary to this.

In this great doubt, there lacked not much that an accident falling vpon the Popes perſon, had broken all the practiſes & beginnings of euils that were in preparing: for he being fallen ſick the ſeuenteenth day of Auguſt, the fourth day after there tooke him ſuch a qualme, that for certaine houres ſuch as were about him held him for dead: by reaſon whereof the brute being ſpred abroad that he was dead, many Cardinals that were abſent, put themſelues vpon the way to come to Rome, and among the reſt thoſe that had conuocated the Councell. And at Rome the people made no leſſe ſtirre, then had bene accuſtomed at the death of Popes; yea, there appeared ſignes and tokens of farre greater tumults, for that Pompey Colonno Biſhop of Reato, and Antimo Sauelle, yong men of the Romane Nobilitie, full of ſedition, aſſembling the Commons in the Capitoll, aſſayed with ſeditious words to perſwade them to put themſelues in libertie. But as they laboured with a vehement ambition to ſtirre vp the people of Rome to publike rebellion, the Pope reuiued from his dangerous qualme; which being ſomewhat ceaſſed, and yet the feare being greater then the hope of his life, the day following, in the preſence of the Cardinals which were aſſembled in forme of a Conſiſtory, he gaue abſolution to his nephew of the murder he had committed vpon the Cardinall of Pauie; not by the courſe of iuſtice, as he had bene aduiſed before, (the ſhortneſſe of the time impugning) but by grace, and Apoſtolike indulgence, as to a perſon penitent: and in the ſame Conſiſtory he ſolicited that the election of his ſucceſſor ſhould be made canonically. And ſeeking to barre others from climing to ſo high a degree by the meanes which raiſed him to it, he cauſed a Bull to be publiſhed, full of horrible paines againſt thoſe that ſhould aſpire to the Popedom, either by mony or by other recompence, declaring all election to be voide that ſhould be made by ſymonie, and giuing an entrie and meanes very eaſie to any Cardinall to impugne it: which conſtitution he had made euen when he was within Bolognia, being at that time diſcontented with certaine Cardinals who laboured openly to obtaine the promiſes of other Cardinals, that they might be choſen to the Papacie after his death. Then he began apparently to amend, either by his ſtrong and able complexion, or elſe for that by deſtinie he was reſerued to be the author and principall occaſion of more long and greater calamities in Italy. For the recouery of his health could not be attributed either to the skill or remedies of the Phyſitions, to whom he was vtterly diſobedient, eating in the greateſt perill of his malady, raw apples, and things contrary to their preſcription. As ſoone as the Pope was deliuered from the danger of death, he returned to his old deuices and determinations, continuing at one time to ſolicite a peace with the French King, and a confederation with the King of Aragon and the Senate of Venice againſt the French: and albeit his will was more inclined to warre then to peace, yet oftentimes he was drawne by many reaſons, now into one opinion, and then into another. That which cauſed him to incline to the warre, beſides his ancient hatred againſt the French, and that he was not able to obtaine all the conditions of peace which he deſired, were the perſwaſions of the King of Aragon, who feared more then euer, leſt the French King being once at peace with the Pope, would aſſaile the realme of Naples vpon the firſt occaſion. And to the end his counſels might carry the greater authoritie, beſides the armie at ſea which was afore repaſſed out of Africa into Italy vnder Peter of Nauarre, he had ſent newly out of Spaine another ſea-armie, containing fiue hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred horſemen mounted vpon Ienners, and three thouſand footmen: which forces ioyned to the others, were of no ſmall regard, as well in reſpect of their number as of their valour. And yet this King proceeding with his accuſtomed ſubtilties, made ſhew that he deſired rather the warre againſt the Moores, and that his owne profite or particular intereſt drew him not from it, but onely the deuotion which he had alwayes borne to the Sea of Rome: & that being not able of himſelfe to entertaine his ſouldiers, the aid of the Pope and the Senate of Venice was neceſſary

ſary for him: whereunto that they might the more eaſily condeſcend, his bands that were all deſcended into the Ile of Capri neare to Naples, made ſhewes as though they prepared to paſſe into Africa. But his immoderate demands much amazed the Pope, and his ſubtilties pleaſing him not at all, he entred into many ſuſpitions: for he knew well that that King ceaſſed not to giue to the French king hopes quite contrary. He knew that the Venetians would not be drawne from his deuotion: but he was not ignorant, that by reaſon of ſo great a war wherein they were, they were not able to beare out the burthen and charges as before: and that the Senate deſired now rather to looke to the defence of their owne, then to take in hand a new warre, which could not be continued without very great and almoſt intollerable expences. He hoped that the Swiſſers, by a common inclination of thoſe countrymen, would declare themſelues againſt the French King; but hauing no certaintie thereof, he held it not meet to expoſe himſelfe to ſo great dangers for a hope ſo vncertaine, knowing that as yet they had not altogether left off their practiſes with the French King, and that many of the principals of them, to whom reuerted no ſmall profits by the French amitie, laboured all they might, that in the aſſembly which was preſently to be holden, their alliance might be renewed with the King. And touching the will and intention of Ceſar, although he was much incited by the King Catholike, and of his owne nature a great enemy to the French name, yet his hope alſo was leſſe then his feare, knowing the great offers that were now made to him as well againſt the Venetians, as againſt him, and that the French King was able to performe greater matters then any other could promiſe: and that if Ceſar ſhould ioyne with the French King, he had great cauſe to feare the Councell, by reaſon of his authoritie: and his owne power being ioyned in good earneſt with the forces and treaſures of the French King, and with the oportunitie of the eſtates of them both, the Pope could not haue any hope of the victory, which he found very hard to obtaine againſt the French King alone. But that which gaue him the greateſt ſtomacke, was the hope he had that the King of England would be won to raiſe warre againſt the French King, both by the counſels and perſwaſions of the King Catholike his father in law, and for the authoritie of the ſea of Rome, which was then great in the Ile of England, and in whoſe name he had with vehement petitions implored his ſuccours againſt the French King, as againſt an vſurper and oppreſſor of the Church. But that King was the more prouoked by a naturall hatred, as well of himſelfe, as of the people of England againſt the French nation, whereunto was much helping the Kings youth, and the great abundance of treaſure left him by his father, which according to the report of perſons worthy of credit, amounted to a quantitie almoſt ineſtimable. Theſe things enflamed the mind of this yong King, who had neuer ſeene in his houſe other then happie fortune: alſo a deſire to renew the glory of his anceſtors, who intituling themſelues Kings of France, and at ſundry times hauing tormented that kingdome with great warres, held a long time not onely Guienne and Normandie (rich and mightie Prouinces) and tooke in a battell neare Poytiers King John with two of his ſonnes, and many great Lords; but alſo tooke, together with the moſt part of the kingdome, the Citie of Paris, the chiefe Citie of France, with ſuch ſucceſſe and aſtoniſhment, that if Henrie the fift, who was then King of England, had not exchanged this life in the flower of his age, and in the glorious courſe of his victories, by a ſickneſſe that came vpon him, it was aſſuredly beleeued that he had made an abſolute conqueſt of the whole realme of France: the memory of which victories the yong King reuoluing in his mind, did maruellouſly moue him, notwithſtanding his father vpon his death-bed had expreſly aduiſed him aboue all other things to entertaine peace with the French nation, as the onely meanes for the Kings of England to reigne both ſafely and happily. Now it was not doubted, but the warre of the Engliſh againſt the French king (ſpecially being at the ſame time aſſailed in other places) was of right great conſequence, for that in that action there was an entrance made into the very intrailes of his kingdome, and withall the French men for the memory of things paſt, redoubted much the name of the Engliſh. And yet the Pope for the incertaintie of the faith of ſtrangers, and for the farre diſtance of thoſe countries, could not eſtabliſh his counſels. Theſe were the hopes of the Pope. The hopes of the Pope.

On the other ſide the French King, to whom nothing was leſſe pleaſing then to be in warre againſt the Church, was greatly deſirous to haue peace, by meanes whereof as he ſhould auoid the ill will of the Pope, ſo ſhould he be deliuered of the importunate demands of Ceſar and of the neceſſitie to ſerue him: and he made no difficultie to diſſolue the Councell of Piſa, which he had ſet abroach onely to make the Pope condeſcend to peace by that feare, prouided that The thoughts of the French King.

the Cardinals and others that had bene partakers in that buſineſſe, might be pardoned. But on the contrary, the demand for the reſtoring of Bolognia (which by reaſon of the ſituation thereof was very conuenient to moleſt him) kept him in ſuſpence: for that he feared the peace was not ſincerely accepted by the Pope, nor with a mind diſpoſed to obſerue it if occaſions returned, but onely to deliuer himſelfe preſently from the danger of the Councell, and from the warre. And yet he hoped to confirme the mind of Ceſar with the greatneſſe of his offers, and to this end he negociated with him of common occurrents as with a confederate, perſwading him among other things, not to conſent that Bolognia, a Citie of ſo great importance, ſhould returne vnder the power of the Pope. And touching the Kings of Aragon and of England, he was not altogether out of hope, notwithſtanding the maner of proceeding of the one was already manifeſt, and the brute of the intention of the other no leſſe publike and generall: and notwithſtanding their Embaſſadours had firſt ioyntly exhorted him with modeſt words, and vnder pretence that they deſired amitie, and afterwards preſſed him with importunities to cauſe the Cardinals and Prelates of his kingdome to be at the Councell of Latran, and to ſuffer and agree that the Church ſhould be repoſſeſſed of the Citie of Bolognia: for that the Engliſh made ſhew on the one ſide to haue a deſire to perſeuere in the confederation they had with him, and many of his Councell aſſuring him of the ſame, he eſteemed they would attempt nothing againſt him: and on the other ſide, the ſleights and ſubtill apparences of the King of Aragon were ſuch, that the King giuing leſſe credite to deeds then to words, whereby he alwayes aſſured him neuer to enter into armes againſt him; he would neuer be perſwaded, that that King would euer ioyne in armes ſo manifeſtly with his enemies, as he did by ſecret counſels. By which vaine opinions he was ſo deceiued, that hope being giuen him by thoſe that were of his faction in Swiſſerland, that he might reconcile that nation if he would conſent to their demands for increaſing their penſions, he refuſed it againe moſt obſtinately, alledging that he would not be taxed by them: and further vſing ſharpe remedies, where eaſie meanes had bene more neceſſary, he made reſtraint that they ſhould haue no reliefe of victuals out of the Duchie of Millan; whereof when they ſtood in great need by reaſon of the ſterilitie of their countrey, he hoped by that meanes they might eaſily be brought to renew the league with him vpon the old conditions. By this time was come the firſt day of September, which had bin afore ſet downe for the beginning of the Councell of Piſa, on which day the Proctors of the Cardinals being come to Piſa, celebrated in their names the acts appertaining to the opening of the ſame. By reaſon whereof the Pope being maruellouſly moued againſt the Florentines, for that they had conſented that the Conuenticle (for ſo did he alwayes call it) tooke beginning vpon their eſtate, he declared that the Cities of Florence and Piſa ſtood ſubiect to the interdiction Eccleſiaſtike, by vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had cauſed to be publiſhed; wherein it was ſet downe, that whoſoeuer ſhould fauour the Conuenticle of Piſa, ſtood excommunicated, interdicted, and ſubiect to all the paines ſeuerely ordained by the lawes againſt ſchiſmatikes and heretikes. And threatning to inuade them with armes, he elected the Cardinall of Medicis Legate of Perouſa: and not long after, the Cardinall of Regina Legate of Bolognia being dead, he put him in his place, to the end that he who enuied their eſtate, being neare their marches with ſo great authoritie, they might fall into feare and confuſion among themſelues: a thing which he hoped would eaſily ſucceed, by reaſon of the ſtate wherein that Citie then ſtood. For, beſides that many deſired the returne of the Medices, diſcords and diuiſions (the ancient maladie of that Citie) reigned among the other citizens of greateſt eminencie, which at that time were cauſed by the greatneſſe and authoritie of the Gonfalonnier, which ſome for ambition and enuie could not endure; and others were diſcontented, for that haply taking vpon him more in the deliberation of things then appertained to his place, he left not that part to others which belonged to their degree: and complained, that the ſtate of the Citie conſiſting in two extremities, that is to ſay, the publicke Magiſtrate, and the councell popular, there wanted a well ordered Senate, according to the true inſtitution of Commonweales: by meanes whereof (beſides that it ſhould be a reaſonable temperature betweene the one and the other extremitie) the principall and beſt qualified Citizens might obtaine a more honorable degree in the Commonweale: alledging that the Gonfalonnier who was principally choſen for the redreſſe thereof, either by ambition or a vaine ſuſpition, did the contrary. Which deſire, notwithſtanding it was reaſonable, and withall not of ſuch importance as to turne their minds to diuiſions; for that euen without that they were both honorably rably aduanced, and withall there was no forme of diſpoſing of the publike affaires without them, was the very originall and principall cauſe of the great calamities which fell afterwards vpon that Citie. The diuiſions among the citizens, being grounded hereupon, and the enemies of the Gonfalonnier ſuſpecting, that both he, and the Cardinall of Volterra his brother, were at the deuotion of the French King, and that they repoſed altogether in his amitie, they oppoſed as much as they could againſt the deliberations that were to be made in fauour of that King, deſiring that the Pope might be preferred. Hereby alſo it came to paſſe, that the name of the family of Medicis began to be leſſe hatefull in that Citie, for as much as thoſe great citizens who deſired not their returne, (for the ill will they bare to the Gonfalonnier) did no more conſpire with others to perſecute them, nor (as had bene done at other times) to hinder the commerce of other citizens with them: but to the end to put downe the Gonfalonnier, making ſhew that they were not eſtranged from their amitie, they did in a maner giue others occaſion to deſire their greatneſſe. And hereby it came to paſſe, that not onely thoſe that indeed were their aſſured friends (in whom was no great power) entred into hopes of innouation, but alſo many yong Gentlemen, puſhed on either by their too great expences, or particular diſdaines, or at leaſt by an ambitious deſire to ſurpaſſe others in dignitie, deſired a mutation of the State by meanes of their returne; the Cardinall de Medicis hauing withall cunningly increaſed that diſpoſition for many yeares before. For euer ſince the death of his brother Peter, whoſe name was both feared and hated, making no ſhew to intermeddle in the affaires of Florence, nor to haue any deſire to aſpire to the ancient greatneſſe of his family, he entertained all the Florentines that came to Rome, with very great kindneſſe, willingly employing himſelfe in all their buſineſſe, and no leſſe for ſuch as had ſhewed themſelues manifeſt enemies againſt his brother, then for others; laying all the fault vpon his brother, as though the faults and offences had bene determined with his death. In which forme of proceeding hauing continued many yeares, and the ſame being accompanied with the opinion that went of him in the Court of Rome, to be of a diſpoſition liberall, affable, and gracious to all men, brought him in the end to be acceptable to many at Florence: and therefore the Pope who deſired the alteration of that gouernment, preferred him with great foreſight to that Legation. The Florentines appealed from the Popes interdiction, to an holy Councell of the vniuerſall Church, ſuppreſſing the name of the Councell of Piſa, that they might the leſſe offend: and as though by the appellation the effect of the interdiction had bene ſuſpended, the Prieſts of the foure principall Churches were compelled by commandement of the ſupreme Magiſtrate to make publike celebration of diuine Seruice: by meanes whereof the diuiſion of the citizens was the more diſcouered, it being at the diſcretion of euery one either to obſerue or contemne the interdict. And for this cauſe the Embaſſadours of the Kings of England and Aragon made new inſtance to the French King, offering him peace with the Pope, if he would cauſe Bologna to be rendred to the Church, and that the Cardinals might be preſent at the Councell of Latran, to whom they offered, that the Pope ſhould pardon them. But when the King would not conſent becauſe of Bologna, he made anſwer, that he did not defend a citie in contumacie and rebellion againſt the Church, it being now gouerned in the ſame forme and eſtate of policie wherein it had bene ruled many yeares afore the Pontificacie of Iulius, who ought not to demand a greater authoritie then had bene practiſed by his predeceſſors: and alſo touching the Councell of Piſa, it had bene introduced with a moſt honeſt and holy purpoſe, to reforme the notorious and intollerable diſorders of the Church, whereunto might eaſily be reſtored her ancient ſplendor, without perill of ſchiſme or diuiſion, if the Pope would agree to be preſent in that Councell, as was meet: adding withall, that his vnquietneſſe, together with his inflamed mind, addicted to warres and troubles, had chiefly induced him to bind himſelfe to the protection of Bologna; and therefore for his honour he would defend it with no leſſe care and ſtudie, then he would protect his good towne of Parma. The Pope then laying aſide all thoughts of peace, no leſſe for his ancient hatreds and couetouſneſſe, then for feare of the Councell and his deſire to Bologna, and finally ſuſpecting, that if he deferred any longer to reſolue, he ſhould be left abandoned of euery one, the Spaniſh ſouldiers beginning now to embarke at Carpy, making as though they would paſſe into Africa: he determined to finiſh the confederation negociated with the King Catholike and the Senate of Venice, which was ſolemnly publiſhed the fift day of October in the Church of S. Maria de Popolo, the Pope and all the Cardinals being preſent. This confederation was principally made to preſerue the vnitie of the Church, and the better to defend her from preſent ſchiſme, to reuerſe the aſſembly of Piſa: to recouer the citie of Bolognia, appertaining by good right to the ſea Apoſtolike, together with all other cities and places which in any ſort belonged to the Church, (Ferrara being comprehended vnder that ſence:) and that againſt all ſuch as ſhould oppoſe againſt any of theſe things, or labour to hinder them, (theſe words ſignified the French King) they ſhould proceed to chaſe them out of Italy with a mightie armie, wherein the Pope was to maintaine foure hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen: the Senate of Venice ſhould furniſh eight hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen: and the King of Aragon twelue hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and ten thouſand footmen, for the entertainment of whom the Pope ſhould pay during the war eight thouſand duckats euery moneth, and the Venetians as much, furniſhing preſently a pay for two moneths, within which time they were bound to march into Romagna or ſuch other place where the confederates ſhould be: That the King of Aragon ſhould arme twelue light galleys, and the Venetians fourteene, which at the ſame time ſhould make warre vpon the French King in Lombardie: That Dom Raimond of Cardona, then Viceroy in the realme of Naples, ſhould be Captaine generall of the armie: That if in this warre there were conquered any townes in Lombardie which had belonged to the Venetians, that in that caſe they ſhould obſerue the declaration of the Pope, who forthwith in a writing apart, pronounced that they ſhould be rendred to the Venetians. There was reſerued for Ceſar libertie to enter into the confederation, and likewiſe to the King of England; to the one with an vncertaine hope to be able in the end to ſeparate him from the French King; and to the other, by the expreſſe conſent of the Cardinall of Yorke, who did alwayes communicate in the treatie of the league. When this confederation was fully reſolued and eſtabliſhed, Ierome Donato the Venetian Embaſſadour died, who for his ſingular wiſedome and dexteritie being very deare to the Pope, had in this action and other affaires during his legation, done many great ſeruices to his countrey.

The opinion that was conceiued of the league.

This confederation made by the Pope vnder colour to deliuer Italy from the impery of ſtrangers, drew the minds of men to diuers interpretations, according to the diuerſitie of their iudgements and paſſions. For many, beguiled with the ſplendor and magnificence of the title, extolled euen to heauen with great praiſes ſo high an enterpriſe: ſaying, it was an action right worthy the maieſtie of the Popedome, and that the greatneſſe of Iulio his mind could not haue choſen an enterpriſe more generous, and no leſſe full of wiſedome then of magnanimitie, ſtirring vp by his induſtrie one ſtranger againſt another: in ſuch ſort that the bloud of forreiners more then of naturall Italians being ſpilt vpon the French men, not onely the liues of Italians were ſpared and reſerued, but alſo after one of the parties ſhould be expulſed, it would be eaſie with the naturall armies of the countrey to chaſe out the other, being already weakened and out of breath. Others, who perhaps conſidered more deeply the ſubſtance of things, not ſuffering their eyes to be dazeled with a magnificall title, feared that the warres that were begun with intention to deliuer Italy from forreine powers, would grow more to hurt the vitall ſpirits of that body, then thoſe that had bene begun with a manifeſt profeſſion and reſolute intention to ſubdue it; and ſaid, it was a thing more raſh then wiſe, to hope that the armies of Italy, depriued of vertue, of diſcipline, of reputation, of Captaines of authoritie, there being no conformitie in the very minds of their Princes, ſhould be able to driue the victor out of Italy, with whom albeit all other remedies ſhould faile, yet the meanes would neuer faile to reunite himſelfe with the vanquiſhed, to the common ruine of all the ſtates of Italy: and that they had more reaſon to feare that theſe new ſtirres would be a meanes to cauſe Italy to be ſpoiled by other nations, then to hope that by the vnion of the Pope and the Venetians, there ſhould be any abilitie to vanquiſh the French men and the Spaniards: That Italy ought to haue wiſhed that the diſcords and ill digeſted counſels of their Princes, had not opened a way to forrein armies to enter therinto, but ſeeing ſ by her infelicitie, two of her moſt worthy members are occupied by the French & Spaniſh Kings, it was to be eſteemed a farre leſſe calamitie, that they both continued ſo, vntill either the goodneſſe of God, or the fauour of fortune, ſhould offer ſome greater and better grounded occaſions, for as much as one King making his partie good againſt the other, the libertie of ſuch as were not yet fallen into ſeruitude would be defended: then that they ſhould fall into armes among themſelues, by meanes whereof, whileſt the warre ſhould laſt, the parts that yet remaine ſound, would be torne in peeces by pillages, by firings, by bloud, and other miſe-

rable accidents. And laſtly, that whoſoeuer among them ſhould remaine victor, would aſſuredly afflict the whole bodie with a more hard and grieuous ſeruitude. But the thoughts of the Pope (in whom was another opinion) being become more violent and kindled by the new confederation: as ſoone as the terme limited in the admonition publiſhed before againſt thoſe Cardinals that were Authors of the Councell, was paſſed, he called together the publike Conſiſtorie of Cardinals with great ſolemnitie, and ſitting in his Pontificall habit in the place named the Hall of the Kings, he declared that the Cardinals of S. Croſſe, of S. Malo, of Coſenſa, and of Bayeux, were fallen from the dignitie of Cardinall, and had incurred all thoſe paines, whereunto heretikes and ſchiſmatikes are ſubiect. He publiſhed alſo an admonition of the ſame forme againſt the Cardinall de S. Seuerin, whom he had not moleſted till that day: and proceeding in the ſame heate to the deuices for warre, he ſolicited continually the coming of the Spaniards, hauing an intention afore all other things to bring warre vpon the Florentines, to reduce that Commonweale to the deuotion of the confederates, reſtoring to the gouernment the family of Medicis: and no leſſe to ſatisfie the infinite malice which he bare to Peter Soderin the Gonfalonnier, as though it had bene by his meanes that the Florentines could neuer be ſeparated from the French King, and alſo for that afterwards they had giuen their conſent that the Councell ſhould be holden at Piſa. Of which reſolution many ſignes and relations were brought to Florence, where falling into preparations to be able to ſuſtaine the warre, it was propounded amongſt other things, as a thing very reaſonable, to reſiſt with the reuenues and goods of the Church, the warre which the Church went about vniuſtly to make: and therefore it behoued them to conſtraine the Churchmen to contribute a great ſumme of money; but vnder this condition, that it ſhould be beſtowed in a ſure place, and that it ſhould not be ſpent but in the warre; which not hapning, and the feare thereof ceaſſing, it ſhould be reſtored to the parties that lent it: to which aduice many of the Citizens were oppoſite, ſome for feare to incurre the paines impoſed by the canon lawes vpon the infringers of the libertie of the Church: but the greater part of them, to contradict the reaſons of the Gonfalonnier, by whoſe authoritie it was manifeſt that this counſell did principally proceed. In ſo much as the new law ordained hereupon, being already debated in the priuie Councels, no leſſe by the diligence of the Gonfalonnier, then the inclination of many others, and nothing wanting now but the approbation of the great & publike Councell, which ſtood aſſembled for that purpoſe, the Gonfalonnier reaſoned for the law in this maner:

None among you (moſt worthy Citizens) can reaſonably doubt what haue bene the perpetuall intentions of the Pope againſt your libertie: not onely by the conſideration of his preſent dealing with you, ſubiecting you vniuſtly to the interdiction, without hearing your iuſtifications, which be no leſſe true then many in number, and without hauing any regard to the hope that was giuen him to remoue the Councell from Piſa within a few dayes: but much more in reſpect of his actions euer ſince he came to the Papacie, whereof briefly to recite ſome few (for to recount them all, it would be too tedious,) who knoweth not, that during our warres againſt the Piſans, this Commonweale could not obtaine of him any fauour, either publike or ſecret, although the iuſtice of our cauſe deſerued it; and that it was a matter appertaining to the ſuretie of the Church and tranquillitie of all Italy, to ſeeke to quench ſuch a fire, which not many yeares before had bene the cauſe of many great troubles? and how on the contrary, as often as they of Piſa had recourſe to him (a thing which we could not but ſuſpect, and were alwayes made more certaine after our victory) he did willingly giue eare vnto them, and nouriſhed them in their obſtinacie with diuers hopes? which was no new inclination in him, but tooke beginning from the time that he was made Cardinall. For, as it was well knowne vnto you all, after the French men had leuied their campe from before Piſa, he wrought what he could with the French King and the Cardinall of Amboiſe, that Piſa ſhould be receiued into protection, and we abandoned. And being become Pope, he neuer imparted to our Commonweale any one of thoſe graces which the ſea of Rome is wont to miniſter in great liberalitie: for that he would not in ſo many difficulties and neceſſities of ours, once conſent that we might at any time ſo much as relieue our ſelues with the reuenues of the Church, contrary to the example of Alexander the ſixt, who gaue vs that libertie many times, notwithſtanding he was a ſetled enemie to this Commonweale; but expreſſing the ſame will in things inferiour, as he did in matters of greater nature, he forbad vs in like ſort to leuie money of the Cleargie for the maintaining of publicke

" like ſchooles, although the ſumme was but litle, and had continued by the permiſſion of
" many Popes, and was conuerted to a pious vſe, to wit, the inſtruction of youth, and aduance-
" ment of learning. Beſides, that which was practiſed in Rome by Bartlemew Aluiano with Cardinal
" Aſcanius, was not debated without his priuitie, whereof at that time appeared many euident
" ſignes; and the effects had alſo ſucceeded, if others of greater power had not withdrawne them-
" ſelues for the ſudden death of the Cardinall: and yet the firſt foundation failing, he would neuer
" (at our iuſt requeſts) conſent, to reſtraine Aluiano to make leuies of ſouldiers in the territories of " Rome: onely he forbad the families of Colonno and Sauello, by whoſe helpes we might haue re-
" moued our dangers with very ſmal charges, to inuade the lands of ſuch as prepared thēſelues to " offend vs. Touching our buſineſſe with Sienna, maintaining alwaies againſt vs Pandolf Petrucci,
" he compelled vs with threatnings to prolong the truce: and for no other cauſe did he ioyne with " vs for the recouering of Montpultian (for whoſe defence he had ſent men to Sienna) then for " feare leſt the army of the French King ſhould be called by vs into Tuſcane. Of the contrary, we
" haue neuer offended him, but euer proceeded in all things with reſpect and due reuerence to the " Church, and particularly gratified him in all ſuch demands as were in our power, euen to ſend
" our men at armes to aide him in the enterpriſe of Bolognia, being not bound to it, yea, againſt
" our owne profite. But no office, nor any obedience, could ſuffice to appeaſe his ill affection, " whereof, beſides many other apparent teſtimonies and tokens, the greateſt and moſt apparent, is " that, which, not to ſeeme tranſported with enuie, and for that I know you all remember it, I will
" paſſe ouer with ſilence: to haue giuen eare (to ſpeake modeſtly) to ſuch as offered to kill me, not
" for any hatred he bare to me (for I neuer did him wrong, and when he was Cardinall he alwayes " entertained me honorably,) but for a burning deſire he hath to depriue you of your libertie. For
" he hauing alwayes ſought to bring this Commonweale to cleaue to his immoderate and vniuſt
" deſires, & to make it partaker of his expences and dangers; and being out of hope that raſh and " vndiſcreet reſolutions could ſucceed of the moderation and maturitie of your counſels, he hath " diſpoſed all his deuices to this end, to bring into this Citie a tyrannie, which ſhould depend
" vpon him, and be directed and managed not for your profit, but according the rage of his luſts,
" with the which (being drawne frō ends exceſſiue) he thinketh vpon no other thing, then to raiſe
" diuiſions, to cauſe one warre to bring forth another, and to nouriſh a perpetuall fire in Chriſten-
" dome. And who can doubt, that now when ſuch mightie armies are ioyned with him, when " he is Lord of Romagnia, and the ſtate of Sienna ſubiected to his obedience (which is an ouerture
" for him to penetrate into the bowels of vs) that his intention is not to aſſaile vs? and that he will " not aſſay to obtaine by open force, that whereunto he hath alreadie aſpired by ſecret deuices,
" and which he hath ſo long and ſo ardently thirſted after; yea ſo much the more, by how much
" he hath ſeene vs ill prepared to defend our ſelues? But though no other thing could detect it, are " not his thoughts ſufficiently diſcouered, in that he hath lately appointed for Legate of Bolognia,
" the Cardinall of Medicis, in intention to make him ruler of the army? a Cardinall, who had ne-
" uer receiued any honorable place or other benefit of him, and to whom he had neuer ſo much
" as made any ſhew that he repoſed any truſt in him? Doth this ſignifie anie other thing, but onely
" that by giuing authoritie to march vpon your frontiers, yea thruſting vpon you with ſuch a dig-
" nitie & reputation, the only man that aſpireth to be your tyrant, he wold encorage your citizens
" (if there be any ſo depraued that they affect tyrannie more then libertie) & ſtir vp your ſubiects
" to that end? In regard of theſe reaſons it hath bin thought neceſſary by this honorable Councel
" and many other good and wiſe Citizens, that for the defence and protection of this libertie,
" there ſhould be made the ſame prouiſions as if the warre were certaine. And albeit it is verie
" likely that the French King, at leaſt for his proper intereſt, will aide vs mightily; yet are we not " for that hope either to leaue off thoſe remedies which be in our power, nor to forget that ma" ny impediments may eaſily chance, which in ſome ſort may depriue vs of his ſuccours. We " are perſwaded that no man will denie this counſell to be both neceſſary and profitable: but if a" ny perhaps will denie it, it may be he is moued by ſome other cauſe then the common benefit.
" But there are ſome who alledge, that being vncertaine whether the Pope haue anie intention " to make warre vpon vs, it is a reſolution vnprofitable, in offending his authoritie, and ſpending
" the reuenues of the Church, to giue him iuſt occaſion to be angrie, and to prouoke him to " make warre vpon vs almoſt by neceſſitie: as though by ſo many and ſo euident ſignes and ar" guments one could not manifeſtly comprehend what is his intention, or as though it appertained to wise Gouernours of Commonweales to deferre preparations till after the beginning of the assault, and first to receiue a deadly blow of the enemie, afore we couer our bodies with armes necessary for our defence. Others say, that not to adde the wrath of God to the anger of the Pope, we must prouide for our safetie by some other meanes, since we are not yet fallen into that necessitie, without the which secular Princes haue bene alwayes forbidden by the canon lawes, and that vnder great paines, to impose any charge vpon the persons or goods of the Church. This reason hath also bene well considered by vs and others, that haue giuen counsell to the publication of this law. But (as you know) the publike reuenues being not sufficient to furnish the expences we must sustaine, and our treasures hauing bene so long time drained, it being a thing certaine, that in the warres we must vpon all occasions haue our hands in our purses, who seeth not that it is reasonable and necessary, that the charges we are to sustaine for the defence of a warre begun by the Church, should be supported with the moneys of the Churchmen? a matter which many times heretofore hath bene practised in our Citie, and much more by all other Princes and Commonweales: but neuer either here or elsewhere, with greater moderation and respect, for that it is not to employ them in any other action, but to lay them vp in places of suretie, to the end to make repaiment to the Cleargie againe, if it so fall out that we find no occasion to feare. If the Pope then bring not warre vpon vs, we shall not disburse the treasures of the Church, and in effect they shall be no way expended. But if he do make warre, who can complaine if by all possible meanes we defend our selues from a warre so vniust? What occasion doth this Commonweale giue him, (which by necessitie and not by will, as he well knoweth, hath suffered the Councell to be assembled at Pisa) for which it may be said, we haue prouoked him? Is it to prouoke his anger, when we refuse to lay downe our neckes to him that hath vowed to strike them off? although he doth neither prouoke nor stirre vp, that prepareth to defend himselfe, and to resist his vniust violence. No, we should the rather prouoke him, if we failed to make prouisions; for that the hope of the facilitie of the enterprise would make his furie the greater, together with his burning emulation to destroy your libertie euen to the foundations. Neither let the feare to offend God retaine you: for the danger is so great and so euident, and our necessitie such, (not standing subiect to any thing that may more preiudice vs,) that it is lawfull not onely to serue our turnes with that part of those reuenues which is not conuerted into pious vses, but also to lay our hands vpon sacred things: for that according to the law of nature, defence is common to all men, allowed of God, and by the consent of all nations, being borne together with the world, shall last as long as the world: and is not subiect to derogation by any of the lawes ciuill or canon, grounded vpon the wils of men, which being couched in paper, cannot derogate a law not made by men, but hath bene engrauen and written by nature her selfe in the spirits and hearts of all mankind. And likewise we ought not expect till we be brought into extreme necessitie, for that when we are once in that estate, and enuironed and almost oppressed with enemies, we cannot haue recourse to remedies in due time, but counterpoisons will come too late, when the poison hath already pierced the bones. Besides all this, how can it be denied that this is very needfull for priuate persons, seeing that by the imposts that are laid vpon them, the greatest part of them are constrained to cut off some of those expences without the which they cannot liue but with great incommoditie and much diminution of things necessary to their degree? That is the necessitie which hath bene considered of by such as haue made the lawes, whereby we are forbidden to expect till our Citizens be brought to the danger of famine, and into such termes, that they can no longer sustaine their families. And on the other part, by this taxation, there is no incommoditie imposed vpon the Churchmen, but they are onely disfurnished of that part of their reuenues, which, either they keepe vnprofitably in their coffers, or reserue to expend in superfluous prodigalities, or perhaps some of them (I speake vnder pardon) would lash out in dishonest pleasures. This is a common resolution of all wise men, that the libertie of Cities and Commonweales is acceptable to God, for that in them, more then in any other sort of gouernment, is preserued the publike good, iustice better administred without any respect of persons, the mind of Citizens more stirred vp to workes of vertue and honour, and more reuerence borne to religion. And yet you beleeue that it will be displeasing to God, that to defend a thing so precious, for the which who sheds his proper bloud winneth great merite and praise, you employ a litle part of the fruites and reuenues of temporall things: which notwithstanding they are dedicated

« cies of laymen our elders: and which are no leſſe to be employed for the preſeruation and ſafe-
« tie of Churches, ſubiect and expoſed in a time of warre, no leſſe then ſecular things, to the cru-« eltie and couetouſneſſe of ſouldiers, and whereunto there will be no more regard had in a « warre made by the Pope, then in a warre made by the greateſt tyrant, or by the Turkes. For-« beare not then whileſt you haue time to prouide for the ſafetie of your countrey; defend your « libertie, and perſwade your ſelues you cannot do any thing more pleaſing to God: and that to « chaſe the warre from your houſes, from your temples, from your Monaſteries, and from your « poſſeſſions, there is no better remedie then to make knowne to him that purpoſeth to offend
« you, that you are determined to forget nothing that may ſerue for your defence.

When they had heard the Gonſalonnier, the law propounded was without any difficultie approued by the great Councell. By reaſon whereof, notwithſtanding the diſpleaſure and diſcontentment of the Pope was greatly increaſed, and that he was ſo much the more incited to diſpoſe the confederates to begin warre with the Florentines: yet the perſwaſions of Pandolfe Petrucci turned from that opinion, as well the Pope as thoſe that ſolicited in Italy for the King of Aragon. For Pandolfe giuing counſell to aſſaile Bologna, blamed much the enterpriſe to make warre in Tuſcane, alledging that Bologna being vnable of her ſelfe to make defence, ſhould be defended onely by the forces of the French king; but for the Florentines, they wold reſiſt with their owne power, and for his profit the ſame King, wil be no leſſe helping vnto them, then to Bologna: That the Florentines, albeit they bare ſome inclination to the French King, yet neuertheleſſe being wiſe, and iealous of the preſeruation of their eſtate, had neuer at his inſtance offended any with armes during ſo great ſtirres: and had not miniſtred to him in any other ſort, but onely furniſhed him for the defence of the ſtate of Lombardie with two hundred men at armes, according to the bonds of the capitulation made in common betweene him and the King Catholike: That there could not be done to the French King a thing more pleaſing or more profitable, then to conſtraine the Florentines to leaue off neutralitie, and to ioyne their cauſe with his: That it would be a matter of great indiſcretion, if his enemies were the cauſe to make him obtaine that which he could neuer bring to paſſe by his authoritie, the King hauing in vaine ſolicited by many prayers and promiſes to declare themſelues for him: That all men may ſee by many ſignes; and he knoweth wel, ẏ it was grieuous to the Florentines, that the Councell ſhould be celebrated at Piſa, whereunto they had not conſented for other reſpect, then that they durſt not gainſay the French Kings demands, made immediatly after the rebellion of Bologna, when there was not ſeene in Italy any army to oppoſe againſt him, it being alſo a thing certaine, that the authoritie of Cæſar was not concurrant in the Councell, and that it was beleeued that the conſent of the King Catholike was alſo ioyned with them: That he knew likewiſe that the Florentines were not to ſuffer the French ſouldiers to ſtay vpon their lands: and that it was a matter dangerous to threaten or prouoke them, where, of the contrary it would be very profitable to deale mildly with them, and with demonſtration to admit their excuſes: for that proceeding herein in ſuch maner, there would be obtained of them with time and occaſion, things which now could not be hoped for, or at leaſt, not being conſtrained by feare of new reſolutions, they might be ſo entertained ẏ they ſhould do no hurt in times of danger: and in caſe of victory, it would reſt in the power of the confederates to giue to the Florentines ſuch forme of gouernment as they ſhould thinke moſt expedient. The matter that in this action diminiſhed the authoritie of Pandolfe, was the knowledge that was had that he deſired for his particular profit, that a warre of that conſequence ſhould not begin in Tuſcane, by meanes whereof the whole countrey would ſuffer indifferent deſtruction, either by the armies of friends, or by thoſe of the enemies. But his reaſons ſeemed ſo pregnant, that it was eaſily determined not to aſſaile the Florentines: which counſell was the better approued by a contention that a few dayes after began to kindle betweene the Florentines and the Cardinals. Now as we haue ſaid before, the Cardinals were not preſent at the firſt acts of the Councell: for they tarried at the borough of S. Donin, either to expect the Prelates that were to come out of France, or to be accompanied with thoſe which Cæſar had promiſed to ſend, or haply for ſome other occaſions: and being departed from thence by ſundry wayes, the bruite ran, that the two Spaniſh Cardinals who had taken the way of Bologna, would be reconciled to the Pope, being knowne to ſolicite continually with the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon which lay reſident with the Pope: and for that they had had demanded and obtained of the Florentines vnder publike faith and promiſe, that they might remaine in ſuretie within Florence, the ſame opinion was increaſed. But when they were come vpon the countrey of Mugello, they turned ſuddenly towards Lucques, to ioyne with the others, either for ỳ their intention had indeed bin always ſo, or for ỳ touching the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, his ancient ambition preuailed in ỳ end more then his new feare; or for ỳ receiuing aduertiſement in that place, that they were depriued of the Cardinals hat, they deſpaired to fall to any accord with the Pope. About this time the three French Cardinals, S. Malo, Albert, and Bayeux, paſſed the Appenin by the way of Pontreſmo, together with the Prelates of France: after whom, and at their requeſt, marched out of Lombardie three hundred French Lances commanded by Odet de Foix Lord of Lautrech, appointed guard of the Councell by the Cardinals, either for that they thought it was dangerous to ſtay in Piſa without ſuch a guard, or to the end that the Councell accompanied with the armes of the French King, might continue with more authoritie; or elſe (which was more likely) to haue power to ſuppreſſe whoſoeuer durſt gainſay or diſobey their decrees. But as ſoone as the Florentines diſcouered this reſolution, which had bene concealed from them vntill the bands began to march, they determined not to receiue into a citie of ſo great importance, ſuch a number of ſouldiers, conſidering the ill diſpoſition of the Piſans, and remembring the rebellion paſt, happening King Charles the eight being preſent, and ſuffering it; and alſo the inclination which the French ſouldiers bare to the towne of Piſa: whereunto was ioyned a feare leſt ſome dangerous accidents might happen by the inſolencie of men of warre, and much more leſt the ſouldiers of the French King entring into Piſa, it might happen (and perhaps ſuch was the ſecret deſire of the King) that Tuſcane ſhould become the ſeate of his warres. Therefore they preſently ſignified to the French King, that it was hard to harbour ſo many people, in a country ſo ſtrait and barren, which could hardly prouide for the nouriſhment of ſo many people as came from all parts to the Councell: and that it was not a thing neceſſary, for that Piſa was ſo gouerned and guarded by them, that the Cardinals might remaine there very ſafely, without danger to be aſſailed by ſtrangers, or troubled by the inhabitants: and to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, by whoſe direction the French men were gouerned in theſe affaires, they ſent word, that they were determined to admit no ſouldiers into Piſa: who, in words ſeeming to conſent, gaue order on the other ſide, that the bands ſhould aduance ſeuerally and without making ſhew of any thing, perſwading himſelfe, that being approched neare to Piſa, they ſhould enter, either by force, or by ſubtiltie, or for that the Florentines durſt not do ſuch an iniury to the French King as to let them. But the King hauing plainly anſwered, that he was content they ſhould not come thither, the Florentines diſpatched Francis Vittorio to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, with an Embaſſage anſwerable to his pride: to certifie him, that if the Cardinals entred vpon their lands with bands of ſouldiers, they would not onely not admit them into Piſa, but they would purſue them as enemies, and would do the like, if the men of warre paſſed the Appenin towards Tuſcane, for that they might preſume that they paſſed for no other purpoſe, then afterwards to ſteale ſecretly into Piſa, or for ſome other ſtratageme. This meſſage ſo moued the Cardinall, that he reſolued the bands ſhould eſtſoones returne againe beyond the Appenin, the Florentines conſenting, that beſides the perſons of Monſieur Lautrech and Monſieur Chaſtillion, he might retaine with him an hundred and fiftie archers. All the Cardinals were together at Lucques, which Citie, for that cauſe, the Pope pronounced to be fallen into the interdiction: and leauing there verie ſicke the Cardinall of Coſenſa, who, not long after, ſaw there his laſt day, the other foure went to Piſa, where they were receiued by the Magiſtrates with verie ſlight entertainment, and the Commons ſhewed them no great reuerence, for that their coming was diſpleaſing to the Florentines, and the cauſe of the Councell not well taken nor approued by the peoples of Chriſtendome. For, notwithſtanding the title of reforming the Church was both verie honeſt and verie profitable, yea no leſſe neceſſarie then plauſible to all the regions of Chriſtendome; yet all men ſaw well enough that the authors thereof were puſhed on with ambitions ends, and entangled with the deſire of temporall things, and vnder the colour of the publike good debated about their particular intereſts, and that which ſoeuer of them ſhould come to the Popedome, would haue no leſſe neceſſitie to be reformed, then thoſe whom they went about to reforme. Moreouer, that beſides the ambition of Prieſts, the quarels of Princes and queſtions of eſtate had ſtirred vp and nouriſhed this Councell: That this reſpect had moued the French King to procure it, the Emperour to conſent to it, and the King of Aragon to deſire it. It being then clearly diſcerned, that vnder the cauſe of the Councell, was chiefly comprehended the quarell of armes and principalities, the people expreſſed an vniuerſall horror, that vnder an holy pretext of ſpirituall things, men ſhould purſue temporall matters with warres and ſcandals. And therefore not onely at the entrie of the Cardinals into Piſa, the common diſdaine and hatred of the people was diſcloſed, but alſo more manifeſtly in the acts of the Councell; for that hauing ſummoned the Cleargie to be in the Cathedrall Church at the firſt ſeſſion, not one of them reſpected the ſummons, and the very Prieſts of that Church refuſed to lend their ornaments and veſtures, when the Cardinals (according to the cuſtome of Councels) meant to haue celebrated the Maſſe, whereby they implored the illumination of the holy Spirit: and afterwards becoming more audacious, they ſhut the doores of their Church, and would not ſuffer them to enter. Whereof the Cardinals making their complaint at Florence, there was commandement giuen, that the vſe of Churches, and the inſtruments ordained for diuine office, ſhould not be denied them, but that the Clergie ſhould not be compelled to be preſent. Theſe deliberations, almoſt repugnant in themſelues, proceeding of the diuiſion of the citizens, by whoſe meanes on the one ſide the Councell was receiued into their dominion, and on the other ſide followed with contempt, brought at one time offence to the Pope, and diſcontentment to the French King. In regard whereof, the Cardinals iudging it to be dangerous to remaine in Piſa without armes, and knowing that it would bring diminution to the authoritie of their Councell, to celebrate it in a citie that obeyed not their decrees, they were vpon termes to depart as ſoone as they could accompliſh the affaires of the Councel: but an accident that hapned conſtrained them to make haſte, the which albeit it was caſuall, tooke notwithſtanding his foundation of the ill diſpoſition of men. For, a French ſouldier, in a publike place committing ſome inſolencie vpon a ſtrumpet, and ſuch as ſaw it, raiſing a preſent outcrie, many ſouldiers as well French as of the traine of the Cardinals and other Prelates, ran armed to the place where the bruite was: and likewiſe many troupes of the people of Piſa and of the Florentine bands flocked thither to behold the accident: and ſome beginning to crie vpon the name of France, and others vpon the title of Marzocco (which is the ſigne of the Commonweale of Florence) there began amongſt them a dangerous fight: but the French Captaines and commanders of the Florentines coming thither, the tumult was at laſt appeaſed, many on both parts bearing away no ſmall hurts, and among others the Lord Chaſtillion, which at the firſt ran thither without armes to auoide ſcandall, and likewiſe Monſieur Lautrech, although neither the one nor the other had any great hurt. This accident brought great aſtoniſhment to the Cardinals, who haply at that houre were aſſembled in the church of S. Michael which was neare ioyning, ſo that the day after they made the ſecond ſeſſion, wherein they obtained that the Councell ſhould be transferred to Millan: and then before the fifteenth day of their arriuall, they departed in great diligence from Piſa, whereof the Florentines and the Piſans were very glad, and no leſſe the Prelates that followed the Councell, whom it did a litle diſcontent to be come into a place, which, what for the incommoditie of lodging, and what for the inconueniencie of other wants, growne by the long warres that were paſſed, did not miniſter to them the meanes to liue delicately and prodigally, as the Prieſts and French men are accuſtomed: but much more for that being come thither by the Kings commandement and againſt their wils, they deſired change of place, and all other accidents that might bring difficultie, prolongation or diſſolution to the Councell. But the hatred and grudging of the people following the Cardinals, they found at Millan the ſame or greater difficulties. For the Cleargie of Millan euen in the beginning refuſed of themſelues to celebrate the diuine Seruice, as though there were entred into their citie, not Cardinals of the Church of Rome, who were wont to be honored, and in a maner adored in euery place, but perſons profane and accurſed: and when they ſhewed themſelues in publike, the commons forbare not to raile at them, ſcorning them as well in words as geſtures: but ſpecially the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, who was the more odious to all men, for that in the laſt ſeſſion holden at Piſa, he was elected Preſident of the Councell. One might perceiue the people murmuring in the ſtreets, and ſaying, that heretofore Councels were wont to bring benedictions, peace and concord, but that this brought them maledictions, warres and diſcords: That other Councels were aſſembled to reunite the Church that was out of vnitie; but this was aſſembled to breake her vnitie, when ſhe was in good agreement: That the contagion of ſuch a peſtilence infected all ſuch as receiued them, which obeyed them, which fauoured them, and which in any

ſort conuerſed with them, or which either heard or ſaw them: and that there could be expected of their coming no other thing then bloud, famine and peſtilence, and in the end perdition both of bodies and ſoules. Gaſton de Foix, who not many moneths afore the departing of Monſieur Longueuille had bene eſtabliſhed Viceroy in the Duchie of Millan and in the armie, ſomewhat ſuppreſſed thoſe murmures, tending now almoſt to a tumult and manifeſt ſedition: for he conſtrained the Cleargie, with moſt ſtrict and expreſſe commandements, to celebrate againe their holy functions, and enioyned the cõmons to ſpeake more modeſtly hereafter. In regard of theſe difficulties the beginnings of the Councell proceeded with ſmall ſucceſſe. But that which moſt troubled the hopes of the Cardinals, was, that Ceſar deferring from day to day, ſent neither Prelats nor Proctors, although beſide ſo many promiſes he had formerly made, he had aſſured the Cardinall of S. Seuerin as he continually did the French King, y he would ſend them thither: but at the ſame time alledging for his excuſe (being haply induced by others) that it was not agreeable to his dignitie to ſend to the Councell of Piſa the Prelates of his proper eſtates, if the like were not done in the name of all Germanie, he had called the Prelates of Germanie together at Auſburg, to deliberate how they ſhould proceed in common touching the Councell: affirming notwithſtanding to the French men, that by this meanes he would ſo worke, that all ſhold be ſent thither. Moreouer he much troubled the Kings mind with the diuerſitie of his proceedings: for that beſides that he ſhewed himſelfe cold in the affaires of the Councell, he inclined openly to the motion of peace with the Venetians, which was ſolicited by the Pope and the King of Aragon with many offers: and on the other ſide, complaining of the King Catholicke for that he was not aſhamed apparently to impugne the league of Cambray, and that in this new rather treaſon then confederation, he named him as acceſſary; he had propoſed to Galeas de Saint Seuerin to go to Rome in perſon as enemy to the Pope, ſo that the King would furniſh him with a great part of his armie, and with a very great ſumme of money: and yet he made no declaration of theſe things with any ſuch aſſurance, but that it might be doubted what he would at laſt determine (though he were ſatisfied in all theſe demands.) In this ſort then was the Kings mind trauelled with his accuſtomed ſuſpitions, that if he abandoned Ceſar, he would ioyne with his enemies: and if he ſhould ſupport him, his alliance would be bought with an exceſſiue price, and yet doubtfull what fruit would come of it, knowing by the experience of things paſt, that oftentimes his owne diſorders did hurt him more then his forces did aide him: and thus the King could not reſolue with himſelfe, which would moſt hurt him in this action, either the happy ſucceſſe of Ceſar, or the contrary. And further, the king Catholik entertained him as much as he could in that doubt, to make him proceed more ſlowly in the prouiſions of the war, giuing him hope that there would be no warres. The King of England did the like, and for the ſame cauſes, who had made anſwer to the French Embaſſadour, that it was not true, that he had conſented to the league made at Rome, but that he was fully determined to keepe the alliance which he had with the French King. And at the ſame time the Biſhop of Tiuoly propounded peace in the name of the Pope, ſo farre forth as the King would no more fauour the Councell, and withdraw himſelfe from the protection of Bologna, offering to giue aſſurance that the Pope ſhould dreſſe no more new enterpriſes againſt him. The King was leſſe diſpleaſed with the peace, notwithſtanding it was with hard conditions, then to vndergo the dangers of the warre and the expences, which ſeemed in a maner infinite, hauing to make reſiſtance againſt his enemies, and to refurniſh the wants of Ceſar: neuertheleſſe he was moued with diſdaine, for he was almoſt forced hereunto by the King of Aragon for feare of armes; and for that it was a matter of ſome difficultie to aſſure himſelfe that the Pope would obſerue the couenants of peace, after he had recouered Bologna, and was freed from the feare of the Councell. He doubted alſo that when he ſhould be ready to conſent to the conditions offered, the Pope would draw backe, as he had done at other times; whereby his dignitie being abuſed, and his reputation diminiſhed, Ceſar would hold himſelfe iniured, for that leauing him in warre with the Venetians, he ſought of himſelf alone to conclude the peace. Therfore he preciſely anſwered the Biſhop of Tiuoly, that he would not conſent that Bologna ſhould be any otherwiſe ſubiect to the Church then it had vſually bene in ancient times. And at the ſame time, to eſtabliſh a firme reſolution with Ceſar who lay at Brunech, a towne neare to Trent, he ſent to him in great diligence, and with very large offers, Andrew Burgo of Cremona, Ceſars Embaſſadour reſident with him: at which time certaine of his ſubiects of the countrey of Tyrol occupied Batiſten, a place of very great ſtrength in the entrie of the valley of Caldora.

The practiſes of the peace being wholly broken off, the firſt thoughts and deuices of the King were, that when Monſieur Paliſſa (leauing in Verona three thouſand footmen to appeaſe Ceſar who was diſcontented with his departure) ſhould haue led the reſidue of the bands to the Duchie of Millan, there ſhould be made new leuies of footmen: and ſo all the army being reaſſembled, they ſhould march to aſſaile Romagna, hoping to win either all or ſome part, before the Spaniard ſhould approch: and then either to march further according to occaſions, or at leaſt to entertaine the warre vpon the dominions of others vntill the Spring, at which time the King paſſing into Italy in perſon with all the forces of his kingdome, he hoped that euery where he ſhould be maiſter of his enemies. But when he had ſuch a determination, his reſolutions proceeding haply more ſlowly then the occaſions required, by reaſon of his nature eſtranged from expences, which withheld him from making many prouiſions, but ſpecially to wage new ſouldiers, he fell into ſuſpition of the riſing of the Swiſſers, of which nation, for that heretofore we haue made mention here and there in ſundry places, it ſeemes to good purpoſe, and almoſt neceſſary, to ſpeake more particularly.

What people the Swiſſers be

The Swiſſers, which are thoſe people whō the ancients called Heluetians, haue their habitations in the higheſt mountaines of Iura, of Valeſia, and S. Godar: and are naturally valiant, warlike, and rude, and for the ſterilitie of the country, rather ſhepheards then tillers of the ground. They haue bene in times paſt vnder the ſubiection of the Duke of Auſtria, whoſe iuriſdiction they haue ſhaken off many yeares ſince. They gouern themſelues, without any dependencie of either Emperours, Kings, or other Princes. They are deuided into thirteene communalties, which they call Cantons, each of them being ſeuerally gouerned by their particular Magiſtrates, lawes and ordinances. They hold their Councell euery yeare, or more often if occaſion require, wherein they diſpute of vniuerſall affaires, their aſſemblies and meetings being not ſubiect to certaintie of places, but referred as beſt pleaſeth the Deputies of euery Canton. They call thoſe aſſemblies dyots or iourneys, according to the cuſtome of the Germains: wherein they deliberate of peace, of warre, of confederations, of the demands of ſuch as make inſtance to leuie ſouldiers by publike decree, or that ſuch as are willing may be permitted: and of ſuch things as appertaine to their publike good. When they agree by publike decree to deliuer ſouldiers, the Cantons chuſe among themſelues a Captaine generall, to whom they giue the banner with the Enſigne and name publike. Their vnitie and the glory of their armes, hath made famous the name of this ſo ſauage and barbarous a nation: in ſo much as by their naturall valour ioyned to due diſcipline and order, they haue not onely at all times valiantly defended their owne country, but haue alſo employed themſelues in forreine wars, and performed ſingular feates of armes to their perpetuall praiſe: which had bene without all compariſon farre greater, if they had employed their forces for their owne iuriſdiction, and not bene mercenary for the increaſing of the dominion of ſtrangers, or if they had ſet before their eyes an end more noble then the deſire of money, by the loue whereof ſuffering themſelues to be corrupted, they haue loſt the occaſion to be feared and redoubted in Italy. For, coming out of their countrey no otherwiſe but as mercenary ſouldiers, they haue carried backe no publicke fruite of their victories: the deſire of gaine making them to follow armies with huge penſions, and new demands of payes almoſt intollerable: and beſides, to ſuch as wage them, they carry themſelues very frowardly and obſtinately. At home, the chiefe of them forbeare not to receiue gifts and penſions of Princes, to follow and fauour their faction in their dyots. By reaſon whereof, publike things being referred to priuate profite, and fauours and voices being made vendible and corrupted, diſcords by litle and litle haue crept in amongſt themſelues, whereby it came to paſſe, that matters which had bin approued in their dyots by the moſt part of the Cantons, being not embraced and followed of the reſidue, they fell at laſt, and that not long ſince, to manifeſt warres among themſelues, much to the diminution of the authoritie which they bare in the world. Somewhat below theſe, be certaine townes and villages inhabited by a people called Valeſians, as hauing their dwellings in valleys; they are inferiour to the Swiſſers in number, in publike authoritie, and in valour, for that in the iudgement of all men, they are not ſo hardy as the Swiſſers. There is alſo yet, more lowet then theſe, another ſort of people called Griſons, which are gouerned by three Cantons, and thereupon are called Lords of the three Leagues. The capitall towne of their country is called Coire: they haue ſocietie and confederation with the Swiſſers, and with them they go to the

warre: they haue almoſt the ſame policie, the ſame lawes, the ſame manners, and for warlike matters are preferred afore the Valeſians, but they hold no compariſon with the Swiſſers, either in numbers or in valour. The Swiſſers then, who were not as yet ſo much degenerate and corrupted as they haue bin ſince, being incited by the Pope, prepared themſelues to deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan, giuing out that this riſing proceeded not of the cõmon conſent of all the Cantons, but that the Cantons of Switz and Fribourg were the authors thereof: the firſt complaining that a poſt of theirs paſſing through the Duchie of Millan, was murdered by certaine French ſouldiers: the other pretending that ſome other particular wrongs had bene done them. The counſels of theſe, and generally of the whole nation, albeit they were afore come to the Kings eare, did for all that nothing moue him to accord with them, as his familiars continually aduiſed him, and his friends which he had amongſt them gaue him hope to be able to obtaine. He was ſtayed alſo by his accuſtomed difficulties to enlarge their ancient penſions with twentie thouſand franks, which is litle more or leſſe then ten thouſand duckats: ſo that he refuſed for a ſmall price, that amitie which afterwards he would gladly haue bought with infinite treaſures, perſwading himſelfe that they would not ſtirre at all, or if they did, that they could not much hurt him, for that being accuſtomed to go to the warre on foote, they had neither horſes nor artilleries: and withall that in that ſeaſon (the moneth of Nouember being now begun) the riuers were ſwelled, they had neither veſſels nor bridges, the victuals of the Duchie of Millan were reſtrained into fortreſſes by the commandement of Gaſton de Foix, the bordering townes well guarded, and in the plaine the men at armes were able to make head againſt them: ſo that for theſe impediments he preſumed, that if they took y field, they would be conſtrained quickly to retire. But the Swiſſers being nothing danted by theſe difficulties, began to deſcẽd at Vareſa, at which place their nũbers increaſed continually, hauing with them ſeuen field peeces & many great harquebuzes, caried by horſes, & ſome reaſonable prouiſion of victuals. And their coming ſeemed ſo much the more dangerous, by how much the inhabitants of Millan began to be weary of the French iuriſdiction: and alſo that the King, reſtrained by couetouſneſſe, had not ſuffered that prouiſion ſhould be made of footmen: and the men at armes that then were in Italy, which in true computation exceeded not thirteene hundred Lances, together with the two hundred Gentlemen, were not all able to make reſiſtance to the Swiſſers, both for that part of them were gone to the guard of Verona and Breſſia, and alſo Monſieur de Foix had newly ſent two hundred Lances to Bolognia, becauſe of the coming of the Cardinall de Medicis and Marke Anthonie Colonno to Faenza: where, albeit they had no footmen as yet leuied, yet becauſe of the diuiſions that were in Bolognia, and alſo for that at that time the Caſtle-keeper of the Rocke of Saſſilon (a borough of the mountaine of Bolognia) had voluntarily put it into the Legats hands, it was thought neceſſary to ſend that garriſon thither. Frõ Vareſa the Swiſſers ſent a trumpet to defie the Kings lieutenant, who, hauing with him but a ſlender ſtrength of men at arms (for he had not had ſufficient time to aſſemble them) and not aboue two thouſand footmen, whereof he was not yet reſolued to make new leuies for feare to diſpleaſe the King, was come to Aſſaron, a place about thirteene miles from Millan; not with intention to fight, but to accoaſt them to cut off their victuals; by which action his hope was onely to let and ſtay them, ſeeing there was betweene Vareſa and Millan neither riuers hard to paſſe, nor any place of defence. From Vareſa the Swiſſers marched to Galera, where they found themſelues increaſed to the number of ten thouſand: and Monſieur de Foix who followed Iohn Iaques Triuulce, put himſelfe within Legnano, which is about foure miles from Galera: by reaſon whereof the people of Millan being greatly terrified, waged bands of footmen at their proper charges for the guard of their towne: and Theodore Triuulce cauſed the baſtillions to be fortified, and (as though the army would haue retired to Millan) he cauſed the wayes to be made plaine within about the rampiers that enuironed the ſuburbes, the more eaſily to manage the horſemen. Neuertheleſſe, Monſieur de Foix accompanied with fiue hundred Lances, and the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings, preſented himſelfe before Galera with great ſtore of artilleries: which as ſoone as the Swiſſers perceiued, they iſſued out in order of battell, and ſuddenly retired into the towne againe, refuſing to fight in an open place, vnleſſe their numbers were greater. During theſe actions, their numbers increaſed continually, in which reſpect determining no more to refuſe the fight, they marched to Buſty, where was a garriſon of an hundred Lances, who ſaued themſelues with much ado, loſing their baggage and part of their horſes. At laſt the French men, who retired alway by the like meaſure and diſtance that the Swiſſers aduanced, were returned and lodged within the ſuburbes of Millan: ſo that it was vncertaine whether they would ſtay to defend them or not, for that ſometimes they affirmed and ſometimes denied, furniſhing with great diligence the Caſtle with victuals. The Swiſſers afterwards approched within two miles of the ſuburbes, but the feare that was had of them before began now to diminiſh much, for that the bands of men at armes that were reuoked, began to arriue continually at Millan, and likewiſe many footmen which they muſtred; and they expected from time to time Captain Molard with his regiment of Gaſcon footmen, and Captaine Iacob with his Lanceknights, the one directed to come from Verona, and the other from Carpy. About this time alſo were ſurpriſed certain letters written by the Swiſſers to their Lords, whom they aduertiſed that the French men gaue them no great impediments, and that they maruelled that they had receiued no newes from the Pope, nor intelligence what the Venetian army did; and yet that they forbare not to march and aduance continually, according to the orders of the reſolution. They were by this time ſixteene thouſand in number, and turned towards Moncia, which they aſſayed not to take, but bearing more towards the riuer of Adda, they kept the French men in feare that they would aduenture to paſſe ouer: by reaſon whereof they caſt a bridge at Caſſan to hinder their paſſage, vſing therein the oportunitie of the towne and the bridge. In this meane while a Captaine of the Swiſſers hauing firſt obtained ſafeconduct, came to Millan, and demanded a moneths pay for all the footmen which offered to returne into their countrey: but departing without any effect of his meſſage, for that their offers were farre inferiour to his asking, he returned the day following with greater demands: and albeit there was made to him greater offers then the day before, yet as ſoone as he was returned to his army, he ſent backe immediatly a trumpet to ſignifie to them, that they would no more hearken to accord: and the day following, contrary to the expectation of euery one, they retired towards Coma, and ſo returned into their countries, leauing to iudge whether they were deſcended to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan, or to paſſe into ſome other place; and for what cauſe, being as yet conſtrained by no euident neceſſitie, they were returned: and, if they had afore determined ſo to do, why they did not accept the money that was offered them, ſpecially ſeeing they had demanded it? Whatſoeuer the cauſe was, this is certaine, that as they retired, there came two poſts from the Pope and the Venetians, who if they had arriued ſomewhat ſooner, it is likely the army of the Swiſſers had not returned: and it is not to be doubted, that if at the ſame time that the Swiſſers entred the Duchie of Millan, the Spaniards had bin neare to Bolognia, the affaires of the French, who were not able to make reſiſtance in ſo many places, had forthwith fallen into manifeſt ruine and perdition.

The French King finding now by experience the perill which he had not preuented afore by reaſon, ſent cõmandement to Monſieur de Foix, before he knew of the retrait of the Swiſſers, that he ſhould make no ſpare of mony to make agreement with them: and making no further doubt, notwithſtanding the Swiſſers were compounded withall, that he muſt endure a ſtrong aſſault, he gaue preſent direction to all the men at armes that he had in France (except two hundred Lances which he reſerued for Picardy) to paſſe the Mounts, and beſides theſe he ſent thither a new ſtrength of Gaſcon footmen, and commanded Monſieur de Foix to furniſh his army with Italians and Lanceknights. And becauſe the ſuccours of the Florentines were of great importance to him, both for that the warre was made very neare them, and alſo for the oportunitie of their frontiers to trouble the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, beſides the cutting off of victuals and other commodities from the army of the enemies if they ſhould approch Bolognia, he ſolicited them with great inſtance, to declare themſelues for him, and ioyne with him in the warre with all their forces, for that the preſent neceſſitie required another matter then a ſmall or limited ſuccor, or that they ſhould containe themſelues within the termes of confederations: and that they could neuer expect a more great or faire occaſion to bind him vnto them, or euer do a more ſingular pleaſure, and which his ſucceſſors ſhould more acknowledge from age to age; beſides, that if they conſidered well, in ſuccouring and defending him, they ſuccoured and ſupported their owne cauſe; for that they could not be ignorant what hatred the Pope bare to them, and with what deſire the King Catholike laboured to dreſſe and eſtabliſh in that Citie an eſtate depending wholly vpon him. But at Florence the opinions of men were diuers, for many, blinded with the ſweetneſſe of preſent ſparing, conſidered not what the time to come might produce: and with others preuailed the memory that the fidelitie and ſeruices of that Commonweale had neuer uer bin acknowledged by the King reigning, nor by Charles the eight his predeceſſor: and that he had ſold to them with a great price his promiſe not to hinder them in the recouery of Piſa, alledging that for theſe examples they could not truſt his promiſes, nor be aſſured by his offers, and that he would neuer acknowledge any benefite they ſhould do to him. In theſe reſpects they held it great raſhneſſe to reſolue to enter into a warre, which ſucceeding not well, they ſhould partake in all the euils, more then was either reaſonable, or in due proportion they ought: and falling out happily, they ſhould in no ſort communicate with the benefites, or at leaſt in a very ſmall proportion. But thoſe were moſt of all to be feared, who either for hatred, or for ambition, or for the deſire of another forme of gouernment, oppoſed againſt the Gonfalonnier, extolling the aforeſaid reaſons, and inferring others; and ſpecially leſt remaining neuters, they ſhould incurre the hatred of either partie, and giue to either of the two Kings iuſt occaſion to complaine: for that touching the French King, they were no otherwiſe bound to him, then to aide him with two hundred men at armes for the defence of his proper eſtates, which they had already accompliſhed: and the King of Aragon could not be diſcontented, but would eſteeme it a great gaine if they intermeddled no otherwiſe in that warre: alſo, that ſuch as kept their faith beſt, were alwayes moſt worthy of praiſe and merite: and that by this example he might hope that when need ſhould require, they would likewiſe obſerue iuſtly to him that which was promiſed in the capitulation made in common with the French king and with him: That proceeding in this ſort, if peace were made betweene the Princes, the citie ſhould be named and preſerued of them both: and in caſe the victory ſhould fall to the one of them, not holding himſelfe offended, and hauing no cauſe to beare them any particular hatred, it would be eaſie to buy his friendſhip with the ſame money, and haply with a leſſe quantitie, then they ſhould haue diſburſed vpon the warre; which was a helpe and meanes, whereby, more then by force of armes, their elders had many times ſaued their libertie: whereas if they ſhould proceed otherwiſe, they ſhould defray for another, during the warre, and without any neceſſitie, intollerable expences; and the victory falling to the enemy, the libertie and ſafetie of their countrey ſhould remaine in moſt manifeſt perill. The aduice of the Gonfalonnier was contrary to the opinions of theſe men; who iudged it profitable that the Commonweale ſhould take armes for the French King, for which reaſon he had afore fauoured the Councell, and giuen the Pope ſufficient matter to be diſcontented, to the end that the Citie being prouoked by him, or at leaſt beginning to enter into ſuſpition, might be as it were conſtrained to make that reſolution: and at that time he perſwaded that it could be no other but a moſt pernicious counſell, to remaine idle, expecting the iſſue of the warre managed ſo neare them, and betweene Princes ſo much more mightie then they: for that in the warres of others, neutralitie is commendable, and a fit meanes to auoid many troubles and expences, when our owne forces are not ſo weake as may cauſe vs to feare the victory of either partie, ſeeing that then it bringeth vs ſuretie, and oftentimes by their long warres, good meanes to increaſe our eſtate. He told them alſo, that it was no ſure foundation, not to haue offended either partie, or not to haue giuen them iuſt cauſe to complaine, for that very rarely it happeneth, that the inſolency of the conquerour is brideled or repreſſed by equitie or other diſcreet conſiderations, and that for theſe reaſons great Princes eſteeme themſelues no leſſe iniuried, when they are refuſed in the things they deſire, but ſtand diſdainful againſt euery one that followeth not their will, and ioyneth not his fortune with theirs: That it was folly to beleeue that the French King would not take it for an offence, to ſee himſelfe left abandoned in ſo great perils, and finding the effects nothing anſwering the confidence he had in the Florentines, touching matters which he conſtantly promiſed to himſelfe of them, and for things which they themſelues had ſo oftentimes aſſured: That it was yet a greater folly to beleeue that the Pope and the King of Aragon being victors, would not vſe the victory outragiouſly againſt that Commonweale, conſidering the inſatiable hate of the one, and the ioynt deſire of them both, to erect there a gouernment to their fancy, leſt that Citie remaining in her libertie, would be alwayes more inclined to the French then to them: and that this deſire of theirs might eaſily be diſcerned, in that the Pope (the King Catholike approuing it) had preferred the Cardinall de Medicis as Legat to ſ army. To remaine neuter then, were as much as to be willing to become the prey of whoſoeuer ſhould become victor: whereas in ioyning to the one of them, at the leaſt by his victory, they ſhould be aſſured and preſerued: a reward and fruit to be well conſidered vpon, ſeeing the danger whereinto the eſtate of their affaires was reduced: and in caſe the peace were made, they ſhould haue better conditions: That it was a ſuperfluous matter to diſpute to whether of the parties they ought rather to ioyne themſelues, for that without all doubt it was fit rather to follow the ancient amitie, (by whoſe meanes, albeit the Commonweale had not bin rewarded and recompenced, yet at leaſt it had bin oftentimes defended and preſerued) then to embrace new friendſhips, which will be euer vnfaithfull and ſuſpitious. The Gonfalonnier occupied in vaine theſe diſcourſes, and thoſe that hindered moſt that his aduice was not followed, were thoſe to whom it was diſpleaſing that it ſhould come to the French Kings knowledge, that it was by his meanes that the Florentines ſhould be ioyned with him. Amid theſe contentions, one faction breaking the aduice of the other, there could be eſtabliſhed no reſolution, whether they ſhould declare, or ſtand abſolutely neuters: ſo that their counſels oftentimes were vncertaine, and their deliberations repugnant in themſelues, without bringing merit or reputation to any: and which more is, proceeding with theſe incertainties, they ſent Embaſſadour to the King of Aragon, (to the great diſpleaſure of the French King) FRANCIS GVICCIARDIN Doctor of the Law, he who wrote this preſent Hiſtory, who at that time was ſo yong, that in reſpect of his age, according to the lawes of the countrey, he was vncapable to manage any office: and yet they gaue him not ſuch commiſſions as might in any ſort mitigate the angrie minds of the confederates.

Soderin for the French King.

But a litle after the Swiſſers were returned to their countries, the Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh ſouldiers began to enter into Romagna, at whoſe coming all the townes which the Duke of Ferrara held on this ſide Po, except the Baſtill of la Foſſa, and the foord of Geniuola, yeelded themſelues at ỹ ſummons of a ſimple Trumpet. But for that the whole regiments were not yet arriued in Romagna, nor the artilleries which the Viceroy expected at Imola, it was thought good, to the end the time ſhould not be ſpent without profite, that Peter of Nauarre Captaine generall of the Spaniſh footmen, ſhould go to beſiege the Baſtill: who hauing begun the battery with three peeces of artillery, and finding it more hard to be taken then he looked for, for that it was well fortified and valiantly defended by an hundred and fiftie ſouldiers that were therein, he cauſed to make two bridges of wood, to giue a greater commoditie to the ſouldiers to paſſe the ditches which were full of water: which bridges being made, the third day after his approching 1512. before the Baſtill, which was the laſt day of the yeare 1511, he gaue a furious aſſault, and ſuch, as after a long and braue fight, the footmen winning the walls with the helpe of their ladders, at laſt they tooke it, making ſlaughter of almoſt all the footmen therein, together with Veſtitello their Captaine. Peter of Nauarre left two hundred footmen within the Baſtill, contrary to the opinion of Iohn Vitelli, who affirmed that it was ſo much ſhaken with the artillery, that there was no poſſibilitie to defend it without making new fortifications: but he was ſcarcely returned to ioyne himſelfe with the Viceroy, ere the Duke of Ferrara, being gone thither with nine great peeces of artillery, aſſaulted it with ſuch fury, that ſo litle a place being layd open and reuerſed in many parts, he entred by force the very ſame day, where were ſlaine, partly in fighting, and partly to reuenge the death of his people, the Captaine with all his footmen, the Duke himſelfe being hurt on the head with a ſtone, which neuertheleſſe by reaſon of his head-peece did him no great harme. In this meane while all the regiments Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh were aſſembled at Imola, mightie in number, braue ſouldiers, and valiant Captaines: for as the bruit went, the King of Aragon had there a thouſand men at armes, eight hundred mounted vpon Iennets, eight thouſand footmen Spaniſh; and beſides the perſon of the Viceroy, many Barons of the kingdome of Naples, of whom the moſt renowmed for experience of armes, was Fabricio Colonno, who had the title of Generall, for that Proſper Colonno being not willing to be ſubiect in the warre to the commandements of the Viceroy, had refuſed it. On the Popes part there were eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and eight thouſand Italian footmen vnder Marke Anthonie Colonno, Iohn Vitelli, Malateſta Baillon ſonne to Iohn Paul, Raphael de Pazzi, with other Leaders and Captains, all ſubiect to the obedience of the Cardinall of Medicis Legat; but they had no Generall, for that the Duke of Termini whom the Pope had choſen, as one in whom the King of Aragon repoſed much, died at Ciuita Caſtellana coming to the army: and the Duke of Vrbin, to whom that place was wont to be transferred, came not at all: either for that ſuch was the Popes pleaſure, or elſe for that he held it a thing vnworthy of his perſon, chiefly vpon the lands of the Church, to obey the Viceroy, bearing authoritie of Captaine generall ouer the whole army of the Confederates. With this army plentifully furniſhed

niſhed with artilleries which were almoſt all come from the realme of Naples, they determined to incampe before Bolognia: not that they were ignorant that the enterpriſe was very difficult, ſeeing the French men might eaſily miniſter ſuccours: but for that there was no other enterpriſe which contained not greater difficulties and impediments: and to remaine idle with ſo great an army, would be too manifeſt an argument of cowardize. Moreouer, the Pope made ſo great inſtance, that who ſo euer would put into conſideration the difficulties, ſeemed to giue him occaſion to beleeue, and cauſe to complaine, that the ſleights and wiles of the Spaniards began already to appeare. Therfore the Viceroy cauſeth the army to march, incamping between the riuer of Adice and Bolognia: where, after he had taken order for things neceſſary to the beſieging of that Citie, and turned the channels which go to Bolognia by the riuers of Rhene and Sauanna, he approched neare the walls, ſtretching out and beſtowing the greateſt part of his army betweene the mountaine and the way that goeth from Bolognia to Romagna, for the commoditie of victuals which come from that ſide: and Fabricio Colonno with the auantguard containing ſeuen hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, was lodged betweene the bridge of Rhene, ſtanding vpon the high way of Romagna which leadeth into Lombardy, and the gate of S. Felix, which is alſo vpon the ſame way, and that to the end the more eaſily to giue impediment that no French ſuccours might enter. And becauſe they would command the mountaines, they beſtowed one part of their bands of ſouldiers in the Monaſtery of S. Michael of the wood, which is very neare the Citie, but ſeated in a high place, and commanding ouer it: they alſo made themſelues Lord of the Church which is more high, called S. Marie on the Mount. Into Bolognia, beſides the people that bare armes, haply more by cuſtome then by nature, with certaine troupes of horſemen and footmen waged by the family of the Bentiuoleis, Monſieur de Foix had ſent two thouſand Lanceknights, and two hundred lances, vnder Odet de Foix and Iues d'Allegre, very notable Captaines, the one for his long experience in warre, and the other for the nobilitie of his houſe, and for that there appeared in him great tokens of valour and courage: & with them were the Captains of Faietta, and Vincent called the great diuel. Neuertheles they repoſed more in the ſuccors which Monſieur de Foix had promiſed them, then in their owne forces, conſidering the great circuite of the Citie, and the incommodities that were on the mountaine ſide, and alſo that there were no other fortifications, then ſuch as for the preſent danger were made in haſte, and the Bentiuoleis diſtruſted many of the Nobilitie and people: and laſtly they had made a late experience about the Baſtill of Geniuola, that the valour of the Spaniſh footmen was anſwerable to the praiſes that haue gone on them in all times, to be men apt to beſiege townes, by reaſon of their great agilitie and dexteritie. Neuertheles they began to be better reſolued, when they ſaw the enemies aduanced but litle, lying nine dayes about the walls without doing any thing, ſauing that they began with two Sakers and two Culuerins planted in the Monaſtery of S. Michael to ſhoot in vaine into the Citie, to terrifie men and to hurt houſes: an execution which they gaue ouer immediatly, knowing by experience that in doing litle domage to the enemy in that ſort, they made alſo an vnprofitable waſte of their munitions. The matter that kept them ſo long from doing any thing, was an aduertiſement they had the ſame day they incamped, that Monſieur de Foix who was come to Finale, waged ſouldiers from all parts, and the bruite that was ſpread, which ſeemed likely to be true, that knowing how much it would preiudice the affaires of the King, and no leſſe diminiſh his owne reputation, if he ſuffered a Citie of that importance and conueniency to be taken out of his hands, he would expoſe himſelfe to all dangers for the preſeruation of it. This made them draw into counſel to debate better, not onely on which ſide they might moſt eaſily & with moſt hope beſiege it, and there to plant their artilleries, but alſo how they might let the French ſuccours for entring. Therefore in the firſt counſell it was agreed, that Fabricio Colonno, being firſt prouided of victuals, ſhould paſſe to the other ſide of the towne, and lodge vpon the hill ſide beneath S. Marie of the Mount, from whence he might eaſily giue impediments to any that ſhould attempt to enter into Bolognia, and not be ſo farre deuided from the reſidue of the army, but that any danger happening, he might be ſuccoured in time: and that at the ſame time they ſhould begin from that part where they were incamped, or very neare thereto, to batter the towne. Such as were the authors of this counſell, alledged, that ſith all that the French held in Italy depended vpon the preſeruation of the army, it was not to be thought that Monſieur de Foix would hazard to do any thing, in the execution whereof he might be conſtrained to fight; and much leſſe would he be of that iudgement, albeit he knew he might do it with ſuretie, to incloſe himſelfe with all his army within Bologna: whereby he might depriue himſelfe of all meanes to ſuccour (in caſes of neceſſitie) the eſtate of Millan, which was not as yet wholly aſſured from the mouings of the Swiſſers, and where was alſo great doubt to be aſſailed by the Venetian army, which being come vpon the marches of Verona, ſeemed to threaten the towne of Breſſia. But the day following, all ſuch as had approued this counſell, were of a contrary opinion, conſidering it was not a thing certaine that the French army would not come, and that if it did come, the vantguard onely would not ſuffice to reſiſt them: and that that deliberation was not to be approued, which was eſtabliſhed vpon ſuch a foundation, that it was in the power of the enemy to change it. For this cauſe the aduice of Peter of Nauarre was allowed by the Viceroy, to whom onely he communicated his opinion, which was, that making prouiſion of victuals for fiue dayes, and leauing a guard onely in the Church of S. Michael, all the army ſhould paſſe to the other ſide of the Citie, where the enemy might be hindred from making entrance, and the towne not being fortified on that ſide (neuer fearing to be there aſſailed) they ſhould without doubt take it within fiue dayes. But as ſoone as this reſolution was diſperſed amongſt the army, there was none which did not openly reproue the direction, to go lodge with the army in a place meerly void of all traffike of victuals that were brought from Romagna, which was the onely meanes to nouriſh them, ſo that vndoubtedly it could not ſtand vndiſſolued and broken, if within fiue dayes it enforced not Bologna: and what is he (ſaid Fabricio Colonno) that can aſſuredly promiſe ſuch a thing within ſo ſhort a time? and what reaſon is there, vnder a hope, which of her proper nature is fallible & ſubiect to many accidents, to put our ſelues in ſo great a danger? and who ſeeth not, that ſet houres failing vs, we haue no poſſibilitie to retire our ſelues and our people, made hungry, diſordered and fearfull, without our loſſe and certaine ouerthrow, hauing Bologna in our face, where is a great multitude of people and many ſouldiers, and at our backs the French army, and the country our enemy? Some others aduiſed, that beſtowing in the vantguard a greater ſtrength of footmen, it ſhould incampe on the other ſide of Bologna, almoſt at the foote of the mountaine, betweene the gate Saragoſſa and that of S. Felix, fortifying themſelues with trenches and other defences: and that they ſhould batter the towne on that ſide, being there not onely the weakeſt in walls and rampiers, but alſo by planting ſome peeces of artillery vpon the top of the mountaine, they ſhould execute in flanke during the aſſault, ſuch of the defendants as would come to the breach: which counſell was alſo reiected, as not ſufficient to let the coming of the French, and as a matter dangerous; for that if they ſhould be charged by the enemy, the army (notwithſtanding it commanded the mountaines) could not deſcend to their ſuccours in leſſe time then three houres. Amid theſe ambiguities, it being farre more eaſie (and that worthily) to reproue the counſels propounded by others, then to propoſe ſuch as deſerued to be approued; at laſt the Captaines grew to a reſolution to aſſaile the towne on that ſide wherein the army was already incamped; a determination which amongſt other reaſons tooke furtherance by an opinion they had that Monſieur de Foix would not come at all, ſince he lingred ſo long: therefore they began to leuell the ground to bring the artillery to the walls, and called backe the vantguard to incampe together with the others. But a litle after, many aduertiſements being come that the French bands increaſed daily at Finale, and ſo the former ſuſpition of their coming reuiuing, there was amongſt them againe diuerſitie of opinions: for euery one being of this mind, that if Monſieur de Foix approched, they ſhould haue ſpeciall regard to aſſaile him afore he entred Bologna; many perſwaded, that in that caſe, the artillery planted already before the wals, which then ſhould be retired, would giue many impediments and difficulties to the army: a matter in ſuch vrgent termes of affaires, both dangerous and hurtfull: Others ſaid, that it was no leſſe infamous then hurtfull to remaine ſo many dayes about the walls of Bologna without doing any thing, confirming at one time the courage of thoſe that were within, and giuing leiſure to ſuch as were without, to prepare to ſuccour them: and therefore it were not beſt to deferre any longer to plant the artillery, but in ſuch place as it might eaſily be withdrawne to oppoſe againe the French men, to leuell the ground the better, and ſo largely, that both the artilleries and the armie might be able to moue together. The Legate was fully with them that gaue counſell to begin to batter the towne, both for the diſpleaſure he had of ſo long deferring, and alſo ſomewhat ſuſpecting leſt the matter had bin wrought by the direction and fancy of the King of Aragon, according to the ſubtilties and diſſembled ma-

ner of proceedings of the Spaniſh: and he complained, that if from the firſt incamping they had begun to batter the towne, they might haply afore that time haue bin maiſters of it: That they ſhould not ioyne fault vnto fault, and much leſſe remaine as enemies about a towne, and yet expreſſe no ſigne of valour to aſſaile it: That the Pope ſent to him poſts and meſſages daily, but he knew not what to anſwer or alledge, and that he could entertaine and nourish him no longer with promiſes and vaine hopes. Theſe words moued not a litle the Viceroy, who complained much, that he being a man of no training in armes nor exerciſes of warre, would by his importunitie be the cauſe of vnaduiſed deliberations: That in his counſels there was debated the intereſt of all the world, wherein he could not proceed with ſuch abſolute maturitie, as it ſhould not be needfull to looke yet more nearly vnto it: That it was the cuſtome of Popes and Commonweales to enter willingly into warre, and afterwards the expences and perplexities increaſing aboue expectation, to wiſh too ſoone to bring them to an end: He willed him to leaue the deliberation of things to the Captains; who had the ſame intention with him, and had alſo experience of warre. Laſtly Peter of Nauarre, in whom the Viceroy repoſed moſt, alledged that in an expedition of ſo great importance, men ought not to reſpect ſo much two or three dayes, and therefore that it was neceſſary to continue the counſell and direction for prouiſions neceſſary, as well for the ſiege of Bolognia, as for the day of battell, to gouerne things afterwards according to the proceedings of the French. Two daies paſſed afore there appeared any light of better reſolution, for that Monſieur de Foix, to whom Cento, Pieua, with many other boroughs of the countrey of Bolognia were rendred, remained ſtill at Finale, where he lay to reaſſemble his forces, which as well for that they had bin diſtributed in many places, as that his footbands which he had waged were long in coming, could not ſo ſuddenly come together: ſo that no further cauſe of deferring appearing, at laſt the artilleries were planted againſt the walls, about thirtie fadomes neare the gate of S. Stephen, which leades to Florence, where the wall turning and crooking towards the gate called Chaſtillon, that hath his proſpect vpon the mountaine, maketh an angle. And at the ſame time Peter of Nauarre was about to make a mine, drawing more towards the gate of Chaſtillon on that ſide the wall where within is a litle Chappell called Barcana, to the end that the aſſault being giuen at the ſame inſtant, they might with more difficultie make reſiſtance being deuided, then if they were vnited and ioyned to defend one onely place. Moreouer, following ſtill their firſt thoughts to oppoſe againſt the French men, they gaue order that the vantguard ſhould return to the lodging where it was before. The artilleries brought downe to the earth in foure and twentie houres an hundred fadomes of the wall; and the tower of the gate was battered in ſuch ſort, that being no more able to maintaine defence, it was abandoned, ſo that they might very conueniently giue the aſſault on that ſide: but they expected till the mine were accompliſhed, notwithſtanding by the raſhnes of the ſouldiers there wanted not much, that the aſſault had bin giuen the ſame day in diſorder. For certain Spaniſh footmen being climed vp by a ladder to a hole which had bin made in the tower, deſcended from thence into a litle houſe which on the inner ſide ioyned to the walls, wherein was no guard: which being perceiued by the other footmen, they had all runne thither by heapes, if the Captaines hearing the noiſe, had not reſtrained them. But after the defendants, hauing planted a canon againſt the houſe, had ſlaine ſome of them, the others fled from the place whereinto vndiſcreetly they were entred. And whileſt they were buſie about the mine, others laboured in the army to make bridges of wood, and to fill vp the ditches with baskets and earth, the better to be able (marching as it were in a plaine way) to bring the footmen to the breach, and to draw euen vpon the ruines ſome peece of artillery, to the end that in the execution of the aſſault, the defendants ſhould not be able to continue to make reſiſtance. But the French Captains ſeeing theſe preparations, & diſcerning withall that the people began already to giue themſelues ouer to feare, ſent immediatly to pray ſuccours of Monſieur de Foix, who diſpatched thither the ſame day a thouſand footmen, and the day after an hundred and foureſcore Lances: a matter which made the enemies aſſuredly beleeue that he was determined to paſſe no further, for that it ſeemed not likely that he would ſeparate from himſelfe part of his ſtrength, if he had another intention: and indeed his intention was ſuch, for that he was of opinion that that ſuccour was ſufficient to defend Bolognia, & he would not, without neceſſitie, aſſay the fortune of the battel. At laſt the mine being accompliſhed, and the army ſtanding in order of battell to go forthwith to the aſſault, for the execution whereof with greater ſtrength the vantguard was reuoked, Peter of Nauarre cauſed fire to be put to the mine, which with an horrible noiſe and fury blew vp the chappell ſo high, that through that ſpace which was left betweene the ground and the wall raiſed vp, thoſe without might plainly ſee into the intrailes of the citie, together with the ſouldiers that were prepared to defend it: but falling ſuddenly downe againe, the whole wall tooke the ſame place from whence the violence of the fire had driuen it, and was ſo reioyned and knit againe, as if it had neuer bin ſtirred: ſo that being impoſſible for the ſouldiers to go to the aſſault on that ſide, the Captains iudged it no leſſe hard to follow it onely on the other part. They of Bolognia interpreted this aduenture to a miracle,, ſaying, it was impoſſible without diuine aide, that the wall ſhould fall and reioyne ſo iuſtly vpon his old foundations: for which cauſe the Chappell was afterwards increaſed and frequented of the people in great deuotion. This ſucceſſe (as though there had remained nothing elſe to be feared touching Bolognia) was the cauſe that Monſieur de Foix thought good to go to Breſſia, for an aduertiſement he had that the Venetian army drew that way, and alſo for feare leſt there ſhould happen ſome want, for that by reaſon of the perils of Bolognia, he had left there a very ſlender garriſon, and no leſſe doubted of ſecret practiſes and intelligences. Neuertheleſſe he changed opinion at the requeſts of the Captaines that were within Bolognia, who ſometimes alledged to him, that if he went his way, the dangers of the warre would redouble and become greater then before; and ſometimes they gaue him hope to ouerthrow the campe of the enemies if he would but ioyne his preſence to their valour. Therefore, notwithſtanding in the counſell almoſt all the Captaines were againſt him, he iſſued very late out of Finale: and the morning following, being but two houres of day light, he drew towards Bolognia with all his army in battell array, laboring againſt the ſnowes and ſharp winds, and entred by the gate of S. Felix, hauing with him thirteene hundred Lances, ſixe thouſand Lanceknights, whom he had beſtowed all in the vantguard, and eight thouſand footmen as well French as Italians. Which being done, Monſieur de Foix prepared himſelfe the morning following to aſſaile the campe of the enemies, the ſouldiers making their ſallies at three gates, and the people iſſuing out by the way of the mountaine, whom he had found not doubting of his coming; whereof it is certaine their Captaines had no knowledge, neither that day nor the moſt part of the day following. But Iues d'Allegre gaue counſell to let the bands repoſe yet one day, who were made weary with the bitter wayes they had marched, thinking withall (which alſo any wiſe man might haue iudged) that it was not poſſible that ſo great an army, in the broad day, and by the high way of Rome, could without their knowledge enter into a Citie, before which they lay incamped. The which ignorance had continued the day after, if by aduenture a Greeke eſtradiot had not bene taken, who was iſſued out to the skirmiſh among other horſemen, and being demanded what they did in the towne, he anſwered, that they could know but litle by him, for that he came but the day before with the French army. Vpon which words being diligently aſked, with great maruell of the Captaines, and being found conſtant in his anſwers, they beleeued him, and thereupon determined to leuie their camp, holding it dangerous to remaine there, as well for the bitterneſſe of the ſeaſon which greatly afflicted the ſouldiers, as for the neighborhood of the citie, whereinto ſo great an army was entred. The night following, which was the nineteenth day after their incamping, whē they had withdrawn their artilleries with as litle bruit as they could, very early in the morning their army tooke the way towards Imola, marching along the plaines by the which they came, in the middeſt whereof was the high way and the artillery: and hauing beſtowed in their reareguard the flower of their army, they went their way in ſuretie, for that there iſſued none out of Bolognia ſauing certaine French horſemen, who hauing made ſpoile of part of the munitions and victuals, and in ſo doing, begun to fall into diſorder, were to their harmes repulſed euen to Bolognia by Malateſta Baillon, who gouerned the laſt part of the armie.

The campe being raiſed, Monſieur de Foix leauing three hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen within Bolognia, departed ſuddenly to march in haſte to the ſuccours of the Caſtle of Breſſia, the Citie being taken by the Venetians the day before he entred into Bolognia. For Andrew Gritti incited by Count Lewis Auogato a gentleman of Breſſia, and by the moſt part of the people of the countrey, and hoping that within the towne they would draw to ſome mutinie, had paſſed by the commandement of the Senate with an army of three hundred men at armes, thirteene hundred light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, the riuer of Adice at Albera, which is a place neare to Legnaguo, and afterwards waded ouer the foord of Myncia at the turning

ning mill betweene Goito and Valegge: and coming at laſt to Montchiaro, he incamped by night at Caſtagnet, a village within fiue miles of Breſſia, from whence he made ſudden incurſions with his horſemen euen to the gates: and at the ſame time the name of S. Marke reſounding in all places, Count Lewis came hard to the gate with eight hundred men of the Eutropian and Sabian valleys, whom he had drawne into commotion, and ſent his ſonne on the other ſide of the Citie euen to the gates with other companies of footmen. But Andrew Gritti, neither receiuing from within the Citie thoſe intelligences which he expected, nor any ſuch ſignes being made to him as were agreed vpon, but vnderſtanding that the citie was carefully guarded on all ſides, thought it not fit to paſſe any further; and in this ſtirre Auogaro the ſonne being aſſailed by thoſe within, was taken priſoner. Andrew Gritti retired to Montagnana, from whence he departed at firſt, leauing a ſufficient guard vpon the bridge which he had made vpon Adice. But being called againe not many daies after, he repaſſed the riuer of Adice with two canons and foure falconets, and incamped at Caſtagnet, Count Lewis being at the ſame time approched within a mile of Breſſia with a very great number of the ſaid valley men: and albeit there appeared no tokens of fauour from them within, yet, Gritti ſeeing his ſtrength to be greater then it was before, determined to aſſay to take it by force. Then being approched with all the paiſants, he began to giue the aſſault in three places, which albeit it was vnfortunately aſſayed at the gate of the Tower, yet it ſucceeded happily at the gate of the Piles where Auogaro fought, and at the gate la Garzula, where (as ſome report) the ſouldiers led by Baltazar Scipion entred by the iron grates, by the which the riuer, being of the ſame name with the gate, entreth into the citie: and that notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of the French men, who both ſeeing the enemies enter the Citie, and the townesmen conſpire in their fauour, they retired into the Caſtle, together with Monſieur du Lude their Gouernour, loſing their horſes and baggage. In which tumult, that part of the towne which is called the Citadell, and ſtandeth ſeparate from the reſidue of the Citie, where almoſt all the Gibelins inhabited, was ſpoiled and ſacked, except the houſes of the Guelfs. After the conqueſt of Breſſia, Bergama rendred immediatly except the two Caſtles, whereof the one is in the midſt of the Citie, and the other within halfe a mile: which happened by the meanes and working of certaine citizens: and Orciuecche, Orcinouo, and Pontuiquo, with many other places thereabout did the like: and haply they might haue proceeded further, or at leaſt the victory had bin better aſſured, if at Venice (where they reioyced exceedingly) they had had as great a care to ſend ſouldiers and artilleries ſufficient for the getting of the Caſtle, which no doubt would haue made no great reſiſtance, as they were to create Magiſtrates for the gouernment of the places already recouered. And this negligence was ſo much the more hurtfull, by how much the diligence and celeritie of Monſieur de Foix was greater, who hauing paſſed the riuer of Po at Stellato (from whence he ſent an hundred and fiftie lances for the guard of Ferrara, and fiue hundred French footmen) he paſſed alſo the riuer of Mincia at the mill bridge, hauing almoſt at the very time of his paſſing, ſent to demand paſſage of the Marquis of Mantua; making ſo ſudden a demand, to the end either to giue the Marquis no reſpite to take aduice, or elſe that the Venetian bands ſhould be ſo much the later aduertiſed of his coming. From thence he went the day after to Nogero vpon the territories of Verona, and the day following to Pontpeſere, and to Treuilla three miles from Eſcalo: where being aduertiſed that Iohn Paul Baillon who had the leading of certaine ſouldiers and artilleries of the Venetians to Breſſia, was come from Frankeaſtle with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and twelue hundred footmen, to incampe in the Ile of Eſcalo, he made haſte thither, to charge him with three hundred lances and ſeuen hundred archers, the reſidue of the army coming after, which could not march with ſuch diligence: but finding that he was remoued an houre afore his coming, he followed him without any tarrying. Iohn Paul Baillon had receiued aduertiſement that Bernardin de Montono to whom was left the guard of the bridge made at Albero, had broken it vp, hearing of the coming of the French, for feare he ſhould be incloſed by them and the Lanceknights which were within Verona, whither Cæſar had a litle before ſent three thouſand footmen which he had in Friul, being at that time releaſed of all guard at Friul, for that all was returned to the power of the Venetians, except Gradiſqua. For this cauſe Iohn Paul Baillon had gotten into Breſſia, if he had not bin told that a litle beneath Verona the riuer might be paſſed ouer by wading: but as he was going to the paſſage, he diſcouered a far off Monſieur de Foix, whoſe incredible celeritie, for that it had ſurmounted the fame that went of him, he thought they could be no other then part of the the ſouldiers that were within Verona; and in that perſwaſion ranging his companies in battell aray, he tarried their coming with great courage at the tower Magnanino, which is ſomewhat neare Adice, and very litle diſtant from the tower of Eſtalo. The encounter of both parties was very furious with their lances, and afterwards falling to other weapons, the battell was hotly continued more then an houre: but the condition of the Venetians grew worſe and worſe, for that there ariued continually freſh ſouldiers from the army which was left behind: and although being checked and violently encountred by their enemies they were often put to diſorder, yet they reaſſembled themſelues againe very often. At laſt, being no more able to make reſiſtance againſt the greater number, they were broken and put to flight, and were chaſed by the enemy (the night now beginning) euen to the riuer, which Iohn Paul paſſed in ſafetie, but many of his people were drowned. In this conflict there were ſlaine and taken about foure ſcore and ten men at armes of the Venetians; amongſt whom were made priſoners Guido Rangon, and Baltazar Signorello of Perouſa: the footmen were diſperſed, and two Faulconets loſt, which was all they had, few of the French men falling into the mercy of the enemy. The day after they encountred Meleager de Furly, with certain light horſemen of the Venetians, whom they eaſily put to flight, Meleager remaining priſoner: and not loſing one houre of time, the ninth day after they departed from Bologna, Monſieur de Foix with the vantguard incamped within the ſuburbes of Breſſia about two croſſe-bow ſhoots from the gate of Tourlongo, and the reſidue of the army more backward along the way that leades to Peſquiero. As ſoone as he was incamped, without giuing himſelfe any leiſure to breathe, he ſent part of his footmen to aſſaile the Monaſtery of S. Fridian, which is halfe way to the hill vnder the which he was incamped, which hill was kept by many paiſants of the valley Tropia. The footmen which were gotten vp in diuers places, and fauored by a great ſhowre of raine that fell, which hindered the artilleries of the Monaſtery that they could not ſhoot, defeated them, and ſlue ſome of them. The day following, Monſieur de Foix ſent a Trumpet to ſummon thoſe of the towne to render, with ſafetie of their liues and goods, except the Venetians: and being proudly anſwered in the preſence of Andrew Gritti, he turned his army to the other ſide of the towne, to be more neare the Caſtle, and was lodged in the ſuburbes of the gate called S. Iohns gate: and the morning following, euen by the peepe of day, hauing choſen out of the maine army more then foure hundred men at armes all armed in white, and ſixe thouſand footmen, part Gaſcons and part Lanceknights, he went on foot with them, and aſcending vp on that ſide towards the gate of the Piles, entred without reſiſtance within the firſt circuit of the Caſtle: where cauſing his companies to reſt and refreſh themſelues a litle, he encouraged them with ſhort ſpeeches to deſcend reſolutely into that rich and wealthy citie, where the glory and bootie would be greater without all compariſon then the paine or perill, hauing to fight with ſouldiers of Venice, who were manifeſtly inferiour to them in number and valour, for that touching the multitude of people vnexperienced in warre, and who are more apt to flie then to fight, they ſhould make no reckoning of them, but rather hope that through cowardize falling into diſorder, they would be the cauſe that the reſidue would become confuſed: and laſtly he deſired them, that as he had choſen them for the moſt valiant men of ſo flouriſhing an army, ſo they would not bring ſhame to themſelues and to his iudgement, but that they would conſider what infamy and diſhonour it would be to them, if they who made profeſſion to enter cities notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of ſouldiers, of artilleries, of walls, and of rampiers, ſhould not now come to the end of their deſires, hauing ſo faire an entry, and no other impediment then men onely. Hauing ſpoken theſe words, he began to iſſue out of the Caſtle, (the footmen marching before the men at armes) and at his departure he found certaine bands of footmen who with their artillerie aſſayed to ſtop him from paſſing any further: but hauing eaſily made them retire, he deſcended furiouſly by the skirts of the pallace greene of the Captaine Burletto, where the Venetian regiments well ranged and cloſe together, expected him with great reſolution: and there coming to hand-ſtrokes, the encounter was furious and dreadfull for a long time, the one part fighting for their proper ſafetie, and the other part not onely for their glory, but alſo with a deſire to ſacke a Citie ſo full of riches: and the Captaines carried themſelues no leſſe furiouſly then the meane ſouldiers, amongſt whom the valour of Monſieur de Foix was ſingular aboue the reſidue. At laſt the Venetian army was driuen from the place, hauing made a wonderfull defence: in ſo much as the conquerours, who now deuided themſelues into bands, made their entry, the one by the Citie, and the other by the Citadell, finding in euery quar-

quarter and corner a maruellous reſiſtance by the ſouldiers and by the people: but the French men being alwaies victorious in all places, chaſed all their enemies afore them; and gaue not their minds to pillage, vntill they ſaw themſelues abſolute maiſters of the towne, as the Generall had commanded them before they deſcended, which they obſerued in ſuch ſort, that if any one did otherwiſe, he was forthwith ſlaine by his fellowes. In theſe encounters there died of the French part many footmen, and a great number of men at armes; but of the enemies were ſlaine eight thouſand men, part of the people, and part of the Venetian ſouldiers, which were fiue hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, & eight thouſand footmen, amongſt whom was Federike Contarin Commander of the eſtradiots, who fighting vpon the greene was ſlaine with a bullet of an harquebuſe. All the reſidue were taken, except two hundred eſtradiots, who fled by a poſterne neare the gate of S. Nazareth, but not with much better fortune, for that being there met withall by the French army which remained without the towne, they were almoſt all either taken or killed by them: who after that entred into the towne without any let by the ſame gate, and fell to pillage as well as the reſidue, enioying the trauels and dangers of others. Andrew Gritti, and Anthonie Iuſtinian whom the Senate had ſent into that Citie as Gouernour, remained priſoners, together with Iohn Paul Manfron and his ſonne, the Knight de la Volpe, Baltazar Scipion, one of the ſonnes of Anthonie de Pio, Count Lewis Anogano, with one of his ſonnes, and Dominicke Buſechio Captaine of the eſtradiots. By the commandement of Monſieur de Foix, the honour of the religious women was ſaued, but their goods, together with ſuch others as were conueyed into their couents, were made a prey to the Captains. Count Lewis was beheaded in the market place, Monſieur de Foix ſatisfying his eyes with that puniſhment: his two ſonnes albeit the matter was a litle deferred, ſuffered ſhortly after the ſame paine. Thus by the hands of the French, of whom the Breſſians vanted to be deſcended, fell into this extremitie the Citie of Breſſia, which for nobilitie and dignitie was nothing inferiour to any other Citie of Lombardie, but in riches was farre ſuperiour to them all, except Millan: and the ſame Citie for ſeuen daies together was expoſed to the couetouſneſſe, to the luſt, and to the crueltie of ſouldiers; things ſacred as well as prophane being parcell of the prey: and no leſſe the liues then the goods of men. This victory brought great reputation to the name of Monſieur de Foix through all the regions of Chriſtendome, to the great praiſe of him, who by his celeritie and valour in the ſpace of fifteene dayes had compelled the armies Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh to diſcampe from before Bolognia, ouerthrowne in the plaine field Iohn Paul Baillon, with part of the Venetian regiments, and recouered Breſſia with ſo great a ſlaughter of ſouldiers and other people: ſo that it was auouched, and confirmed by the iudgement of all men, that touching warlike enterpriſes, Italy had ſeene no ſuch thing of a long time.

After the taking in of Breſſia, together with the other places that were loſt, of which Bergamo drawne into rebellion by the aide of very few of the towne, had by common conſent reuoked the French men before Monſieur de Foix made his entry into Breſſia: and after Monſieur de Foix had ſet downe a forme to his affaires, and had ſomewhat refreſhed and reordered his army, made weary with ſo long and great trauels, and no leſſe diſordered, partly by keeping and partly by diſtribution of the ſpoile; he determined according to the Kings commandement, to go ſeeke the army of the Confederates; which, after his departure from before the walls of Bolognia, was ſtayed vpon the lands of the Bolognois. To this direction the King was conſtrained by many vrgent accidents, which droue him into neceſſitie to take new counſels, for the ſafetie and benefite of his affaires: for, he diſcerned manifeſtly that he ſhould haue warre with the King of England, notwithſtanding that King had in franke termes afore aſſured him the contrary, and ſince kept him in ſuſpence with doubtfull words: for the actions which were quite contrary, could be no more couered, for that there came aduertiſement from Rome, that he had at laſt approued and ratified the league by writing. And further, the King was not ignorant, that in England were made great preparations of men and ſhips, and in Spaine was rigged a great naue to paſſe into England, where was an vniuerſall diſpoſition in all ſorts of the people of that region to make warre vpon the realme of France; whereunto was much furthering the arriuall of a Galeaſſe from the Pope, laden with Greeke wines, with cheeſes, and other prouiſions, which being giuen in his name to the King, and to many Barons and Prelates of the realme, were receiued of all with a wonderfull gladneſſe: and all the people who being oftentimes no leſſe carried by vaine and ſmall things, then by matters more graue and weightie, ranne to ſee the Galeaſſe,

and tooke therein great pleaſure, glorying in this, that they had neuer ſeene in that Ile any veſſel bearing the Popes banners. At laſt, the Biſhop of Murrey, who had negociated peace between the Pope and the French King, induced either by his conſcience, or by a deſire he had to be Cardinall, when he had ſpoken very fauourably in an aſſembly of all the States of that Iland, with an ample teſtification of the Popes equitie: it was determined in this Parliament that the Prelates ſhould be ſent to the Councell of Latran in the name of the whole realme, and alſo (the importunitie of the Popes Embaſſadour concurring) the King commanded the French Kings Embaſſadour to depart out of the realme: for that it was not conuenient to entertaine about the perſon of a King, and in a kingdome ſo deuout to the Church, a man that repreſented a King ſo manifeſtly perſecuting the Sea Apoſtolike. And now began to be diſcouered that it had bin ſecretly reſolued that the King of England with his army by ſea ſhould moleſt the ſhoares of Normandie and Brittaine, and ſend eight thouſand footmen into Spaine to make warre vpon the Duchie of Guyen, together with the forces of the King of Aragon: a ſuſpition which not a litle afflicted the French King, for as much as by the memory of warres paſt, he feared much the Engliſh people, and for that the danger would be ſo much the greater when the Spaniſh forces were ioyned with thoſe of England: chiefly for that he had ſent into Italy all his companies of men at armes ſauing two hundred lances, which if he ſhould call backe either in part or in all, the Duchie of Millan, which he eſteemed much, ſhould remaine in manifeſt perill: and if for his reſupply he ſhould increaſe the ancient band of eight hundred lances, what aſſurance could he haue in ſo great dangers in ſuch new and vnexperienced perſons? He added to this the ſuſpition of the alienation of Ceſar, which daily more and more increaſed: for, notwithſtanding Andrew Burgos whom he had ſent with ſo great expectation, was returned, and brought tidings that Ceſar was diſpoſed to abide in the confederation; yet he made offers of very hard conditions, intermixing many complaints: for, he required of the King, to aſſure him to recouer all that appertained to him by the capitulations of Cambray, affirming that he could no more truſt in ſimple promiſes, for that he had alwayes knowne, both from the beginning and ſince, that it was a matter very grieuous to the King that he ſhould conquer Padua: and that to conſume and hold him in continuall trauels, he had willingly waſted two hundred thouſand duckats euery yeare, knowing that to him the ſpending of fiftie thouſand was much more: That he had refuſed the laſt yeare to deliuer to him the perſon of Triuulce, being a Captaine that had both the will and the experience to put a ſpeedy end to the warre. He required that the Kings ſecond daughter being but two yeares old, might be promiſed to his nephew, induing her for her dowrie with Burgundy, and that ſhe might preſently be deliuered to his hands: and that the quarrels of Ferrara, of Bolognia, and the controuerſie of the Councell, ſhould be referred to him, forbidding the French army to march towards Rome, and proteſting that he could not endure that the King ſhould any way increaſe his eſtate in Italy. Theſe moſt grieuous and of themſelues almoſt intollerable conditions, were yet more heauie by the experience he had, that notwithſtanding he ſhould accord to him ſo many things, yet he could not be aſſured that he would not vary, either according to occaſions, or according to his cuſtome: yea, the iniquitie of the conditions propounded, ſerued almoſt as a certaine argument, that being already determined to alienate himſelfe from the French King, he ſought the occaſion to put it to effect vnder ſome colour, ſeeing that as well in words as in works he diſcloſed many ſignes of an ill will. For, the Proctors which he had ſo many times promiſed to ſend to the Councell of Piſa, were not come with Burgos; and which more is, the Prelates aſſembled at Auſburg, had at laſt made anſwer by a publike decree, that the Councel of Piſa was ſchiſmaticall and deteſtable; but yet with this moderation, that they were ready to change ſentence, if they might be ſhewed the contrary by more ſtrong and pregnant reaſons. And yet notwithſtanding the King, at a time when he ſtood in moſt need to aſſemble his forces, was conſtrained to maintaine at the requeſt of Ceſar two hundred lances, and three thouſand footmen in Verona, and a guard of a thouſand footmen in Legnaguo. Moreouer, the feare of the Swiſſers vexed not a litle the Kings mind. For, albeit he had obtained to ſend to their Diots the Bailiffe of Amiens, to whom he had giuen very ample commiſſions, and was now reſolued by diſcreet counſell (if ſuch may be called counſels diſcreet as are taken when the oportunitie of helping is already paſt) to ſpare no money to reduce them to his amitie: yet the great hatred of the commons, and the ſtrong perſwaſions of the Cardinall of Sion preuailing aboue the authoritie of thoſe that from Diot

to Diot had hindered all resolutions that were to be made against him, it was discerned that they inclined to send six thousand footmen to the pay of the Confederates, who made demand of them, to oppose against the firme squadrons of the Lanceknights. Besides all this, the King found himselfe depriued of all hopes of peace and agreement, although during the heate of the warre, there had bin great solicitation made by the Cardinall of Nants, and the Cardinall of Strigonia, a mightie Prelate of the Realme of Hungarie; for that the Pope had at last answered, that if they would be better heard then before, they should so work, that the Conuenticle of Pisa might be disanulled, and that the Cities of Bolognia and Ferrara might be rendred to the Church: and expressing no lesse violence in his actions, he had newly deposed from their dignities many of the French Prelates which were present among others at the Councell, together with Philip Decc, one of the most excellent Lawyers of that time, for that he had written and disputed for the iustice of their cause, and followed the Cardinals to direct matters when there should be question in points of law. And in all these difficulties & dangers which enuironed the King on all sides, he had no firme or certaine footing in any part of Italy; for as much as the estate of Ferrara and Bolognia serued him (as in times past) rather for vexations and charges, then for any other vse: and touching the Florentines, to whom he made a new instance to ioyne with him in the warre against Romagna, he could not draw from them other then generall answers: yea, he held them somewhat suspected, by reason of an Embassadour of the Viceroys of Naples, who made his ordinary residence at Florence, but much more for that they had sent an Embassadour to the King Catholike, and did no more communicate with him of their affaires, as they were wont: but most of all, for that hauing laboured them to prolong the league which was finished within a few moneths, without demanding of them either money or other great obligations, they vsed delayes, to the end they might be at libertie to take what part they liked best. And the Pope to augment this disposition, and for feare withall, left his too great soueritie should induce them to follow with their forces the fortune of the French King, gaue them absolution of the censures, the Commonweale not suing for it, and sent as Nuncio to Florence, with very easie and gracious commissions, Iohn Gossadin a Bolognian, one of the Clarks of the Chamber Apostolike, labouring to take away the suspition that they had had of him. The King then seeing himselfe left alone against so many enemies, either declared, or likely to be declared; and knowing no meanes of resistance but with great difficultie, if so many troubles should come vpon him at once, he commanded Monsieur de Foix to march with as great diligence as he could against the army of the Confederates; of whom he promised himselfe the victory, for that they were supposed to be the weakest: and hauing ouercome them, he should assaile Rome and the Pope without any respect; in the good successe whereof he should stand acquitted of all his great dangers. And to the end that the emulation of the enterprise might be diminished, and his iustifications the more increased, he gaue order that the enterprise should be made in the name of the Councell of Pisa, by whom should be assigned a Deputie Legat to go with the army, and vnder that name to receiue the townes that should be conquered.

Thus, Monsieur de Foix being departed from Bressia, came to Finale, where after he had remained certaine daies, to make prouision of victuals that came out of Lombardy, and to reassemble all the bands which the King had in Italy, (except such as by necessitie remained for the guard of townes;) albeit he was stayed by the great raines that fell, yet he went to S. Georges, which is vpon the territories of Bolognia, in which place there came to him a new supply of three thousand footmen Gascons, a thousand aduenturers, and a thousand Pictards, all men of choise, and such as the French men made great reputation & reckoning of: so that his whole campe, according to a iust number, contained fiue thousand Lanceknights, fiue thousand Gascons, and eight thousand Italians and French, with sixteene hundred lances, comprehending therein the band of two hundred Gentlemen. The Duke of Ferrara was also to ioyne to this army with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and a great traine of good artilleries, for that Monsieur de Foix had left his behind him at Finale, because of the deepe and foule waies. To this army came also the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, appointed Legat of Bolognia by the Councell, who was a braue and valiant Cardinall, bearing more inclination to armes then to matters of religion. Now when Monsieur de Foix had set downe these directions for his affaires, he marched forward to seeke the enemies, burning in desire to fight with them, as well for the continuall commandements and incitations of the King, as by his naturall hardineſſe and deſire of glory, being the more ſtirred vp by his former happie ſucceſſe: and yet he was not ſo much tranſported with this hote deſire, that he meant to ſet vpon them raſhly, but approching neare their campe, to ſee if he could willingly draw them out to battell in ſome place where the qualitie of the ſituation might giue leaſt impediment to his vertue, or elſe by cutting off their victuals, to conſtraine them to fight. But the intention of the enemies was farre other, in whoſe army (after the regiment of the Duke of Vrbin was gone vnder colour of ſome controuerſie) there was (as the report went) 1400 men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, ſeuen thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and three thouſand Italians newly leuied. For being of opinion, that as they were inferior in numbers, ſo the French horſemen being more nimble and valorous then theirs, it could not be for their ſuretie to fight in a place of equalitie, at the leaſt afore the ſixe thouſand Swiſſers were come, which being newly granted by the Cantons, there was practiſe at Venice, (whither the Cardinall of Sion with twelue Embaſſadours of that nation were gone for that purpoſe) to leuie them at the common charges of the Pope and the Venetians. Hereunto was added the will of the King of Aragon, who had giuen commandement both by letters and expreſſe meſſengers, to abſtaine from battell as much as could be. For, he hoped ſpecially (which the French King feared moſt) that if the battell were deferred vntill the King of England and he began the warre in France, the King would be conſtrained to call home either all or the greateſt part of his companies, and by that meanes he ſhould accompliſh the wars of Italy, and remaine poſſeſſed of the victory without bloud or danger: for which reaſon he had frō ỹ beginning forbidden the Viceroy to beſiege Bologna, had it not bin for the great inſtance and complaints that the Pope made. Then the Viceroy of Naples together with the other Captains, determined to incampe alwaies neare to the French army, to the end that the townes of Romagna ſhould not remaine to them in prey, and alſo to ſtop their way for going to Rome: but to keepe them alwaies in places of ſtrength, either for their ſituation, or being backt with ſome great towne, that the French men might haue no oportunitie to charge them but to their great diſaduantage: and therefore to make no account nor difficultie to retire as often as need ſhould be, iudging, as men well vnderſtanding the qualitie of warre, that they ought not regard the apparences and bruites that ranne, but principally to obtaine the victory, which was accōpanied with glory and the praiſe of men. According to which reſolution, the ſame day that the army was lodged at Caſtle-Guelfe and at Medecina, ſuch as were incamped neare thoſe places, retired neare the walls of Imola. The day following, the French men paſſed within a mile and a halfe of Imola, the enemies keeping good order in the place where they were incamped: but they would not aſſaile them with ſo great diſaduantage, but paſſed further. The vantguard lodged in the borough of Bubana foure miles from Imola, and the other parts of the army at Dordana and Bagnaro, townes ſomewhat more then a mile one from another, taking vp their lodging beneath the high way, for the oportunitie of victuals which were ſafely brought by the riuer of Po: for that Lugo, Bagnacaual, and the townes thereabout, being abandoned by the Spaniards, were eftſoones returned to the deuotion of the Duke of Ferrara, when Monſieur de Foix entred vpon the territories of Bolegnia. The day after, the Spaniards leauing ſufficient garriſon in the Caſtle of Imola, and threeſcore men at armes in the towne vnder Iohn Saſſatello, went to Caſtle-Bolonnois, and incamped vpon the high way, their campe ſtretching towards the mountaine. And the ſame day, the French men tooke by force the borough of Solarola; and Cotignola and Grauarola rendred to them, where they remained the day following: and the enemies incamped themſelues in a place called the Field of flies. In theſe ſmall remouings from places ſo neare, the two armies marched alwaies in good order, their artillery going foremoſt, with their faces to the enemy, as though the battell were to begin at euery houre: and yet they both marched with very great reſpect; the one not to be conſtrained to come to blowes but in a place where the aduantage of the ſituation ſhould recompence the diſaduantage of their number and forces; and the other to bring the enemies into a neceſſitie to fight, but in ſuch ſort, that at one time, both the weapons and the place might not be contrary to them. In that place Monſieur de Foix receiued a new commandement from the King, to haſten the battell, the ſame cauſes and reaſons ſtill increaſing that had induced him to giue the firſt commandement. For the Venetians hauing obſtinately refuſed to make peace with Caſar, but vpon condition that they might retaine Vincenſa, (notwithſtanding they were much weakened by the acci-accident of Breſſia, and much preſſed, firſt by requeſts, and after by the proteſtations and threatnings of the Pope and the King of Aragon,) there was at laſt made betweene them a truce for eight moneths before the Pope, with couenant, that each of them ſhould retaine the things they poſſeſſed, and to pay to Ceſar fiftie thouſand Florins of Rhein: ſo that the King doubted no more of his alienation from him: and at the ſame time he was certified that he ſhould haue warre out of Italy. For, Ieronie Cabanillo the King of Aragons Embaſſadour reſident in his Court, hauing made inſtance to be heard in full Councell, had ſignified vnto him, that he had receiued commandement from his King to depart, exhorting him in his name to forbeare to fauour againſt the Church the tyrants of Bolognia, and for ſo vniuſt a cauſe, to trouble a peace of ſo great importance, and ſo profitable to the whole cõmonweale of Chriſtendome: offering him, that in caſe he feared to receiue any domage by the reſtitution of Bolognia, to aſſure him in any ſort he would deſire; and adding in the end, that he could not faile to defend the Church according to the dutie of euery Chriſtian Prince. Wherefore Monſieur de Foix being now very certaine that he could not accompliſh his intention by accoaſting the enemy, for that by reaſon of the commoditie they had of the townes of Romagna, he could not eaſily cut off their victuals, nor force them to battell without great diſaduantage; and alſo becauſe his owne army ſuffered no ſmall want of victuals by reaſon of the barrenneſſe of the places where he lay, he determined, by the counſel of his Captains, to go & incampe afore Rauenna, hoping that the enemies would not ſo much diminiſh their reputation as to ſuffer a Citie of that importance to be loſt before their eyes: and that by this meanes occaſion wold be offered to fight with the enemy in a place of indifferencie. And to let the enemy (haply ſuſpecting his deuice) to approch to Rauenna, he incamped betweene Contignola and Granarolla, ſeuen miles from them, where he ſtayed foure daies, expecting from Ferrara twelue cannons and twelue other leſſer peeces of artillery. The enemies were in doubt of ſuch a reſolution, and for that cauſe ſent to Rauenna Marke Anthonie Colonno, who before he went thither, tooke the faith and promiſe of the Legat, the Viceroy, Fabricio, and Peter of Nauarre, with all the other Captaines of the army, (for otherwiſe he would not vndertake the enterpriſe) that if the French incamped afore it, they ſhould come to his ſuccours with the whole army. There went with him in this expedition, threeſcore men at armes of his owne band, an hundred light horſemen vnder Peter de Caſtre, and ſixe hundred Spaniſh footmen commanded by Parades and Salezart: and touching the reſidue of the army, they incamped neare the walls of Faenza, along the gate that goeth to Rauenna: and whileſt they remained there, they had an hote skirmiſh with the enemy. About that time Monſieur de Foix ſent an hundred Lances and fifteene hundred footmen to take the borough of Ruſſi, guarded onely by thoſe of the place it ſelfe, who, though in the beginning (according to the maner of the vulgar ſort) they ſhewed themſelues very reſolute & aſſured, yet feare quickly ſurmounting their courage, they began the ſame day to parley of yeelding: during which communings, the French men taking the oportunitie of their negligence and diſorder, entred the place with no litle fury, and ſacked it, putting to the ſword more then two hundred men, and reduced all the reſidue to the calamitie of priſoners. From Ruſſi, Monſieur de Foix drew neare to Rauenna, and the day after incamped neare the walls, betweene the two riuers, in the midſt whereof the towne hath her ſituation. The riuer Ronquo, called by the ancients Vitis, and the riuer Montono (not a litle eſteemed, for that next after Po, it is the chiefeſt of thoſe riuers that haue their head on the left ſide of the Appenin, which enter into the ſea of their owne courſe) do fall from the Appenin hils, and where they take their head, they make the ſeparation of Romagna from Tuſcane. Theſe riuers runne in ſuch ſort, as they incloſe the Citie of Furly; Montono that runneth on the left hand, almoſt touching the walls; and Ronquo which is on the right hand, paſſeth within two miles of it, and afterwards they are reſtrained and drawne narrow neare Rauenna, with ſo litle ſpace, that the one on the one ſide, and the other on the other, make their courſe cloſe by the walls: a litle below which walls, their waters meeting together, fall afterwards into the ſea, which is now three miles off, but in old time (as they ſay) did beate vpon the walls of the towne. Monſieur de Foix poſſeſſed the diſtance betweene both the riuers, the front of his campe being towards the gate Adriana, which is almoſt ioyning to the ſhoare of Montono. The day after he was incamped, he cauſed the artillery to be planted, part againſt the Tower called Roncono, ſituated betweene the gate Adriana and the riuer Ronquo, and part on the other ſide of Montono, whither a part of the army was paſſed by a bridge which was caſt ouer the riuer: and he haſtened the battery as much as he could, to the end to come to the aſſault afore the enemies approched, whom he knew to be marching; and no leſſe for the great difficultie to recouer victuals, ſeeing the Venetian bands which lay at Ficquerõles with many armed veſſels, gaue impediment to ſuch as were brought out of Lombardie: and hauing ſunke certaine barks in the mouth of the channell which entreth into Po twelue miles from Rauenna, and paſſeth there within two miles, they alſo ſtopped the entry of thoſe that came from Ferrara in veſſels of that countrey; a prouiſion which was no leſſe dangerous then vneaſie to be brought by waggon. Beſides this, there was great incommoditie and danger for the forragers, who of neceſſitie were to range ſeuen or eight miles from the campe. For theſe reaſons Monſieur de Foix determined to giue the aſſault the ſame day, notwithſtanding he knew it was very hard to make his entry: for that of the battered wall, there was beaten downe but thirtie fadoms, which notwithſtanding was not altogether ruined; for that which remained was yet three fadoms high, ſo that there could no entry be made but by ladders: to ſurmount which difficulties with valour and direction, and to encourage his people by an emulation amongſt themſelues, he deuided into three ſquadrons diſtinct & ſeparate one from another, the regiments of footmen of the Almaines, Italians, and French: and after he had choſen out of euery company of the men at armes, ten of the moſt reſolute, he commanded them, that being couered with the ſame armes wherewith they were wont to fight on horſebacke, they ſhould march afore the footmen: who being come to the wall, gaue a very furious aſſault, thoſe within defending themſelues valiantly, to the great praiſe of Marke Anthonie Colonno, who, without fauouring himſelfe, relieued and backed them, now here now there, as he ſaw it was moſt needful. At laſt the French men being out of hope to be able to force the towne, & finding themſelues much endomaged by a Culuerin that was planted vpõ a baſtillion, after they had fought three houres, they retired to their lodgings, with the loſſe of three hundred footmen, certaine men at armes, and almoſt as many hurt, amongſt whom was Monſieur Chaſtillon and the Captaine of the artillery, who receiuing their wounds by the artillery of the towne, died not many daies after. Federike de Boſſolo was alſo hurt, but not much. The day following, the deuices to batter the walls, were turned to fight with the enemies in the field; who when the French army remoued, intending to keepe their faith promiſed to Marke Anthonie, were entred within Furly which is betweene the ſame riuers, and hauing afterwards paſſed the riuer of Ronquo a few miles lower, came towards Rauenna: at which time the citizens of the towne, being diſmayed by the aſſault of the day before, ſent out one to treate of compoſition without the priuitie of Marke Anthonie: but as he was going and returning with anſwers, the army of the enemy was diſcouered, which marched along the riuer: and as ſoone as the French men diſcerned it, they drew immediatly into armes with a great noiſe, and ranged themſelues all vnder their enſignes. They retired in great haſte their artilleries from before the walls, and turned them towards their enemies; Monſieur de Foix conſulting in the meane time with the other Captaines, whether it were good to paſſe the riuer at the ſame inſtant, to let them for entring into Rauenna: a matter which either they had not determined to do, or at leaſt it was impoſſible with order conuenient, and with neceſſary diligence: whereas it was eaſie to the army of the Confederates to enter the ſame day into Rauenna by the wood of Pineta, which is betweene the ſea and the Citie; which would haue conſtrained the French men to retire with ſhame, and to go out of Romagna, conſidering the want of victuals. But the Confederates either not knowing the occaſion, and fearing leſt as they marched they ſhould be enforced to fight in the plaine field: or elſe ſuppoſing that by the onely view and ſhewing of their army, Rauenna was ſufficiently ſuccoured, for that Monſieur de Foix durſt not eſtſoones ſend to the aſſault; they incamped, contrary to all expectation, three miles from Rauenna, in a place called Monlinacco, ſpending the reſidue of that day and the night following in intrenching their campe with ditches, ſo large and deepe, as the ſhortneſſe of the time would ſuffer. During which time, the French Captaines conſulted together, not without diuerſitie of opinions. For they held it an enterpriſe too dangerous to giue a new aſſault to them within Rauenna, hauing before them ſo litle a breach in the wall, and the enemies at their backs; and vnprofitable to remaine there without hope to be able to do any thing; yea with impoſſibilitie in regard of the ſcarcitie of victuals: and that by retiring, there would grow to the Spaniards a greater reputation then was wonne the day before by aduancing: and beſides, that as it was a matter very dangerous, and againſt all former deliberations, to go charge them in their campe, which they had to thinke was well fortified, and that of all ſorts of dangers, that chiefly was to be eſchued by which might happen greateſt harmes, and that to be ouerthrowne was without compariſon the greateſt ill that might happen. Amid theſe difficulties, it was in the end reſolued, to go ſet vpon the enemy as ſoone as it was day, Monſieur de Foix allowing that reſolution as a matter moſt glorious and ſafe: according to which deliberation they ſet vp a bridge vpon the riuer of Ronco in the night, leuelling the banks on all ſides, to make the paſſage more eaſie: and in the morning by the breake of day, being the eleuenth of Aprill, a day very ſolemne for the memory of the holy Reſurrection, the Lanceknights marched ouer the bridge; but almoſt all the vantguard and the battell paſſed the riuer by foord, and the reareguard guided by Iues d'Allegre, wherein were foure hundred Lances, remained vpon the ſhore of the riuer on Rauenna ſide, to the end to be able to ſuccour the army if need required, and to make head if the ſouldiers or people iſſued out of Rauenna; and for the guard of the bridge which had bene afore built vpon the riuer of Montono, was appointed Captaine Paris a Scottiſh man with a thouſand footmen. This being done, the French men prepared themſelues to the battell in this order: The vantguard with the artillery before, gouerned by the Duke of Ferrara, with ſeuen hundred lances and the Lanceknights, was placed vpon the banke of the riuer which was on their right hand, the footmen being on the left hand to the horſemen: On the ſide of the vantguard and in flanke, were beſtowed the footmen of the battell, which were eight thouſand, part Gaſcons and part Piccards: and after, in enlarging and alwaies bearing further from the bank of the riuer, was the laſt eſquadron of Italian footmen led by Federike de Boſſolo, wherein was not aboue fiue thouſand bodies. For notwithſtanding Monſieur de Foix coming from before Bologna, tooke with him ſuch as were there in garriſon, yet many of them were ſhrunke away, by reaſon the pay was ſmall: and on the wing of this ſquadron were all the archers and light horſemen, which exceeded the number of three thouſand. After all theſe ſquadrons, who not ſtretching in a right line, but plying and bowing, bare the forme of a halfe Moone, and vpon the banke of the riuer, were the ſixe hundred Lances of the battel, commanded by Monſieur de la Paliſſa together with the Cardinall of S. Seuerin Legat of the Councell, who being a big man, and of great courage, and withall armed from top to toe with glittering armes, performed farre better the office of a Captaine then of a Cardinall or Legat. In this diſpoſing of the army Monſieur de Foix reſerued to himſelfe no charge or place particular, but hauing made choiſe of thirtie of the moſt valiant Gentlemen of the whole army, would be at libertie to ſuccour and miniſter to all parts, and the ſplendor and beautie of his armes and his coate, made him eaſie to be diſcerned aboue all others, who ſhewing a moſt chearfull countenance, with eyes full of vigor, and almoſt ſparkling for ioy, when the army was ranged, he mounted vpon the banke of the riuer, and ſpake (as the report goeth) with an eloquence more then martiall, to ſtirre vp and inflame the minds of his ſouldiers, in this ſort:

Monſieur de Foix encouraged his ſouldiers to the battell.

My louing ſouldiers, behold the fortune which offereth vs this day to fight with our enemies in open field, which we haue ſo much deſired: the fortune, I ſay, that hath bene fauourable to vs in ſo many victories, puts into our hands an occaſion to winne to our great glory the moſt faire and honorable victory that euer was got by any army in the memory of man. For not onely Rauenna, and all the townes of Romagna ſhall be expoſed to your diſcretion, but they ſhall » be the leaſt part of the reward of your valour: for as much as no Prince or Potentate remaining » now in Italy able to make head againſt your forces, what ſhall let you to runne vp euen to » Rome, where the infinite treaſures of that wicked Court, drawne in ſo many ages out of the very » bowels of Chriſtians, ſhall be by you ranſacked, ſo many ſtately ornaments, ſo much ſil- » uer, ſo much gold, ſo many precious ſtones, and ſo many rich priſoners, that the whole world » will enuie your condition? From Rome, euen with the ſame facilitie, we may runne euen to Na- » ples, reuenging our ſelues of ſo many iniuries done to vs: which felicities I ſee not ſubiect to » any impediment, when I conſider your vertue, your fortune, and the honorable victories you » haue gotten in a few dayes: when I behold your countenances, and when I call to mind that » there are few amongſt you, who in my preſence haue not giuē ſome notable teſtimonie of their » valour. Our enemies are the ſame Spaniards, whom our arriuall forced with ſhame to flie by » night from before Bologna, they be the very ſame, who not many dayes ſince, ſaued themſelues » from vs no otherwiſe then by hiding themſelues vnder the walls of Imola and Faenza, and after- » wards in places mountainous and impaſſable. This nation neuer fought againſt our forces in »

« either of rampiers, of riuers, or of ditches, neuer truſting in their valour, but in ſleights and am« buſhes. And yet theſe are not thoſe Spaniards which haue bene nouriſhed and become old in « the warres of Naples, but a people new and vnexperienced, who neuer fought againſt other « armes then bowes and arrowes, and lances pointed after the maner of the Mores: and who not-« withſtanding the laſt yeare were ouerthrowne with ſo great infamy by that people, being weake
« of body, without heart, without armour, and altogether ignorant in the art of warre, in the Ile
« of Gerbes: frō which place fled this Peter of Nauarre, a Captain of ſo great reputation with them, « ſeruing as a notable example to all the world touching the difference to make walls fall with the « fury of powder, and ſubtiltie of vaults ſecret and vnder earth, and to fight in the field with true « reſolution and magnanimitie of courage. They are now incloſed with a trench, which feare hath « driuen them to make this night in great haſte, the footmen being couered with the riſing of the « banke; and they put confidence in their armed wagons, as if the battell were to be performed « by thoſe childiſh inſtruments, and not with the reſolution of mind, and force of hands & armes.
« But, beleeue me, that with our artilleries we ſhall hunt them out of their caues, and compell « them to come into the plaine and open field, where it will appeare what difference there is « betweene the fury of the French, the reſolution of the Almaines, the valour of the Italians, and « the ſubtilties, wiles and ambuſhes of the Spaniards. Nothing can diminiſh our glory, but onely
« this, that we are the more in number, and almoſt twiſe ſo many as they: and yet to vſe this ad« uantage (ſith fortune hath giuen vs the meanes) is not to be referred to our cowardize, but to « their raſhneſſe, for that their valour and courage is not the cauſe of their appearing, but the « authoritie of Fabricio Colonno, in reſpect of his promiſes vndiſcreetly made to Marke Anthonie;
« or rather Gods iuſtice, for the iuſt puniſhment of the pride and enormous vices of that falſe
« Pope Iulius, and of ſo many treaſons and deceits as that diſloyall King of Aragon hath wrought « againſt vs, abuſing the goodneſſe of our King. But why do I ſpend ſo much time in words?
« wherefore in vſing ſuperfluous perſwaſions to ſouldiers of your vertue, do I ſo much deferre
« and hinder our victory? March on then boldly according to the direction ſet downe, aſſuring « your ſelues that this day will giue vnto our King the impery and iuriſdiction, and to you the « wealth and riches of all Italy. For my part, who am your Captain, I will be with you at all times,
« and in all places, and will expoſe my life to all dangers (according to my cuſtome,) eſteeming
« my ſelfe more happie then all other Captaines, ſeeing that by the meanes of this dayes worke, I « ſhall make my ſouldiers more glorious and more rich, then euer were any ſouldiers for the ſpace « of theſe three hundred yeares.

After theſe words, the aire reſounding with the noiſe of trumpets and drums, and with the ioyfull acclamations of the whole army, they began to march towards the enemies campe, not two miles diſtant from the place where they paſſed the riuer, who were lodged all along the ſhore of the riuer, which was on their left hand, where they had caſt afore them a trench ſo deep as the ſhortneſſe of the time would ſuffer, which turning vpon the right hand, enuironed all the place where they were incamped, onely they had left at the entry of the trench an opening of twentie paces for the horſemen to iſſue out to the skirmiſh. In this campe, as ſoone as they ſaw the French begin to paſſe the riuer, they were ranged in battell in this ſort: The vantguard of eight hundred men at armes commanded by Fabricio Colonno, was beſtowed along the ſhore of the riuer, and cloſe to them on the right hand a ſquadron of ſixe thouſand footmen. After the vantguard occupying the place along the riuer, was the battell of ſixe hundred Lances, and on the wing a ſquadron of foure thouſand footmen, all gouerned by the Viceroy, accompanied by the Marquis of Paluda. The Cardinall de Medicis, who by nature had no cleare ſight, and was of a mild nature, marched in the battell in the habite of peace, ſhewing himſelfe as well in demonſtrations as in effects, very vnlike to the Cardinall de S. Seuerin. After the battell, and likewiſe along the brinke of the riuer, followed the reareguard of foure hundred men at armes, led by Caruagial a Spaniſh Captaine, with a ſquadron for his wing of foure thouſand footmen, and with the bands of light horſemen, of whom was Captaine generall Ferdinand d'Aualo Marquis of Peſquiero, who was yet very yong, but of ſingular expectation: who were on the right hand, at the backs of the footmen, to ſuccour ſuch as ſhould be in diſtreſſe. The artilleries were beſtowed afront the men at armes: and Peter of Nauarre who with fiue hundred choſen footmen had tied himſelfe to no place, had beſtowed vpon the trench afore the footmen thirtie waggons like

like to them of old, armed with ſithes, euery waggon being full of ſmall ſhot, with a very long boare-ſpeare vpon them, the more eaſily to ſuſtaine the aſſault of the French men: and in this order they kept themſelues cloſe within the body of their trench, expecting the army of the enemy to come and charge them: which reſolution as it proued in the end litle to their profit, ſo from the beginning it appeared very preiudiciall. For Fabricio Colonno had giuen aduice to charge the enemy when they began to paſſe the riuer, iudging it a greater aduantage to fight againſt one part onely, then to ſtand to the defence of a ſlender trench which they caſt afore them. But Peter of Nauarre contradicting this aduice, whoſe counſels were receiued of the Viceroy as Oracles, it was very vnwiſely reſolued, to ſuffer them to paſſe. Therefore the French men marching on, were by this time come within two hundred paces of the trench: and ſeeing their enemies ſhew no diſpoſition to come out of their place, they ſtayed, to the end not to giue them the aduantage which they ſought for: and in that ſort both the armies ſtood without ſtirring more then two houres, the artilleries ſhooting continually on both parts, by which the French footmen were not a litle endomaged, for that Peter of Nauarre had planted the artilleries in a place of great oportunitie to diſtreſſe them. But the Duke of Ferrara drawing behind the army part of the artillery, brought it in great haſte to the other wing of the French men, in the very place where the archers had bene beſtowed; the which wing, for that the army bare the forme of a halfe Moone, was almoſt vpon the backs of the enemies, who were now furiouſly battered in flanke, to their great harmes, but ſpecially the horſemen, for that the Spaniſh footmen whom Peter of Nauarre had withdrawne into a low place on the ſide of the banke of the riuer, being in no perill to be hurt, for that according to his commandement they threw themſelues flat vpon the earth, Fabricio Colonno cried aloud, and with redoubled meſſengers vrged the Viceroy to iſſue out to the battell, and not to tarry till they were conſumed with the ſhot of the artilleries. But Peter of Nauarre was againſt it, moued thereto by a peruerſe ambition. For he imagining that by the valour of the Spaniſh footmen (though all the reſidue periſhed) he ſhould remaine victorious, eſteemed that his glory would by ſo much the more be augmented, by how much the danger of the army ſhould be increaſed. But the artillery had already giuen the men at armes and the light horſemen ſuch an ouerthrow, that they could no longer hold out, and there might be ſeene with a miſerable ſpectacle mingled with lamentable cries, many times both men and horſes falling dead to the ground, and ſometimes many heads and armes ſundred from the reſt of the bodie, flying vp into the aire: by reaſon whereof Fabricio Colonno crying out, Shall we all die here ſhamefully through the obſtinacie and leudneſſe of one hard hearted fellow? Shall this army be deſtroyed, without the death of any one of our enemies? Where are all the victories obtained by vs againſt the French? Shall the honour of Spaine and Italy be loſt for the pleaſure of one particular man of Nauarre? He cauſed his companies to iſſue out on the other ſide of the trench, without tarrying for licence or direction from the Viceroy: and being followed with all the horſemen, Peter of Nauarre was compelled to giue the ſigne to his footmen, who being riſen from the ground, charged with incredible fury the footmen of the Lanceknights which were already come vpon them. By this meanes all the ſquadrons being ioyned pelmell, there began a moſt furious battell, and out of doubt one of the greateſt that had bene fought in Italy of long time: for the battell of Taro was ſcarcely any other thing then a gallant encounter of Lances; and the deeds of armes in the kingdome of Naples, were rather actions of diſorder and raſhneſſe, then battels pitched and performed: and in Guiaradadda the leſſer part onely of the Venetians was brought to the fight: but here where euery one was mingled in the battell, the fight being in the plaine field, without impediments of waters or rampiers, both the armies fought with a wonderfull reſolution and courage, determining either to ouercome or to die; and they were not onely inflamed with glory, with hope, and with danger, but alſo with hatred of nation againſt nation. And this was a memorable ſpectacle, that in the encounter of the Lanceknights with the Spaniards, two Captaines of great reputation marching afore their ſquadrons, whereof the one was named Iaques Empſer a Lanceknight, and the other Zamudo a Spaniard, fought hand to hand as it were by defiance, where the Lanceknight being ſlaine, the Spaniard remained victor. The horſemen of the league, which ordinarily were not equall to the French, ſuffered that day much hurt by the artillery, which made them farre more inferiour, bing not able to make further reſiſtance; who hauing long borne out the fury of the fight, more with courage then with ſtrength, and alſo Iues d'Allegre whom Monſieur de la Paliſſa

had called, comming with the reareguard to charge them in flanke, and with the thouſand footmen that had bene left at Montono, Fabricio Colonno who fought valiantly, being now taken priſoner by the ſouldiers of the Duke of Ferrara; being no longer able to make reſiſtance, they turned their backs. Whereunto was much furthering the example of the Captains, for that the Viceroy and Caruagial, without making a laſt proofe of the vertue of their men, began to flie, carrying with them the third ſquadron almoſt entire: with whom fled Anthonie de Leua, a man at that time of very baſe condition, but afterwards riſing by continuall exerciſe of armes to all degrees of warre, he became a Captaine of ſingular reputation. All the light horſemen were likewiſe ouerthrowne, and their Captaine the Marquis of Peſquiero taken priſoner, being all couered with bloud, and his body full of wounds. There was taken alſo the Marquis of Paluda, who in great diſorder had led the ſecond ſquadron to the battell through a field full of pits and buſhes: and the place was all couered with bodies of dead men and carcaſſes of horſes; yet neuertheleſſe the footmen of the Spaniards abandoned of their horſemen, continued to fight with an incredible valour and aſſurance. For, albeit in the beginning, and at the firſt encounter with the Lanceknights, they were ſomewhat ſhaken by the firme and cloſe order of the pikes, yet coming afterwards to the ſwords point, many of the Spaniards couered with their targets, running with their daggers and ſhort weapons betweene the legs of the Lanceknights, they came with a wonderfull ſlaughter almoſt to the very middeſt of their ſquadron: and neare vnto them the Gaſcon footmen hauing occupied the way betweene the riuer and the riſing, had charged the Italian footmen; who albeit they had ſuffered much by the artilleries, yet they had repulſed them to their great praiſe, if, with a guidon of horſemen Iues d'Allegre had not thruſt in amongſt them with greater valour then fortune: for that Monſieur Vinarais his ſon being ſuddenly ſlaine afore his eies, vnwilling to liue after ſo great a griefe, he thruſt in with his horſe into the thickeſt preaſſe of enemies, where he was ſlaine (after he had killed a great nũber) fighting as appertained to a valiant Captaine. The Italian footmen gaue backe, being no more able to reſiſt ſo great a multitude: but part of the Spaniſh footmen running to their ſuccours, ſuſtained them for a time: and likewiſe the Lanceknights being oppreſſed by the other part of the Spaniards, could hardly make any more reſiſtance. But all the horſemen being already fled, Monſieur de Foix turned him to charge them with a great troupe of horſemen, by reaſon whereof the Spaniards rather retiring then chaſed out of the battell, and winning the way which is betweene the riuer and the riſing, without any kind of diſorder, began to get further off, not giuing faſter backe then by foote paces, keeping the front of their ſquadron very cloſe, by whoſe force they repulſed the French men. At which time Peter of Nauarre, who deſired rather to die then to ſaue himſelfe, and for that cauſe would not go out of the battell, was taken priſoner. But Monſieur de Foix being not able to endure that the Spaniſh footmen ſhould go their way as it were victorious, and in ſo good order, and knowing that the victory was not perfect, if they were not ouerthrowne as well as the reſidue, he went furiouſly to aſſaile them with a ſquadron of horſemen, and charged vpon thoſe that were laſt, by whom being ſuddenly enuironed and caſt from his horſe, or as ſome ſay, his horſe falling vpon him whiles he fought, he was ſlaine with the thruſt of a pike giuen him in the flank. And if (as the opinion is) death is to be deſired, when men are come to the height of felicitie, then ſurely he died happily, ending his life after he had gotten ſo glorious a victory. He died very yong, but with a ſingular reputation throughout the whole world, hauing in leſſe then three moneths, and being a Captaine almoſt before he was a ſouldier, obtained ſo many victories with incredible celeritie and valour. Neare vnto him Monſieur Lautrech was left for dead, hauing vpon him twentie wounds, but being afterwards carried to Ferrara, his life was ſaued by the diligent cure of Phyſitions. Monſieur de Foix being dead, the Spaniards went away without receiuing afterwards any trouble or impediment, the reſidue of the army being already diſperſed and put to flight, the baggage ſacked, the Enſignes and artilleries ſpoiled & taken, together with the Popes Legate, who frõ the hands of the eſtradiots being come into the power of Federike de Boſſolo, was by him preſented to the Legate of the Councel. There were likewiſe taken Fabricio Colonno, Peter of Nauarre, the Marquis of Paluda, the Marquis of Bitonto, the Marquis of Peſquiero, with many other Lords, Barons and honorable Gentlemen, as well Spaniards as of the kingdome of Naples. Touching the number of the dead, then which in battels there is nothing more vncertaine, the common bruite was, that of the one and the other army, there was left on the ground at the leaſt ten thouſand bodies,

The death of Iues d'Allegre

The death of Monſieur de Foix.

The number of the dead.

one third part being of the French, and the other two thirds of the Confederates: ſome publiſh a greater number, onely this is certaine, that the calamitie fell vpon the moſt valiant and braueſt ſort, of which number on the Eccleſiaſtike ſide was Raphael de Paſſi, a Captaine of great renowne: and of ſuch as were hurt, the number was infinite. But in this reſpect the loſſe of the conquerours was without controuerſie farre greater, by reaſon of the death of Monſieur de Foix, Iues d'Allegre, and many of the Gentlemen of France: as alſo of Captaine Iacob, with many other reſolute Almaine Leaders, to whoſe valour (but with a great price of their bloud) the victory in the greateſt part was attributed; and alſo for the death of many Gaſcon and Piccard Captaines, who were left there with Captaine Molard. But that which ſurmounted all other loſſes, was the death of Monſieur de Foix, with whom vtterly periſhed the very ſinew & ſtrength of that army. Of ſuch as were vanquiſhed and ſaued themſelues from the battell, the moſt part drew towards Ceſena, and from thence fled further off: and the Viceroy made no ſtay till he came into the countrey of Ancona, where he arriued with a very ſlender troupe of horſemen. Many were ſlaine and ſtripped as they fled, for that the paiſants on all parts by troupes beſet the wayes. And the Duke of Vrbin (who for that many dayes afore he had ſent Baltazar Chaſtillon to the French King, and entertained alſo certaine bands of men with Monſieur de Foix, was ſuſpected to haue ſecretly conſpired againſt his Vnkle,) did not onely ſtirre vp the countrimen againſt ſuch as fled, but alſo ſent bands of ſouldiers into the territory of Peſera to do the like. Onely ſuch as fled by the dominions of the Florentines, paſſed without any harme, according to the commandement of the officers of that Commonweale.

The vanquiſhed weepe, and the victors mourn: Theſe are the fruits of warre

The victorious army being returned to their tents, the people of Rauenna ſent preſently vnto them to render themſelues: but whileſt they were in debating of the couenants, or haply hauing already agreed, as they prepared to ſend victuals to the campe, the Almain footmen and Gaſcons perceiuing their walls to be ill guarded, entred the towne at the breach which Monſieur de Foix had made, and ſacked it moſt cruelly, the deſpite of the harmes they receiued in the battell, added to their naturall hatred againſt the Italians, inciting them, and making them the more cruel. The fourth day after Marke Anthonie Colonno forſooke the Citadell, into the which he was retired, yeelding it vpon promiſe of life and goods ſaued, but with promiſe as well for himſelfe as the other Captaines, not to beare armes, neither againſt the French King, nor againſt the Councell of Piſa, vntill Magdalens day next: and certaine dayes after, the Biſhop Vitelli who had the charge of the Rocke, with an hundred and fiftie footmen, conſented to giue it vp vpon the ſame conditions. The Cities of Imola, Furly, Ceſena, and Rimini, together with all the Caſtles of Romagna, except thoſe of Furly and Imola, followed the fortune of the victory, which were all receiued by the Legate in the name of the Councell of Piſa. But the French army, for the death of Monſieur de Foix, and other loſſes, being danted, and as it were aſtonied, remained foure miles from Rauenna, without doing any thing: and the Legate and Monſieur de Paliſſa to whom was diuolued the gouernment of the army (for Alphonſo d'Eſte was now returned to Ferrara,) being vncertaine what would be the Kings will, expected his further direction, their authoritie with the ſouldiers being not yet ſufficient to cauſe the army to ſtirre, being troubled in parting and ſending to places of ſuretie the things they had ſacked, and ſo much weakened in force and courage for ſo bloudy a victory, that they ſeemed rather vanquiſhed then victorious. By reareaſon whereof all the ſouldiers with plaints and teares bemoned Monſieur de Foix, whoſe preſence onely had ſufficed to remoue all impediments that might let them to haue followed him. And it was not to be doubted, that being puſhed on with the fury of his valour, and by the promiſes that the King had made to him, that the kingdome of Naples ſhould be conquered to his vſe, but he had with his accuſtomed diligence preſently after the victory, run euen to Rome, and that the Pope and all his dependants hauing no other hope, would haue betaken themſelues to flight. The thirteenth day of Aprill the newes of the battell came to Rome, by the relation of Octauian Fregoſo, who went thither in poſt from Foſſambrun, and were entertained with great feare and tumult of the whole Court; ſo that the Cardinals running in haſte to the Pope, preſſed him with vehement petitions, that accepting peace, which they diſtruſted not to obtaine of the French King vnder honeſt conditions, he would at laſt diſpoſe himſelfe to deliuer the ſea Apoſtolike and his perſon from ſo many perils, ſaying that he had taken paines enough for the aduancement of the Church, and the libertie of Italy, and gotten great glory by his intention: and that in ſo holy an enterpriſe, the will of God ſtriuing againſt him, which he might know by many many ſignes and tokens to oppoſe againſt it, were nothing elſe then to bring the whole Church to vtter ruine: That to God more appertained the care of his ſpouſe then to him. Therefore that he ſhould referre himſelfe to his will; and embracing peace, according to the commandement of the Goſpell, to free from ſo many perplexities and trauels, his old age, the ſtate of the Church, and all his Court, which demanded and cried out for nothing elſe but peace: That it was very credible that the victors were already on the way to come to Rome, with whom his nephew would ioyne, and likewiſe Robert Vrſin, Pompey Colonno, Anthonie Sauello, Peter Margano, and Rance Mancin, bearing the ſame inclination, (for it was knowne that all theſe had receiued money of the French King, and were prepared euen afore the battell to diſtreſſe Rome:) for which dangers, what other remedy was there then peace? On the other ſide, the Embaſſadours of the King of Aragon and the Senate of Venice, ſolicited vehemently to the contrary, endeuoring to perſwade him, that matters were not reduced to ſuch extremitie, nor the army ſo extremely diſperſed, but that without any great charge, and in a litle time it might be redreſſed: That it was well knowne that the Viceroy was eſcaped with the greateſt part of the horſemen, and that the Spaniſh footmen, vnited together, were retired from the battell in good order, who if they were in ſafetie (as it was very likely) all the other loſſes were of ſmall conſequence: That it was not to be feared that the French men could march ſo ſpeedily to Rome, but that there would be reſpite enough to prouide againſt them; for that it could not be, but the death of their Captaine would be followed with many diſorders and inſolencies, and alſo that they would be holden in ſuſpence for feare of the Swiſſers, of whom it was now no more to be doubted, that they would openly profeſſe themſelues for the league and deſcend into Lombardie. Likewiſe that there was no hope to obtaine peace of the French King, but vnder conditions vnequall and full of infamy, and that he muſt alſo receiue lawes from the pride of Bernardin Carnagial and the inſolencie of Federike de S. Seuerin. And therefore, that nothing could be worſe, then vnder the colour of peace, to bring himſelfe into ſuch intollerable and vnfaithfull ſeruitude, with ſo great indignitie and infamy: for that thoſe ſchiſmatikes would neuer ceaſſe to perſecute his dignitie and his life: That it were a much leſſe euill (if there were no other remedy) to abandon Rome, and to withdraw himſelfe and all his Court either to the kingdome of Naples or to Venice, where he might remaine with the ſame ſuretie, the ſame honour, and the ſame greatneſſe, that he had there: for that with the loſſe of Rome, the Pontificacie was not loſt, being alwayes tied to the perſon of the Pope, in what place ſoeuer he were. Laſtly, that if he retained his accuſtomed conſtancie and magnanimitie, God, who is the ſearcher of the hearts of men, would neuer faile to aide him in ſo holy a purpoſe, and much leſſe abandon the litle ſhip of Saint Peter, which hath bene wont to be tormented with the waues of the ſea, but neuer to be drowned: And that the Princes of Chriſtendome moued with the zeale of religion, & with the feare of the too great power of the French King, would vndertake his quarrell, and defend him with all their forces, and with their proper perſons. Theſe things were heard of the Pope with great doubt and ambiguitie of mind, and in ſuch ſort, that it was eaſily diſcerned how on the one ſide did worke in him hate, diſdaine, and his obſtinacie, not being accuſtomed to bend or ſubmit: and on the other ſide, feare and danger: and it might be perceiued by the anſwers he made to the Embaſſadours, that it was not ſo grieuous to him to abandon Rome, as that he could not reſort to any place where he might not be in the power of another. Therefore he anſwered the Cardinals, that he would haue peace, conſenting that the Florentines might be ſolicited to interpoſe to that end with the French King: and yet he anſwered not with that reſolution, nor ſo plainly, as there might be any aſſurance what was his intention. He cauſed to come from Ciuitauecchia, Baſcia a Genoway and Captaine of his galleys, which was a manifeſt coniecture that he would go from Rome: and a litle after ſent him backe againe. He ſpake of leuying thoſe Barons of Rome which were not of the conſpiracie with the others. He heard willingly the diſcourſe of the two Embaſſadours, but ſo, as oftentimes he anſwered them with words full of reproch and diſdaine. About this time came Iulio de Medicis Knight of the Rhodes, and afterwards Pope, whom the Cardinall de Medicis, with the leaue of the Cardinall S. Seuerin, ſent from the army vnder colour to recommend himſelfe to him in ſo great a calamitie, but indeed to relate vnto him in what eſtate things ſtood: and the Pope vnderſtanding by him at large how much the French men were weakened, of how many Captaines they were depriued, and how many valiant men they had loſt, how many hurt, who for many dayes would be vnprofitable, what ſpoile of horſes they had

ſuffered, and how part of the army was diſperſed abroad by reaſon of the ſacke of Rauenna, the Captaines vncertaine of the Kings will, and not at good agreement amongſt themſelues, becauſe Monſieur de Paliſſa refuſed to endure the inſolencie of the Cardinall de S. Seuerin vſurping the office of a Legate and a Captaine: that there were ſecret murmures of the deſcending of the Swiſſers, and no apparent token ſeene that the army could ſtirre ſo ſoone. This diſcourſe recomforted much the Pope, who hauing brought him into the Conſiſtory, cauſed him to relate the ſame things in the preſence of the Cardinals; whereunto he added, that the Duke of Vrbin (whatſoeuer moued him) changing counſell, ſent to offer him two hundred men at armes and foure thouſand footmen. The Cardinals notwithſtanding continued to aduiſe him to peace, whereunto albeit in words he ſeemed not eſtranged, yet he was reſolued not to accept it but as a laſt remedy; and vntill ſuch time as when there appeared no ready helpe for the preſent euill, he ſhould the rather chuſe to go from Rome, with this hope, that his cauſe might be ſupported by the armes of Princes, and principally that the Swiſſers would ſtirre, who ſhewing themſelues inclinable to his deſires, had many dayes before forbidden the French Kings Embaſſadours to be preſent in the place where the Deputies of all the Cantons were aſſembled to determine vpon the Popes demands. In this eſtate of affaires there appeared ſome hope of peace, for that before the battell of Rauenna, the French King what with the conſideration of the dangers that threatned him on all ſides, and being diſpleaſed with the inconſtancie of the Emperour, and the hard conditions he propounded vnto him, and therfore reſoluing in the end rather to yeeld to the Popes wil in many things, had ſecretly ſent Fabricio Carretto, brother to the Cardinall of Finale, to the Cardinals of Nants and Strigonia, who had not yet altogether abandoned the negociations of peace: and bad them declare to the Pope, that he was content that Bologna ſhould be rendred to him: That Alphonſo d'Eſte ſhould giue vp to him Lugo, with all the other townes he held in Romagna: That he ſhould be bound to pay him the ancient tributes, and to make no more ſalt vpon his grounds: and that the Councell ſhould be extinct: demanding no other thing of the Pope then to haue peace with him onely, and that Alphonſo d'Eſte might be abſolued of the cenſures, and reſtored to his ancient rights and priuiledges: That to the family of the Bentiuoleis, who ſhould remaine in exile, their proper goods might be reſerued, and the dignities reſtored to the Cardinals and Prelates which had followed the Councell. Which conditions albeit the two Cardinals feared that the King would not now conſent vnto, by reaſon of the victory that had ſucceeded ſince, yet they durſt not propound them in other maner: and the Pope ſeeing them ſo honorable for him, and yet being vnwilling to manifeſt that which he had ſecretly determined in himſelfe, iudged that the King could not refuſe them, yea peraduenture that it was more profitable with theſe conferences to ſtay the Kings armie, to haue the better leiſure to ſee what would be done by thoſe in whom he had repoſed the reſidue of his hopes. Wherefore all the Cardinals importuning him to that effect, he ſubſigned theſe articles the ninth day after the battell of Rauenna, giuing to the Cardinals his faith and promiſe to accept them if the King did confirme them: and ſent commandement by letters to the Cardinall of Finale, who remained in France, but abſented himſelfe from the Court for feare to offend the Pope; and to the Biſhop of Tiuoli, who kept the place of Legate in Auignon, that they ſhould go to the King to debate of theſe things; but he ſent them no authoritie nor power to conclude them.

Vntill this time the affaires of the Pope went but ill, and vntill this day the full meaſure of his calamities and dangers continued: but afterwards his hopes began to appeare greater, and the wheele of fortune without any ſtay to turne to his greatneſſe. The thing that gaue beginning to ſo great a mutation, was the ſudden departing of Monſieur de Paliſſa out of Romagna: who being reuoked by the Generall of Normandie for feare of the bruite of the coming of the Swiſſers which daily increaſed, he drew with his army towards the Duchie of Millan, leauing in Romagna vnder the Legate of the Councell three hundred Lances, three hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, with eight peeces of great artilleries. And the feare which was had of the Swiſſers was become greater, for that the ſame Generall ſeeking rather to pleaſe the King, then to do him good ſeruice, had vndiſcreetly diſmiſſed the Italian footmen and part of the French immediatly after the battell of Rauenna, contrary to that which the preſent affaires required. The departure of Monſieur de Paliſſa deliuered the Pope of the feare that troubled him moſt, confirmed him in his obſtinacie, and helped him much to aſſure the affaires of Rome:

for which cauſe he had hired certain Romane Barons with three hundred men at armes, and debated to make Proſper Colonno Captaine general, becauſe (the courages of ſuch as deſired new things being abated) Pompey Colonno that prepared himſelfe at Montfortin, conſented (at the requeſt of Proſper) to deliuer Montfortin into the hands of Marke Anthonie Colonno for the Popes ſuretie, retaining diſhoneſtly in his hands the money he had receiued of the French King. By which example alſo Robert Vrſin, who was come afore from Petillano vpon the lands of the Colonnois to raiſe armes, keeping likewiſe in his hands the money he had receiued of the French King, was brought in afterwards by the meanes of Iulio Vrſin, receiuing of the Pope in recompence of his diſloyaltie, the Archbiſhopricke of Regge in Calabria. Onely Peter de Margana was aſhamed to keepe the money he had receiued, and that with a counſell more honorable and happie, for that not long after being take priſoner by the ſucceſſor of this King, he had otherwiſe bene conſtrained to beare (and that iuſtly) the puniſhment of his trechery. Now the Popes mind being greatly confirmed by reaſon of theſe things, and hauing no more to feare either forreine or domeſticall enemies, the third day of May he gaue beginning to the Councell with great ſolemnitie in the Church of Saint Iohn de Latran, being now aſſured that not onely the moſt regions of Italy would come thither, but alſo the realmes of Spaine, England, and Hungaria: and in the beginning thereof he was preſent in perſon in habite Pontificall, accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals and a great number of Biſhops, where the Maſſe of the holy Ghoſt (beſides many other prayers) being celebrated according to ancient cuſtome, and the Fathers exhorted with a publike oration to incline with all their hearts to the publike benefite and dignitie of Chriſtian religion: it was declared, to lay the better foundation for other matters that afterwards ſhould be ordained, that the Councell aſſembled was a true, lawful, and holy Councell, and that in the ſame remained vndoubtedly all the authoritie and power of the vniuerſall Church: Ceremonies ſurely both goodly and holy, and able to pierce euen into the hearts of men, if it might haue bene beleeued that the thoughts and intentions of the authors of theſe things had bene ſuch as were their words. In this ſort did the Pope gouerne himſelf after the battel of Rauenna. But the French King, although preſently after the death of M. de Foix whō he loued dearly, which did ſomwhat impeach ỹ ioy of the victory, he had cōmanded M. de Paliſſa and the Legate to leade the army to Rome as ſoone as they could, yet his former heate being ſomewhat abated, he began to returne with all his heart to the deſire of peace, fearing leſt at one time and from many places great ſtormes would thunder vpon him and trouble his affaires. For, notwithſtanding Cæſar promiſed him ſtill, that he would remaine firme with him, affirming that the truce made with the Venetians in his name, was concluded without his conſent, and that he would not ratifie it: yet it ſeemed to the King (beſides the feare of the inconſtancie of Cæſar, and doubt leſt his promiſes were diſſembled) that for the conditions which he demanded, he ſhould haue a companion that in time of warre would be very chargeable to him, and for peace very preiudiciall, for that he feared leſt by his interpoſing, he ſhould be conſtrained to conſent to more diſhonorable conditions. Beſides this, he now nothing doubted that the Swiſſers would ioyne with his enemies: and was alſo certaine he ſhould haue warre with the King of England, who had ſent an Herald to ſignifie vnto him that all couenants betweene them were broken, for that in them all was comprehended this exception, that he ſhould make no warre either againſt the Church, or againſt the King Catholike his father in law. Therefore the King vnderſtanding with great pleaſure that the Florentines were ſolicited to worke the peace, he diſpatched ſpeedily to Florence the Preſident of Grenoble with a very large commiſſion, to the end matters might be debated more at hand, and that (if the matter ſo required) he might go to Rome: and knowing afterwards by the ſubſcription of the articles that the Popes inclination was more ready then he ſeemed, he inclined for his part wholly to the peace; although fearing leſt for the retiring of his army, the Pope would eſtſoones returne to his accuſtomed obſtinacie, he commanded Monſieur de Paliſſa lying then at Parma, to march againe immediatly into Romagna with part of his regiments, and that he ſhould ſpread a bruite, that he would paſſe further. It ſeemed to him a matter grieuous to deliuer vp Bolognia, not ſo much for the inſtance that Cæſar made to the contrary, as for the feare he had, that notwithſtanding the peace, the Pope would continue his euill mind towards him: in which caſe it could not but be an action preiudiciall to him to depriue himſelfe of the towne of Bolognia, which was as the fort and bulwarke of the Duchie of Millan. And beſides this, the Cardinall of Finale and the Biſhop

of Tiuoly being come without expreſſe authoritie to conclude, he tooke that for an apparent ſigne that he had not with an honeſt heart giuen his conſent, but for the dangers wherewith he ſtood enuironed. Neuertheleſſe at laſt he determined to accept thoſe articles vnder certaine limitations, and yet not ſuch as by them the ſubſtance of things ſhould be troubled or altered. With which anſwer the Secretarie of the Biſhop of Tiuoly went to Rome, demanding in the Kings name, that the Pope would ſend authoritie to the Cardinall and the Biſhop to conclude, or elſe, that he would call afore him the Preſident of Grenoble, who was at Florence and had ſufficient power to do the like: but the hopes of the Pope increaſed daily, and by conſequent, if he euer had any inclination to peace, it was now diminiſhed. About this time arriued the commiſſion of the King of England, by the which (being diſpatched in the moneth of Nouember) he gaue power to the Cardinall of Yorke to enter into the league: who had ſo long deferred his coming, by reaſon of the long courſe by ſea, hauing bene afore in Spaine: and the Emperour after very long doubts, had newly ratified the league made with the Venetians, being principally moued to that action by the hopes which the Kings Catholike and of England gaue to him of the Duchies of Millan and of Burgundie. In like ſort that which much helped to confirme the Pope, was the very great hopes which the King of Aragon put him in: who, hauing the firſt knowledge of the ouerthrow by letters from the French King written to the Queene, expreſſing that Gaſton de Foix her brother was dead with great glorie, in a victory which he obtained againſt his enemies: and afterwards more particularly by aduertiſements of his owne people, coming ſomewhat later for the impediments of the ſea: and therefore iudging the kingdome of Naples to ſtand in great perill, he had determined to ſend into Italy the Great Captaine with a ſupply of new men; to which remedy he had recourſe, hauing almoſt no other choiſe. For notwithſtanding in outward ſhew he ſeemed to reſpect much the Great Captaine, yet by reaſon of that which had paſſed in the kingdome of Naples, he loued him but litle, and likewiſe ſuſpected him for his greatneſſe and authoritie. The Pope then being confirmed by theſe occaſions, at ſuch time as the Secretary of the Biſhop of Tiuoly arriued with the articles that had bene debated, putting him alſo in hope that the limitations added by the King to moderate the infamie that might grow to him by abandoning the protection of Bologna, ſhould be referred to his will; he determined abſolutely not to accept them: but making ſemblance of the contrary, in regard of the ſubſcription and faith he had giuen to the Colledge of Cardinals, as ſometimes he vſed to do, contrary to the opinion that went of his ſinceritie; he cauſed the articles to be read in the Conſiſtory, and asked aduice of all the Cardinals: and thereupon the Cardinall Arborenſo a Spaniard, and the Cardinall of Yorke (as they had before ſecretly compacted with him) the one ſpeaking in the name of the King of Aragon, and the other in the name of the King of England, counſelled and exhorted him to perſeuer in his conſtancie, and not to leaue abandoned the cauſe of the Church, which he had embraced with ſo great honour: chiefly for that all the neceſſities that had induced him to hearken to theſe offers were ceaſſed, and that it was manifeſtly ſeene, that God who for ſome cauſe to vs vnknowne, had ſuffered his litle ſhip to be toſſed by the waues of the ſea, would not ſuffer it to periſh; and that it was neither honeſt nor reaſonable that he ſhould make peace onely for himſelf, or debate of it without the participation of the other Confederates, for as much as the action ought to be common: admoniſhing him to conſider well at laſt what preiudice it might bring to the Sea Apoſtolike and to him, to ſeparate himſelfe from true and faithfull friends, to embrace the amitie of reconciled enemies. By which counſels the Pope ſeeming to be moued, refuſed the peace openly; and within a few dayes after, proceeding in his ancient furie, he pronounced in the Conſiſtory an admonition to the French King, to releaſe the Cardinall de Medicis, vpon the penalties ordained in the holy Canons: and yet he forbore to publiſh it, for that the Colledge of Cardinals beſeeching him to deferre as much as he could ſuch rigorous remedies, offered to worke the ſame by letters written in the name of them all, by the which they would intreate him, that as a moſt Chriſtian Prince he would ſet him at libertie. The Cardinall de Medicis was brought to Millan, where he was kept vnder reaſonable and eaſie guard: and yet albeit he was in the power of others, the authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike and the reuerence of religion ſhined in him. And at this time there appeared a contempt of the Councell of Piſa, the cauſe whereof was not onely abandoned of faith and deuotion by all others, but alſo of ſuch as afore had followed and ſupported it with armes: for that the Pope hauing ſent vnto him power both to abſolue from all paines and cenſures

the ſouldiers that would promiſe to beare no more armes againſt the Church, and alſo to giue libertie of holy buriall to all the dead bodies, for whom it ſhould be demanded, the concourſe of people was wonderfull, and no leſſe maruellous the deuotion of them that came to demand and promiſe ſuch matters, the officers of the King not ſpeaking againſt it; but to the manifeſt indignation of the Cardinals, who ſaw euen before their eyes, and in the place where was the ſeate of the Councell, the ſouldiers and ſubiects of the King, contrary to his honour and profit, and vpon the lands of his iuriſdiction, without reſpecting any thing the authoritie of the Councell, to adhere to the Romane Church, acknowledging with great reuerence the Cardinal de Medicis as Legate Apoſtolike, being a priſoner. Now becauſe of the truce ratified by Cæſar, notwithſtanding his agents that were within Verona maintained that it was vntrue, the French King withdrew part of the companies he had in garriſon in that Citie, as ſeruing to ſmall purpoſe: and hauing reuoked alſo the band of two hundred Gentlemen, the archers of his guard, and two hundred other Lances, becauſe of the threats of the King of England, he knew by the ſuſpition he had of the Swiſſers, which was redoubled in him, that he ſhould need greater forces in the Duchie of Millan. And for the ſame cauſe he had preſſed the Florentines to ſend him into Lombardie three hundred men at armes, as they were bound by the couenants of confederation betweene them, for the defence of his eſtates in Italy; the which being finiſhed within two moneths, he compelled them (the reputation of the victory being yet freſh) to confederate with him againe for fiue yeares, binding himſelfe to defend their eſtates with ſixe hundred lances, and the Florentines promiſing for their part to furniſh him with foure hundred men at armes for the defence of all that he poſſeſſed in Italy: and yet, to auoid all occaſions to enter warre with the Pope, they excepted in the generall obligation of defence, the towne of Cotignola, as if the Church might pretend right to it.

But now were apparently diſcloſed right great dangers to the affaires of the King, for that the Swiſſers at laſt were determined to ſend ſixe thouſand men to the pay of the Pope, who had demanded them vnder colour to employ them againſt Ferrara; thoſe that ſtood for the King being able to preuaile no further, then to protract the deliberation vntill that time; againſt whom the common people made vniuerſall exclamations in their aſſemblies, for the wonderfull hatred they bare to the name of the French King, affirming that the King could not content himſelfe with this ingratitude, to refuſe to increaſe a litle the penſions of thoſe by whoſe bloud and valour he had wonne ſo much reputation and ſo great an eſtate, but that with words full of reproch he had deſpiſed them as ſlaues; as though all men at the firſt had not had one and the ſame originall, and as though any mortall man were now noble or great, whoſe anceſtors were not ſometime poore, vnknowne, and baſely deſcended: That he had begun to entertaine the Lanceknights, to ſhew that he had no more need of their helpe in his warres, perſwading himſelfe, that being depriued of his pay, he ſhould ſuffer them idlely to die of hunger in their mountaines; and therefore they had reaſon to make knowne to all the world, how much he was deceiued in his vaine thoughts and perſwaſions: That his ingratitude was onely hurtfull to himſelfe: That nothing could ſtay men of warre from ſhewing their valour: And briefly, that gold and ſiluer was ſubiect to them who had weapons and armour: and that it was neceſſary once to ſhew to the world, how indiſcreet were the reſolutions of him, who in warre would preferre the Lanceknights afore the nation of the Swiſſers. This paſſion carried them ſo farre, that embracing the Popes cauſe, as if it had bene their owne, they departed from their houſes, hauing receiued in preſt onely one Florin of Rhein for a man, where afore they were not wont to march for the ſeruice of the King without promiſe of many payes, and great diſtribution of preſents to their Captaines. Their muſter was at Coire, the capitall towne of the Griſons, who hauing confederation with the French King, of whom they receiued ordinary penſions, had ſent to excuſe themſelues, that for the ancient alliances they had with the higheſt Cantons of Swiſſers, they could not refuſe to ſend with them certaine bands of footmen. This mouing troubled much the minds of the French men, whoſe forces were much diminiſhed. For, after the Generall of Normandie had diſmiſſed the regiments of Italian footmen, they had not in all aboue ten thouſand footmen; and the companies of men at armes which the King had reuoked, being returned ouer the mounts, there were left in Italy but thirteene hundred lances, whereof three hundred were at Parma: and yet the Generall of Normandie doing rather the office of a Treaſurer then of a man of warre, would in no wiſe conſent to the leuying of new ſuccours of footmen without out the Kings commiſſion: onely he had cauſed to returne to Millan the bands that ſhould haue marched into Romagna vnder Monſieur de Paliſſa, which were already arriued at Finale; and appointed that the Cardinall of S. Seuerin ſhould likewiſe bring thoſe that were with him in Romagna: for the departing of whom, Rimini and Ceſena with their Caſtles, and alſo Rauenna, reuerted without difficultie to the obedience of the Pope. And becauſe the French men wold not diſfurniſh the Duchie of Millan, Bologna for the defending whereof they had receiued ſo many afflictions, ſtood in great danger, being in a maner abandoned. After the Swiſſers were aſſembled at Coire, they marched from thence to Trent, hauing permiſſion of Ceſar to paſſe through his lands, who ſtudying to hide from the French King as much as he could, the things he had determined, excuſed himſelfe that he could not withſtand their paſſage, in reſpect of the confederation he had with them. From Trent they entred vpon the territories of Verona, where the army of the Venetians expected them, who together with the Pope contributed to their pay. And albeit there was not in the campe ſufficient money to pay them, for that their number was farre greater then ſixe thouſand, which was the number demanded: yet, ſuch was the hatred that the Commons bare to the French King, that contrary to their cuſtome, they brooked with patience all difficulties. On the other ſide, Monſieur de Paliſſa, who was come afore them with his army to Pontoille, to the end to hinder their paſſage, thinking they would deſcend into Italy on that ſide, finding afterwards their intention to be otherwiſe, incamped at Chaſtillon d'Eſtriuero, a place ſixe miles from Peſquiero, being vncertaine whether they would take towards Ferrara according to the bruite, or elſe do ſome enterpriſe vpon the Duchie of Millan: and it may be that this vncertaintie haſtened the harmes that happened. For, it is not to be doubted but they had taken the way to Ferrara, if a letter which by miſhap fell into the hands of the Venetian eſtradiots, had not changed their minds, by the which Monſieur de Paliſſa ſignified to the Generall of Normandie being at Millan, the eſtate wherein ſtood their affaires, aſſuring him it would be hard to reſiſt them if they turned towards the Duchie of Millan. By the direction of which letter the Cardinall of Sion who was now come from Venice, and the other Captaines, after they had taken counſell together, determined with reaſon (which ſeldome beguileth men) to follow that enterpriſe which they perceiued by the letters to be moſt troubleſome to the enemies. Therefore they went from Verona to Villefranche, where they ioyned with the Venetian army, wherein (vnder the gouernment of John Paul Baillon) were foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, with diuers peeces of artillery, as wel for battery as for the field. This was the cauſe why Monſieur de Paliſſa abandoning Valegge, the place not being defencible, retired to Gambara, with intention to incampe at Pontuiquo. He had not aboue ſixe or ſeuen thouſand footmen with him, the reſidue being diſtributed into Breſſia, Peſquiero, and Legnaguo, and no more then a thouſand Lances. For, notwithſtanding he was reſolued to call backe the three hundred that were at Parma, the apparent danger of Bolognia conſtrained him, after the great importunities of the Bentiuoleis, to giue order that they ſhould be beſtowed in that Citie, which remained almoſt without garriſon. But perceiuing too late in that place the danger wherein they were, and the vanitie of the hopes wherewith they had bene beguiled, and blaming aboue all, the couetouſneſſe and corrupt counſels of the Generall of Normandie, they conſtrained him to ſuffer Federike de Boſſolo with certaine other Italian Captaines, to leuie as faſt as they could, ſixe thouſand footmen: a remedy which they could not apply to any purpoſe, till at leaſt the ſpace of ten dayes were paſt. And likewiſe beſides the ſmall number of ſouldiers, the diſagreement amongſt the Captaines weakened much the French army: for the other Captaines were hardly brought to obey Monſieur de Paliſſa, and the ſouldiers and men at armes, made weary with ſo long troubles and trauels of warre, wiſhed rather the Duchie of Millan were loſt, to the end they might returne into France, then to continue the defence of it with ſo many diſaduantages and dangers. As ſoone as Monſieur de Paliſſa was gone from Valegge, the Venetians and the Swiſſers entred into it, and afterwards paſſing ouer the riuer of Mincia, they lodged vpon the territories of Mantua, where the Marquis gaue them libertie of paſſage, excuſing himſelfe by his diſabilitie. Amid theſe difficulties the reſolution of the Captaines was wholly to abandon the field, and to looke to the defence of the places of moſt importance, hoping (and not without cauſe) that by temporiſing, ſo great a multitude and number of Swiſſers, would at laſt diſperſe and breake; for that the Pope, no leſſe cold to furniſh the expences, then hote to further the warre, was very ſlow in ſending their payes.

The French men thē beſtowed within Breſſia two thouſand footmen, an hundred & fifty lances, and an hundred men at armes of the Florentines: to Crema they ſent fiftie lances and a thouſand footmen: and in Bergama they put a thouſand footmen and an hundred men at armes of the Florentines. The reſidue of the army which contained ſixe hundred lances, two thouſand footmen French, and foure thouſand Lanceknights, withdrew themſelues to Pontuiquo, a place of ſtrong ſituation, and very conuenient to ſuccour Millan, Cremona, Breſſia and Bergama, and there they hoped they might eaſily be able to abide the enemie. But the day after came letters and commandements from Ceſar to the Almaine footmen, to depart immediatly from the pay of the French King: who, for that they were all of the countrey of Tyrol, and would not be diſobedient to their proper Lord, departed the ſame day. By reaſon of their departure Monſieur de Paliſſa and his Captaines loſt all hope to be able any longer to defend the Duchie of Millan; ſo that they retired ſuddenly and in great haſte from Pontuiquo to Piſqueton: by reaſon whereof they of Cremona being left abandoned, yeelded themſelues to the army of the Confederates which was at hand, binding themſelues to pay to the Swiſſers fortie thouſand duckats: and when they had diſputed in whoſe name it ſhould be taken, the Venetians making great inſtance that it might be deliuered to them, it was at laſt receiued (the French men notwithſtanding holding as yet the Caſtle) in the name of the League and of Maximilian the ſonne of Lodowike Sforce, for whom the Pope and the Swiſſers pretended the conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan. At the ſame time the Citie of Bergama fell into the power of the Confederates, by reaſon that Monſieur de Paliſſa hauing called backe the companies that were there to ioyne them to the armie, certaine of the baniſhed crewes who entred as ſoone as the other companies were departed, procured them to reuolt. From Piſqueton Monſieur de Paliſſa paſſed the riuer of Adda, where the three hundred lances appointed for the defence of Bologna ioyned with him, whom he had reuoked for the greatneſſe of the perill: and there he hoped to be able to hinder the enemie for paſſing the riuer, if the footmen that were appointed to be leuied, had come: but it was in vaine for him to thinke of ſuch things, for that he had not money to pay the footmen, and the Generall of Normandie, who had none in ſtore, (all credit being wholy loſt in ſo great dangers) could take vp none at intereſt, as he was wont, binding ẏ kings demain for ſecuritie. Therfore hauing remained there 4. days, as ſoon as the enemies approched the riuer three miles below Piſqueton, he retired to S. Ange, to go the day following to Pauie: by reaſon wherof there being no hope to be able to defend Millan, and the countrey already drawing faſt into tumult, John Iaques Triuulce, the Generall of Normandie, Anthonie Maria Paluoiſin, Galeas Viſcounte, with many other Gentlemen, and all the officers, went from Millan to ſaue themſelues in Piemont. And not many dayes afore the Cardinals fearing the people no leſſe then the enemies, were fled, notwithſtanding (being more hardy in decrees, then in other actions) they had at that time almoſt ſuſpended the Pope from all adminiſtration ſpirituall and temporall of the Church; which was a degree to depriue him of the place which he held. Theſe tumults were much helping to the ſafetie of the Cardinall de Medicis, whom God reſerued to a greater happineſſe. For, as they were leading him into France, and the morning that he entred the barke at the paſſage of Po, which is right ouer againſt Baſſignana, called by the ancients Auguſta Bacienorum, certaine paiſants of the village called la Pieua de Caire, beginning to riſe in tumult, of whom Reignold de Zallo was the chiefe, and with whom certaine of the Cardinals fauourites lodging there all night had conſpired, he was taken from the French men that guarded him, who being amazed and fearing euery accident, hearing the noiſe, were more carefull to flie then to reſiſt. But Monſieur de Paliſſa being entred into Pauie, determined to ſtay there, and therefore ſent for Triuulce and the Generall to come to him thither: whereupon Triuulce by the aduice of the Generall and the principall men, layed afore him the vanitie of his counſell, and how vnpoſſible it was to ſtop ſo great a ruine, ſeeing there were no footmen in the army: that the ſhortneſſe of the time ſuffered not to wage new companies, and much leſſe to draw any but from places farre remoued, and with great difficulties: and though theſe impediments were not, yet there was no money to pay them, their reputation being loſt, their friends full of aſtoniſhment, and the people full of hatred, for the immoderate inſolencies which the ſoldiers had vſed for ẏ ſpace of ſo long a time. When Triuulce had declared theſe things, he went and cauſed a bridge to be caſt, farre from Valence, drawing towards Aſt, where the riuer is ſtraighteſt, by the commoditie of which he meant to paſſe his companies ouer Po. But by this time the army of the Confederates (to the which after the French men were retired tired from Adda, the Citie of Lody was rendred together with the Caſtle) diſcamping from S. Ange, was come neare to Pauie, where the Venetian Captaines vpon their arriuall began to batter the Caſtle, and part of the Swiſſers vpon barks to paſſe the riuer that ioyneth to the Citie. Now the French men fearing they ſhould find impediments to paſſe the ſtone bridge which is vpon the riuer Theſin, by the which onely they might ſaue themſelues, wonne the bridge, to be able to iſſue out of Pauie: but afore the reareguard was come forth, wherein, to ſuſtaine the horſemen, certaine footmen of the Lanceknights which were not iſſued out with the others, were beſtowed the laſt of all, the Swiſſers iſſuing out of the new gate and of the Caſtle which was now abandoned, went skirmiſhing with them all along Pauie and the bridge, the Lanceknights making reſolute defence aboue all others: but paſſing ouer the bridge of Graualona which was of wood, the plankes breaking with the weight of the horſes, all the French men and Lanceknights that were not yet paſſed ouer, were either ſlaine on the place, or taken priſoners. The towne of Pauie bound it ſelfe to pay a great quantitie of money, and Millan had already done as much, compounding for a greater ſumme; and all the other townes except Breſſia and Cremona did willingly runne the ſame courſe. All the countrey cried now vpon the name of the Empire; and all was receiued and gouerned in the name of the holy League (ſo was it called vniuerſally,) and all affaires were diſpoſed of by the authoritie of the Cardinall of Sion, aſſigned Legate for the Pope: but all the treaſure and taxes of money was giuen to the Swiſſers, to whom was transferred all things that concerned gaine or profite: which was the cauſe that many other troupes of them deſcended into Lombardie to ioyne with the reſidue after the Diot of Zurich was ended, which was aſſembled for that cauſe. In this mutation, the cities of Plaiſance and Parma gaue themſelues willingly to the Pope, who pretended they appertained to him as members of the Exarchat of Rauenna. The Swiſſers made themſelues Lords of Lucarno, and the Griſons of Valtolino and Chiauenna, places very commodious for them. And Ianus Fregoſa a Captaine in the Venetian army, going to Genes with ſuch bands of horſemen and footmen as he had obtained of the army, was the cauſe that that Citie reuolted (the French Gouernour being fled,) whereof he was created Duke, which dignitie his father had ſometime had. With the ſame violence of fortune, all the townes and Caſtles of Romagna returned to the Popes obedience: and the Duke of Vrbin approching neare to Bologna with the ſouldiers of the Church, the family of the Bentiuoleis, being depriued of all hope, left it abandoned; whom the Pope purſuing very ſharply, excommunicated all the places that ſhould afterwards receiue them, and expreſſed no leſſe hatred againſt the Citie, being much moued for that forgetting ſo many benefits receiued from him, it was reuolted with ſuch ingratitude, that they had done many villanies to his ſtatue, and ſpoken infinite reprochfull words againſt him: and for this cauſe he would no more conſent that they ſhould create new Magiſtrates, nor communicate any way in the gouernment of the towne; exacting by the meane of ſeuere officers, huge ſummes of mony of ſundry citizens, as partakers with the Bentiuoleis: for which things, the bruite ran, whether true or falſe, that if his deuices had not bene cut off by death, he had a meaning to deſtroy that Citie, and to tranſlate the inhabitants to Cento.

THE ELEVENTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

THe Duke of Ferrara is in great trouble. The Medices returne to Florence. The Emperour makes alliance with the Pope. Maximilian Sforce is put in poſſeſſion of the Duchie of Millan. The French King makes his preparations to recouer Millan. Pope Iulio dieth. Leo the tenth is created Pope. The Frenchmen are ouerthrowne neare to Nouaro: and the Venetians neare to Vincenſa.

NOtwithſtanding the Pope, amidſt his greateſt aduerſities and dangers, had contrary to all hope obtained the victory of his enemies, and recouered and amplified the iuriſdiction of the Church: yet he was ſtill poſſeſſed with an earneſt deſire of the Citie of Ferrara, which had bin the firſt cauſe of all theſe broiles. But albeit he earneſtly deſired to turne his forces againſt Ferrara, yet, the way of peace ſeeming to him more eaſie then that of warre, or rather hoping more in ſecret practiſes then in open actions, he gaue eare firſt of all to the Marquis of Mantua, who deſired him to be pleaſed that Alphonſo d'Eſte might come to him to Rome to demand pardon, and be receiued into his grace vnder ſome honeſt conditions: and then to the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon, who intreated for him as the kinſman of his King (for Alphonſo came of a daughter of the old Ferdinand King of Naples,) and for that it was more commodious for the affaires of his King, to bind the Duke to him by ſo great a benefite, then to ſuffer that his eſtate ſhould be adioyned to the greatneſſe of the Church. The family of the Colonnois likewiſe being become great friends to Alphonſo, vſed their beſt endeuours; by reaſon that after the battell of Rauenna, the French King ſending for Fabricio Colonno, who was Alphonſoes priſoner, he had firſt in refuſing, and then in interpoſing many excuſes, ſo long deferred to deliuer him, that by the mutation that happened, it was in his owne power moſt courteouſly to ſet him at libertie without any charge or ranſome. Safeconduct then being obtained of the Pope, Alphonſo went to Rome, when for his better ſuretie he had obtained the faith of the Embaſſadour of Aragon in the name of his King, that he might go and returne in ſafetie, which was done with the conſent of the Pope. Being come to Rome, the Pope admitted him into the Conſiſtory, ſuſpending the cenſures; and there, with great humilitie he demanded pardon, and with the ſame ſubmiſſion beſought him, that he might be receiued into his grace, and reſtored to the fauour of the ſea Apoſtolike, offering to do hereafter all thoſe offices and duties which might appertaine to a moſt deuout and faithfull vaſſall of the Church. The Pope heard him very graciouſly, and appointed ſixe Cardinals to debate with him touching the conditions of agreement: who, after certaine dayes diſpute, declared vnto him, that the Pope meant not to depriue the Church of the Citie of Ferrara, ſince it was lawfully reuerted to him: but that in recompence, there ſhould be giuen to him the Citie of Aſt, which being receiued into the power of the league by the departing of the French men, the Pope had vainly ſent thither the Biſhop of Agrigenta to take poſſeſſion of it, pretending that whatſoeuer was on this ſide Po, appertained to the Church. This offer being conſtantly refuſed of Alphonſo; for that it comprehended a demand contrary to all the hopes that had bene giuen him, and no leſſe for the late accident at Regge, he began to feare leſt the Pope ſought to entertaine him cunningly within Rome, that he might aſſaile Ferrara in the meane while. The Pope had ſummoned thoſe of Regge (who in ſo great confuſion of things feared much) to giue giue themſelues vp to the Church, following the example of Parma and Plaiſance; and to giue greater force to his perſwaſions, he had giuen direction to the Duke of Vrbin to march with his companies vpon the territories of Modena. And on the other ſide, Vitfruch who was gone to Regge, aſſayed to do the like for the profite of Ceſar, and the Cardinall of Eſte, who in the abſence of his brother had the charge of his eſtate, ſeeing that Citie could not be kept, and iudging the danger would be leſſe if it fell into the hands of Ceſar, who pretended nothing againſt Ferrara, and in whoſe affaires there was hope of a greater alteration, aduiſed the people of Regge rather to acknowledge the Empire. But they anſwering, that they would follow the example of the Duke, who was gone to the Pope and not to Ceſar, receiued into their towne the ſouldiers of the Church, who alſo found meanes to make themſelues maiſters of the Citadell, notwithſtanding Vitfruch had furniſhed it with a garriſon of footmen. Laſtly, Garfagnana was rendred to the Duke of Vrbin, who returning afterwards to Bologna, diſmiſſed all his bands of footmen: for that the Confederates being very angry that the Pope occupied Parma and Plaiſance, the Cardinall of Sion ſignified to the Duke, that it was not neceſſary that he ſhould paſſe any further, ſince the victory was already obtained againſt the common enemies.

The Duke of Ferrara in danger to be priſoner at Rome.

But the Duke of Ferrara being entred into great doubt, for the hard conditions that the Pope offered him, and for the taking of Regge, made meanes to the Pope by the Spaniſh Embaſſadour and Fabricio Colonno who neuer left to accompanie him, to haue leaue to returne to Ferrara. Which requeſt the Pope ſhewing no diſpoſition to agree vnto, and maintaining that the ſafeconduct which he had giuen for the controuerſie with the Church could not let him to do iuſtice to his particular creditors, many of whom demanded inſtantly that he wold do thē iuſtice; the Embaſſador and Fabricio anſwered him roundly, ỹ he ſhould not perſwade hmſelf ỹ his faith was to be violated to the Duke & to them; and therefore to preuent the Pope to do any further matter againſt him, ỹ next morning Fabricio being well mounted, went towards the portall of S. Iohn de Latran, the Duke and Marke Anthonie Colonno following him a ſmall diſtance off: and finding the portall guarded with a greater ſtrength then it was wont to be, who ſought to hinder his paſſage; he hauing a force aboue theirs, brought the Duke through the gate, and conducted him in ſuretie to the waters ſide, in recompence (as moſt men thought) of the benefite of the libertie which he had receiued of him: for no man doubted, but the Pope would ſtill haue retained him priſoner, had it not bene for the impediment of the Colonnois; ſo that the way being dangerous for him to go by land, he returned afterwards by ſea to Ferrara. Furthermore, whileſt theſe things were in doing, the Pope, in whom was yet no diminution of hatred againſt the libertie of the Florentines, had ſo wrought with the Cardinall of Sion, that the bands of ſoldiers which they had ſent to the King were ſtripped: of whom, ſuch as were vnder Luke Sauella, being ſixſcore men at armes and threeſcore light horſemen (for the reſidue were left for the guard of Breſſia vnder Francis Torelle) had, afore the French army paſſed ouer the riuer of Po, obtained ſafeconduct of the Cardinall of Sion, confirmed by the oath and faith of Iohn Paul Baillon, and of almoſt all the Venetian Captaines, that they might returne into Tuſcane. But as they were lodged neare to Cremona, according to their direction, they were ſpoiled by the Venetian ſouldiers, by the conſent of the Cardinall of Sion: who to the end the violence might be executed with more ſuretie, had ſent thither (as ſome ſuppoſe) two thouſand footmen, for that the companies of Triuulce and of the Maiſter of the great horſe were lodged with them, who for that they were almoſt all Italian ſouldiers, had likewiſe obtained ſafeconduct to paſſe. Immediatly vpon the ſpoile of theſe ſouldiers, the Biſhop of Sion ſent to Chriſtopher More and Paul Capello agents for the Senate, to demand the bootie that had bene made, as appertaining to the Swiſſers: but they refuſing it, and coming the next day to the campe of the Swiſſers to ſpeake with the Cardinall of Sion, they were led almoſt as priſoners to Iaques Staffler their Captaine, and by him to the Cardinal, who conſtrained them to pay ſixe thouſand duckets in recompence of the prey, not holding it conuenient that his diſloyaltie ſhould turne to the profite of any other: according to which fidelitie he demanded of the Marquis of Montferrat to deliuer him as priſoner Nicholas Capponi Embaſſadour of the Florentines, to whom he had giuen ſafeconduct, being retired to Caſal Caruas. In this meane while the Senate deſiring to recouer Breſſia and Crema, laboured the Cardinall of Sion, that their companies might be returned; whom the Cardinal entertained vnder colour to march together with the Swiſſers into Piemont againſt the Duke of Sauoy and the Marquis of Saluſſa, who had followed the faction of the French King. But that

reaſon ceaſſing afterwards, both for the wonderfull augmentation of the number of the Swiſſers, and alſo for that it was well ſeene that the French ſouldiers returned ouer the Mounts, he neither refuſed nor agreed that they ſhould go: a matter ſuppoſed to proceed of the inſtance of Cæſar, to the end they ſhould not recouer thoſe townes. At laſt, the Swiſſers being in Alexandria, the Venetians departed from Boſco vpon the ſodaine, and paſſed the riuer of Po without any impediment, at Caua vpon the territories of Cremona, which the Cardinall who might haue ſtayed them, diſſembled (as was beleeued) at the Popes requeſt. When they were ouer the riuer, ſome marched againſt Breſſia, and others againſt Crema, both which were kept as yet for the French King: and the French men that were within Breſſia, hauing aſſailed them at the village of Paterna, were conſtrained to retire into the towne, with the loſſe of more then three hundred men. The Swiſſers remaining alone in the Duchie of Millan and in Piemont, deuiſed how to get money, being on all ſides wholly aſſured of the French. For albeit the French King, for the great affection he bare to the Duchie of Millan, was hardly brought altogether to abandon the affaires of Italy; yet neceſſitie compelled him to hearken to the counſels of ſuch as aduiſed him to deferre thoſe deuices to another time, and to diſpoſe his wits for that Sommer to defend the realme of France, ſeeing that the King of England, according to the contract made with the King Catholike, had ſent by ſea an armie of ſixe thouſand footmen to Fontarabie, a towne of the kingdome of Spaine, ſtanding vpon the Ocean ſea; to the end that ioyning with the companies of the King Catholike, they might aſſaile the Duchie of Guyen: and further, he began with his nauie to ſcoure all along the coaſts of Normandie and Brittaine, to the great aſtoniſhment of the peoples of thoſe Prouinces. Moreouer, the French King had no hope to draw againe Cæſar into amitie with him, for that he vnderſtood by the Biſhop of Marſeilles his laſt Embaſſadour reſident in his Court, that he wiſhed him no good: and that he had entertained him with ſo many hopes, and debated with him of ſo many matters with a faire apparence, to no other end then to winne occaſion to oppreſſe him when he thought leaſt of it, or at leaſt to giue him (as it were) ſome deadly blow, as he boaſted he had done, at ſuch time as he reuoked the Lance-knights.

Thus Italy being deliuered for this yeare from the feare of the French King, whoſe ſouldiers held as yet Breſſia, Crema, Legnaguo, the Caſtle and Lanterne of Genes, the Caſtle of Millan, the Caſtle of Cremona, with certaine other fortreſſes of that eſtate; there was diſcerned amongſt the Confederates, ſignes of variance and diſunion, for the diuerſitie of their wils and their ends. For the Venetians deſired to recouer Breſſia and Crema, as due to them by the articles of capitulation, and for that they had ſo long borne out the dangers and troubles of the warre, a matter which the Pope deſired likewiſe for them: but Cæſar on the other ſide (from whoſe will the King of Aragon could in no wiſe diſagree) thought to appropriate them to himſelfe, and alſo to ſpoile the Venetians of all that had bene iudged to them by the league of Cambray: and likewiſe Cæſar and the King of Aragon practiſed (but very ſecretly) to make the Duchie of Millan diuolue to one of their Nephewes: a working quite contrary to the Pope and the Swiſſers who laboured apparently as much as they could, that according to the vniuerſall reſolution and conſent from the beginning, Maximilian, ſonne to Lodowike Sforce, might be reſtored to the place of his father, after whoſe fall he had remained alwayes in Germanie. That which moued the Pope, was a feare he had, leſt Italy ſhould wholly fall into the ſeruitude of the Almaines and Spaniards: and that which induced the Swiſſers, was a deſire for their owne profite, that that eſtate ſhould not be brought into the power of ſo mightie Princes, but rather of ſuch as could not maintaine themſelues without their aide and ſuccours. Which thing depending almoſt wholly vpon them, in whoſe power that eſtate was, and for the feare that all men had of their armes, the Pope to the end to confirme them in that will, and vpon all occaſions to haue this bridle ready wherwith he might moderate the ambition of Cæſar and the King Catholike, did all that he could to winne their amitie: and for that cauſe, beſides the great account he made publikely of the nation of the Swiſſers, raiſing to the ſtarres the actions they had done for the ſafetie of the Sea Apoſtolike, he gaue them for their greater honour the Banners of the Church, with this glorious title, to be the champions and defenders of the Eccleſiaſtike libertie. Beſides theſe diuerſities, the Viceroy hauing readdreſſed the Spaniſh companies which after the ouerthrow were all retired with him into the kingdome of Naples, and preparing himſelfe to paſſe with them into Lombardie, the Pope and the Venetians refuſed to recontinue the payes

of forty thouſand duckets a moneth, which had bin diſcontinued ſince the ouerthrow, and ſaid, that ſeeing the French army was gone, they ſtood no more ſubiect to ſuch a bond, for that it was to ceaſſe by the articles of the confederation whenſoeuer the French were expulſed out of Italy. Whereunto was replied on the behalfe of the King of Aragon, that it could not be ſaid that the French King was driuen out of Italy, ſo long as Breſſia, Crema, and other ſtrong places were at his deuotion. Moreouer, the King of Aragon together with Ceſar complained, that the Pope had appropriated to himſelfe the profits of the victory that was common to them; and vſurped that which manifeſtly appertained to others, making himſelfe Lord (vnder colour of certaine feigned reaſons, or at leaſt ſo old that they were of no force) of Parma and Plaiſance, Cities which the Lords of Millan had holden ſo long a time as freeholders of the Empire. The diuerſitie of minds was alſo expreſſed for matters that concerned the Duke of Ferrara. For the Pope was ſtill inflamed with his ancient couetouſneſſe; and on the other ſide, the King of Aragon, who deſired to protect him, was alſo angrie (as was beleeued) for ỳ it had bin aſſayed to ſtay him at Rome, contrary to the faith giuen: for which cauſe the Pope deferred to vex Ferrara, haply expecting firſt the iſſue of affaires of greater importance: whereof Ceſar not thinking good that any reſolution were made without him, diſpatched into Italy the Biſhop of Gurci, whom he had appointed to that expedition, euer ſince after the battell of Rauenna there was negociation of peace betweene the Pope and the French King. He ſent him then for feare leſt they ſhould compound amongſt themſelues without reſpecting his intereſts: but the ſtate of affaires being afterwards altered, he ſtill continued his purpoſe to ſend him. In like ſort fell into conſideration the affaires of the Florentines, who being full of ſuſpition, began now to feele the fruites of the neutralitie which they had vndiſcreetly vſed, and to know that it was not ſufficient to ſtand vpon the iuſtice of their cauſe, when there was want of diſcretion. For in the warre preſent, they had not offended the Confederates, nor miniſtred any ſuccours to the French King, other then ſuch as they were bound vnto for the defence of the Duchy of Millan, according to the confederatiõ which they had made in common with the King Catholike and with him: they had not ſuffered within their iuriſdiction any violence to be done vpon thoſe Spaniſh ſouldiers which fled from the battell of Rauenna, for the which the King of Aragon himſelfe gaue thanks to the Embaſſadour of Florence: and which more is, they had fully ſatisfied all his demands, ſo that when the Councell was broken vp from Piſa, not onely his Agents in Italy, but the King himſelfe had offered to their Embaſſadour to be bound to defend their Commonweale againſt all men, ſo far forth as they promiſed him they would not defend Bolognia, nor take armes againſt the Church, nor fauour the Conuenticle of Piſa: but they being let by ciuill diſcords to make the better election, gaue themſelues neither to follow the French nor any other, and obſeruing neutralitie from time to time, and with counſels doubtfull and interrupted, neuer conſulting all together, nor declaring whether they would continue in that mind they offended much the French king, who in the beginning promiſed himſelfe much of thẽ; they remoued not the hatred of the Pope, and without any recompence left the King of Aragon to enioy the fruite of their neutralitie: a matter which to haue obtained, he would gladly haue couenanted with them. The Pope then puſhed on with his ancient hatred againſt the Gonfalonnier, and by an ancient deſire of all Popes to haue authoritie in that Commonweale, ſolicited earneſtly the reſtitution of the family of the Medices to their ancient greatneſſe: whereunto the King of Aragon (notwithſtanding he vſed to the Embaſſadour of Florence words contrary to his deeds) was likewiſe inclined, but not with ſo great vehemencie, for feare leſt in any ſtirre or alteration they might be brought to fauour the French King by the authoritie of the Gonfalonnier. And which more is, it was diſtruſted that though the Gonfalonnier were taken away, the Commonweale being freely gouerned, would haue the ſame affection, in reſpect of new and ancient dependances. But the reſolution of this matter, together with others, was reſerued till the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci, with whom it was agreed that the Viceroy, and ſuch as were for the Confederates, ſhould meet at Mantua. Now whileſt he was coming, the Pope ſent to Florence his Datario, Laurence Pucci a Florentine (it was he who afterwards being choſen Cardinall, was called the Cardinall of foure Saints) to ſolicite them, together with the Embaſſadour which the Viceroy had there, that they would ſticke to the League, and contribute to the charges againſt the French men. This was the colour of his going, but in true meaning he was ſent to ſound the wils of the Citizens: and that demand was debated many dayes without any concluſion, the Florentines offering to pay to the Confederates federates certaine proportions of money, but answering doubtfully to the demand to enter the league,& to declare themselues against the French king: which doubtfulnesse was caused partly by an opinion they had (which was true) that those matters were propounded artificially, but much more by the answer which the Bishop of Gurci had made to their Embassadour at Trent, whom they sent to meet him: for that he seeming to make no reckoning of the report made to him that Cæsar by the capitulation of Vincensa, subsigned with his owne hand, was bound to defend thē, he affirmed to them that the Pope had determined to trouble them, and that paying to Cæsar fortie thousand duckats, he would deliuer them of that danger: and added hereunto, that the confederation betweene Cæsar and the French King continued as yet, and therefore he counselled them not to enter into the league, if first Cæsar gaue them not example. The Florentines would haue made no difficultie to buy their quiet with money, but they feared that the onely name of Cæsar (notwithstanding the Bishop of Gurci assured them that his will should be followed by the Spaniards) would not suffice to remoue and make ceasse the ill intention of others; a matter which held them in doubt, and kept them so restrained, that with a counsell well ordered, they ministred not salue to such as could helpe their infirmitie. This matter perhaps was wisely considered, but that they made not prouision of trained souldiers, by whom they might the better haue defended a sudden assault, or at least haue made their couenants more easie with the Confederates, knowing how hard a matter it was to force them, proceeded either of indiscretion, or of their discords, or for that they attributed more then was meete to the leuies of their owne footmen. Whilest these things were in debating, the Viceroy with his Spanish footmen was alreadie entred vpon the countrey of the Bolognois, where hauing no meanes to satisfie the payes which he had promised to the footmen, they ranne with such a tumult to his tent, threatning to kill him, that he had scarce leisure to steale away, and to flie towards Modena. One part of the army tooke their way towards the countrey of the Florentines, the residue changed not place, but kept there, without law, without order, and without commandement: and then three or foure dayes after, being somewhat pacified with part of the money that was due to them, and the Viceroy and all the footmen being returned to the army, they promised to tarry for him in that place till he returned from Mantua, where the Bishop of Gurci was now arriued: to whom, as he passed by the territories of Verona, the French men that lay in garrison in Legnaguo, hauing refused many offers of the Venetians, gaue vp that towne, which they could no longer hold: and that (as was beleeued) according to a former commandement of Monsieur de Palissa, as well to them, as to all the residue that had in charge the other townes, to the end to nourish the discord betweene Cæsar and the Venetians: and yet it was an action of ill successe for the souldiers, who when they issued out, were (without any respect to their safeconduct obtained from the Bishop of Gurci) miserably robbed and stripped by the Venetian army which was in the confines of Bressia, where they had incamped themselues in their returne from Bosco, after they had recouered Bergama without any difficultie: onely they forbare to batter the towne, for that (as was said) the Cardinall of Sion had forbidden them.

It was decreed in the assembly of Mantua, that Maximilian Sforce who was much desired of the people, should come to the gouernment of the Duchie of Millan: whereunto Cæsar and the King of Aragon agreed, to satisfie the great instance of the Pope and the Swissers: but it was resolued ỳ the Bishop of Gurci should determine of the time & maner with the Pope, to whō he was to go to conclude the alliance between Cæsar & his Holinesse, and to solicite peace with the Venetians, & so by the meane of cōmon vniō to confirm Italy in her ancient suretie, ỳ the French King might no more trouble it. In that assembly it was also debated to assaile the Florentines, Julio de Medicis following the matter, as well in his owne name, as for the Cardinall: alledging that the alteration of that State would be easie by reason of the diuisions amongst the Citizens: for the affection of many that desired their returne: for the secret intelligences they had (as they affirmed) with sundry Gentlemen and mightie families: and for that part of the men at armes of that Commonweale being dispersed in Lombardie, and others inclosed within Bressia, they had not sufficient forces to make defence against so sudden an assault. Lastly, besides the mony he offered, he shewed the fruite that would come by restoring them to their former dignitie. For the power of that Citie being taken out of the hands of one that depended wholly vpon the French King, it would fall into the hands of persons, who being wronged by that King, would acknowledge no other dependance or alliance then of the Confederates. Bernard de Bibiena

(afterwards Cardinall) vrged this matter much in the name of the Pope, who for that occaſion had ſent him to Mantua, the ſaid Bernard and his brethren hauing bene trained vp euen from their youth in the houſe of the Medices. Iohn Vittorio Soderin, a Lawyer, and brother to the Gonfalonnier, was at this time Embaſſadour for the Florentines with the Biſhop of Gurci, to whom nothing was either ſaid or demanded, either by the Viceroy or in the name of the league: onely the Biſhop of Gurci declared to him the danger, and how conuenient it was that they accorded with Caſar according to the demands made before, offering that Caſar and the King of Aragon ſhould receiue them into protectiõ. But the Embaſſador hauing no power to conclude, could do no other thing then aduertiſe the Commonweale and expect anſwers: neither did he ſolicite the Viceroy by himſelfe or by others, nor vſed any diligence to hinder the purpoſes of the Medices. And yet the matter of it ſelfe was not without many difficulties, for that the Viceroy had not ſo puiſſant an armie, as to hazard his forces without neceſſitie: and the Biſhop of Gurci, to let the Venetians for recouering Breſſia, or to make any greater proceedings, deſired that the Spaniards might paſſe into Lombardie with all poſſible ſpeed. Therefore it was beleeued, that if the Florentines without hauing regard to their aduantage and to ſparing, as the preſent perils required, had conſented to contribute to Caſar the money he demanded, and relieued the Viceroy with ſome ſmall ſumme, whereof he had great neceſſitie, they had eaſily turned away the ſtorme: and that the Biſhop of Gurci and the Viceroy might perhaps with a better will haue entred into couenant with their Commonweale, of whom they were certaine to receiue the things that ſhould be promiſed, then with the Medices, who had no abilitie to giue them any thing, if firſt they returned not to Florence with armes. But the cauſe of that Citie being almoſt vtterly abandoned, either by the negligence or by the malice of men, it was determined that the Spaniſh army, together with the Cardinall and Iulian de Medicis, ſhould march towards Florence: and that the Cardinall, whom in that expedition the Pope had declared Legate of Tuſcane, ſhould command the ſouldiers of the Church, and wage ſuch others of the townes adioyning, as he ſhould thinke conuenient for that ſeruice. But as ſoone as the aſſembly of Mantua was broken vp, the Viceroy returning to the territories of Bolognia, cauſed his army preſently to march againſt the Florentines, who had very ſmall reſpite to make neceſſary prouiſions, for that they were not aforehand aduertiſed of the reſolutions at Mantua. The Cardinall ioyned with the Viceroy as he drew neare the frontiers, hauing cauſed to be drawne from Bolognia two cannons to ſupply the wants of the Spaniards, who had no peeces of battery: and Francis Vrſin and the Vitelbies (Captaines for the Church) came to meet him, but without their companies, for that the Duke of Vrbin had forbidden it, as well to them as to the other bands of the Church: who, notwithſtanding Iulian de Medicis had had ſome bringing vp in his Court, and that he had alwayes profeſſed to deſire the greatneſſe of the Medices, had refuſed (whatſoeuer the cauſe was) to furniſh them with artilleries, or any ſuccours either of his ſouldiers or of his ſubiects, though the Pope had commanded the contrary by large letters, as wel to him as to other neighboring townes ſubiect to the Church. As ſoone as the Viceroy was entred vpon the lands of the Florentines, there came to him an Embaſſadour, ſent in the name of the whole Commonweale, who declaring the reſpect they had alwayes borne to the King of Aragon, what were their actions in the laſt warres, and what that King might hope for of ſuch a Citie receiuing it to his amitie, beſought him, afore he paſſed further, to ſignifie what it was he demanded of the Florentines: for that in demands reaſonable, and ſuch as were in their power, they would willingly ſatisfie him. Whereunto the Viceroy anſwered, that his coming had not bene determined by the King Catholike onely, but by all the Confederates, for the common ſuretie of Italy, ſeeing that ſo long as the Gonfalonnier remained in that adminiſtration, there was no aſſurance that they would not follow the French King vpon all occaſions: and therefore he demanded in the name of the whole League, that the Gonfalonnier might be depriued of the gouernment, and that there might be inſtituted a forme of policie not ſuſpected to the Confederates; which could not be done, vnleſſe the Cardinall and Iulian de Medicis were reſtored to their countrey: That if they wold conſent to theſe things, they ſhould find agreement in the reſidue more eaſily: That he ſhould go therfore & make report hereof, or otherwiſe ſignifie his intentiõ at Florence, and yet that he would not ſtay his armie till anſwer were returned. When the marching of the Spaniards was vnderſtood at Florence, there might be diſcerned an vniuerſall aſtoniſhment in the minds of men, for the opinion they had that the Popes forces would inuade them on ſome other other ſide, and for feare of the diuiſion of the Citizens, and the inclination of many to innouation. They had very few men at armes, and no other footmen, then ſuch as were leuied in haſte, or at leaſt drawne out of their garriſons, the moſt part of whom were vnexperienced in warre: and alſo they had no excellent Captaine, vpon whoſe vertue and authoritie they might repoſe the guiding of an armie; and their other Leaders were ſuch as in the memory of man they had not in their pay men of leſſe expectation. Neuertheleſſe making ſuch prouiſion as they could, according to the ſhortneſſe of time, they reaſſembled their men at armes diſtributed into many places; waged footmen, but ſuch as they could get, making choiſe of the beſt bands of their garriſons, and drew to Florence all their principall forces, for the ſafetie of their Citie, and to furniſh from thence all other places whither the enemie ſhould turne himſelfe. And not forgetting (though very late) to proue the meanes of accord, beſides the continuall ſolicitation of their Embaſſadour with the Viceroy, they wrote to the Cardinall of Volterra lying at Gradoli neare to Rome, to go to the Pope, and labour to appeaſe him with offers, petitions, and all other meanes. But the Pope hauing a heart hardened, anſwered, although with words contrary to his doings, that the enterpriſe came not of him, and that it was followed without his forces: but not to ſtirre vp the league againſt him, he was conſtrained to conſent to it, and to ſuffer the Cardinall de Medicis to draw artilleries from Bologna: That he was not able to ſtay the expedition afore it was begun, and much leſſe could he breake it now it was in action. By this time the Viceroy who had paſſed the mountaines to Barberina, a towne within fifteene miles of Florence, ſent to ſignifie to the Florentines, That it was not the intention of the league either to alter the iuriſdiction, or to change the libertie, ſo farre forth as for the ſuretie of Italy, they would depoſe the Gonfalonnier from his eſtate: That he deſired that the Medices might be reſtored to their countrey, not as chieftaines of the gouernment, but as perſons priuate, ſubiect to the lawes, and to the magiſtrates, and in all things like vnto other Citizens. This propoſition being knowne throughout the Citie, the opinions of men were diuers, according to the diuerſitie of iudgements, paſſions, and feare. Some complained, that for the regard of one onely, the generalitie of Citizens, and the whole Seigniory ſhould be expoſed to ſo great a danger: ſeeing that by the depoſition of the Magiſtrate, they loſt neither the councell popular, nor the publike libertie: a thing which could not be hard to keepe, though the Medices, depriued of reputation and power, ſhould ſtriue to exceed their priuate degree: That it was to be conſidered in what ſort the Citie might reſiſt the authoritie and forces of ſo great a league; which of themſelues they could not: that all Italy was become their enemie: that they had wholly loſt all hope of ſuccours with the French men, who being driuen with cowardiſe out of Italy, had enough to do to defend their owne Realme, and knowing their weakneſſe, had anſwered to the demands of the Florentines, that they were contented they ſhould accord with the League. Of the contrary, others ſaid it was ridiculous to beleeue that ſo great a ſtirre was made onely for the hatred of the Gonfalonnier, or to the end that the Medices might dwell in Florence as priuate Citizens: That the intention of the Confederates was farre otherwiſe, who to haue the Citie at their wils, and to draw from thence a great ſumme of money, had no other end, then to place the Medices in a tyrannie; but that they diſguiſed their intentions with demands not ſo ſharpe, which neuertheleſſe contained the ſame effect. For what other thing is it to take out of the Pallace the Gonfalonnier in a time ſo troubled, and with ſuch threatning and compulſion of armes, then to leaue a flocke wandring and without a paſtor? What other thing to bring the Medices into Florence in ſo great a tumult, then to aduance the ſtandard which thoſe would follow, who thinke vpon nothing elſe then to deface the name, the memory, and the forme of the great Councell? an eſtate of gouernment which cannot be depoſed without the abſolute ruine of the common libertie. And what is there to let the Medices, accompanied with the Spaniſh army, and followed within with ſeditious and ambitious troupes, that they may not oppreſſe the libertie euen as ſoone as they ſhall enter into Florence? That it is to be conſidered what may be the iſſue of ſuch things, and what may happen by yeelding to demands vniuſt and preiudiciall: and that it is not meet ſo much to feare the dangers, as to forget the generall ſafetie; and how intollerable it would be to liue in ſeruitude, to ſuch as haue bene borne and bred vp in libertie: That they ſhould remember with what valour they had oppoſed againſt the late King Charles the eight for the preſeruation of their libertie, at ſuch time as he was within Florence with a mightie army: and conſider how much more eaſie it was to reſiſt ſo ſmall a companie, vnfurniſhed of money,

vnprouided of victuals, naked of great artilleries, and all other commodities to beare out the warre, if onely they reſiſted their firſt furie: and who being conſtrained to ſtay but a while in Tuſcane, and puſhed forward by a hope giuen them by the baniſhed men, to carry Florence at the firſt aſſault, when they ſhall perceiue that men begin to make a reſolute defence, they will quickly incline to accord, and that vpon very honeſt conditions. Theſe diſcourſes ranne in the market places and ſtreets amongſt the Citizens. But the Gonfalonnier holding it beſt that the anſwer which the Magiſtrate was to make to the Viceroy, ſhould be communicated with the people, called together the great Councell, and in full preſence of the Citizens gaue his opinion in this maner:

Peter Soderin reaſoneth in the Councell.

If I thought the demand of the Viceroy touched me onely, and that it ſtretched no further, I my ſelfe would haue giuen an anſwer conformable to my intention, which hauing alwayes bene, to be ready to giue my life for your good, it would be a matter much more eaſie for me to reſolue to renounce the charge you haue giuen me (to deliuer you from the dangers and harmes of the warre,) ſpecially hauing for ſo many yeares ſince I came to this place, worne out both my body and mind with infinite cares & trauels. But ſince it may be that in this demand wil be debated other things then my priuate intereſt, it hath bene thought good by this honorable aſſiſtance, and my ſelfe, not to deliberate without publike conſent in a matter that ſo vniuerſally concerneth you all, and that a cauſe ſo graue and generall, ſhould not be referred to the conſultation of that ordinary number of Citizens, who do ordinarily handle other things; but to you, in whoſe perſons is reſembled the ſoueraigne maieſtie and preſence of this Citie, and to whom onely belongeth a deliberation of ſo great conſequence. I will not exhort you to incline more to one part then to the other, I referre all to your counſell and iudgement: that which you ſhall reſolue, ſhall be accepted and liked of me, who do not onely lay at your feete the office you haue giuen me, which is your owne, but alſo my perſon and life; and I ſhould thinke my ſelfe very happie, if I could beleeue that that were a meanes of your ſafetie. Examine of what importance the demand of the Viceroy may be for your libertie; wherein I beſeech God ſo to direct your minds, as you may make election of the better way. If the Medices were diſpoſed to liue in this Citie as priuate Citizens, and would be obedient to your lawes and Magiſtrates, it were a laudable act to ſuffer them to returne, and to receiue them, to the end that our common countrey might be reincorporated into one common bodie: but if they haue any other intention, conſider your danger, and let it not be grieuous vnto you to ſuſtaine all expences and difficulties to preſerue your libertie, the which how precious it is, you ſhall then beſt diſcerne, but without profit (which I haue horror to ſpeake) when you are depriued of it. And let no man perſwade himſelfe that the gouernment of the Medices will be the ſame it was afore they were expulſed, ſeeing the forme and foundations of things are changed. For then, they being trained vp amongſt vs almoſt as priuate Citizens, wealthy in goods according to the degree they held, and not offended by any, relyed vpon the good will of the Citizens, vſed to conſult with the principals of publike affaires, and laboured with the cloake of ciuilitie to hide rather then to diſcouer their greatneſſe: but now that they haue liued ſo many yeares out of Florence, hauing learned the faſhions and manners of ſtrangers, and in that regard haue ſmall skill in ciuill cauſes; mindfull of their exile, and ſeuerities done to them, poore in goods, iniuried by ſo many families, and knowing well enough that the moſt part, yea almoſt all the whole Citie, abhorreth tyrannie: they will repoſe confidence in no Citizen, but compelled by pouertie and ſuſpition, they will take to themſelues the adminiſtration of all things, not ſupporting themſelues by goodwill and loue, but by force of armes, in ſuch ſort, that in a very ſhort time this Citie ſhall become like to Bolognia, as it was in the time of the Bentiuoleis, and like to Sienna and Perouſa. I haue thought good to ſpeake this, to ſuch as commend the time and gouernment of Lawrence de Medicis, the which in compariſon of this would ſeeme a golden age, notwithſtanding the conditions of that time were hard, and the gouernment was a kind of tyrannie, although more eaſie then many others. Now it appertaineth to you to reſolue wiſely, and to me, either conſtantly and freely to giue vp this charge, or elſe if you determine otherwiſe, reſolutely to apply my ſelfe to the preſeruation and defence of your libertie.

There was no doubt what the Councell would reſolue, the people bearing almoſt an vniuerſall inclination to maintaine the popular gouernment: therefore it was determined by a wonderfull accord, to conſent to the returning of the Medices in the nature of priuate perſons:

and to refuſe the depoſing of the Gonfalonnier from the Magiſtracie, and that if the enemies were obſtinate herein, they ſhould looke to the defence of their libertie and common countrey, ſparing neither goods nor life in that action. Then all mens thoughts being turned to the warre, and to the prouiſions of money, they ſent men to the towne of Prato, ten miles from Florence, which they thought would be the firſt place that would be aſſailed by the Viceroy: who after he had gathered together his army at Barberina, together with the artillery which was drawne with great difficultie, both for the ill way of the Appenin, and alſo for that for want of money they lacked labourers and inſtruments neceſſary for the cariage, he tooke the way to Prato, as had bene formerly iudged: where being arriued at the breake of day, he began the ſame day to batter the gate Mercatala with two Falconets about the ſpace of an houre, but he preuailed litle there, for that it was well rampiered within. The Florentines had beſtowed within Prato about two thouſand footmen, the moſt part of their garriſon ſouldiers, and the reſidue leuied in haſte of all ſciences and baſe trades; and in that number there were very few experienced and trained to the warre. They had alſo ſent thither with an hundred men at armes Luke Sauello an ancient Captaine, but yet neither for his age, nor by experience, had attained to any degree of martiall knowledge: and the men at armes were the very ſame who a litle before had bene ſtripped in Lombardie. Hereunto was added, that by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of the time, and the ignorance of ſuch as had the charge to make prouiſions, there was great want of artilleries within Prato, and not halfe the munitions and other things neceſſary to defend the place. The Viceroy had in his armie two hundred men at armes, fiue thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and two Cannons onely, which was an armie very ſmall in numbers and other prouiſions, but great in valour, for that the footmen were all of thoſe bodies, who with ſo great reputation were retired from the battell of Rauenna, and who like men of warre repoſing much in their vertue, deſpiſed greatly the ignorance of their aduerſaries. But being come, without hauing taken order for victuals, and finding ſmall ſtore in the country (for that although the harueſt was hardly finiſhed, it was all carried into places of ſtrength) they began immediatly to fall into want, wherewith the Viceroy being terrified, he began to incline to accord, whereof there was continuall ſolicitation, namely, that the Florentines ſuffering that the Medices might returne equall with the other Citizens, and without ſpeaking any more of the depoſing of the Gonfalonnier, the Citie ſhould pay to the Viceroy, to the end that he might withdraw his armie from off their dominions, a certaine ſumme of money, which was ſuppoſed not to exceed thirtie thouſand duckats: and therfore the Viceroy had granted a ſafeconduct to the Embaſſadors elected for that expedition, and had abſtained vntill their coming any more to aſſaile Prato, if they within had in any ſort furniſhed him with victuals. There is nothing that flieth faſter away then occaſion: nothing more dangerous then to iudge of the intention and profeſſion of another: and nothing more hurtfull then an immoderate ſuſpition. All the chiefe Citizens deſired agreement, being accuſtomed by the example of their elders, to defend their libertie againſt armes with gold: and therefore they made requeſt, that the Embaſſadours elect ſhould depart incontinently, being charged among other things to ſee them of Prato furniſh the Spaniſh armie with victuals, to the end the Viceroy might expect with patience if the compoſition that was now in hand would ſort to any effect. But the Gonfalonnier perſwading himſelfe (againſt his naturall timorouſneſſe) that the enemies deſpairing to be able to do any thing, would depart of themſelues, or fearing the Medices by what meanes ſoeuer they ſhould returne to Florence, or his deſtinie puſhing him on to be the cauſe of his owne ruine, and the calamitie of his country, he held artificially in delay the diſpatch of the Embaſſadours, not ſuffering them to depart the day that was appointed according to the reſolution which had bene made: in ſo much as the Viceroy when he ſaw himſelfe preſſed with the want of victuals, and being vncertaine whether the Embaſſadours would come, diſlodged by night from the gate Mercatala, and incamping before the gate called Serraglio, from the which the way goeth to the mountaine, he began to batter the next wall with two Cannons, chuſing that place for the commoditie of a high heape of earth ioyning to the wall, by the which he might eaſily aſcend to the breach of the wall aboue that was battered: the which facilitie for them without, being turned into a difficultie for them within the towne, for that the breach that was made aboue the heape of earth, remained within very high and far from the ground, one of the Canons was broken at the firſt execution, and the other with the which the battery was continued, had ſo loſt his force with often ſhooting, that

the bullets came very ſlackly to the wall, and did litle harme. Neuertheleſſe, after they had in the ſpace of many houres made a breach in the wall of more then twelue fadomes, certaine of the Spaniſh footmen being gotten vp to the heape of earth, began to aſſaile the breach; from thence they got to the top of the wall, where they ſlue two of the footmen that guarded it, for whoſe death the reſidue beginning to retire, the Spaniards climbed vp quickly by the helpe of ſcaling ladders: and albeit there was within neare the wall a ſquadron of ſhot and pikes, beſtowed there to ſuffer none of the enemies to ſtay vpon the wall, and to make ſlaughter of the firſt that raſhly ſhould leape in, or otherwiſe get downe; yet as ſoone as they ſaw the enemies vpon the wall, they brake their ranke, and of themſelues abandoned the defence of the place: ſo the Spaniards being amazed to ſee ſo great cowardize and litle experience in men of warre, made their entrie in ſundry places without impediment, and began to run through the towne, where was ſeene no other thing then flying, violence, ſpoiling, bloud, murders, and crying; the footmen of the Florentines making no reſiſtance, but caſting away their weapons, offered their bodies to the rigour of their enemies: from whoſe couetouſneſſe, luſt and crueltie, nothing had eſcaped, if the Cardinall de Medicis hauing beſtowed guards in the great Church, had not ſaued the honour of women, which in their calamitie were fled thither for ſafetie. There were more then two thouſand men that died, not fighting (for not one fought) but in flying, or crying for mercie: and all the reſidue were made priſoners, together with the Florentine Commiſſioners. Prato being loſt, they of Piſtoya, not falling otherwiſe from the iuriſdiction of the Florentines, agreed to relieue the Viceroy with victuals, receiuing his promiſe not to be diſtreſſed by his armie. Prato taken by the Spaniards.

But as ſoone as the ſucceſſe of Prato was knowne at Florence, by reaſon whereof the Embaſſadours that went to the Viceroy, being on the halfe way, were returned, there was diſcerned great alteration in the minds of euery one. The Gonfalonnier repenting the vanitie of his counſell, being amazed, and hauing almoſt altogether loſt both reputation and authoritie, rather vngouerned then gouerning, and altogether vnreſolued, gaue himſelfe vp to the wils of others, without making prouiſion either for his owne ſafetie, or the common tranquillitie. Others, who deſired alteration of the gouernment, waxing bold, diſcõmended publikly the things preſent: but the moſt part of the Citizens who were not accuſtomed to armes, and who ſet afore their eyes the miſerable example of Prato, notwithſtanding they affected the popular gouernment, remained, by reaſon of feare, as a miſerable prey to whoſoeuer would oppreſſe them. By reaſon of theſe things Paul Vettori and Anthonie Franciſquo Albizi, Gentlemen ſeditious and deſirous of innouation, becoming more audacious (who had many moneths afore conſpired ſecretly with others in fauour of the Medices, and to agree with them of the maner of their reſtoring, had ſecretly ſpoken with Iulian de Medicis in a village of the Florentine territory neare to Sienna) determined to make experience to draw the Gonfalonnier out of the publike Pallace by force: and hauing communicated their counſell to Bartholomew Valori a yong man of the like condition, and intangled (by his vnreaſonable prodigalities) with ſundry debts, as was alſo Paul Vettori, they went the ſecond morning after the loſſe of Prato, being the laſt day of Auguſt, with a ſmall companie to the Pallace, where, for that the Gonfalonnier had left all things to aduenture, finding no great guard or reſiſtance, they entred his chamber, and threatned him to take his life from him if he would not depart the Pallace; but in caſe he would go out, they gaue him their faith to defend him from harme. Whereunto he yeelding, and the whole Citie riſing into tumult, many diſcloſing themſelues againſt him, and not one in his fauour, when (as they had appointed) he had preſently cauſed ỹ Magiſtrates to aſſemble, who, hauing according to the lawes great authoritie ouer ỹ Gonfalonniers, they required that he might be lawfully depriued of the Magiſtracy, threatning ỹ otherwiſe they wold kil him. In wch feare depoſing him contrary to their wil, they led him in ſafetie into ỹ houſe of Paul Vettori, frõ whẽce the night following, being wel accompanied, he was conueyed vpon the dominions of Sienna, and frõ thence making ſhew to go to Rome with ſafeconduct of the Pope, ſecretly taking the way of Ancona, he paſſed by ſea to Ragouſa, for that he was aduertiſed by his brother the Cardinal, that the Pope wold breake his promiſe with him, and ſpoile him of the money which he had, which was ſuppoſed to be in great quantitie. As ſoone as the Gonfalonnier was depoſed from the Magiſtracie, the Citie diſpatched preſent Embaſſadours to the Viceroy, with whom they compounded eaſily by meanes of the Cardinall de Medicis; for the Cardinall was content that in reſpect of him there ſhould be no further mention, then of the reſtoring of him and his, and of all ſuch as had followed him, as priuate Citizens, with power to redeeme within a certaine time their goods that had bene alienated by the fiske; but reſtoring the moneys that had bene disburſed, and the increaſe that was made by ſuch to whom they had bene transferred: and touching common affaires, the Florentines entred the league. They bound themſelues (according to that which the Medices had promiſed at Mantua to the Biſhop of Gurci in recompence of their returne) to pay to the Emperour fortie thouſand duckats, to the Viceroy twentie thouſand, and for the armie foureſcore thouſand, the one halfe preſently, and the reſidue within two moneths: but vpon this condition, that the firſt paiment being receiued, the armie ſhould forthwith depart from off the lands of the Florentines, relinquiſhing all that they had taken. Beſides this, they contracted a league with the King of Aragon, with bonds reciprocall for certaine numbers of men at armes for the defence of their eſtates, and that the Florentines ſhould entertaine in their pay two hundred men at armes of the ſubiects of that King; and although it was not expreſſed vnder whom, it was intended vnder the Marquis of Paluda, to whom the Cardinall had promiſed, or at leaſt giuen hope, to make him Generall of the Florentine men of warre. The Gonfalonnier being driuen away, and the dangers of the warre remoued by the compoſition, the Citizens began to correct the gouernment in points wherein the former forme was thought vnprofitable: but with an vniuerſall intention (except of a very few, who were yong, and almoſt of no reſpect) to preſerue the libertie and the Councel popular. Therefore they determined with new laws, that the electiõ of the Gonfalonnier ſhould no more be for perpetuity, but for one yeare onely: and that to the Councell of the foureſcore, which changed from ſixe moneths to ſixe moneths, and by whoſe authoritie the cauſes of greateſt weight were determined, to the end there might be a continuall communitie of the Citizens of greateſt qualitie, ſhould be alwaies added all ſuch as had adminiſtred either at home or abroad the chiefe offices and honours: at home, ſuch as had bene either Gonfalonnier of iuſtice, or of the ten of the Balia, which is an office in that Commonweale of great authoritie; abroad, all ſuch as being choſen by the Councell of the fourſcore, had ſerued either as Embaſſadours to forreine Princes, or elſe as generall Superintendents in the warre: the ordinances of gouernment remaining firme and ſtable in all other matters. After theſe things were reſolued, they elected Gonfalonnier for the firſt yeare, Iohn Baptiſta Rodolfe, a noble Citizen, and who was eſteemed very wiſe, the people reſpecting (according to the maner of troubleſome times) not ſo much ſuch as by popular practiſes were moſt agreeable to them, as one, who by the great authoritie he had in the Citie, ſpecially with the Nobilitie, and by his proper vertue could ſupport and eſtabliſh the tottering eſtate of the Commonweale. But things were already too much out of order, and the common liberty had too many mightie enemies; in the bowels of the countrey an army ſuſpected, and within the Citie the moſt audacious of the youth deſirous to oppreſſe it, to whoſe wils was conformable the deſire of the Cardinall de Medicis, notwithſtanding in words he made ſhew of the contraty. For he who from the beginning eſteemed not the reſtoring of him and his as priuate Citizens, a recompence worthy of ſo many trauels and paines, conſidered further now, that this alſo could not long endure; for that together with his name, they ſhould be greatly hated of euery one, the other citizens liuing in continuall ſuſpition, that they would dreſſe ſome ambuſh againſt their libertie: and much more, for diſdaine that they had brought the Spaniſh army againſt their country, & bin the cauſe of the moſt cruell ſacke of Prato: and becauſe that for feare of armes the Citie had bene conſtrained to receiue ſuch baſe and vniuſt conditions. To this he was vrged by ſuch as afore had conſpired with him, and ſome others who in a Commonweale well ordered held no honorable place. But the conſent of the Viceroy was neceſſary, who expecting the firſt paiment, which for the ill condition of the citie could not ſo ſoone be procured, kept as yet within Prato, and had no fancie (whatſoeuer the cauſe was) that any new change ſhould be made in the Citie of Florence. Notwithſtãding the Cardinal declaring vnto him (& cauſing the Marquis of Paluda & Andrew Caraffe Earle of S. Seuerin, Captaines in the armie, to do the like) that the name of the Spaniards could not but be very odious to a Citie againſt which they had done ſo many harmes, and that in all occaſions they would ſticke alwayes to the enemies of the King Catholike; yea, that there was danger, leſt when the army ſhould depart, they would reuoke the Gonfalonnier, whom they had expulſed by conſtraint: and being further moued, for that the money was ſo long vnpayed which they had promiſed him, which if they had ſooner performed, the Florentines might haue

layed a better foundation for a free gouernment, he conſented to the deſire of the Cardinall, who as ſoone as he had made agreement and reſolution of the affaires with him, came with diligence to Florence into his houſes, and many Captaines and ſouldiers of the Italians entred, ſome with him, and ſome ſeparate, the Magiſtrates not hauing the courage to let their entrie, for feare of the Spaniards that were at hand. The next morning a Councell of many Citizens being aſſembled at the publike Pallace to conſult of the preſent affaires, Iulian de Medicis being preſent and aſſiſting the action, the ſouldiers charged the gate of the Pallace on a ſudden, and climing vp by ladders, they made themſelues maiſters thereof, making pillage of the ſiluer veſſell which was kept there for the ſeruice of the Citie; which together with the Gonfalonnier, compelled to giue place to the wils of ſuch as could do no more with weapons then the Magiſtrate could with reuerence and authoritie, called together preſently with the ringing of the great bell (by the direction of Iulio de Medicis) the people, to Parliament vpon the Pallace green: where, ſuch as went thither being enuironed with armed ſouldiers, and by the yong men of the Citie that had taken armes for the Medices, they conſented that to fiftie Citizens of the Cardinals naming, ſhould be giuen the ſame authoritie in publike buſineſſe, which the whole people had, (which large kind of power the Florentines call Ampla balia.) Now by the decree of theſe men, the gouernment being reduced to that forme which it caried before the yeare a thouſand foure hundred ninetie and foure, and a garriſon eſtabliſhed within the Pallace, the Medices reſumed the ſame ſtate of greatneſſe which their father had, but their gouernment was more imperious, and with a power more abſolute. In this ſort was oppreſſed the libertie of the Florentines, being brought to that degree principally by the diſagreements of the Citizens; into which it was thought it would not haue come, if they had not behaued themſelues ſo negligently in the defence of the publike buſineſſe, ſpecially in the lateſt times, not to ſpeake of the neutralitie, which they vſed very vndiſcreetly, and the cowardize of the Gonfalonnier, giuing too much head to the enemies of the popular gouernment. For the King of Aragon had not from the beginning ſo great a deſire to ſubuert the libertie, as to turne away that Citie from the alliance of the French King, and to draw from thence ſome ſummes of money to pay his armie: in ſo much that as ſoone as the French had abandoned the Duchie of Millan, he ſent to tell the Viceroy, that whether the affaires occurrent ſhould draw him to another enterpriſe, or for any other occaſion he ſhould know that the reſtitution of the Medices would be difficult, determining according to the condition of the times, he ſhould deale with the Citie as he thought good, and to the beſt aduantage for his affaires. This was his commandement in the beginning: but being afterwards diſcontented with the Pope for that he would haue done to Alphonſo d'Eſte at Rome, and entring withall into ſuſpition for the threats he gaue publikely againſt ſtrangers, he gaue plainly to vnderſtand to the ſame Embaſſadour of Florence that came to him in the beginning of the warre, (enioyning no leſſe to the Viceroy) that there ſhould be no ſtriuing to alter the gouernment: either for that he iudged it would be a thing of more ſuretie for him to preſerue the Gonfalonnier, who was enemy to the Pope, or elſe for that he feared leſt the Cardinall of Medicis being reſtored, would depend more of the Pope then of him: but this laſt deliberation came not to the knowledge of the Viceroy vntill the day after the Commonweale was reduced into the power of the Cardinall. By this diſcourſe it may be diſcerned, that if the Florentines, after the French were chaſed away, had diligently looked to aſſure their affaires by ſome agreement, or at leaſt had made themſelues ſtrong with armes & trained ſouldiers, either the Viceroy had not marched againſt them, or at leaſt finding reſiſtance, he would eaſily haue compounded with them for money. But their deſtinie would not ſuffer them ſo to do, although beſides that which might be coniectured by humane reaſons, they had bene warned of the perils imminent to them, by ſignes from heauen: for, not long afore, the lightning that fell vpon the gate that leades from Florence to Prato, caried away from an ancient ſhield of Marble, the golden flower de Luces, which are the armes of France: and another time a flaſh of lightening deſcending from the top of the Pallace into the chamber of the Gonfalonnier, touched no other thing then a great boxe of ſiluer, wherein were wont to be gathered the voices of the great Magiſtrate: and afterwards falling downe, it ſtroke ſo violently a great ſtone at the foote of the ſtaires, which bare vp the whole weight of the building, that being remoued from his place without any hurt, it ſeemed to be pulled from thence with great dexteritie by men skilfull in Architecture.

the artilleries which the Pope had lent them, the Caſtle-keeper being corrupted with a bribe of ten thouſand duckats, deliuered it vp to the townesmen; being hereunto moued, for that an armie by ſea which was ſent out of Prouence for the defence of the towne before the King had knowledge of the rebellion, hauing not the courage to take land, were retired, ſo that he had no hope to be ſuccoured. But the Lanterne held out for the King, whereinto the ſame day certaine French veſſels had conueyed victuals and other neceſſary prouiſions. As ſoon as the matters of Florence were diſpatched and the mony receiued, the Viceroy raiſed the camp to march to Breſſia, which Citie, the Venetian armie, hauing appeaſed the Swiſſers, held beſieged afore the gate of S. Iohn, battering at one time both the towne and the Caſtle with artilleries planted vpon the oppoſite mountaine. And likewiſe had hope to be let in at the gate of Piles by meanes of an intelligence, which proued vaine, for that it was diſcloſed. But when the Spaniſh armie arriued at the borough of Gairo which is neare to Breſſia, Monſieur d'Aubigny Captaine of the French that were within, determined to giue vp the towne together with the Caſtle to the Viceroy, with compoſition that all the ſouldiers that were within, ſhould iſſue out, their goods and liues ſaued, but their Enſignes folded, and the points of their weapons downeward, and leauing behind them their artillerie. And it was thought that Monſieur d'Aubigny preferred the Viceroy before the Venetians, hauing receiued a commandement a litle afore from his King, to deliuer it rather to the Spaniards or to Ceſar, not for any hatred that he bore them, but to entertaine matter of contention with Ceſar and the King of Aragon. The French men that kept Legnaguo, had followed the ſame counſell afore the Spaniards came into Lombardie: for, litle eſteeming of the many offers of the Venetians, they ſurrendred it vp to the Biſhop of Gurci, vnto whom Peſquiero yeelded at the ſame time that the Viceroy entred Breſſia, the poſſeſſion whereof the ſame Biſhop deſired to haue, but it pleaſed the Viceroy thē to retaine it for the League, in whoſe name he had receiued it. It happened otherwiſe to the towne of Crema, about the which lay incamped Rance de Cere with part of the Venetian ſouldiers: for that foure thouſand Swiſſers which Octauian Sforce Biſhop of Loda and Gouernour of Millan had ſent to conquer it in the name of the future Duke Maximilian Sforce, being approched, Benedict Cribario who was corrupted by gifts, and a promiſe to be created a Gentleman of Venice, gaue it vp to the Venetians, with the conſent of Monſieur Duraz that kept the Caſtle, who repoſed no confidence for his ſafetie in the faith of the Swiſſers. Afterwards the Biſhop of Gurci went to Rome, whom the Pope deſiring earneſtly to haue at his deuotion, forcing his nature, he cauſed him to be receiued through all his dominions with all ſorts of honors: defraying his expences by the way, together with all ſuch as followed him, making them great cheare. All the townes receiued him with exceſſiue and vnuſuall honours, the wayes being filled with ſuch as went to meete him, and in many ſeuerall places he was viſited by ſundry new Embaſſadours of Prelates and perſonages of honor whō the Pope ſent vnto him: and he was deſirous that the Colledge of Cardinals ſhould haue gone to the gates of Rome to receiue him, but the Colledge refuſing it, as a matter not onely new, but full of great indignitie, the Cardinals Aginenſe and of Strigonia went by the medowes halfe a mile out of the gates to receiue him in the name of the Pope, who led him to S. Maria de Popolo, he being in the middeſt betweene them as Lieutenant to Ceſar. And from thence, where the two Cardinals left him, accompanied with an innumerable multitude, he went to the Pope, who being in his Pontificall ſeate, in ſolemne habite, expected his coming in the publike Conſiſtorie, where not many dayes before he had very honorably receiued the twelue Embaſſadours of the Swiſſers, whom all the Cantons had ſent to him, both to giue him publike obedience, and to declare that that nation would be perpetuall defenders of the ſtate of the Church, and to thanke him, that with ſo great honour he had giuen them the ſword, the hat, the helmet, and the banner, together with the title to be the Defenders of the Eccleſiaſtike libertie. When the Biſhop of Gurci was arriued, they began to debate of the eſtabliſhment of the common affaires, whereof the principall point conſiſted in the remouing of particular quarrels & contentions, to the end that Italy might be ſo eſtabliſhed, that with an vniforme courage and counſell it might be able to reſiſt the French King: and that which herein was the moſt difficult, was the compoſition ſo many times practiſed betweene Ceſar and the Venetians. For, the Biſhop of Gurci conſented willingly that Padua, Treuiſa, Breſſia, Bergama and Crema ſhould remaine to the Venetians, ſo farre forth as they would render Vincenſa to Ceſar, renouncing the rights they pretended to the townes that Ceſar held, and paying to him preſently two hundred thouſand thouſand florins of Rhein, and thirtie thouſand yearely for euer in way of tribute. It diſpleaſed the Venetians to acknowledge themſelues tributaries for thoſe townes which they had poſſeſſed ſo many yeares as their owne: and no leſſe to giue ſo much money, notwithſtanding the Pope offered to lend them part of the ſumme. But that which troubled them moſt, was the reſtoring of Vincenſa; for they ſaid, that that were to ſeparate the bodie of their eſtate, and to depriue them of the commoditie to paſſe from the head and principall parts to the other members, and that thereby the poſſeſſion of Breſſia, Bergama and Crema would be vncertaine and ill aſſured. And beſides, to refuſe the more honeſtly, they ſaid, they had giuen their faith to the Vincentines the laſt time they put themſelues into their hands, neuer to ſeparate themſelues from them. Other conditions were debated betweene the Pope and the King of Aragons Embaſſadour, propounded partly more for reuenge of the complaints of others, then for any hope to obtaine them. For the Pope demanded that that King according to the contents of the confederation, ſhould aide him to conquer Ferrara: he required him to leaue off the protection of Fabricio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, againſt whom he had begun to proceed with ſpirituall weapons, for that they had forced the gate of Latran, and receiued Alphonſo d'Eſte who had rebelled againſt him, into thoſe townes whoſe iuriſdiction appertained directly to the Church. He required him to renounce the protections he had vndertaken in Tuſcane, of the Florentines, of the Siennois, of the Lucquois, and of Plombin, as matters done in diminution of the rights of the Empire, and generally ſuſpected of all Italy, but particularly of the Church: for that it was not profitable to the other Potentates that he ſhould haue ſo many alliances in Italy, and moſt dangerous for the Church, that a prouince belonging to the dominion of the ſame ſhould depend vpon his authoritie. To theſe things the Spaniſh Embaſſadours replied, that they refuſed not to aide him againſt Ferrara, ſo farre forth as according to the bonds of the ſame confederation, he made paiment of the mony due to the armie for the time paſt, and made prouiſion for the time to come: That it was an action not praiſeworthy to proceed againſt Fabricio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, for that as well by reaſon of their dependances, as for that they were Captaines of authoritie, if they were purſued, it would be the cauſe of a new warre: That the King Catholike could not leaue them abandoned, without ſpeciall preiudice to his proper honour, and that their ſeuerall ſeruices in the warres of the Pope and himſelfe againſt the French King, deſerued no ſuch recompence: And touching the complaint he made of the protections of Tuſcane, that it proceeded not of any good or iuſt zeale, but to the end that Sienna, Lucques and Plombin, ſhould remaine a prey to his couetouſneſſe, intimating notwithſtanding that the King would referre himſelfe in thoſe things to the will of Cæſar. All the Confederates agreed with full conſent, that Maximilian Sforce ſhould enter vpon the Duchie of Millan, but Cæſar conſented not to inueſt him, nor to endue him with the name of Duke or any iuſt title. But the complaints of the Biſhop of Gurci and the Spaniards were againe renewed touching the occupation of Parma and Plaiſance, in preiudice of the rights of the Empire, to the too much increaſe of the Popes greatneſſe, and weakening of the Duchie of Millan, which had need to be made more mightie, for that it lay alwayes open to the firſt inuaſions of the French: That in the capitulations of the League, the Pope had made mention of no other thing then of Bologna and Ferrara: That now he vſurped that which of long time paſt had not bene poſſeſſed by the Church of Rome, there being no certaine knowledge that euer ſhe had enioyed it, euen in the times moſt ancient: and that vnder colour of rights, whereof there appeared no authentike memorie, he ſhewing no other thing of the donations of Emperours, then a ſimple writing, which might be forged or feigned according to any mans fancie: and ẏ the Pope, notwithſtanding taking occaſion of the tumults of Lombardy, was his owne iudge, as in a matter manifeſt & notorious. Theſe diſputatiõs could not be eaſily reſolued. But that which moſt troubled the iſſue of things, was the controuerſie betweene Cæſar and the Venetians, by reaſon whereof the Pope did what he could, ſometimes prouoking them, ſometimes praying them, and ſometimes threatning them, for a deſire which he ſtill nouriſhed to preſerue the Venetians, for the common benefite of Italy, and for that he hoped by meanes of their ſuccours, to be able to take Ferrara without the aide of the Spaniards. The Embaſſadours of the King of Aragon laboured herein with great importunitie, fearing leſt to a common danger, there might be ſome cauſe giuen to the Venetians to turne their diſpoſitions to the French: but they were driuen to proceed circumſpectly, not to prouoke Cæſar to make alliance with the French, from whom their King had had ſeparated him with ſo great paine, and for that he would not for other reaſons breake amitie with him. The Swiſſer Embaſſadours likewiſe did their vttermoſt endeuour, for that being bound to defend the Venetians, who alſo in that regard were bound to pay them euery yeare fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, they deſired not to be brought to this neceſſitie to breake their promiſes, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt Cæſar if he offered to vexe them. At laſt, when the Biſhop of Gurci could not be brought to relinquiſh the demand which he made that the Venetians ſhould render Vincenſa to Cæſar, nor the Venetians to be diſpoſed to giue it vp, who were not yet agreed touching the ſumme of money, the Pope, who deſired aboue all things, to the end to ſuppreſſe the name and authoritie of the Conuenticle of Piſa, that Cæſar might approue the Councell of Latran, proteſted to their Embaſſadours, that he ſhould be conſtrained to perſecute their Commonweale with armes ſpirituall and temporall: which proteſtation not mouing them, he proceeded to confederate onely with Cæſar, the Spaniſh Embaſſadour refuſing to deale in the action, either for that he had no commiſſion from his King, or for that that King, notwithſtanding he was reſolued in mind to aide Cæſar, ſought ſtill to nouriſh the Venetians with ſome hope. It was expreſſed in the proeme of the confederation, which was after ſolemnly publiſhed in the Church of S. Maria de Popolo: That the Venetians hauing obſtinately refuſed the peace, and the Pope, for the neceſſitie of the Chriſtian commonweale, had proteſted to abandon them; Cæſar did now enter and accept the league made in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and eleuen, betweene the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians, according as the libertie was then reſerued for him; and promiſed to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, diſanulling the commiſſion, and reuoking all the procurations & acts done in fauour of the conuenticle of Piſa: binding himſelfe not to aide any one of the ſubiects or enemies of the Church, but chiefly Alphonſo d'Eſte and the Bentiuoleis, occupiers of Ferrara and Bolognia: and to call home all the bands of Almaine footmen that were in the pay of Alphonſo, together with Federike de Boſſolo that held of him. On the other ſide, the Pope promiſed to aide Cæſar againſt the Venetians with armes both ſpirituall and temporall, vntill ſuch time as he had recouered all that was contained in the league of Cambray. It was declared, that the Venetians were altogether excluded out of the league and truce made with Cæſar, for that in many ſorts they had impugned both the one and the other: That they were enemies to the Pope, to Cæſar and to the King Catholike, to whom they reſerued place to enter the confederation within a certaine time, and vnder certaine conditions: That the Pope could make no couenant with them without the conſent of Cæſar, or till Cæſar had recouered that which appertained to him, as was ſaid afore: That neither the Pope nor Cæſar, without reciprocall conſent, could contract or couenant with any Chriſtian Prince: That during the warre againſt the Venetians, the Pope ſhould do no hurt or diſpleaſure to Fabritio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, it being notwithſtanding left in his power to proceed againſt Pompey and Iulio, and ſome others that had bene declared rebels: That notwithſtanding he was ſuffered to poſſeſſe Parma, Reggia and Plaiſance, yet by this capitulation it was not meant to preiudice the rights of the Empire. When this confederation was publiſhed, the Biſhop of Gurci in the next ſeſſion of the Councell of Latran, adhered to the Councell in the name of Cæſar; and as his Lieutenant generall in Italy, diſanulled all commiſſions, acts and procurations, and teſtified in the preſence of the whole Councell, that Cæſar neuer conſented to the conuenticle of Piſa, diſauowing all ſuch as had vſed his name. This being done, the Biſhop of Gurci departed from Rome, to be preſent when Maximilian Sforce (being now come by commiſſion of Cæſar to Verona) ſhould take poſſeſſion of the Duchie of Millan: whoſe comming the Cardinall of Sion expected with an ill will, together with the Embaſſadours of the whole nation of Swiſſers, who were at Millan, for that they deſired that in the demonſtrations and ſolemnitie of the actions that were to be performed, it might appeare (as the truth was indeed) that the Swiſſers were the men that had chaſed the French men out of that ſtate, and by whoſe valour and courage Maximilian Sforce receiued it. And yet the Viceroy obtained more by deuices & induſtry then by his authoritie, that they taried for the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci: who, after he had ratified at Florence in the name of Cæſar, the confederation made in Prato, and receiued certaine ſummes of money of the Lucquois, whom he tooke into protection, came at laſt to Cremona, where Maximilian Sforce and the Viceroy attended him: and from thence they went all together to Millan, to make their entrie, at the day appointed, into that Citie, with the ſolemnities and honours accuſtomed to new Princes. In which action, albeit it was long diſputed betweene the Cardinall of Sion and the Viceroy, which of them ſhould giue him the keyes at the entrie of the gate, in ſigne of poſſeſſion, yet, in the end the Viceroy giuing place, the Cardinall put into his hands the keyes of the towne in the vniuerſall name of the Swiſſers: and that day, being one of the laſt dayes of December, he did all things both in ſhew and act, that were neceſſary to make knowne that Maximilian Sforce receiued the poſſeſſion of them: who was receiued with an incredible gladneſſe of all the people, for the great deſire they had to haue a Prince proper and particular, and for that they hoped he wold reſemble his grandfather or his father, of whom the memory of the one was very famous in that ſtate for his excellent vertues, and touching the other, the deſpites they had receiued by the gouernment of ſtrangers, had turned their hatred into good will: and theſe gratulations and ioyes were not yet finiſhed, when the Caſtle of Nouaro was recouered, for that they within yeelded it vp. The confederation made at Rome, had not taken away all hope of agreement betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, for that the Pope had ſuddenly ſent to Venice Iaques Staffiley his Nuncio, with whom went three Embaſſadours of the Swiſſers to perſwade them to accord: and on the other ſide, the Senate, the better to entertaine the good will of the Pope, and not to giue cauſe to Ceſar to inuade them with armes, had ſent to their Embaſſadours a new direction to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, and commanded the men of warre as ſoone as the confederation was made, to retire vpon the territories of Padua: and therefore the Viceroy not willing to trouble the hopes of peace, had turned his armie towards Millan. But the ſame difficulties remaining touching the reſtitution of Vincenſa and the money which Ceſar demanded, all theſe things were to no purpoſe: which was the cauſe that the Pope aſſailed not the Duke of Ferrara, whom (agreement being made betweene Ceſar and the Venetians) he ſuppoſed he ſhould be able to vanquiſh with his owne forces and the aide of the Venetians, together with the bruite onely that the Spaniards were to come if need ſhould be: for otherwiſe he had reſolued to deferre that expedition till the Spring time, for that he eſteemed it a hard matter to take Ferrara in the Winter, the ſituation being ſtrong in reſpect of the riuer, and greatly fortified beſides by the continuall induſtrie of Alphonſo.

If I make mention of that which was done in France that ſame yeare, it may haply ſeeme to ſome, that I go from my purpoſe, which hath bene, not to meddle with things done out of Italy: but becauſe the affaires of that nation haue ſome affinitie with the buſineſſe of theſe parts, and that to the ſucceſſe of the one, the counſels and iſſues of the other were oftentimes conioyned, I am conſtrained not to paſſe them altogether vnder ſilence. About the beginning of May, ſixe thouſand Engliſh footmen ſailed in veſſels of Englaind and Spaine to Fontaraby, which is a frontier towne belonging to the Crowne of Spaine vpon the coaſt of France, ſtanding vpon the Ocean ſea: and it was (according to the couenants made betweene the father in law and ſon in law) together with the forces of Spaine, to aſſaile the Duchie of Guyen, which is a part of the prouince of Aquitaine, according to the ancient names and diuiſions of the ſame: againſt which warre, the French King being not yet aſſured on the coaſt of Picardie, prepared the new leuie of eight hundred Lances which he had made, and waged many bands of footmen of the lower parts of Germanie not ſubiect to the Emperour: and knowing of what importance for the defence of the Duchie of Guyen, was the realme of Nauarre, which was the dowrie of Katherine de Foix, and poſſeſſed ioyntly with Iohn the ſonne of Albert, who was her husband; he called to the Court the father of the ſaid Iohn, and carefully conſidered how he might make him his friend and conſociate: to which purpoſe the death of Gaſton de Foix ſtood him in good ſtead, by the inſtigation of whom, pretending the ſame kingdome not to fall vpon the female, and by conſequent to appertaine to him as to the next heire male of the houſe of Foix, the French King had purſued the ſaid Iohn. On the other ſide, the King Catholike, who had ſet his eyes vpon that Realme, required the King of Nauarre to ſtand neuter betweene the French King and him: and that he would ſuffer his ſouldiers that were to enter France, to paſſe through his realme: and that for the aſſurance of theſe things he would put into his hands certaine places of ſtrength, vnder promiſe to render them as ſoone as the warre ſhould be ended. But the King of Nauarre being not ignorant of the drift of theſe demands, (for the ancient deſire of the King of Spaine to get poſſeſſion of the Realme of Nauarre was very manifeſt) choſe rather to expoſe himſelfe to an vncertaine perill, then to accept a loſſe vnauoidable, hoping that he ſhould not faile of the ſuccours promiſed by the French King, for whoſe affaires it came well to paſſe that the warre began

gan in the realme of Nauarre: and at the ſame time, either to giue more leiſure to ſuch as were appointed to come to his ſuccours, or to deliuer himſelfe if he could from thoſe demands, he treated with the King of Aragon, who according to his cuſtome proceeded in theſe matters with great cunning. But the induſtrie and warineſſe of the King of Aragon was not more hurtfull to the King of Nauarre, then the negligence of the French King; who growing more ſecure for that the Engliſh that were arriued at Fontaraby, had now for many dayes done nothing, and ſuppoſing withall, that the King of Nauarre was able with his owne forces to defend himſelfe for a time, he deferred very long to ſend him ſuccours. By reaſon whereof the King of Aragon who had cunningly nouriſhed and entertained the hopes of the King of Nauarre, conuerting thither with great expedition the bands which he had prepared to ioyne with the Engliſh, the King of Nauarre being vnprepared, deſpairing to be able to make reſiſtance, fled into Bearn beyond the Pyrene hils, and the realme of Nauarre being left abandoned (except certaine ſtrong places which yet held out for the King who was fled) fell, without any expences or difficultie, and more for the feare and reputation of the Engliſh that were at hand, then by his owne forces, into the power of the King of Aragon: who becauſe he could not affirme that he poſſeſſed it lawfully with any other title, alledged that he was iudicially impatronized of it by the authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike. For the Pope being not ſatisfied with the happie ſucceſſe of Italy, had a litle before publiſhed a Bull againſt the French King, wherein naming him no more Moſt Chriſtian, but Moſt Noble, he ſubiected as well his perſon as whoſoeuer were his adherents, to all the paines of heretikes and ſchiſmatikes, permitting euery one to occupie their ſubſtances, eſtates, and all that appertained vnto them: and with the ſame ſeueritie being much offended that the Cardinals and other Prelates who were fled from Millan, had bene receiued into the towne of Lyons, he commanded vnder paine of moſt grieuous cenſures, that the Fayre accuſtomed to be kept at Lyons foure times euery yeare, with great affluence of Merchants, ſhould be hereafter holden in the Citie of Geneua, from whence King Lewis the eleuenth had taken it for the benefit of his kingdom: and laſtly, he had brought the whole realme of France vnder the Eccleſiaſticall interdiction. But after the King of Aragon had conquered the kingdome of Nauarre, which albeit is but of litle circuite, & of leſſe reuenue, yet for the ſituation is very conuenient for the kingdome of Spaine, and greatly auaileable to the ſuretie of it: he determined in himſelfe to paſſe no further, eſteeming it not profitable for him to make war againſt the French King beyond the Mounts. In this reſpect, and euer ſince the Engliſh men arriued, he had bene long in preparing his forces: and after the conqueſt of Nauarre, the Engliſh ſoliciting him to ioyne his forces with them, to march together and incampe afore Bayon, a Citie neare to Fontaraby, and ſtanding almoſt vpon the Ocean ſea, he propoſed vnto them other enterpriſes, in places more remoued from the ſea, alledging that Bayon was ſo manned and fortified, that there could be no hope to take it. Which things being contradicted by the Engliſh, who made no reckoning of any other conqueſt in the Duchie of Guyen beſides Bayon, when there had beno much time ſpent in theſe diſputes, the Engliſh who were angrie and thought themſelues mocked, embarking themſelues without commiſſion or licence of their Prince, returned into England. By reaſon whereof the French King remaining aſſured on that ſide, and fearing no more the inuaſions of the Engliſh by ſea, for that at laſt he was become ſo ſtrong by ſea, that he commanded from the coaſts of Spaine euen to the ſhores of England; he determined to make triall if he could recouer the realme of Nauarre: whereunto he was encouraged, beſides the departing of the Engliſh fleete, for that by reaſon of the ill ſucceſſes in Italy, all his bands of ſouldiers were returned into France. At the ſame time that the King of Aragon gaue hope to the Engliſh men to enter into the warre, the better to bring vnder him the whole iuriſdiction of the realme of Nauarre, he had ſent certaine regiments of men to S. Iohn Pedeportum, which is the vttermoſt towne of that kingdome, ſtanding at the foote of the Pyrene hils, on that ſide towards France: and afterwards the French forces beginning to increaſe thereabouts, he ſent thither with the maine armie Federike Duke of Alba, Captaine generall of that warre. But the French armie being at laſt become farre more mightie, whereunto was arriued the Daulphin of France, Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Monſieur Longueuille, the chiefe Princes of the realme of France, the Duke of Alba lying incamped in a ſtrong place betweene the plaine and the mountaine, held it an action very neceſſary to that ſeruice, to hinder the French men for entring into the realme of Nauarre: who being not able to force him out of that place for the ſtrength of the ſituation, determined

termined that the King of Nauarre with ſeuen thouſand footmen of his countrey, and Monſieur de Paliſſa with his company of three hundred lances remouing from Saluatierra neare to S. Iohn Pedeportum, where the whole armie lay, ſhould paſſe the Pyrene hils by the way of the Vale of Roncales, and drawing neare to Pampeluna the capitall towne of the kingdome, wherein the people taking courage by the nearneſſe of the French, began alreadie to draw into mutinie, for the deſire they had of their King, they ſhould ſeize vpon the Vale of Roncales, by which way onely was brought to the Spaniſh armie victuals, whereof by reaſon of the ſterilitie of the countrey they had already ſome want in the place where they were. The ſucceſſe was, that the King of Nauarre and Monſieur de Paliſſa when they had wonne the way that is vpon the top of the Pyrene hils, tooke Bourget by aſſault, a towne that ſtands at the foot of the hils, wherein was Beldes Captaine of the guard to the King of Aragon, with many bands of footmen: and if they had vſed ſuch celeritie as they ſhould, to winne the Vale of Roncales, famine onely had bene ſufficient to vanquiſh the Spaniſh armie, enuironed on all ſides with enemies, and countries infinitely troubleſome. But the diligence of the Duke of Alba preuented them, who hauing left in S. Iohn Pedeportum a thouſand footmen with all the artillerie, he paſſed to Pampeluna by the Vale of Roncales afore they came thither. So that the King of Nauarre and Monſieur de Paliſſa being diſappointed of their hope, to whom alſo the Daulphin had ſent a new ſtrength of foure hundred lances, and ſeuen thouſand Lanceknights, made their approch to Pampeluna with foure peeces of artillerie, which they had drawne with great paine and difficultie, by reaſon of the ſteepneſſe of the mountaines: and when they had giuen the aſſault, perceiuing they could not carry it for that the ſeaſon was againſt them (for it was in December,) and there was no meanes to recouer victuals in ſo barren a countrey, they repaſſed the Pyrene hils, vpon the which they were conſtrained to leaue their artillerie, both for the difficultie of the paſſages, and for the impediments giuen them by the men of the countrey. And at the ſame time Monſieur Lautrech who was entred Biſcay with three hundred Lances and three thouſand footmen, ſpoiling and burning the whole countrey, after he had in vaine aſſaulted the towne of S. Sebaſtian, repaſſed the mounts and returned to the armie, which now brake vp, both hope and feare ceaſſing on all parts, and the whole realme of Nauarre remaining free and peaceable to the King of Aragon. About this time it being detected that Ferdinand ſonne to the late Federike King of Naples, who called himſelfe Duke of Calabria, had ſecretly conſpired with the French King, and meant to ſteale to the French armie not farre from the towne of Logrognia, where at that time was the King of Aragon, he was by him ſent to the Caſtle of Sciatiua, whither the Kings of Aragon are wont to ſend ſuch priſoners as are perſonages of name, either for their nobilitie or for their vertue: and for the ſame cauſe Philip Coppolo a Neapolitane was quartered, who was the ſecret meſſenger to the French King in this action: Fortune ſo changing the ſtate of worldly things, that he was executed for the ſeruice of him, whoſe grandfather by the fathers ſide, had cut off the head of the Count de Sarny his father. This conſpiracie being diſcouered, was of ſome conſequence for the affaires of Italy: for, as it had his beginning of a certaine gray Frier, which the Duke of Ferrara had ſecretly ſent to Ferdinand; ſo the King Catholike hauing alreadie an inclination to ſatisfie the Popes will, tooke this matter ſo to heart, that he commanded the Viceroy and his Embaſſadour reſident with the Pope, to conuert when they thought good, his armie againſt Ferrara, demanding of him no more money then ſuch as ſhould be neceſſary to entertaine them. Theſe were the accidents of that yeare both in Italy, in France, and in Spaine.

Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and thirteene, no leſſe full of memorable things then the former: in the beginning whereof, armes ceaſſing on all parts, (for that neither the Venetians moleſted others, nor any other moued againſt them) the Viceroy went to incampe with three thouſand footmen afore the rocke of Treſſa, which was rendred vnto him vnder condition that the bodies that were within ſhould depart with their goods ſaued. But all men were troubled in their minds with the conſideration of things to come: knowing that the French King being deliuered from forreine armes, and reincouraged both for the great leuie of Lanceknights he had made, and for the increaſe of his numbers of men at armes, had nothing in ſo great deſire as to recouer the Duchie of Millan: which diſpoſition albeit it was very violent in him, and that he deſired much to haſten the warre, whileſt the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona were yet kept by his ſouldiers: notwithſtanding conſidering how he was hindered by the 1513.

oppoſing of ſo many enemies, and being not yet aſſured that the King of England would not make ſtrong warre againſt him the next Sommer, he determined to enter into no action, vnleſſe he could ſeparate ſome one of the Confederates from the common alliance, or elſe winne to him the amitie of the Venetians: of which things the yeare paſt gaue him many hopes that one of theſe might haply ſucceed to him. For when the Biſhop of Gurci went from Rome to Millan, he heard graciouſly by the way one of the familiar friends of the Cardinall de S. Seuerin, ſent to him from the French Queene, and afterwards ſent one of his men ſecretly into France to make this motion: That the King ſhould be bound to aide Ceſar againſt the Venetians: That the mariage ſhould go forward betweene the ſecond daughter of the King, and Charles nephew to Ceſar, to whom the King ſhould giue in dowrie the Duchie of Millan: and ſhould alſo giue vp to his ſaid daughter and future ſonne in law, the rights he pretended to the Realme of Naples: And to the end that ſimple words and promiſes ſhould not ſtand to Ceſar as a ſuretie, he required that the daughter might be immediatly put into his hands: And that when the King ſhould haue recouered the Duchie of Millan, Cremona and Guiaradadda ſhould be for Ceſar. The King hoped likewiſe that he might eaſily ioyne to him the Venetians, who were not a litle angrie at that time that the Viceroy occupied Breſſia, but much more for the matters which afterwards were accorded at Rome betweene Ceſar and the Pope. Therefore after that the King cauſed Andrew Gritti to come ſecretly to his Court, who hauing bin taken at Breſſia, remained as yet priſoner in France, and cauſed Iohn Iaques Triuulce, in whom the Venetians repoſed much, to ſend to Venice one of his Secretaries vnder colour of other affaires. He had alſo ſome hope to be able to compound with the King of Aragon, who (according to his cuſtome oftentimes to debate affaires by the negociation of religious men) had ſent ſecretly into France two gray Friers, to the end that expreſſing their zeale to the common benefit, they might begin to negociate with the Queene in ſome points, concerning the peace either vniuerſall or particular betweene the two Kings. Neuertheleſſe touching the particular, there was litle hope, the king knowing well enough that he would retaine the Realme of Nauarre, and to him it was a matter of no leſſe indignitie to leaue abandoned that King, who to reenter into his amitie and vnder hope of his ſuccours, was fallen into that calamitie. But nothing troubled ſo much the mind of the French king, as the deſire to reconcile the Swiſſers vnto him, knowing that thereupon depended his aſſured victorie, for the great authoritie that that nation then had, for the feare of their armes, and for that it ſeemed they had begun to gouerne themſelues, not as mercenarie ſouldiers, nor as ſhepheards, but with a care and vigilancie, as of a well ordered Commonweale, and as men brought vp in the adminiſtration of eſtates, and managing of affaires, without ſuffering any leuies to be made, but by good counſell and diſcretion: by reaſon whereof all Chriſtian Princes had Embaſſadours with them: the Pope with almoſt all the Potentates of Italy payed them yearely penſions, to be receiued into their confederation, and to leuie for their proper defence in times of neceſſitie, ſouldiers of that nation. The remembrance of which things made them ſo proud, that weighing how King Charles the eight by their armes had firſt toubled the quiet ſtate of Italy, and that afterward King Lewis his ſucceſſor, by their valour had conquered the Duchie of Millan, recouered Genes, and ouerthrowne the Venetians, they vſed towards all men an imperious and inſolent behauiour. And though the French King, beſides the perſwaſions of many particulars of that nation, and the opinion that they would become more flexible to him for the great offers of money that were made them, hoped he might winne them; for that ſuch as gouerned Millan, hauing agreed with the Embaſſadours of the Swiſſers in the name of Maximilian Sforce, that he ſhould giue them an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats ſo ſoone as he had receiued the poſſeſſion of Millan and the Caſtles, and fortie thouſand duckats a yeare for the ſpace of fiue and twentie yeares, the Swiſſers taking him into their protection, with couenant to deliuer into his pay bands of their footmen; yet the Cantons would neuer ratifie it: by reaſon whereof, in the beginning of the yeare preſent, notwithſtanding afore he had in vaine proued to haue his Embaſſadours heard, which he meant to ſend to treate of theſe things, yet to purchaſe audience in their Diots, he conſented freely to giue vp to them the Caſtles of the Vale of Lugan, and of Lucarna: with ſo great indignitie great Princes ſought at that time the amitie of that nation. Then Monſieur Trimouille according to the commiſſion of the King, came to Lucerna, a place appointed to heare him in publike aſſembly; and albeit he was receiued in good ſort, yet he quickly perceiued he ſhould do

litle good touching the Duchie of Millan: for that not many dayes before, ſixe of the Cantons had ratified and ſubſigned the capitulations made with Maximilian Sforce, three had determined to confirme them, and touching the other three, they were not yet reſolued: by reaſon whereof, ſpeaking no more of Millan, he demanded that at leaſt they would aide the King to recouer Genes and Aſt, which were not comprehended in the capitulation made with Maximilian Sforce. For the better aduancement of which demand, Triuulce made requeſt that he might be at the Diot, vnder colour to treate of particular affaires; and ſafeconduct was granted him, but with this condition, that he ſhould not ſolicite in any matter appertaining to the French King: and being come to Lucerna, he was forbidden to haue any conference with Monſieur Trimouille, either in publike or in priuate. At laſt by an vniuerſall conſent, the capitulations made with the Duke of Millan were ratified by all the Cantons, and all the demands of the French King denied, with this addition, that they would not ſuffer any leuies of footmen of that nation to ſerue him either in Italy or out of Italy: by reaſon whereof the King ſeeing himſelfe reiected of ỹ Swiſſers, perceiued that it was neceſſary for him to be reconciled either with Ceſar or with the Venetians, who treated alſo at the ſame time with Ceſar, for that the ſuſpition of their reconciliation with the French King increaſing in the minds of the Confederates, the Biſhop of Gurci conſented that they ſhould retaine ſtill Vincenſa. But the ſame reaſons encouraging the Senate which gaue feare to the enemies, they ſtood vpon this, to make no more peace if Verona were not rendred to them, recompencing Ceſar with a greater quantitie of money. In which demand ſome difficultie being found, the Venetians inclining ſo much the more to the amitie of the French, contracted with the Secretarie of Triuulce to be confederate with the King, according to the capitulations made betweene them afore, by the which Cremona and Guiaradadda ſhould remaine to them. But the Secretarie ſet downe expreſſe mention in the capitulation, that that agreement ſhould ſtand as voide and of none effect, if within a certaine time it were not approued by the King, in whoſe Councell the diſputations were great, which was moſt to be deſired, either a reconciliation with Ceſar, or a confederation with the Venetians: Robert a Secretarie of great authoritie, Triuulce, and almoſt all the chiefeſt of the Councell approued more the confederation with the Venetians; alledging that which the preſent experience had made them know of the inconſtancie of Ceſar with ſo great detriment, the hatred he bare to the King, and his deſire of reuenge; and that which they had heard of perſonages worthy of credit, who reported that they had often heard him ſay at that time, that he kept fixed in his mind the remembrance of ſeuenteene iniuries receiued from the French, and that whenſoeuer oportunitie ſerued him to be reuenged of them all, he would not loſe the occaſion: and that theſe ſolicitations were practiſed by him for no other end, then by the meane of a reconciliation full of fraud, either to haue the better oportunitie to do harme, or at leaſt to break off ỹ which he knew was practiſed with the Venetians, or elſe to detract the preparations of the war: & that they could not excuſe him, nor eſteeme him worthy of compaſſion, who being once beguiled by another, returneth vnwiſely to repoſe confidence in him againe. The Cadinall of S. Seuerin was of another opinion, who (as his aduerſaries ſaid, croſſing Triuulce more through enuie then for other occaſion, for that with his brethren he had alwayes defended the Gibelin faction in Millan) replied on the contrary, that nothing could be more profitable to the King, then by ioyning with Ceſar, to breake the vnion of the enemies, ſpecially the confederation being made by ſuch meanes as they might hope it would laſt: it being proper to Princes, in their deliberations alwayes to preferre profite afore good will, hatred, and other affections: And what greater benefite could be done to Ceſar, then to aide him preſently againſt the Venetians, with hope that his Nephew ſhould come to ſucceed in the Duchie of Millan? That Ceſar being ſeparate from the others, the King Catholike would not oppoſe againſt his authoritie, as well for the intereſts of his Nephew, as for other good regards. Moreouer, that nothing could more amaze the Pope, then this confederation: and on the contrary, that the confederation with the Venetians, was full of indignitie, ſince he muſt yeeld to them Cremona and Guiaradadda, members ſo conuenient to the Duchie of Millan, that to recouer them, the King had ſtirred vp all the world: and yet if the vnion of the reſidue were not broken, that the confederation with the Venetians would not ſuffice to obtaine the victory. At laſt this opinion preuailed, the rather for the authoritie of the Queene, who deſired greatly the aduancement of her daughter, ſo farre forth as it might be obtained, that till the conſummation of the mariage ſhe might remaine with her, who would giue her faith and promiſe to keepe her in the name of Cæſar, as the aſſigned ſpouſe for his Nephew, and to deliuer her to her husband as ſoone as her age made her fit for mariage. But the King being afterwards certified that Cæſar would not admit this limitation, but rather that theſe things were by him artificially propounded, to cauſe him to proceed more ſlowly in his other proiects, he brake off from this practiſe, and ſent backe againe for Monſieur d'Aſparot brother to Monſieur de Lautrech, who was already gone from the Court to meete the Biſhop of Gurci with this commiſſion. On the other ſide, the feare of the vnion betweene the King and the Venetians increaſing dayly, the King of Aragon aduiſed Cæſar to render Verona, and with the money which he ſhould receiue of the Venetians, and with the Spaniſh armie, to transferre the war into Burgundie. The Biſhop of Gurci was of the ſame opinion, who hoping by his preſence to be able to moue Cæſar, returned into Germanie, being followed not onely of Dom Peter de Vree which was come with him, but alſo of Iohn Baptiſta Spinella Count of Carriato, Embaſſadour to the ſaid King of Aragon reſident with the Venetians. And firſt of all he perſwaded the Senate (to the end that new difficulties might not breake off the matters in queſtion) to make truce with Cæſar for all the moneth of March: and then the ſaid Embaſſadours ſhould giue them their faith, that Cæſar ſhould render Verona, if they would promiſe him within certaine times two hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and fiftie thouſand by the yeare.

In this alteration of affaires, and in ſo troubleſome a time, the Pope fell ſicke, who was full of more high conceits and deſires then haply at any time before: for when he had obtained the thing he deſired, his plots did nothing diminiſh, but increaſed dayly. He had determined in the beginning of the Spring to vndertake the enterpriſe of Ferrara ſo much deſired, which (as he thought) wold make litle reſiſtance, both for that it was naked of all ſuccours, and becauſe the Spaniſh armie was to ioyne with his companies: He had ſecretly bought of Cæſar for the price of thirtie thouſand duckats the Citie of Sienna for the behooſe of the Duke of Vrbin, to whom (except Peſera) he would neuer giue any thing of the Eccleſiaſtike eſtate, to the end to reſerue entire to himſelfe the glorie to haue ſimply and onely ſtudied for the exaltation of the Church: He agreed to lend to Cæſar fortie thouſand duckats, receiuing Modena in gage: He threatned the Lucquois who in the heate of the affaires of the Duke of Ferrara, had ſeized vpon Garfagnana, importuning them to deliuer it to him: And he was angrie with the Cardinall de Medicis, for that he thought he adhered more to the King Catholike then to him: and becauſe he perceiued he was not able to diſpoſe of the Citie of Florence as he thought, he ſtudied alreadie new plots & practiſes to alter the eſtate of Florence. He was diſpleaſed with the Cardinal of Sion, from whom he tooke the name of Legate, and enioyned him to come to Rome, for that in the Duchie of Millan he had appropriated to himſelf a yearly reuenue of more then thirtie thouſand duckats of the eſtates and goods of diuers perſons: The better to aſſure the Duke of Vrbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbors, he had of new taken into his pay Charles Baillon, to chaſe out of Perouſa Iohn Paul, who by affinitie was very neare conioyned to the ſons of Pandolfe Petrucci, ſucceſſors to the greatneſſe of their father: He would eſtabliſh for new Duke of Genes, Octauian Fregoſa, depoſing Ianus from that dignitie, whereunto the reſidue of the houſe of Fregoſa did conſent, becauſe for the degree that his anceſtors had held in that ſtate, it ſeemed beſt to appertaine to him: He ſtudied continually either how he might get the Spaniſh armie out of Italy, or ouerthrow it by the aide of the Swiſſers, whom onely he exalted and embraced: and that to this end, that the kingdome of Naples being poſſeſſed by him, Italy might remaine free frō ſtrangers, a ſpeech that often paſſed out of his mouth; and for this cauſe he had hindred that the Swiſſers did not confederate with the King Catholike. And yet (as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time) continuing in his accuſtomed heat againſt the French King, although he had giuen eare to a meſſage frō the Queen, he ſtirred vp the King of England to make warre, to whom he had transferred by a publike decree of the Councell of Latran, the name of Moſt Chriſtian, whereof there was alreadie a Bull written, wherein was likewiſe contained the priuation of the dignitie and title of the King of France, giuing that kingdome to whom ſoeuer could ſeize vpō it. In theſe ſo great thoughts, and haply in others more ſecret and more great (for in a mind ſo fierce and terrible, all ſorts of imaginations how great and vaine ſoeuer they be, are not incredible) after the ſickneſſe of many dayes, death ſeized vpon him: whereby ſeeing himſelfe preuented, he called together the Conſiſtorie, wherein he could not be preſent in perſon, by reaſon of his diſeaſe, by the which he cauſed the Bull to be confirmed med which he had publiſhed before againſt ſuch as by ſymony would climbe to the Popedome: declaring that the election of his ſucceſſor appertained to the Colledge of Cardinals, and not to the Councell: and that the Cardinals ſchiſmatikes could haue no preſence there, to whom he ſaid he pardoned the iniuries they had done him, and prayed God to forgiue them the wrongs they had done to his Church. After this he beſought the Colledge of Cardinals, that for his ſake, they would grant to the Duke of Vrbin his Nephew, the Citie of Peſera in Vicarage, in conſideration that by the meanes of that Duke it had bene recouered to the Church after the death of Iohn Sforce. He ſhewed in no other matter any priuate or particular affection: in ſo much as Madame Felice his daughter (and many others for her ſake) intreating him with great importunitie, to create Cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being her brother by the mothers ſide, he anſwered roundly, that he was not worthy of that degree; and retaining in all things his accuſtomed conſtancie and ſeueritie, together with the ſame iudgement and force of mind which he had before his ſickneſs, when he had deuoutly receiued the Sacraments of the Church, the night before the one and twentieth day of Februarie he ended the courſe of theſe preſent paines about the breake of day. He was a Prince of incredible conſtancie and courage, but violent, and of ſuch vnmeaſurable apprehenſions, as the reuerence that was borne to the Church, the diſcord of Princes, and the condition of the times, did more to ſtay him from his ruine, then either his moderation or diſcretion: worthy no doubt of great glory, if he had bene a Prince ſecular, or if that care and intention which he had to raiſe the Church into temporall greatneſſe by the meanes of warre, had bene employed to exalt it by the way of peace in matters ſpirituall. And yet neuertheleſſe he was lamented and eſteemed aboue all his predeceſſors, by thoſe, who (hauing loſt the true names of things, and being ignorant how to diſtinguiſh them rightly) iudged it the dutie of Popes rather to increaſe the iuriſdiction of the Sea Apoſtolike by armes and the bloud of Chriſtians, then to labour (by good example of life, and by curing and correcting of corrupt manners) for the ſauing of thoſe ſoules, for whom they boaſt that Ieſus Chriſt hath conſtituted them his Vicars in earth.

The Pope being dead, the Viceroy of Naples who was marched with his Spaniſh armie towards Plaiſance, conſtrained that Citie to returne, as it had bene accuſtomed to be, vnder the gouernmẽt of the Dukes of Millan. And Parma did the like, hauing the ſame feare of the Spaniſh ſouldiers. On the otherſide, the Duke of Ferrara hauing ſuddenly recouered the townes of Romagna, drew neare to Reggia: but finding no tumult within the towne, he durſt not abide there for feare of the Spaniſh armie, which lay diſperſed betweene Plaiſance and Reggia. There was no other ſtirre or mouing in the ſtate of the Church, neither did the Citie of Rome nor the Colledge of Cardinals feele any of thoſe difficulties which they felt at the death of the two laſt Popes: by reaſon whereof the obſequies and funerals being ended according to the accuſtomed maner, foure and twentie Cardinals entred peaceably into the Conclaue, hauing firſt agreed that the Marquis of Mantuaes ſonne, whom Pope Iulio kept in his Court for hoſtage, ſhould be acquited of his faith and promiſe, with libertie to returne to his father. The firſt matter that was debated in the Conclaue, was with ſtrict articles to moderate the authoritie of the Pope to come, which they ſaid the laſt Pope had vſed too immoderatly: and yet (as amongſt men, ſome haue not the heart to oppoſe againſt a Prince and great Lord, and ſome deſire to enter into his grace) within a ſmall time after, of themſelues they diſanulled the moſt part of thoſe lawes. The ſeuenth day they choſe Pope without any diſcord of conſent, Iohn Cardinall of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth, being but ſeuen and thirtie yeares of age, which was a very ſtrange matter, and contrary to cuſtome, which the yong Cardinals brought to paſſe by their induſtrie, hauing a long time afore ſecretly agreed among themſelues to create the firſt Pope of their number. The moſt part of Chriſtendome were very well pleaſed with this election, all men in generall perſwading themſelues, that he would become a rare and excellent Pope, as well for the freſh memory of the valour of his father, and for the fame of his liberalitie and benignitie, which was vniuerſally ſpread, as for the opinion of his continencie and life not attainted, together with an hope that by the example of his father, he would be a louer of learned men, and of all generous ſpirits. Whereunto was much helping the maner of his election, which was performed ſincerely, and without ſymonie or ſuſpition of other corruption. And it ſeemed that God began already to approue and confirme his ſeate, for that the fourth day after the election, the Cardinals of S. Croſſe and S. Seuerin, which had bene depriued of the Hat, came into his power, who as ſoone as they heard of the death of Pope Iulio, went by ſea to Rome accompanied with the Embaſſadour of the French King: and when they were arriued at the hauen of Liuorne, vnderſtanding that the Cardinall de Medicis was choſen Pope, truſting to his benignitie, and chiefly the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, for the ancient friendſhip and ſtrait familiaritie which he had had with him and his brother; when they had obtained ſafeconduct of the Captaine of Liuorne, which ſtretched no further then the bounds of his iuriſdiction, they tooke land, and without ſeeking other ſuretie, went vp voluntarily to Piſa: in which Citie they were honorably receiued, and afterwards being conueyed to Florence, they were ſo curteouſly guarded, that they had no diſpoſition to depart: the ſame being the deſire of the Pope, who ſending vnto them the Biſhop of Oruietto, exhorted them with words full of affection, that as well for their proper ſuretie, as for the tranquillitie of the Church, they would abide at Florence vntill it were determined in what maner they ſhould come to Rome; and that hauing bene iudicially depriued, and their depriuation confirmed in the Councell of Latran, they ſhould forbeare to go in the habite of Cardinals, to the end that making ſhew of their humiliation, they might giue him the better occaſion to reduce their affaires into good termes, as he had determined. The firſt act of the new Pope was his coronation, which was performed according to the cuſtome of his predeceſſors, in the Church of S. John de Latran, with ſo great pompe, as well of his family and Court, as of all the Prelates, and many Lords that were there preſent, together with the people of Rome, that all men acknowledged that ſuch magnificence and ſumptuouſneſſe had not bene ſeene in Rome ſince the inundations of the ſauage nations: in which ſolemnitie the Standard of the Church was carried by Alphonſo d'Eſte, who hauing obtained ſuſpenſion of the cenſures, was come to Rome, with great hope, by the clemencie of the Pope, to be able to cõpound with him for his affaires. The Standard of the Knights of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis, mounted vpon a ſtately Courſer armed at all points, who by nature was inclined to the profeſſion of armes, but by deſtinie drawne to the Eccleſiaſtike life, wherein he may ſerue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune. That which made that day more memorable and admirable, was the conſideration that he who then with ſo rare pompe and glorie tooke the enſignes of ſo great dignitie, had bene the yeare before, and on the very ſame day, miſerably made priſoner. This magnificence confirmed in the multitude the opinion that was had of him, euery one promiſing himſelfe that Rome ſhould be happie vnder a Pope adorned with ſo great liberalitie and bountie, it being very certaine that he had ſpent an hundred thouſand duckats that day. But wiſe men deſired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: who iudged, that ſuch pompe was not conuenient for Popes, and that the condition of the preſent times required not that the treaſures gathered by his predeceſſor, ſhould be ſo vnprofitably ſpent. But ſo it was, that neither the changing of the Pope, nor other accidents, were ſufficient to eſtabliſh and aſſure the tranquillitie of Italy: for it was plainly diſcerned that matters tended more to warre then to peace: for Ceſar (who would heare no more of the rendring of Verona, fearing thereby to be depriued of all oportunitie to haue any eaſie entrie into Italy) albeit the truce was prolonged for the full moneth of Aprill, made no reckoning of the conditions of accord that had bene debated at Millan; and being diſcontented with the importunities of the Embaſſadours of the King Catholike, he told the Count of Carriato, that for the inclination he ſhewed to the Venetians, he might rather be called the Embaſſadour of Venice then of Spaine. But that which much more augmented this diſpoſition, was the truce that was made for a whole yeare betweene the French King and the King Catholike, onely touching the affaires out of Italy: the oportunitie of which truce gaue to the French King (being now deliuered from the ſuſpitions of Spaine) a great facilitie to renew the warre in the Duchie of Millan.

The diſpoſition of Princes to the warre.

The King Catholike did alwayes diſlike to haue warre with the French out of Italy, for that being not ſufficiently ſtored with money, and therefore conſtrained to helpe himſelfe with the forces of the Barons and peoples of Spaine, either he had no readineſſe of ſuccours, or elſe he was conſtrained in times of warre to remaine with them as it were in ſubiection: but at this time principally he ſtood confirmed in his ancient counſell, for as much as by peace, he ſhould be the better aſſured of the Realme of Nauarre, by him newly conquered; but much more for that ſince the death of Queene Iſabel, being no more King but Gouernour of Caſtile, he had not in troubleſome times ſo great and firme authoritie: a freſh example whereof he had ſeene in the defence of the Realme of Nauarre, whereof albeit he had a happie ſucceſſe, yet it happened

that by the ſlowneſſe of ſuccours he ſaw himſelfe brought into many dangers. Therefore to the end to fall no more into thoſe inconueniences, not knowing yet of the Popes death, he agreed to the truce, which neuertheleſſe was not publiſhed before he receiued newes of the election of a new Pope: and to iuſtifie himſelfe of this vnlooked for deliberation; he alledged, that the Pope and the Venetians had violated the league with him: for that ſince the battell of Rauenna they had neuer payed to him the fortie thouſand duckats, as they were bound whileſt the French king poſſeſſed any thing in Italy: That he only had bin carefull for the publike good of the Confederates, and had not chalenged to himſelfe the rewards of the common victory: That he did not poſſeſſe in Italy ſo much as one ſmall tower more then he had before the warre; but the Pope had ſought his particular benefite, and made proper to himſelfe the things that were common, ſeizing vpon Parma, Plaiſance and Reggia, and nouriſhing a continuall ſtudie to poſſeſſe Ferrara: which couetouſneſſe of his had bene the onely impediment of the recouering of the Caſtles in the Duchie of Millan and the Lanterne of Genes: That for his part, he had interpoſed all his diligence and authoritie to worke the accord betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, but the Pope for his proper intereſts had laboured to exclude them out of the league; wherein he ſaid his Embaſſadours had behaued themſelues vndiſcreetly, who not conſenting (for that they knew ſuch was his intention) that he ſhould be named in the head of the confederation, had ſuffered him to be named in that article wherein the Venetians were excluded. Moreouer, that in thoſe negociations and practiſes, the Venetians had not anſwered the opinion that men had of their wiſedome, holding Vincenſa in ſuch eſtimation, that for feare to loſe it, they would not deliuer themſelues from the trauels of the warre: That it was impoſſible for him to maintaine the armie he had in Italy without the contributions promiſed, and much leſſe poſſible to ſuſtaine the whole warre vpon the confines of his realmes, a matter which he knew all the reſidue did deſire and procure: That the Pope could no more diſſemble his deſire and intention to take from him the kingdome of Naples: and yet that theſe iniuries could not moue him to haue a thought to abandon the Church and the other eſtates of Italy, if he might find in them a reaſonable correſpondencie to contract and capitulate with him for their common defence, which he hoped they would be moued vnto, the rather by the oportunitie and meanes of this truce. He cauſed to be inſerted in the inſtrument of the truce the names of Ceſar and the King of England, notwithſtanding he had nothing communicated with them: and this was a thing very ridiculous, that at the ſame time that the truce was ſolemnly publiſhed throughout all Spaine, an Herald came from the King of England, to ſignifie vnto him the great preparations which he made to inuade France, and to ſolicite him likewiſe to make warre againſt the King on the coaſts of Spaine, according to his promiſe. The truce made in this manner, amazed much the minds of ſuch in Italy to whom the iuriſdiction of the French was diſpleaſing, euery one holding it almoſt for certaine, that the French King would not deferre to ſend an army into Italy; and that for the obſtinacie of Ceſar touching the conditions of the peace, the Venetians would ioyne with the King, againſt whom being ioyned together, it ſeemed a very hard matter to make reſiſtance; for that the Spaniſh armie had now no more meanes to maintaine themſelues, notwithſtanding they had at times drawne ſome ſtore of money out of the eſtate of Millan, much afflicted with infinite expences. Touching the new Pope, men could not yet diſcerne what was his intention. He ſeemed to wiſh ſecretly that the power of the French King might be bounded by the Alpes; and yet being newly aſcended to the Popedome, and no leſſe confuſed then others for the truce made by the king Catholike, in a time whē men had greateſt expectation that he wold follow the war, his mind was full of doubt, & he was alſo angrie, for that demanding with great inſtance the reſtitution of Parma and Plaiſance to the Church, men were ready to giue him hope thereof, but the execution went ſlowly forward, all the others deſiring to preſerue them to the Duchie of Millan, and haply hoping that the deſire to recouer them, would induce him to the defence of that ſtate. The Swiſſers ſeemed to be a more certaine and a more mightie defence and ſuccour; but becauſe the ſummes of money, which according to the couenants were neceſſary to wage and leuie them, could not be aduanced neither by Maximilian Sforce nor the reſidue, it was feared, that in the greateſt neceſſitie they would refuſe to deſcend into the ſtate of Millan. On the other ſide, the French King, after he had finiſhed the truce, determined to ſend an armie into Italy, the reaſons afore recited giuing him great hope of the victory: whereunto was added, that he knew well enough that the peoples of the ſtate of Millan, vexed with ſo many taxes and rapines of the Swiſſers, and with the harbouring and payment to the Spaniards, deſired earneſtly to returne vnder his obedience; hauing found by the rude behauiour which others had vſed towards them, that in comparison the domination of the French was to be deſired; and particularly many Gentlemen by expreſſe letters, which they ſent, ſome to himſelfe, and others to Triuulce, whom the King had ſent to Lyons, the better to debate with them of Millan, perſwaded that he ſhould not deferre to ſend an armie, promiſing to take armes, and to declare themſelues for him as ſoone as his armie was paſſed the Mounts. And there was no want of continuall perſwaſions, as well of Triuulce, as of others that were baniſhed, who, according to the cuſtome of ſuch as be out of their countrey, alledged that the enterpriſe would be very eaſie, ſpecially the Venetians being brought to ioyne with him in the action. But that which enforced the King to make haſte, was the confidence he had to preuent with the end of that expedition, the beginning of the warre which the King of England meant to make vpon him, which he could not begin till after certaine moneths; for that that kingdome hauing now bene many yeares in peace, was diſfurniſhed of armour, of artilleries, and almoſt of all other things neceſſary for warre: and alſo in great want of horſes of ſeruice, for that the Engliſh do ordinarily make warre on foote: and their footmen being vnexperienced, the King of England was conſtrained for that he meant to paſſe into France with a mighty power, to entertain a great number of Almain footmen: matters which could not be diſpatched without great tract of time. The French King in like ſort was conſtrained to make the more haſte, for feare leſt the Caſtles ſhould be loſt for want of victuals, but ſpecially the Lanterne of Genes, which not many dayes before had miſſed to be relieued with victuals by a ſhip ſent for that purpoſe: which from Albinguo, whither it was accompanied with three ſhips and one gallion, being entred the maine ſea with a good wind, had by the force thereof paſſed through the midſt of the Genoways fleet, and being approched neare the Lanterne, and riding at anker, had faſtened her cables to the Caſtle, and began already to vnlade her victuals and munitions which ſhe had brought, at what time Andrew Doria, who afterwards was ſo happie and famous by ſea, thruſting in with no ſmall danger with a great ſhip, whereof he was the owner, betweene the Lanterne and the French ſhip, when he had cut a ſunder the cable that was faſtened to the Caſtle, and the cables that held the ankers, fighting valiantly, and receiuing a wound in his face, he tooke the ſhip. The King therefore being determined not to deferre the beginning of the warre, to which intent, and to be ready vpon all occaſions, he had already ſent many lances into Burgundie and Daulphiney, he thought good to hearken with diligence after thoſe things which now had bene debated ſo many moneths with the Venetians, the which had bene ſomewhat deferred and protracted as well by the one as by the other partie, for that ſometimes the hope to haue peace with Cæſar, and ſometimes the great inſtance made by the Venetians for Cremona and Guiaradadda, had holden the King in ſuſpence: and in the Senate the opinions were found diuers, for that many of great authoritie in that Commonweale, preferred the accord with Cæſar, ſhewing that it was more profitable for them to auoide for the preſent ſuch huge expences, and to free themſelues from dangers, thereby to be the more ready to embrace the occaſions that would be offered, then, their Commonweale being ſo ouer-wearied and trauelled, and the wealth of priuate men abated, to intangle themſelues with new warres in company of the French King, of whoſe amitie, how faithfull and aſſured it was, they were not without a late experience. Neuertheleſſe, for that it ſeemed to the greater part that rarely ſuch an occaſion would preſent it ſelfe as might giue them the meanes to recouer their ancient eſtate, and that the agreement with Cæſar (he retaining Verona) would not deliuer them from troubles and dangers, they reſolued (without ſpeaking any more of Cremona and Guiaradadda) to make confederation with the French King, which was concluded in the Kings Court by Andrew Gritti, who enioyed already rather the place of an Embaſſadour then of a priſoner; and wherein, after it was granted that Bartholomew Aluiano and Andrew Gritti ſhould be ſet at libertie, the Venetians were bound to aide the King with eight hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſemen, and ten thouſand footmen, againſt all ſuch as would riſe vp to let him for recouering of Aſt, of Genes, and the Duchie of Millan: and the King bound himſelfe to ioyne with them vntill they had recouered all that they poſſeſſed in Lombardie and the Marque of Treuiſana afore the league of Cambray. As ſoone as the confederation was reſolued, Iohn Iaques Triuulce and Bartholomew Aluiano went to Suſa: the one, to go from thence to Venice

by the ſurer way, and the other to aſſemble there the army appointed for the warre, which conſiſted of fifteene hundred lances, eight hundred light horſemen, and fifteene thouſand footmen, whereof eight thouſand were Lanceknights, and the reſidue French men, all vnder the gouernment of Monſieur Trimouille, whom the King had appointed his Lieutenant, to the end that matters might proceed with the more reputation.

At this time the French King made great ſute to the Pope with earneſt prayers not to hinder him in recouering the Duchie of Millan, offering him not onely not to paſſe further after the victory, but alſo to make peace alwayes as it ſhould ſeeme beſt vnto him. To which motions albeit the Pope gaue eare very graciouſly, and that, to the end there might the more credite be giuen to his words, he vſed the helpe of Iulian his brother to treate with the French King, yet many things made him ſuſpected to the King: as the memory of things done afore the time of his Papacie: then, ſince he was Pope, how he had ſent to him Cinthio his familiar friend with letters and very friendly commiſſions, but ſo generall, as they diſcouered that his mind was not inclined to him: and that he had conſented that Proſper Colonno ſhould be elected Gouernour of the Duchie of Millan; a matter which Pope Iulius had alwayes hindred, for the hatred he bare to the Colonnois. He entred alſo into greater doubt, for that the Pope had ſignified to the King of England, that he would continue in the confederation made with Ceſar, the King Catholike and himſelfe: and afterwards he wrote to the Communalties of the Swiſſers, in a maner exhorting them to the defence of Italy, and diſſembled not his willingneſſe to continue with them the confederation made by Pope Iulius, by the which they were bound to the defence of the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, receiuing of him a yearly penſion of twentie thouſand duckats. It was alſo a ſigne of his will and intention, that he had not receiued into grace the Duke of Ferrara, but by many excuſes deferred to render to him Reggio vntill his brother the Cardinall came to Rome, who to auoide the perſecutions of Pope Iulius, and the inſtance which the French King made vnto him to go to the Councell of Piſa, was withdrawne to his Biſhopricke of Agria in the countrey of Hungaria. But that which aboue all other things made the King enter into ſuſpition of the Pope, was, that he had (although very ſecretly) counſelled the Senate of Venice to accord with Ceſar: a matter cleane contrary to the intention of the King, who had alſo taken in ill part, that the Pope pretending that he was not moued for any other cauſe then for that which concerned his office, had written vnto him a Briefe, wherein he exhorted him not to take armes, and to make it appeare, that he deſired rather to finiſh the warre with ſome honorable compoſition: a matter which the King would not haue diſliked, if for the ſame deſire of peace, the Pope had declared to the King of England, that he ought not make war vpon the Realme of France. And certainly this ſuſpition of the King was not without cauſe, for that the Pope earneſtly deſired that the French might haue no more footing in Italy; either for that he thought it more profitable for the common ſuretie, or for the greatneſſe of the Church: or for that he kept ſtill fixed in his mind the remembrance of harmes receiued by the Crowne of France, whereunto albeit his father and other his predeceſſors had borne no litle affection, and in ſundry accidents had reaped many honours and profites; yet it was an iniury freſh in memory, that his brethren and he had bene expulſed Florence by the coming of King Charles, and that the King reigning bearing fauour to the popular gouernment, had either alwayes deſpiſed them, or if at any time he ſhewed himſelfe affected to them, it was to vſe them as inſtruments to draw the Florentines by that ſuſpition to couenants more aduantagious for himſelfe, without hauing any care at all of them. To this perhaps was added, a diſdaine, for that he had bin led priſoner to Millan after the battell of Rauenna, and that the King had commanded that he ſhould be brought into France. But although the Pope was thus affected, either for theſe or for other cauſes, yet he proceeded aduiſedly, and diſſembled as much as he could his intention, perceiuing himſelfe not of abilitie to make ſuch reſiſtance as he could haue wiſhed, and he gaue eare dayly with great affection to the demands and complaints which were made vnto him againſt the King. For the Swiſſers being much inclined to riſe for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, offered to deſcend thither with a farre greater number then before, if they might be furniſhed with a certaine ſumme of money, which for the pouertie and weakneſſe of others could not be expected from any but from the Pope. Touching the Viceroy, his counſels were vncertaine, and his ſpeeches variable and ſecret, for ſometime he offered the Pope to oppoſe againſt the French men, if he would ſhew himſelf openly in the cauſe, ſending his bands of ſoldiers

to ioyne with him, and waging for three moneths a good number of footmen; and to adde the more credite to his doings, he tooke his ſouldiers from the Cities of Parma and Reggia, and incamped with his army vpon the riuer of Trebia, leauing notwithſtanding ſome of his ſouldiers for the guard of Tortona and Alexandria, who had not ſtirred from thence: ſometimes alſo he auouched that he had receiued commandement from his King (at the ſame time that he wrote to him of the truce) to leade backe the armie to the kingdome of Naples. But Ierome Vich Embaſſadour reſident with the Pope, vſed other ſpeeches, and yet he agreed with him in this, that his King promiſed, the Pope taking vpon him the defence of Millan, to begin the warre in France without any reſpect to the truce, which he ſaid he might lawfully do without any violation of his faith promiſed. Therefore it was beleeued of many, that the King Catholike, fearing that by reaſon of the truce that had bene made, no man would oppoſe againſt the French King, had commanded the Viceroy, that if he ſaw none would proceed roundly to the defence of the Duchie of Millan, that he ſhould not ſeeke to prouoke the French King by new iniuries, but ſhould retire his army to Naples: for which cauſe alſo he made ſhew to the King that he was content to incline to peace, offering withall to induce Ceſar and the King of England thereto. And to make him the more tractable if he ſhould recouer the Duchie of Millan, he made almoſt an aſſured promiſe, that his army ſhould be no impediment to him. The Viceroy then who had determined to go his way, reuoked the ſouldiers that were vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero in Alexandria and Tortona, communicating at the ſame time (as was ſaid) his reſolution to Triuulce, to the end his departing might be more acceptable to the French King. Neuertheles he put not this deliberation ſo ſpeedily in execution, for that the Swiſſers being very deſirous to defend the Duchie of Millan, had ſent thither by common conſent fiue thouſand footmen, and gaue hope to ſend a farre greater number: but making demonſtration of the contrary, he ſent Proſper Colonno to debate with the Swiſſers of the place where they ſhould aſſemble againſt the French, either for that he had receiued aduertiſement that the truce was diſcontenting to Ceſar, or for that he was enioyned by new commiſſions from his King to follow the will of the Pope, who perſeuered ſtill in the ſame perplexities (his ſmall hope on the one ſide, and his owne inclination on the other, ſtriuing in him.) And yet notwithſtanding the Swiſſers being come vpon the territories of Tortona, where Proſper had ſignified vnto them that the Viceroy would come and ioyne with them, interpoſing many excuſes, he required them to come vpon the lands of Trebia to ioyne with him. By which maner of ſolicitation, they perceiuing the difference that was betweene his will and his words, anſwered reſolutely, That the Viceroy made not this demand to the end to go looke his enemies in the face, but to turne his backe with more ſafetie: and that it was a matter of no importance to the Swiſſers, to whom it was all one, whether he feared to fight with the French men, whether he taried ſtill, whether he marched, or whether he fled, for that they onely were ſufficient to defend the Duchie of Millan againſt all men.

But now was all the countrey in a mutinie, and the Count Muſſocquo ſonne to Iohn Iaques was got into Aſt without any impediment, and after into Alexandria; and the French men which were departed from Suſa marched with great diligence. The Duke of Millan who was come ſomewhat too late to enter Alexandria, ioyned himſelfe to the Swiſſers neare Tortona, where being giuen to vnderſtand by the Viceroy, that he was determined to go his way, they drew towards Nouaro. The inhabitants of Millan at the bruite of the departing of the Viceroy, ſent Embaſſadours to Nouaro to excuſe them to their Duke, for that hauing none to defend them, they compounded with the French men, to the end to auoide vtter ruine; who declared that he willingly accepted their excuſe, and alſo commended them for their charitable care of the ſafetie of their common countrey. Vpon this occaſion Sacromoro Viſcount to whom was appointed the beſieging of the Caſtle of Millan, turned to the French, and reuictualled the Caſtle which he was ſent to batter. The Viceroy then brake vp from Trebia with all his armie, conſiſting of twelue hundred men at armes and eight thouſand footmen, to returne to the kingdom of Naples, as though the affaires of Lombardie being deſperate, he had bene carefull onely of his ſafetie: but receiuing the ſame day in the way betweene Plaiſance and Florenzola letters from Rome, he cauſed immediatly the Enſignes to march backe againe, and came to the ſame lodging from whence he was departed. The cauſe was, that the Pope, to whom almoſt at the ſame time were rendred Plaiſance and Parma, determining to proue if the Duchie of Millan might be defended by the helpe of the Swiſſers, gaue very ſecretly to Ierome Moron the Dukes

Em-

Embaſſadour reſident in his Court, fortie thouſand duckats to ſend to the Swiſſers: but with this pretext, that if the matter came to the knowledge of others, he ſhould giue out, that twentie thouſand of them were vpon the account of their yearely penſions, and the other twentie thouſand to ſatisfie the three Cantons, who pretended the ſame to be due to them by his predeceſſor, who had alwayes refuſed to pay them. For the returning of the Viceroy to Trebia, together with a bruite of the deſcending of the new companies of Swiſſers, the Millanois repenting their great haſte, gaue hope to Maximilian Sforce, that they would be ready to returne to his obedience, whenſoeuer they ſaw the Swiſſers and the Spaniſh armie ioyne together in the field. And the more to nouriſh them in theſe hopes, the Viceroy, with whom was Proſper Colonno, raiſed a bridge vpon Po, promiſing from time to time to paſſe ouer, but neuer putting it in effect, for that hauing a ſpeciall care to ſaue his armie, he determined to proceed according to the euent of things; and held it very dangerous to haue the French men in his face, and the Venetian armie at his backe, who hauing already taken the Citie of Cremona, and caſt a bridge at Cana vpon Po, were not farre from him. Bartholomew Aluiano was gone from Suſa to Venice, fetching a great circuite: where after he had in open Councell, without any contradiction, caſt vpon the Count Petillano the fault of the ouerthrow of Giaradadda, & ſpoken very proudly of the preſent warre, he was by the Senate choſen Captaine generall of their armie, vnder the ſame conditions that the Count Petillano had obtained that degree, and haply on the very ſame day whereon foure yeares before he fell into the power of his enemies: ſo often doth fortune laugh at the ignorance of mortall men. As ſoone as he was choſen Generall, he went to the armie which was muſtering at S. Boniface vpon the territories of Verona, and Theodore Triuulce was with him as Lieutenant to the French King, with whom he approched with great diligence to the gates of Verona, the ſelfe ſame day that the French armie parted from Suſa: for that in that Citie there were ſome who had conſpired to receiue him in: but the day after, fiue hundred Lanceknights entred Verona by the riuer of Adice, and the conſpiracie being diſcouered, Aluiano hauing loſt all hope to preuaile, determined, contrary to the authoritie of the Venetian Aſſiſtant, to draw towards the riuer of Po, to ſtop the Spaniards, or according to the occurrence of things, to ioyne with the French armie: and he imparted not this deliberation to the Senate vntill he was gone from Verona one baite; for that notwithſtanding he alledged, that the euent of the whole warre depended on the ſucceſſe of the affaires of Millan, wherein if fortune ſhould be aduerſe to the French, whatſoeuer ſhould be attempted or obtained in any other place would be but in vaine and not durable, and therefore it was neceſſary by all poſſible meanes, to make the French King victorious: yet he feared (and not without cauſe) leſt the Senate would be againſt it, not ſo much for the deſire he had that there ſhould be a care had firſt to recouer Verona and Breſſia, as for that certaine other of the Captaines allowed not that they ſhould paſſe the riuer of Mincia, vnleſſe they had firſt more particular knowledge of the proceedings of the French: wherein they ſhewed, in caſe of any inconuenience, how hard it would be to retire in ſafetie, hauing to paſſe by the confines of Verona and Mantua, countries either in ſubiection or at the deuotion of Caſar. Valeggia and the towne of Peſquiero, fearing the threats of Aluiano, yeelded themſelues to him, by whoſe example alſo the Caſtle-keeper gaue vp the Rocke, receiuing a ſmall ſumme of mony, as well for himſelfe, as for certaine Lanceknights that were therein. About the ſame time certaine of the chiefe men of the Mountaine, entred into Breſſia in fauour of the Venetians with a great ſtrength of paiſants: and yet Aluiano, although he was intreated of the Breſſian Embaſſadours which came to him at Gambaro, and deſired by the Venetian Aſſiſtant, could not be brought to conſent to go thither and remaine there onely one day, to recouer the Caſtle that was kept in the name of the Viceroy, ſo great was his deſire to follow his firſt deliberation without intermiſſion. With which celeritie being come to the gates of Cremona, he found that at the ſame time Galeas Paluoiſin (called by certain of Cremona) was entred in fauour of the French King, but being vnwilling that any other ſhould participate with him in the glory of that action, he brake & ſpoiled his bands of ſoldiers, and entring the towne, ſtripped Caſar Fieramoſquo that was left there in garriſon with three hundred horſe and fiue hundred footmen by the Duke of Millan. And it behoued him not to loſe time to recouer the Caſtle, for that it had bene alwayes holden by the French King, and reuictualled a litle before by Ranſe de Cere: who (as he returned to Crema, where he was appointed Gouernour) brake a troupe of two hundred horſemen of Alexander Sforce, which he encountred at Serzana. From thence Aluiano incamping at Caua vpon Po with the bridge made to passe ouer, kept not his souldiers from doing some insolencies vpon the lands of the Pope. He went afterwards to Pisqueton, hauing already because of the mutation of Cremona, Soncino, Loda, and other places thereabouts, set vp the French Ensignes. But afore, as soone as he had recouered Cremona, he had sent Ranse de Cere to Bressia with part of the men of warre, to assure that Citie, and to recouer the Castle, but much more to hinder the good successe of the Almaines: for that almost as soone as he was retired from before Cremona, Rocandolph Captaine of the Lanceknights, and with him Federike Gonsaguo de Bossolo issuing out of Verona with sixe hundred horse and two thousand footmen, were gone to S. Boniface, where Aluiano had left vnder Sigismund Cauallo and Iohn Fortin, three hundred light horsemen and sixe hundred footmen: who being scattered in the countrey without any military discipline, hearing of the coming of the enemies, were fled to Colorgno, where the Lanceknights following them, entred the towne by force, and making them all prisoners, they sacked and burnt the towne. They did the like afterwards to Soaue, breaking downe the bridge which the Venetians had made vpon Adice: and had with the same furie gotten Vincensa, if a very great companie of paisants had not suddenly entred therein: which maner of proceeding was so much the more feared, by how much the bruite ranne, that there came to Verona new supplies of footmen out of Tyrol.

About this time the French nauie containing nine light galleys and certain other vessels, drew neare to Genes; and Anthonie and Ierome brethren of the house of the Adornes, approched by land with the fauour of those of the Riuers that held their faction, and with other bands of souldiers that had bene leuied with the Kings money: which they did, pushed on by a great occasion, by reason of a discord hapned a litle before betweene the Fiesquois and the Duke of Genes, with whom they were at first confederate against the family of the Adornes: and the matter fell out, for that either for some quarrell that hapned by chance, or for some suspition, Ierome the sonne of Iohn Lewis de Fiesquo, coming out of the publike Pallace, was slaine by Lodowike and Fregosin, the Dukes brethren: for which iniurie, Othobon and Sinibald his brethren, retiring themselues to their country-houses, and shortly after hauing contracted with the French King, and conspired with the Adornes, they approched neare to Genes by another way, accõpanied with foure thousand footmen. The Duke was not mightie enough of himselfe to make resistance against the Fiesquois and Adorneis ioyned together, neither by reason of the diligence of his aduersaries, could the succours which he had demanded of the Viceroy arriue in time: and that which wholy put him downe, was, that a thousand of his footmen, who were possessed of the mountains neare the towne, being not able to resist a greater number, were ouerthrowne; so that the Duke together with Fregosin, hauing scarce leisure to saue his owne life, fled away by sea, leauing Lodowike his other brother to guard the Castle: and the victors entred Genes, where the brethren of the family of Fiesquo, caried with a furious desire of reuenge, cruelly caused Zacharie the Dukes brother to be slaine, and after to be tied to a horse taile, and drawne through the Citie, who had bene taken in the encounter vpon the mountaines, and was present with the others at the slaughter of their brother. Thus Genes being reduced to the deuotion of the French King, Anthonie Adornei was created Gouernour in the name of the King, and the French nauie furnished the Lanterne with men and victuals, and afterwards hauing sacked Spetia, roade at Portouenere. There remained no more but Nouaro and Coma, of an absolute recouery of all those estates which the King had lost the yeare before: for these two Cities onely in all the Duchie of Millan, held as yet in the name of Maximilian Sforce.

Nouaro besieged by the French.

But the glorie of this warre was destinated, to the great infamie of all others, not to the French men, nor to the Almaine footmen, nor to the Spanish regiments, nor to the Venetian bands; but to the Swissers onely, against whom the French armie (hauing left sufficient garrison within Alexandria to assure the places beyond Po) drew neare to Nouaro, boasting of their happie successes, of the confession euen of their enemies, who had inclosed themselues within wals, and of the manifest feare of the Spaniards. Besides this, there was presented to the memory of men, as it were a certaine image and representation of things past: That this was the same Nouaro wherein Lodowike Sforce father to the present Duke had bene made prisoner: That in the French campe were the same Captaines, Monsieur Trimouille and Iohn Iaques Triuulce: and some of the same Ensignes and Captaines of those Cantons, which in another warre had sold

the father, did now accompanie the ſonne in this warre: by reaſon whereof Monſieur Trimouille had proudly written to the King, that he would ſend to him priſoner the ſonne, from the ſame place where he had deliuered into captiuitie the father. The French men violently beat vpon the walls of Nouaro with their artilleries, but in a place of no leſſe difficultie then danger to deſcend into the towne: and the Swiſſers ſeemed to haue ſo litle feare of their valour, that they would neuer ſuffer that gate of the towne that was towards the campe to be ſhut. After the artilleries had beaten to the earth a ſufficient ſpace of the wall, the armie without prepared furiouſly to the aſſault, but finding a valiant reſiſtance, and vnderſtanding they did preſently expect Altoſaſzo a Captaine of great renowne with a farre greater ſupply, they doubted of the ſucceſſe of the enterpriſe, which made them the day following to retire two miles from the wals of Nouaro, hoping afterwards to carry the victorie more by the diſorders and wants of the enemies, then by the furie of their armes. But theſe hopes were made vaine by the reſolute mind of Motin one of the Swiſſers Captaines, who calling together all the bands of ſouldiers vpon the market place of Nouaro, encouraged them with words full of reſolution, that without tarrying for the ſuccours of Altoſaſzo, who was to arriue the day following, they ſhould iſſue out and ſet vpon their enemies in their campe, and not ſuffer the glory and victory which they might appropriate to themſelues, to become common, or rather wholly transferred to others: for that as things that follow draw vnto them ſuch as go afore, and the increaſing of any thing couereth the part that is augmented; ſo the merite and praiſe of this warre would not be caſt vpon them, but vpon the ſupplies that came after. By how much (ſaid he) the enterpriſe may ſeeme more hard and perillous, by ſo much ſhall it be found more eaſie and ſure; for that the more accidents are ſudden and vnexpected, the more do they terrifie and amaze men. The French men doubt nothing leſſe at this time then to be charged by vs, and whereas they are newly incamped this very day, they cannot but ſuffer diſorder, the place being neither intrenched nor fortified. The French men were neuer wont to haue the courage to fight if they had not of our men among them; and though of late they haue aduentured to fight without vs, yet neuer againſt vs. How much will they then be aſtoniſhed when they ſhall ſee themſelues furiouſly charged vpon the ſudden, by thoſe whoſe vertue and reſolution was wont to encourage and aſſure them? Let not their horſemen and artilleries trouble you, ſince we haue had many experiences heretofore what confidence they repoſe in thoſe things againſt vs. Gaſton de Foix who was ſo braue a Captaine, notwithſtanding he was ſtrong in multitudes of lances and cannons, did not he alwayes ſuffer vs to paſſe by him along the plaines when we deſcended (two yeares ſithens) euen to the gates of Millan, we being no otherwiſe armed then with pikes? They haue now with them many bands of Lanceknights, but that doth ſo much the more encourage me, ſeeing we haue at one time an occaſion to ſhew to him who with ſo great couetouſneſſe and ingratitude hath contemned our trauels and our bloud, that he neuer made a worſe reſolution, either for himſelfe or for his Realme: and to manifeſt to thoſe that thinke the emploiment and ſeruice of their perſons to be ſufficient to make vs periſh for hunger, that the Lanceknights are not equall to the Swiſſers, and albeit they haue the ſame language and forme of diſcipline with vs, yet they haue neither the ſame valour nor the ſame reſolution. All the difficultie will be to winne their artillery, and yet this ſhall make it eaſie; that it is not planted in a place fortified; that our inuaſion is ſudden, and fauoured with the darkneſſe of the night; and aſſailing it furiouſly, it cannot endomage vs but for a very ſhort time, which yet will be interrupted by tumult, diſorder, and ſudden confuſion. Touching other things, they will be very eaſie to vs, for their horſemen dare not aduenture vpon our pikes, and much leſſe will their vile troupes of French footmen and Gaſcons enter skirmiſh with vs: ſo that taking ſuch a deliberation, we ſhall make no leſſe proofe of our wiſedomes then of our valour. Our nation is of ſuch reputation, that the glorie of our name cannot be preſerued but by attempting ſome matter beyond the common expectation and vſage of all men: and ſince we are about Nouaro, the place it ſelfe admoniſheth vs, that we can in no other ſort quench the ancient infamie we got here in the pay of Lodowike Sforce. Let vs proceed then in the name of the great God, the perſecutor of ſchiſmatikes, excommunicate perſons, and the enemies to his name: let vs march on to a victorie no leſſe eaſie then aſſured (if we ſhew our ſelues men,) whereby our name ſhall be made ſo much the more great and glorious, by how much the danger ſeemeth more euident: and by how much our enemies doe exceede vs in number, by ſo much the more ſhall we

we be enriched by their ſpoiles. At theſe ſpeeches of Motin all the bands of ſouldiers began to giue a great ſhout, euery one approuing his deuice by holding vp their hands: and then, aſſuring them of the victory, he commanded them to go to reſt, and to prepare themſelues to fall into array when the drum ſhould ſtrike. The nation of Swiſſers neuer made a more braue or more reſolute deliberation, being but a few againſt many, without horſemen, and without artilleries, againſt an armie well furniſhed and moſt mightie in that kind: and withall being not puſhed forward by any neceſſitie, for ỹ Nouare was deliuered frō danger, and they expected the day after a great ſtrength of ſouldiers. They rather choſe this way, wherein the ſuretie was leſſe and the hope of glory greater; then that, wherein for greater ſafetie there might happen to them leſſe glorie. Therfore the ſixt day of Iune after midnight they iſſued out of Nouare with great furie, being in number about ten thouſand men, who were ſo diſtributed and diſpoſed, that ſeuen thouſand were appointed to charge the artillerie, about which the Lanceknights were lodged, & ỹ reſidue were to be beſtowed with their pikes aduāced againſt the men at armes. The French men, for the ſhortneſſe of the time, and becauſe they doubted not that ſuch an accident ſhould befall them ſo ſoone, had made no fortification of their campe: and at the firſt tumult and alarme that the ſentinels made of the coming of the enemies, the ſuddenneſſe of the aduenture, and the darkneſſe of the night, increaſed much their feare and confuſion; yet the men at armes drew forthwith into ſtrength, and preſented themſelues in battel-ray, and the Lanceknights who were followed with the other bands of footmen, fell preſently into order. Now the artillery ſhot off with great noiſe againſt the Swiſſers that came to aſſaile it, and endomaged them much, ſtrewing the place with many of them, which was rather knowne by the crying & howling of men then by the benefite of the eyes, the vſe whereof was taken away by the darkneſſe of the night: and yet with a deſperate reſolution, deſpiſing preſent death, and nothing diſcouraged with the fortune of thoſe that lay ſlaine at their feete, nor once breaking their order for all this, they ranne as faſt as they could vpon the artillerie: and being come to it, the Lanceknights and they encountred together with a maruellous furie, the one fighting againſt the other with great rage, and much more for hatred and the deſire of glorie. There might haue bene ſeene (for now the Sunne began to ſhew) ſometimes one ſide to yeeld, ſometimes the other: oftentimes that part to ſeeme to preuaile which earſt was thought to haue the worſt: on the ſame ſide, and at the ſame time, the one battell to ſway, and the other to aduance; one part to inuade their enemies furiouſly, & the other to reſiſt hardly; all things on all ſides full of dead bodies, wounded men, and bloud: ſometimes the Captaines would valiantly performe the office of ſouldiers, both charging their enemies and defending themſelues and theirs, and ſometimes they would diſcreetly manage the place of Captaines, encouraging, prouiding, ſuccouring, relieuing, and commanding. On the other ſide, where the men of armes ſtood, they were very calme, without doing any thing; for that the authority, the perſwaſions, the commandements, the prayers, the exclamations, and threatnings of Triuulce and Trimouille, preuailing nothing with the horſemen, whoſe minds were already made timorous, they had not the courage to charge their enemies that were before them: & it ſufficed the Swiſſers to keep them impaled in their ranks, to the end they ſhould not ſuccour their footmen. At laſt in ſo great a hardineſſe and valour of ſuch as fought, the vertue of the Swiſſers preuailed, who hauing victoriouſly wonne the artilleries, turned them vpon their enemies, whom they put to flight as well by that meanes as by their owne valour. To the flying of the footmen was ioyned the running away of the men at armes, who ſhewed no valour, nor did any thing worthy of praiſe. Only the Lord Robert la March carried with the vehement affection of a father, entred the battell of the Swiſſers with a ſquadron of horſemen, to reſcue Florango and Iames his ſonnes, Captaines of the Lanceknights, who lay ſore wounded on the earth, and fought with ſuch furie, that the Swiſſers themſelues maruelled much that he could draw them aliue out of that danger. The battell continued about two houres, to the great hurt of both the parties. There was ſlaine of the Swiſſers about fifteene hundred bodies, amongſt whom was Captaine Motin, the firſt mouer of that ſo glorious a counſell, who fighting valiantly, was thruſt through the throate with a pike. But farre greater was the ſlaughter of the enemies, of whom ſome ſay were left dead ten thouſand carkaſſes: the moſt part of the Lanceknights died in fighting, and the greateſt ſlaughter of the French and Gaſcon footmen, was in flying. Almoſt all the horſemen went away in ſafetie, the Swiſſers being not able to follow them, who if they had had horſemen, might haue broken them eaſily,

The deſcriptiō of a furious conflict.

eaſily, retiring as they did in great feare. All the baggage became a prey to the victors, with two and twentie peeces of great artillerie, and all the horſes aſſigned for the ſeruice of the ſame. The victors returned the ſame day into Nouaro almoſt triumphantly, and with ſuch renowne through the world, that in reſpect of the magnanimitie of their enterpriſe, the euident deſpiſing of death, the reſolution they ſhewed in the fight, and the happie ſucceſſe of the ſame, there were many that durſt preferre this action, afore almoſt all the memorable things which we reade to haue bene done by the Greekes and Romanes. The French men fled into Piemont, from whence (Triuulce loſing time to crie after them) they paſſed ſpeedily into France.

The victorie obtained, Millan with the other places that were declared for the French, ſent to demand pardon, which was granted them, vpon condition to diſburſe a great ſumme of money: the inhabitants of Millan two hundred thouſand duckats, and the reſidue euery one according to his abilitie: all giuen to the Swiſſers, to whom was rightly due, as wel the gain as the glorie gotten with their valour and with their bloud: and who, to draw all the fruit afterwards into the Marquiſdome of Montferrat and into Piemont, charged [illegible] aue receiued the French army: and there, partly by pillage, and partly by [illegible] ople (yet without attempting any thing againſt the life and honour of [illegible] h. The Spaniards alſo were not altogether depriued of the profits of the victo[illegible] or Ianus lately chaſed out of Genes, and Octauian Fregoſo (both which aſpired to be Duke) being retired to the Viceroy after the battell, the Viceroy preferring Octauian, for whom the Pope did what he could in regard of their ancient amitie, and withall receiuing his promiſe to pay him fiftie thouſand duckats when he ſhould be poſſeſſed of Genes, he deliuered him three thouſand footmen vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero, and for his owne part, he went with the reſidue of the armie to Chieſteggio, making ſemblance to paſſe further if need required. But as the Marquis and Octauian drew neare to Genes, the brethren of the family of Adorno, knowing their owne weakneſſe, went their way; and Octauian entring in, was created Duke of that Citie, which in the courſe of a yeare had for gouernours the French men, Ianus Fregoſo, the Adorneis, and Octauian. Bartlemew Aluiano hearing of the ouerthrow giuen to the French army, feared leſt he ſhould be preſently followed by the Spaniards, and retired in all haſte to Pontuiquo, leauing in the way (for loſing of time) certaine peeces of artillery, which could not ſo ſuddenly march. From Pontuiquo when he had left Ranſe de Cere in Crema, and abandoned Breſſia, for that it was not profitable to diminiſh the army, wherein were remaining ſixe hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, marching with the ſame celeritie, and with ſo great feare and diſfauour of the country, that if but a ſmall company had followed them, they would of themſelues haue fallen into diſorder; he went to Tomba, neare to Adice, neuer ſtaying in any place longer then the neceſſitie to refreſh his men and horſes conſtrained him. When he ſaw the feare ouerpaſſed, ſince no man followed him, he ſtayd at Tomba, and there he gaue order to conuey to Padua and to Treuiſa the greateſt prouiſion of victuals that he could draw from the territories of Verona: and at the ſame time he ſent Iohn Paul Baillon to Legnagno with threeſcore men at armes, and twelue hundred footmen, who being immediatly receiued by the inhabitants of the towne where was no garriſon, he gaue aſſault to the Rock which was guarded by an hundred and fiftie footmen, part Spaniſh and part Lanceknights, hauing firſt battered it with the artillery on that ſide that is towards the market place: in which aſſault, I know not which had more force, either valour or fortune, for that during the fight, the fire by aduenture faſtening vpon the munitions, by meanes of certaine inſtruments of artificiall fires throwne by thoſe that were without, part of the Rocke was burned: and in this tumult the footmen that gaue the aſſault being entred ſome at the breach, and ſome by ladders, tooke their Captaine who was a Spaniard, and killed and tooke priſoners all the reſidue that were therein. Legnagno being taken, Aluiano cauſed to build a bridge vpon Adice, and afterwards certaine inhabitants of Verona giuing him hope that they would mutine againſt the Almaines, he went to incampe at the village of S. Iohn, which is foure miles from Verona; and from whence the morning following, approching neare to the gate called S. Maximo, he planted his artilleries with great furie againſt the tower of the gate and the wall ioyning to it, expecting in the meane while if there would riſe any tumult in the towne: and after he had brought to the earth about fortie fadomes of the wall, beſides the tower, which fell in ſuch ſort, that the ruines ſerued for a very ſtrong rampier to the gate, he gaue a very furious aſſault. But there were within Verona

The battell continued about two houres, to the great hurt of both the parties. There was ſlaine of the Swiſſers about fifteene hundred bodies, amongſt whom was Captaine Motin, the firſt mouer of that ſo glorious a counſell, who fighting valiantly, was thruſt through the throate with a pike. But farre greater was the ſlaughter of the enemies, of whom ſome ſay were left dead ten thouſand carkaſſes: the moſt part of the Lanceknights died in fighting, and the greateſt ſlaughter of the French and Gaſcon footmen, was in flying. Almoſt all the horſemen went away in ſafetie, the Swiſſers being not able to follow them, who if they had had horſemen, might haue broken them eaſily, easily,retiring as they did in great feare. All the baggage became a prey to the victors, with two and twentie peeces of great artillerie, and all the horses assigned for the seruice of the same. The victors returned the same day into Nouaro almost triumphantly, and with such renowne through the world, that in respect of the magnanimitie of their enterprise, the euident despising of death, the resolution they shewed in the fight, and the happie successe of the same,there were many that durst preferre this action, afore almost all the memorable things which we reade to haue bene done by the Greekes and Romanes. The French men fled into Piemont, from whence (Triuulce losing time to crie after them) they passed speedily into France.

The deſcriptiō of a furious conflict.

The victorie obtained, Millan with the other places that were declared for the French, sent to demand pardon, which was granted them, vpon condition to disburse a great summe of money: the inhabitants of Millan two hundred thousand duckats, and the residue euery one according to his abilitie,to be all giuen to the Swissers,to whom was rightly due,as wel the gain as the glorie of the victorie, gotten with their valour and with their bloud: and who, to draw all the fruite they could,entred afterwards into the Marquisdome of Montferrat and into Piemont, charging those countries to haue receiued the French army: and there, partly by pillage, and partly by ransoming the poore people (yet without attempting any thing against the life and honour of any) they got much. The Spaniards also were not altogether depriued of the profits of the victorie, for that Ianus lately chased out of Genes, and Octauian Fregoso (both which aspired to be Duke) being retired to the Viceroy after the battell, the Viceroy preferring Octauian, for whom the Pope did what he could in regard of their ancient amitie, and withall receiuing his promise to pay him fiftie thousand duckats when he should be possessed of Genes, he deliuered him three thousand footmen vnder the Marquis of Pesquiero, and for his owne part,he went with the residue of the armie to Chiesteggio, making semblance to passe further if need required. But as the Marquis and Octauian drew neare to Genes, the brethren of the family of Adorno,knowing their owne weakenesse, went their way; and Octauian entring in,was created Duke of that Citie, which in the course of a yeare had for gouernours the French men, Ianus Fregoso,the Adorneis, and Octauian. Bartlemew Aluiano hearing of the ouerthrow giuen to the French army,feared lest he should be presently followed by the Spaniards,and retired in all haste to Pontuiquo, leauing in the way (for losing of time) certaine peeces of artillery, which could not so suddenly march.From Pontuiquo when he had left Ranse de Cere in Crema,and abandoned Bressia, for that it was not profitable to diminish the army, wherein were remaining sixe hundred men at armes,a thousand light horsemen, and fiue thousand footmen, marching with the same celeritie,and with so great feare and disfauour of the country, that if but a small company had followed them, they would of themselues haue fallen into disorder; he went to Tomba,neare to Adice, neuer staying in any place longer then the necessitie to refresh his men and horses constrained him.When he saw the feare ouerpassed,since no man followed him,he stayd at Tomba, and there he gaue order to conuey to Padua and to Treuisa the greatest prouision of victuals that he could draw from the territories of Verona: and at the same time he sent Iohn Paul Baillon to Legnaguo with threescore men at armes, and twelue hundred footmen, who being immediatly receiued by the inhabitants of the towne where was no garrison,he gaue assault to the Rock which was guarded by an hundred and fiftie footmen, part Spanish and part Lanceknights, hauing first battered it with the artillery on that side that is towards the market place: in which assault,I know not which had more force,either valour or fortune, for that during the fight, the fire by aduenture fastening vpon the munitions, by meanes of certaine instruments of artificiall fires throwne by those that were without, part of the Rocke was burned: and in this tumult the footmen that gaue the assault being entred some at the breach, and some by ladders, tooke their Captaine who was a Spaniard, and killed and tooke prisoners all the residue that were therein. Legnaguo being taken, Aluiano caused to build a bridge vpon Adice, and afterwards certaine inhabitants of Verona giuing him hope that they would mutine against the Almaines, he went to incampe at the village of S. Iohn,which is foure miles from Verona; and from whence the morning following,approching neare to the gate called S. Maximo, he planted his artilleries with great furie against the tower of the gate and the wall ioyning to it, expecting in the meane while if there would rise any tumult in the towne: and after he had brought to the earth about fortie fadomes of the wall, besides the tower, which fell in such sort, that the ruines serued for a very strong rampier to the gate, he gaue a very furious assault. But there were within Verona

three hundred horſemen and three thouſand Lanceknights vnder Roccandolph a Captaine much eſteemed, who defended themſelues valiantly, beſides that the breach that was made in the wall, was a good height frō the gound within; and they of Verona ſtirred not, according to the hopes that were giuen: ſo that Aluiano perceiuing the difficultie to take it, retired his footmen from the wals, and had already begun to withdraw the artillery, when changing counſel in a moment, as was ſuppoſed, by a certaine meſſage which he receiued from the towne, he cauſed his footmen to returne to the walls, and recontinued the aſſault with a greater fury then before. But he found ſtill the ſame difficulties, and thoſe that had called him ſo ſlow and remiſſe, that hauing loſt at the aſſault more then two hundred of his people, amongſt whom was Thomas Fabro of Rauenna, Marſhall of his footmen, he began to deſpaire wholly of the victory, and retiring his artillery with great diligence, he returned the ſame day to the lodging from whence he was departed in the morning, hauing gained no credit that day, either for his counſell, or the iſſue thereof, but his great diligence was much praiſed throughout all Italy, for that in one day he had done that, which hardly other Captaines are wont to do in three or foure dayes. After this he ſpoiled the country, aſſaying if by that feare he could conſtraine the inhabitants of Verona to come to accord. But the Spaniſh army being now come on, for that the Viceroy after he heard of the loſſe of Legnago, fearing leſt by the ill diſpoſition of the townesmen Verona would ſet open her gates to the Venetians, determined to giue preſent ſuccours to the affaires of Cæſar, hauing now no impediment, ſith the affaires of Genes had happily ſucceeded. Therefore after he had paſſed without difficultie the riuer of Po at Stradella, and that the Cities of Bergamo and Breſſia were rendred to him without reſiſtance, together with the towne of Peſquiero, he incamped before the Caſtle, that was manned with two hundred and fiftie footmen: the which although the common opinion was, that it might haue holden out yet certaine dayes, came by force into his power, the Venetian Ruler being made priſoner, and all the reſidue of the ſouldiers that were not ſlaine at the aſſault. Becauſe of the approch of the Spaniards, Aluiano retired to Alberè on the other ſide of Adice, and called to refurniſh his army as much as he could, not only certaine bands of footmen which were at Poleſina de Rouigna, but thoſe alſo whom he had left within Legnago: and a litle after the Lanceknights being ioyned at S. Martin with the Viceroy, alſo after the recouery of Legnago went to Montagnana, the Venetians who held no more in that quarter but Padua and Treuiſa, caring for no other thing then the preſeruation of thoſe Cities, ordained that the army ſhould be diſtributed in them, and that Iohn Paul Baillon, with whom were Malateſta de Sogliano and the Knight de la Volpe, ſhould be beſtowed in Treuiſa with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen, Aluiano remaining in Padua with the reſidue of the army: who taking care to fortifie it, by repairing the baſtillions, and giuing perfection to many things that were vnperfect, cauſed likwiſe to raze all the houſes, and cut downe all the trees that were within three miles about Padua, to make more hard & dangerous the approch of the enemies, and to cauſe them to haue need of many pioners.

The Pope ſeeks to appeaſe the King.

But whileſt that matters of warre proceeded in this ſort, the Pope trauailed with great induſtrie to weed out of the Church the diuiſion brought in by the Councell of Piſa: which matter depending wholly vpon the will of the French King, he laboured to appeaſe him by many meanes, aſſuring him that the rumor that ranne that he had ſent money to the Swiſſers, was a falſe bruite, and declaring that he deſired nothing more then an vniuerſall peace, and to be the common father to all Chriſtian Princes: That he was very ſory that his diſſention with the Church, depriued him of all meanes to know how naturally he was inclined to his amitie; ſeeing that for the honour of the Sea Apoſtolike, and of owne his perſon, he was conſtrained to proceed with him ſeuerally, vntill by his returning to the obedience of the Church of Rome, it were lawfull for him to receiue him as King Moſt Chriſtian, and to embrace him as the eldeſt ſonne of the Church. The King in regard of his owne affaires, deſired the vnion of his kingdome with the Church, the ſame being alſo inſtantly demanded by all his peoples and all his Court, whereunto alſo he was much incited by the Queene; and he knew alſo that there could be no hope of alliance with the Pope in matters temporall, if firſt there were not agreement for controuerſies ſpirituall. For this cauſe, either truſting indeed, or ſeeming to giue faith to his words, he ſent to him as Embaſſadour to negociate in theſe cauſes, the Biſhop of Marſeilles: at whoſe coming, the Pope by decree of the Councell, reinueſted the Biſhops and Prelates of France, againſt whom his predeceſſor proceeded rigorouſly by way of excommunication, as againſt ſchiſſchiſmatikes, with power to purge themſelues of their contumacie, during the whole moneth of Nouember: and the ſame morning wherein it was thus determined, there was read in the Councell a writing ſubſcribed by Bernardin Caruagial and Federike de S. Seuerin, wherein forbearing to name themſelues Cardinals, they approued all the acts of the Councell of Latran, promiſing to cleaue to the ſame, and to obey the Pope: wherein conſequently they confeſſed themſelues to be lawfully depriued of the eſtate of Cardinals; which priuation being done by Pope Iulio, had bene in his life time confirmed by the ſame Councell. It had bene debated afore to haue them reſtored, but it was afterwards deferred for the impediment of the Embaſſadours of Ceſar and the King of Aragon, together with the Cardinals of Sion and Yorke, who alledged, that it was a matter vnworthy the maieſty of the ſea Apoſtolike, and of very ill example, to pardon the authors of ſo great a ſcandal, and ſo pernicious a treſpaſſe, full of ſo manifeſt abhomination; a matter which the laſt Pope had conſtantly maintained againſt them, euen to the laſt moment of his life, and that for no other cauſe then for the publike good. But the Pope inclined to that ſide that was leaſt rigorous, iudging it more eaſie vtterly to quench the name of the Councell of Piſa, with clemencie then with ſeueritie: & withall, he would not prouoke the mind of the French King, who was a diligent interceſſor for them: neither was he carried againſt them by any particular hatred, for as much as the iniury was not done to him; but before his Pontificacie he and his brethren had bene great friends to Federike: for which reaſons, of his owne motion he cauſed to be read before the fathers of the Councel, the writing of their humiliation, and aſſigned a day for their reſtoring, which was done in this maner: Bernardin and Federike entred ſecretly into Rome by night, without either habite or note of Cardinals, and the morning following being to preſent themſelues before the Pope ſitting in full Conſiſtory, accompanied with all the Cardinals, except the Swiſſer and the Engliſh, who refuſed to be preſent: they firſt paſſed apparelled as ſimple Prieſts, with blacke bonnets on their heads through all the publike places of the Pallace of Vatican, where they had lodged: a great multitude of people flocking to ſee them, and euery one affirming that ſo publike an ignominie might ſerue as a cruell torment for the vnmeaſurable pride of Bernardin, and no leſſe arrogance of Federike. When they were admitted into the Conſiſtory, they fell downe on their knees, and with many ſignes of great humilitie demanded pardon of the Pope and the Cardinals, approuing all things that had bene done by Pope Iulio, and namely their priuation, and the election of the new Pope, as canonically done; reprouing the conuenticle of Piſa, as ſchiſmaticall and deteſtable. When this confeſſion was ſolemnly enregiſtred and ſubſigned with their hands, they roſe vp and ſtood on their feete, and after reuerence done, they embraced all the Cardinals, who ſtirred not out of their ſeates; and afterwards being apparelled in the habite of Cardinals, were receiued by the reſidue to ſit in the ſame order wherein they were wont to ſit before their priuation. They recouered onely by this act the dignitie of Cardinals, and not the benefices and other reuenues which they were wont to hold, for that long time before they had bene diſtributed to others, as vacant. In this act the Pope ſatisfied the French King, if not fully, yet at leaſt in part: but he ſatisfied him not in other matters, for that he ſought by all the wayes he could to accord Ceſar and the Venetians; which he thought he might eaſily obtaine, by reaſon of the accidents that happened. For he beleeued that Ceſar prouoked by the occaſions beyond the Mounts, would be content to hearken thereto, the more eaſily to recouer Burgundie for his Nephew: and much more the Venetians, as well for that they ſtood amazed with the ouerthrow of the French, as for that they knew the French King (many dangers hanging ouer his Realme) could not for that yeare thinke any more of the affaires of Italy: and likewiſe they ſaw the Spaniſh army neare them, whereunto were to be vnited the companies that were within Verona: they were drained of money, ill furniſhed of ſouldiers, and namely of footmen: and alone were to beare the whole brunt of the warre, without any hope or ſhew of other ſuccours: and yet the Senate anſwered very conſtantly, that they would not hearken to any accord, vnleſſe Vincenſa and Verona were reſtored to them.

Humilitie of two Cardinals

Ceſar at that time demanded of the Pope two hundred men at armes againſt the Venetians: which demand though it was grieuous to the Pope, for feare leſt the French King ſhould be diſcontented, and for that he held it inconuenient for Ceſar and him to become ſuſpected to the Venetians for a matter of ſo ſmall importance: Ceſar notwithſtanding perſeuering obſtinately in his demand, he ſent him vnder Troilo Sauello, Achilles, Torello, and Mutio Colonne, the numbers he required, for that he would not (by refuſing) ſhew any token of vnwillingneſſe to perſeuer in the confederation contracted with the laſt Pope; and for that he thought himſelfe not reſtrained by any obligation that he had with the Venetians: who, beſides that their armie had behaued themſelues almoſt in hoſtile maner vpō the lands of Parma and Plaiſance at ſuch time as Aluiano lay neare Cremona, had not elected Embaſſadours to proteſt their obedience to him according to the ancient cuſtome, vntill the French men being ouerthrowne, were returned out of Italy. This deliberation brought no litle amaze to the Venetians, not ſo much for the importance of ſuch a ſuccor, as for feare leſt by this beginning the Pope would paſſe further: and they tooke this likewiſe for a manifeſt ſigne that he would neuer be ſeparate from their enemies. Neuertheleſſe they changed not their firſt counſels, but ſtanding reſolute to make as good head as they could againſt fortune, they ſent commandement to their Admirall that was at Corfu, that aſſembling as many veſſels as he could, he ſhould aſſaile the marine places of Powilla; although a litle after, conſidering of what importance it would be to prouoke ſo much the King of Aragon, they reuoked that counſell, as more couragious then diſcreet, as well for the power of that King, as for that he had alwayes made ſhew that he perſwaded Ceſar to peace. The Viceroy remained at Montagnana, not hauing as yet determined what to doe, for as much as the conceptions of the Lanceknights were great, and the enterpriſes that remained to be attempted either of Padua or of Treuiſa very hard, and the forces farre inferiour to the difficulties: for in the whole army there was not aboue a thouſand men at armes, not many light horſemen, and ten thouſand footmen, as well Spaniards as Lanceknights: and alſo there was expectation of the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci, vpon whoſe will all depended. At this time a Spaniſh magiſtrate being in Bergamo to gather the impoſt of fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, taxed vpon that Citie at ſuch time as it was rendred to the Viceroy, Ranſe de Cere ſent thither from Crema part of his ſouldiers, who entring by night by the helpe of ſome of the towne, tooke the Spaniard with all the money he had leuied, and returned afterward to Crema. There was diſcerned about this time a preparation of new troubles in the ſtate of Genes, conformable to the wils of the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers, to whom Anthonie and Ierome Adorno had recourſe, declaring to the Duke the offices and kindneſſes which had paſſed betweene their fathers and Lodowik his father: That by the aide of their family he had recouered and many yeares holden in peace the principalitie of Genes, of the which he had bene fraudulently depriued by the Dukes Fregoſes: and that the Adorneis had participated with the aduerſe fortunes of the Sforces, for that at the ſame time that Lodowike loſt the Duchie of Millan, the Adorneys were chaſed out of Genes: and therefore it was conuenient that they ſhould likewiſe communicate in his good fortune, ſeeing the ſame affection & the ſame faith continued: and that they ought not to be charged by imputation, if being not ſo much as heard in any place, but abandoned of all hope, their neceſſitie had driuen them againſt their will, to haue recourſe to that King, by whom they had bene chaſed and expulſed before: That on the other ſide, he was to remember the ancient hatred of the Fregoſes, how many iniuries and practiſes had bene wrought againſt his father by Baptiſta and the Cardinall Fregoſa, who were Dukes of Genes ſucceſſiuely; and to conſider how he might truſt Octauian Fregoſa, who, beſides his ancient hatred, refuſed to haue a ſuperiour in that Citie. To the Swiſſers they propoſed the profite, the ſuretie and the honour they might reape hereby: That if by their meanes they were reſtored to their countrey, they would pay a ſumme of money equall to that which Octauian Fregoſa payed to the Spaniards: That by their vertue the Duchie of Millan had bene preſerued, and to them appertained the protection and defence thereof: and that therefore they ſhould conſider how much it would be contrary to the ſuretie of that ſtate, that Genes a citie of ſo neare neighborhood and ſo great importance, ſhould obey a Duke that depended wholly vpon the King of Aragon: and that it were an action very vnworthy their name and glory, to ſuffer Genes (the fruite of the victory of Nouaro) to fall to the profit of the Spaniards, who, whileſt the Swiſſers went with ſo great valour to expoſe themſelues againſt the thundring ſhot of the French, whileſt that (to expreſſe it better) the Swiſſers ranne vpon death, ſate ſtill at their eaſe, without doing any thing vpon the territory of Trebia, watching as it were the iſſue of the battell, either ſhamefully to flie, or fraudulently to ſteale the rewards of the victory gotten with the bloud of others. Theſe reaſons then inflaming them, the Duke cauſed his companies to march, and the Swiſſers aduanced foure thouſand footmen: but the threats of the Viceroy againſt the Duke, and the authoritie of the Pope, who tooke greatly to heart the af-affaires of Octauian, were the cauſe that they gaue ouer preſently. In this meane while the Viceroy went vp to Battallia, a place about ſeuen miles from Padua, where Caruagial riding vp and downe vndiſcreetly with a ſmall ſtrength of horſemen to view the ſituation of the countrey, was taken by Mercurio Captaine of the Venetian light horſemen. At which time the Biſhop of Gurci ariuing in the army, they drew to conſultation what was to be done: & the Biſhop gaue counſel to beſiege Padua, ſaying, he hoped ſo much in the vertue of the Spaniards and Lanceknights againſt the Italians, that in the end they ſhould ouercome all difficulties: That it was a matter of leſſe labour to take Treuiſa, but the reward of the victory was farre different; for that to win Treuiſa onely, was of litle importance for the ſubſtance of the warre, but by the taking of Padua, the townes of Cæſars obedience ſhould ſtand fully aſſured from the troubles and dangers of the warre, and the Venetians ſhould be depriued of all hope to be euer able to recouer the places they had loſt. The Viceroy and almoſt all the other Captaines were of a contrary opinion: iudging it rather impoſſible then hard, to force Padua, by reaſon of the incredible fortificatiõs, it being throughly ſtored with artilleries and all things neceſſary for defence, & abundantly furniſhed with ſouldiers, many yong men of the Nobilitie of Venice being come thither, as they had done at other times. They alledged that the circuite of Padua was large, in which regard, as alſo for the multitude of the defendants and other difficulties, it required to be enuironed with a ſiege of two armies: which they were ſo farre from, that they were not able to make one ſufficient, the number of their ſouldiers being not great, of whom the Lanceknights, who murmured already for their pay, ſhewed themſelues not very forward: That they were not furniſhed with munitions, and wanted pioners, a prouiſion very neceſſary for an enterpriſe of that difficultie. But in the end the reaſons of the Viceroy and the other Captaines gaue place to the will of the Biſhop of Gurci, according to which the army drawing neare to Padua, incamped at Baſſanella vpon the right ſhore of the channell, within a mile and a halfe of Padua, in which place being much endomaged by certaine double cannons that lay planted vpon a baſtillion of the towne, they paſſed the channell, and lodged a litle further from the towne, from whence ſending certaine bands of footmen to S. Anthonies Church within halfe a mile of Padua, they began to approch with leſſe danger, and to caſt trenches neare to S. Anthonies gate: but the labor was great, and the want of pioners no leſſe, in a countrey abandoned of all inhabitants. Therefore the worke aduanced litle, and not without danger, for that the ſouldiers making many ſudden ſallies as well by day as by night, did great domage to thoſe that laboured. They ſuffered alſo great want of victuals, for that onely a ſmall part of the towne being enuironed by the enemies, the eſtradiots that had libertie to iſſue out of the other quarters of the towne, ouerrunning freely the whole countrey, gaue impediment to all that was brought to the campe; certaine armed barks which the Venetians had ſet for that purpoſe vpon the riuer of Adice doing the like, for that the men that they carried, ceaſſed not to make incurſions in all the plaine countrey, now in one part, and then in another. In regard of theſe difficulties, the eſtate of things being eftſoones brought into conſultation by the Viceroy, all men were of opinion, that it would be a leſſe infamy to correct the deliberation vndiſcreetly made, in leuying the campe, then by perſiſting in their error, to be the cauſe of ſome great domage that might happen, which would be accompanied with great ſhame. Which opinion being related to the Biſhop of Gurci by the Viceroy in the preſence of many Captaines, for that he had refuſed to be preſent at the Councell, he made anſwer, That the diſcipline of warre being not his profeſſion, it was no ſhame for him to confeſſe his ignorance in the affaires of warre: and that touching the counſell he had giuen to beſiege Padua, he had not ſo much followed his owne iudgement in that deliberation, as the authoritie of the Viceroy, who both by letters and expreſſe meſſengers had perſwaded the Emperour thereunto, and giuen him great hope to be able to carry it. At laſt the difficulties not ceaſſing, neither for their complaints nor for their debating, but rather the deſpaire to be able to take Padua dayly increaſing, the campe brake vp, after it had lien eighteen dayes afore the wals of Padua: and hauing both at their breaking vp, and vpon the way, the light horſemen art their backs, they withdrew themſelues to Vincenſa, which then was voide of inhabitants, and lay as a prey to who was maiſter of the field. In this meane while the ſouldiers of the Duke of Millan, to whoſe aide the Viceroy had ſent Anthonie de Leua with a thouſand footmen, tooke Pontuiquo, wherein were two hundred footmen in garriſon for the Venetians, who, neither amazed with the thunder of the artilleries, nor diſcouraged with the mines that were made, were conſtrained at the end of a moneth to yeeld for want of victuals, after they had valiantly ſuſtained the aſſault. About the ſame time Ranſe de Cere iſſuing out of Crema, ouerthrew Siluio Sauello, marching with his bands and foure hundred Spaniſh footmen to Bergamo, whither the Duke of Millan ſent him: and a litle after a Spaniſh officer being returned to Bergamo to gather money, Ranſe ſent thither three hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, who tooke both the officer and the Rocke whereunto he was fled for ſafetie with the money he had receiued: in which Rocke were very few men of warre, by reaſon whereof threeſcore men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and ſeuen hundred footmen, with two thouſand paiſants of the mount of Brianſo, went from Millan vnder the leading of Siluio Sauello and Cæſar Fieramoſquo, to recouer Bergamo: who encountring vpon the way fiue hundred light horſmen and three hundred footmen, ſent by Ranſe to Bergamo, were eaſily put to flight; by whoſe example the reſidue that afore had occupied Bergamo abandoned it, leauing onely a garriſon in the Rocke, which ſtandeth out of the Citie vpon the mountaine called Cappello.

The Viceroy and the Biſhop of Gurci ſoiourned certaine dayes at Vincenſa, and ſent part of the Spaniards vnder Proſper Colonno to ſack Baſciano and Maroſtique: not that they had offended, but that with the ſubſtances of thoſe wretched people they might nouriſh the army as well as they could, wherein the payes did faile, for that Cæſar was alwayes preſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties, the King of Aragon was not able alone to ſuſtaine ſo great a burden, and the Duchie of Millan being exceſſiuely taxed by the Swiſſers, could not contribute to the reliefe of others. The army abode at Vincenſa, with great diſcommodities, by reaſon of the continuall vexations of the light horſemen, who ouerrunning day and night the whole countrey, ſtopped all traffike and paſſage of victuals, vnleſſe they were guarded with a great ſtrength, and that of neceſſitie muſt be of men at armes, for that they had but a very few light horſemen: and therfore to be out of this torment, the Biſhop of Gurci went to Verona with the Lanceknights, very much diſcontented with the Viceroy, who following him by ſmall iourneys, got into Albero vpon the riuer of Adice, where he remained certaine dayes to giue oportunitie to them of Verona to gather their vintage and their harueſt, the incurſions of the light horſemen not ceaſſing for all that, who tooke from the Almaines euen neare the gates of Verona, the oxen that drew the artilleries. The Viceroy had layed a former plot to beſtow the army in garriſon in the countries of Breſſia and Bergamaſqua, and at the ſame time to moleſt Crema, which was all that the Venetians held on the other ſide the riuer of Mincia: and that deuice being publiſhed, had made the countries thereabouts ſo ſecure, that the territories of Padua were ful of inhabitants and goods, which was the cauſe that the Viceroy, who had no other meanes to feed his army then by preys and pillage, altering his plot, and calling back the Almains, went to Montagnana and to Eſte, and from thence to the village of Bouolento, where after he had driuen away great flockes of cattell, the ſouldiers conſumed with fire many faire houſes that ſtood thereabout. From Bouolento the deſire of pillage carrying them on, and taking courage for that the Venetian footmen were diſtributed to the guard of Padua and Treuiſa, the Viceroy determined to approch Venice, but againſt the opinion of Proſper Colonno, who told him, it was both raſh and dangerous. Therefore after they had paſſed the riuer of Bacquillon, and ſacked Pieue de Sacco, which is a borough very populous, and full of all things, they went to Meſtro, and ſo to Marguera, which ſtandeth vpon the ſalt waters: from whence, to leaue a more honorable memory of this expedition, they diſcharged towards Venice ten peeces of great artillery, whoſe bullets pierced the Monaſtery of S. Secondo; and at the ſame time they pilled and ſpoiled all the countrey, whoſe inhabitants were fled, moſt impiouſly making warres againſt the wals: for, not content with the rich preys of cattell and other wealth, in their crueltie they burned Meſtra, Marguera, and Liſſafuſina, together with all the other townes and villages of the countrey, not ſparing any houſe or pallace which had any beautie or extraordinary apparence. In theſe inſolencies, the impietie of the Popes ſouldiers and the other Italians, was not the leaſt, but ſo much the greater by how much it was more infamous in them then in the forreiners, to vſe crueltie againſt the magnificence and ornaments of their common countrey. But they of Venice diſcerning within their towne the ſmoke by day, and by night the fire through the whole countrey, and hearing within their houſes the noiſe of the artillery of the enemies, which was planted for no other purpoſe then to increaſe their ignominie, were touched in their minds with great indignation and ſorrow, ſuch a change of fortune ſeeming to euery one hard and grieuous, that in ſtead of ſo great glorie and ſo many victories formerly obtained tained in Italy and out of Italy both by ſea and land, their eyes ſhould then behold a ſmall army, in compariſon of their ancient force and power, ſo boldly and contumeliouſly to offer ſuch a brauado to the name of ſo glorious a Commonweale. In regard of which indignities, the deliberations of that Senate being inforced, who till that day ſtood reſolute, what hopes ſoeuer were offered, not to tempt fortune: they now conſented, by the vehement perſwaſions of Bartlemew Aluiano, that reaſſembling all the ſouldiers, and ſtirring vp all the villages as well of the plaines as of the mountaines, they ſhould aſſay to ſtop the returne of the enemies: a matter which Aluiano ſhewed to be very eaſie, for that they being raſhly come ſo farre, that they were now in the middeſt betweene Venice, Treuiſa and Padua, and chiefly being laden with ſo great a prey, they could not retire without great danger, as well for the incommoditie of victuals, as for the impediment of riuers and hard paſſages: and now the Spaniards vnderſtanding of this new ſtirre, marching a good ſpace, were by this time come to Ciuitella, which when they ſaw they could not get, for that a ſuccour of ſouldiers were entred therein, they lodged a litle beneath neare to Brenta, to paſſe to the village of Conticella, where the riuer of Brenta was paſſable by foord: but they durſt not venture to paſſe ouer for feare of Aluiano, who was on the other ſide with his companies ranged in battell, and his artillery planted along the ſhore of the riuer, carefully looking not onely to that place, but alſo to many others: whereby, if reſiſtance had not bin made, the enemy might eaſily haue paſſed. Now it happened, that the Viceroy continuing his demonſtrations to paſſe ouer at the place below, to the which Aluiano had turned all his forces, he paſſed the night after without any impediment at the paſſage called the New Croſſe, three miles aboue Ciuitella, and from thence he tooke his way with great diligence to Vincenſa; but Aluiano ſeeking to ſtop his paſſage ouer the riuer of Bacquillon, preuented him. Iohn Paul Baillon and Andrew Gritti with a ſtrength of two hundred men at armes, and two thouſand footmen of the forces of Treuiſa, came and ioyned with Aluiano neare Vincenſa: and the opinion of the Venetian Captaines was not to fight with the enemies with banners diſplayed in open place, but guarding well the paſſages of ſtrength and places moſt conuenient, they ſhould labour to ſtop their way on what place ſoeuer they came, drawing now towards Vincenſa. To this end they had ſent Iohn Paul Manfron to Monteſquo with foure thouſand trained men: and to Barberano to hinder their paſſage in the mountains, were ſent fiue hundred light horſmē, with many other bands of the paiſants; & had alſo cauſed the country people to ſeize vpō all the paſſages ỹ led into Germanie, & to fortifie them with ditches, trenches, great ſtones, & trees laid thwart the wayes. Aluiano left Theodor Triuulce to guard Vincenſa with a garriſon ſufficient, and himſelfe with the reſidue of the armie incamped at Olmo, a place within two miles of Vincenſa, vpon the way that leades to Verona: which paſſage with another faſt by, was ſo choked with trenches, ditches, and artilleries planted vpon the places coming to it, that it was almoſt impoſſible to paſſe. The way towards Verona being thus peſtered, it was likewiſe hard for the Spaniards that marched along the mountaines to paſſe through the countries that were mooriſh and full of waters; and alſo difficult to take the way of the mountaine, which was narrow, and guarded by many armed men: in ſo much as being enuironed almoſt on all parts with enemies, both before, behind, and in flanke, and continually followed by great troupes of light horſemen, they could make no deliberation, which was not both difficult and very dangerous. After they had ſpent certaine time in skirmiſhing, they incamped in the beginning of the night, within halfe a mile of the place where the Venetians lay, and there the Captaines conſulting by night among themſelues what was beſt to be done amid ſo many difficulties and perils, they choſe as leaſt dangerous to turne their enſignes towards Germany, to the end to returne to Verona by the way of Trent, although for the longneſſe of the way, and the ſmall garriſon they had left there, they had almoſt an aſſured opinion that the celeritie of the Venetians would preuent their purpoſe. In this ſort then did they march at the dawning of the day towards Baſſan, turning their backes to the enemies, a matter then the which there is nothing more dreadfull or pernicious to an armie; and albeit they marched in order, yet it was with ſo ſmall hope of ſafetie, that they thought the loſſe of all their baggage and horſes of cariage, would be the leaſt harme that could happen to them. Aluiano was not ſo ſpeedily aware of their diſcamping without ſound of trumpet or drum, for that a thicke miſt falling that morning, tooke away the benefite of his ſight: but as ſoone as he perceiued it, he followed them with all the armie, wherein was thought to be a thouſand men at armes, a thouſand eſtradiots, and ſixe thouſand footmen, the eſtradiots vexing them continually on all ſides, and infinite troupes of paiſants, who deſcending from the mountaines, were no litle trouble to them with their ſmall ſhot: ſo that with the danger, the difficultie to march increaſed continually, which was the more augmented by the multitude of their carriages, and the great quantitie of bootie, and for that they were driuen to paſſe through wayes ſtreight and full of ditches, which they had not had oportunitie to enlarge or make plaine with mattocks and ſpades. And yet notwithſtanding they made haſte to be gone, they forgot not to march in order, the ſame proceeding as well of the vertue of the ſouldiers, as of the carefull diligence of the Captaines: neuertheleſſe, after they had marched two miles of ſuch way with ſo great paine and trouble, they iudged it would be hard for them to hold out long in that ſort. But the enemies, by their raſhneſſe, had not the patience to expect till ſo faire an occaſion were ripe, which already was come almoſt to perfection; for Aluiano (according to his cuſtome) being not able to containe himſelfe, charged vpon the reareguard of the enemies guided by Proſper Colonno, and that not in diſorder, but with the armie ranged in battell, and with his artilleries. It was holden for more certaine, that Aluiano being long in preparing to the charge, Loredano a ruler among the Venetians, rebuked him with very ſharpe words, becauſe he went not to the charge, and that he gaue oportunitie to the enemies being already broken, to ſaue themſelues: which words cauſing ſo valiant a Captaine to runne headlong to the fight, in great furie he gaue the ſigne of battell. Some other affirme that Proſper Colonno was the cauſe of this battell, by whoſe counſell the Viceroy had rather proue the vncertaine fortune of the fight, then otherwiſe to follow ſo ſmall a hope of ſafetie. And it is ſaid further, that hauing made a ſhew that he would returne towards Vincenſa, Aluiano had cauſed to be beſtowed in the ſuburbes of Vincenſa, John Paul Baillon, with thoſe bands that were come from Treuiſa, and himſelfe with the reſidue of the armie was incamped at Creatia, within two miles of Vincenſa, in which place there is a litle hill where he might commodiouſly make vſe of the artillery againſt the enemies, and at the foote thereof a valley capable of a maine armie ranged in battell, but there is no way to come into it but onely by a narrow paſſage that runneth vp along the hils, and is almoſt incompaſſed with mariſhes, and that Proſper knowing what incommodities this place gaue to the enemies, perſwaded to ſet vpon them in that quarter. But howſoeuer it was, Proſper beginning reſolutely to fight, and hauing ſent to call the Viceroy which brought on the battell, and the Spaniſh footmen on the one ſide aduancing by the direction of the Marquis of Peſquiero, and the Lanceknights on the other, the Venetian ſouldiers being ſo furiouſly charged, not able to reſiſt their furie, betooke themſelues to flight, ſhamefully caſting downe their pikes. The footmen of Romagna, whoſe Colonell was Babou Naldo of Briſiquello, were the firſt that ſerued to the others as an example of cowardize and infamie. The reſidue of the armie did their endeuor as ill, no man almoſt being ſeene to fight, or once to looke his enemie in the face; and the vertue of Aluiano himſelfe was ſo abated by this ſo ſudden flight, that without ſtroke ſtriking he left the victory to the enemies, to whom the artilleries with al the baggage remained in prey. The footmen were ſcattred into diuers places; and for the men at armes, ſome of them fled towards the mountaine, and the reſidue ſaued themſelues in Padua and in Treuiſa, whither Aluiano and Gritti fled in like ſort. In this encounter were ſlaine Francis Calſono, and Anthonie Pio an ancient Captaine, with Conſtance his ſonne, Meleager de Furly and Lewis de Parma; and the fortune of Paul de Saint Ange was litle better, who ſaued himſelfe, though not without many wounds. The priſoners were John Paul Baillon, and Iulio the ſonne of John Paul Manfron, Malateſto de Sogliano, with many other Captaines and men of mark; and Loredano the Venetian ruler, but with a worſe fortune, for that two ſouldiers ſtriuing whoſe priſoner he ſhould be, the one of them killed him againſt all humanitie. The whole number, as well of the ſlaine as of ſuch as were taken priſoners, was about foure hundred men at armes, and foure thouſand footmen, for that many were hindred in their flight by the mariſhes. And this alſo brought them great domage in their flight, that Theodore Triuulce ſhut the gates of Vincenſa, and would receiue none, for feare leſt the Victor and the vanquiſhed ſhould enter pelmell together: ſo that many ſtriuing to paſſe further, were drowned in the next riuer, amongſt whom were Hermes Bentiuole and Sacromoro Viſconte. This was the ouerthrow that fell vpon the Venetians the ſeuenth day of October neare to Vincenſa, worthy to be remembred, both for the example it gaue to Captaines not to haue confidence touching matters of armes, in the Italian footmen, not experienced in pitched battels, and for that in a moment the victorie was transferred to thoſe in whom was leaſt hope of ſafetie.

tie. This ouerthrow had put in danger either Treuiſa or Padua, notwithſtanding with the reſidue of the armie Aluiano was retired to the one and Gritti to the other, if the ſeaſon of the yeare, when raines began to fall, had not bene contrary, and the townes ſo well fortified as they were, and that the Captaines of the enemies had not bene ſo much troubled to diſpoſe to new enterpriſes the ſouldiers that were not yet payed. Neuertheleſſe, albeit the Venetians were afflicted with ſo many aduerſities, and confuſed with an accident ſo contrary to their hopes, yet they forbare not to prouide for thoſe Cities as well as they could, to the which, beſides other prouiſions, they ſent many yong Gentlemen, as they had bene accuſtomed to do in times of greateſt perill.

After this battell, things began to draw from armes to cogitations of peace, which was negociated with the Pope: vnto whom was gone the Biſhop of Gurci, principally to exhibite obedience vnto him in the name of Cæſar and the Archduke: being accompanied by Francis Sforce Duke of Bary, to do the like in the name of Maximilian Sforce his brother. And albeit the Biſhop of Gurci repreſented in Italy the perſon of Cæſar, as he had done at other times, yet now laying aſide his accuſtomed pompe and magnificence, he entred modeſtly into Rome, not wearing by the way the Cardinals Hat, which the Pope had ſent to him at Poggibonſo. At the coming of the Cardinall of Gurci, the Pope was appointed by him and the Venetian Embaſſadours arbitrator of all the controuerſies that were betweene Cæſar and their Commonweale: but it was a compromiſe rather in name and apparence, then in effect and ſubſtance; foraſmuch as neither partie would commit a matter of ſuch importance to a ſuſpected arbitrator, vntill they had ſeuerally and ſecretly receiued promiſe of him, that he would not giue vp his arbitration without their conſent. The compromiſe being ended, the Pope declared by a Brieſe, that there ſhould be a ſurceaſſing of armes betweene both the parties, the which (although it was ioyfully accepted of both the parties) was ill obſerued by the Viceroy: for that being come betweene Montagnana and Eſte, beſides that he had done nothing elſe ſince the victorie but make pillage and ouerrunne the whole countrey; and hauing ſent part of his ſouldiers to Poleſina de Rouigna, he committed in all thoſe places many inſolencies; ſometimes excuſing his doings, that they were the lands of Cæſar, and ſometimes alledging that he expected letters from the Cardinall of Gurci: and the end likewiſe of the compromiſe was no more happie then had bene the midſt and the beginning, by reaſon of the difficulties that fell out in the negociation of affaires. For, Cæſar conſented to the accord, no otherwiſe but with condition to retaine ſome of the townes, and for the other to receiue a great proportion of money: and of the contrary, the Venetians demanded all the townes, and offered a very ſmall ſumme of money. And it was beleeued, that the King Catholike did ſecretly diſſwade the accord, although openly he made demonſtration to deſire it, as he had formerly done: and it was ſaid, that to make it more hard, he had at the ſame time put Breſſia into the hands of Cæſar, which the Viceroy neuer would giue vp till that day, alledging that he kept it to make him more inclined to the peace. The cauſes were diuerſly coniectured, either for that hauing ſo much offended the Venetians, he iudged he could no more haue with them a true amitie, or for that he knew his reputation and greatneſſe in Italy depended of the keeping on foot the armie, which for want of money he was not able to maintaine but by racking and ranſacking the peoples that were his friends, and by ouerrunning and ſpoiling the countries of his enemies. The Pope then left the matter vnperfect: and a litle after the Almaines, by the helpe of the exiles and baniſhed men, tooke Marano vpon the ſudden, a ſeafaring towne in the country of Friul, and afterwards Montfalcon. And albeit the Venetians who deſired to recouer Marano, being within threeſcore miles of Venice, aſſailed it both by ſea and land, yet their fortune being all one in all places, they receiued loſſe and vexation on all ſides. Onely Ranſe de Cere in that time ſuſtained in ſome ſort the name and credite of their armes, to his great praiſe: who albeit there was a great plague and famine in Crema where he lay in garriſon, and the bands of Spaniards and Millanois being diſperſed in the townes thereabout, by reaſon of the ſeaſon of the yeare, he was at it were beſieged, he gaue a ſodaine charge vpon Calcinaia, a towne of the countrey of Bergamo, and ſtripped Cæſar Fieramoſquo with fortie men at armes and two hundred light horſemen of the regiment of Proſper Colonno: and not many daies after, being entred by night into Quinſano, he tooke the Lieutenant of the Count S. Seuerin, and ſpoiled there fiftie men at armes, and within within Treuy ten men at armes of the companie of Proſper. At this time things went quiet enough in other places of Italy, ſauing that the Adorneis and the Fieſquois with three thouſand men of the countrey, and perhaps with the ſecret fauour of the Duke of Millan, after they had taken Spetia and other places of the riuer of Leuant, drew neare the walls of Genes: but things ſucceeding not well with them, they went away almoſt ouerthrowne, hauing loſt part of the men they brought thither, and certaine peeces of artillerie. There appeared alſo in Tuſcane certaine beginnings of new ſcandals: for, the Florentines began to moleſt them of Lucques, perſwading themſelues that for feare of the Pope they would redeeme peace by reſtoring to them Pietraſanta and Mutron, alledging that it was not conuenient that they ſhould enioy the benefite of that confederation, which they had broken in miniſtring ſecret ſuccours to the Piſans: whereof they of Lucques complained to the Pope and to the King Catholike, in whoſe protection they were; but ſeeing they found no remedie, they were at laſt contented (to auoide greater miſchiefes) to referre a compromiſe to the Pope; who hauing the like authoritie from the Florentines, pronounced that the Lucquois, who had afore rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, Garfagnana, ſhould leaue to the Florentines the places of Pietraſanta and Mutron, and that there ſhould remaine betweene them a perpetuall confederation. About the end of this yeare the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona, which for the neceſſitie of victuals had agreed to yeeld if they were not ſuccoured in a certaine time, were deliuered into the power of the Duke of Millan: ſo that there remained no more that the French King held in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genes, which in the end of the ſame yeare the Genowayes aſſayed to caſt downe by mines, approching to it in a boate of thirtie cubites in length and twentie in breadth; wherein was ſtowage for three hundred men, and which was ſet round about with packes of wooll, the better to defend the ſhot: which was a matter of great art and inuention, but being brought to triall (as often it happeneth with ſuch ſtrange workes) it ſerued to litle vſe.

THE

THE TWELFTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

THe King of England makes warre vpon the French King. Terwaine beſieged by the Engliſh, and taken by them. The Venetians recouer Friul. The Pope as arbitrator pronounceth peace betweene them and the Emperour. King Lewis the twelfth dieth. Francis the firſt cometh to the Crowne, and deſcendeth into Italy to recouer Millan. A league betweene the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers againſt the French King, to whom the Pope ioyneth himſelfe.

THere hapned the ſame yeare in the regions beyond the Mounts, moſt dangerous warres, whereof I will make diſcourſe, both for the ſame reaſons, and with the ſame ſhortneſſe that I haue touched them in the narration of the yeare before. The beginning of theſe ſtirres was the reſolution which the King of England made to inuade that Sommer the Realme of France, with a maine armie both by ſea and land: to make the victorie of which enterpriſe the more eaſie, he had agreed with Ceſar to furniſh him of an hundred and twentie thouſand duckats, to make an entrie at the ſame time into Burgundie with an armie of three thouſand horſemen and eight thouſand footmen, part Swiſſers and part Almaines. He promiſed alſo to the Swiſſers a certaine proportion of money, to the end that they ſhould do the like being ioyned with Ceſar who conſented that they ſhould keepe in pawne part of Burgundie vntill he had fully ſatisfied them of their payes. Beſides this, the King of England perſwaded himſelfe that the King Catholike his father in law, adhering to the confederation betwixt Ceſar and him (as he had alwayes promiſed to do) would open the warre on his ſide at the ſame inſtant: by reaſon whereof, the report of the truce made by the Engliſh with the French King (although for all that the deſire to make warre was nothing diminiſhed) was ſo ill brooked not onely by him, but by all the people of England, that vndoubtedly the commons had violently ſlaine the Spaniſh Embaſſadour, if the Kings authoritie had not reſiſted their furie. To theſe things were added the oportunitie of the eſtate of the Archduke, not ſo much for that he letted not his ſubiects to take pay againſt the French, as for that he promiſed to giue ſufferance and paſſage of victuals out of his countries into the Engliſh armie.

Prouiſions of the French againſt the king of England.

Againſt theſe great preparations and dangerous threatnings, the French King forgot not to make all ſorts of prouiſion: for he furniſhed a ſtrong armie by ſea to encounter the Admirall of England; and by land he leuied men from all parts, labouring ſpecially to haue as great a ſtrength of Lanceknights as he could. He had alſo afore made inſtance to the Swiſſers, that ſince they refuſed to aide him in the warres of Italy, at leaſt, that they would furniſh him with footmen for the defence of the Crowne of France. But they being wholly ſet vpon the protection & aſſuring of the Duchie of Millan, gaue anſwer that they would giue him none, vnleſſe he would returne to the vnitie of the Church; and giue vp the Caſtle of Millan, which was not yet rendred; and that cancelling his rights and intereſts to that eſtate, he would promiſe no more to moleſt either Millan or Genes. The King likewiſe, the more to terrifie the King of England, and to make him looke to his owne affaires, had called into France the Duke of Suffolke as Competitor to the Crowne of England: in reuenge whereof the King of England cut off the head of his brother, who till then had bene holden priſoner in England, ſince the time that Philip King of Caſtile, ſailing into Spaine, deliuered him into the hands of the late King his father. The French king alſo was not without hope to haue peace with the King Catholike: for that when the King Catholike vnderſtood of the league made between the French king and the Venetians, diſtruſting much of the defence of the Duchie of Millan, he ſent into France one of his Secretaries taries to practiſe new offers: and it was beleeued, that in conſideration that the greatneſſe of Caſar and the Archduke might not alter his gouernment of Caſtile, he could not in good policie ſtand well contented with the embaſing of the Realme of France. Beſides this, the French King ſtirred vp Iames the King of Scots his ancient confederate, to make warre vpon the Realme of England; who being much more moued by the conſideration of his proper intereſt, for that the aduerſities of France were dangerous for his kingdome, he prepared himſelfe with all diligence, demanding of the French King no other thing then fiftie thouſand franks to furniſh munitions and victuals. The French King neuertheleſſe was very ſlow in making theſe prouiſions, both by his accuſtomed negligence, for that he had turned his thoughts to the enterpriſe of Millan, and for that he repoſed not a litle in the truce made with the King Catholike. And touching the King of England, he conſumed many moneths in theſe preparations, for that his ſubiects hauing bene many yeares without warres, and the maner of warfaring being much changed, their bowes and their other vſuall armes being become vnprofitable, he was conſtrained to make great prouiſions of armours, artilleries, and munitions, to leuie (as ſouldiers trained) many bands of Lanceknights, and by neceſſitie many horſes, the ancient cuſtome of the Engliſh being to fight on foote. For theſe cauſes the Engliſh armie paſſed not the ſeas afore the moneth of Iuly: and after they had bene many dayes in the champaine countrey neare to Bolleine, they went to incampe afore Terwaine, a towne ſtanding vpon the marches of Picardie, and in the region of thoſe peoples whom the Latins call Morini. The King of England a litle after was preſent there in perſon, who had in his whole armie fiue thouſand horſes of ſeruice, and more then fortie thouſand footmen. When the Engliſh who were ſo many in number were incamped, and that according to their ancient cuſtome they had enuironed their campe with trenches and carts, and had rampired it with wood, and planted it round about with artillery, that they ſeemed to be in a walled towne, they began to batter the towne of Terwaine in many places, and to make many mines, but their vertue being not anſwerable to ſo great preparations, nor to the fame of their hardineſſe, they forbare to giue the aſſault. The towne of Terwaine within was very well furniſhed with artilleries, and manned with a great ſtrength of two hundred and fiftie Lances and two thouſand footmen: which was a ſmall garriſon, but not without hope of ſuccours: for that the French King, who was very carefull to aſſemble his armie, which was intended to containe fiue and twentie hundred Lances, ten thouſand Lanceknights guided by the Duke of Gueldres, and ten thouſand footmen leuied in his owne Realme, was come to Amiens, to the end that by his neareneſſe he might be the readier to giue ſuccours to the beſieged, who fearing nothing but the want of victuals, for that (except of bread) they had not ſufficient prouiſion of any one nature, vexed day & night the Engliſh campe with the artillerie, wherewith the Great Chamberlaine of England was ſlaine, and one leg taken away from Talbot then Captaine of Calice. The danger of Terwaine troubled the King, but for that by the negligence of the French, and for the difficultie to leuie Lanceknights, he was long ere he began to put order to his affaires, his whole armie was not yet aſſembled, he determined (whatſoeuer happened) not to hazard to fight with the enemies, for that in loſing the battell, the whole Realme of France had ſtood in manifeſt danger: and for that he hoped that the Winter, which in thoſe cold climates was now at hand, would be very helpfull to him. But when his armie was aſſembled, the King remaining ſtill at Amiens, he ſent it forth to Aire, neare to Terwaine, vnder the gouernment of Monſieur Longueuille, otherwiſe called the Marquis of Rotelin, Prince of the bloud, and Captain of an hundred Gentlemen, and of Monſieur de Paliſſa, with commiſſion, that eſchuing all occaſions to attempt the battell, they ſhould ſee to the well reuictualling of the townes thereabouts, which till that time had bene ill furniſhed, by the ſame negligence; and, if they could, to put into Terwaine a ſuccour of men and victuals: a matter of it ſelfe very vneaſie, and yet made more hard by the ſmall agreement that was betweene the Generals, either of them attributing ſeuerally to himſelfe the whole direction and gouernment, the one for his nobilitie, and the other for his long experience in warre. Notwithſtanding thoſe within the towne, demanding a ſuccour of men, there was a ſtrength of fifteen hundred lances that aduanced to approch the towne on that ſide that was furtheſt remoued frõ the Engliſh: and the artilleries within beat in ſuch ſort vpon three thouſand Engliſh that were beſtowed at certaine paſſages to ſtop them, ẏ the reſidue of the armie being not able to reſcue them, by reaſon of certaine ouerthwart trenches and ditches caſt by thoſe of the towne, Captaine Frontailles got to the gate, and put into the towne

foureſcore men at armes without horſes, as they had required: and afterwards retired with the reſidue of his companies without receiuing any harme; and he might by the ſame meanes haue put victuals into the towne, if he had carried any with him. By which experience the French Captaines taking courage, went another day with a great quantitie of victuals, to put them in by the ſame way. But the Engliſh, who doubting ſuch a thing, had raiſed a new fortification on that ſide, ſuffered them not to approch, and on the other ſide, had ſent out their horſemen and fifteene thouſand Lanceknights to cut off their way; in ſo much as being vpon their returne, and mounted vpon their litle nags to be the more at their eaſe, as ſoone as they were aſſailed, they betooke themſelues to flight without making any reſiſtance, and in that diſorder the French men loſt three hundred men at armes, with whom were taken priſoners the Marquis of Rotelin, the Captaines Bayard and Fayette, with many other men of marke: and Monſieur de Paliſſa was alſo taken priſoner, but he eſcaped away by chance. And it was thought that if the Engliſh had followed their fortune, they had that very day opened a way to be maiſters of the whole realme of France; for that behind, ſtood a great battell of Lanceknights which had followed the men at armes, whom if they had ouerthrowne, it had bene with ſo great domage to the French army, as it is certaine that the French King when he receiued the firſt newes, beleeuing that they had bin likewiſe broken, complaining maruellouſly, entred into ſuch deſpaire, that he was already in mind to flie into Britany. But the Engliſh, after they had giuen the chaſe to ſ horſemen, minding to take Terwaine, preſented the French enſignes and priſoners before the wals: by reaſon whereof the ſouldiers within the towne deſpairing of ſuccour, and the Lanceknights being vnwilling to endure the laſt extremitie of victuals, they agreed to leaue the towne, the horſes and liues of the ſouldiers ſaued, if they were not reſcued within two dayes. And it is not to be doubted, but their holding out for the ſpace of fiftie days, was a thing very profitable for the Realme of France. Not many dayes before the Emperour Maximilian was come in perſon into the Engliſh armie, reuiewing thoſe places wherein in his youth he had with ſo great glorie ouerthrowne the armie of the French King Lewis the eleuenth; and whileſt he remained in the campe, the armie was gouerned by his direction.

The ouerthrow of the French neare Terwain

Now ſo it is that the French King was not onely trauelled with the Engliſh armies, but alſo, and that with greater danger, by the Swiſſers, amongſt whom the vulgar ſort deſiring much that the King ſhould renounce the rights he pretended to the Duchie of Millan, and for as much as he did it not, their hatred redoubling towards him, they had burnt ſ houſes of many priuate perſons of Lucerna, whom they ſuſpected to fauour too much the affaires of the French King: and proceeding continually againſt all men that were noted of like ſuſpition, they had cauſed all the principals of thē, to ſweare they would put all the penſions in cōmon; & afterwards when they had taken armes by publike decree, they entred almoſt by heapes into Burgundie, to the number of twentie thouſand footmen, with a thouſand horſemen; and the artillerie which the Emperour gaue them; who, either according to his inconſtancie, or for iealouſie he had of them, refuſed to go thither in perſon, notwithſtanding his promiſe made as well to the King of England as to the Swiſſers, who went and incamped afore Dyon the chiefe towne of Burgundie, wherein was Monſieur Trimouille with a thouſand Lances and ſixe thouſand footmen: and for doubt that the Swiſſers had of their Captaines, who began already to conferre with the French, they tooke the artilleries and fell to batter the towne, of whoſe defence Monſieur Trimouille doubting much, had recourſe to the laſt remedies, and agreed ſuddenly with them, without expecting any commiſſion from the King, that the King ſhould be bound to renounce all the rights he had to the Duchie of Millan, and to pay them ſixe hundred thouſand crownes within a certaine terme: for the obſeruation of which couenant he gaue them foure hoſtages, perſons very honorable and of great condition: and the Swiſſers bound themſelues to no other thing then to returne to their houſes: ſo that they were not tied to remaine friends to the French King for the time to come, but might returne when they liſted to moleſt his kingdom. As ſoone as they were poſſeſſed of the hoſtages, they departed immediatly, alledging for their excuſe for entring into this couenant without the King of England, that they had not receiued in time conuenient the money which he had promiſed them. It was generally thought that this agreement was the cauſe of ſauing the whole Realme of France, for that Dyon being taken, it was in the power of the Swiſſers to runne without reſiſtance euen to the walls of Paris; and it was not vnlikely that the King of England paſſing the riuer of Somme, would haue taken the field to ioyne with them, which the French could not let, for that not aboue ſixe thouſand Lanceknights being in the armie, and the Duke of Gueldres not yet come, they were conſtrained to keepe themſelues incloſed within townes. But the King was not a litle diſcontented herewith, complaining not a litle of Monſieur Trimouille for the ſumme of money he had promiſed, and much more that he had bound him to the reſignation of his rights, as an action of too great preiudice, and far vnworthy his greatneſſe and the glorie of the Crowne of France. For this cauſe, albeit the danger had bene great if the Swiſſers in their wrath had eftſoones returned to aſſaile him, yet reposing much in the approch of the Winter, and in the difficultie to reaſſemble themſelues ſo ſoone, and being withall reſolued to incurre all fortunes rather then to depriue himſelfe of his rights in that Duchie (which he loued ſo dearely,) he determined not to ratifie it: yea rather, he began to propound to them new offers, which they conſtantly reiected, with theſe threats, that if the ratification came not within a certaine time, they would cut off the heads of the hoſtages.

Terwine being taken, whereunto the Archduke layed claime by pretence of his ancient right, and the King of England ſaid it belonged to him, hauing gotten it by a iuſt conqueſt; Cæſar and he fell to this point, for the auoiding of diſcord, to caſt downe the walls to the ground, notwithſtanding it was forbidden them by the capitulations made with them of Terwaine. Immediatly after, Cæſar went from the armie, affirming by that which he had ſeene, that the Engliſh were raſh, and not very skilfull in matters of warre. From Terwaine the King of England went to incampe before Tournay, a towne very ſtrong and rich, and of great deuotion of long time to the Crowne of France, but ſo enuironed with the countries of the Archduke, that it was impoſſible for the French to reſcue it ſo long as they were not maiſters of the field. The French King was not a litle glad of this enterpriſe, fearing leſt they would haue paſſed further into thoſe parts of his Realme that were of more importance, which put him into no ſmall perplexities. For, notwithſtanding he had now aſſembled a mightie armie, wherein (beſides the fiue hundred Lances which he had beſtowed in garriſon in S. Quentin) were two thouſand Lances, eight hundred light horſemen Albanois, ten thouſand Lanceknights, a thouſand Swiſſers, and eight thouſand footmen of his owne nation: yet it was farre inferiour to the puiſſance of the Engliſh armie, which, by the continuall flocking of ſouldiers, was (as the report went) reſupplied to the number of foureſcore thouſand fighting men. Therefore the French King who had no great hope to be able to defend Bulleine and the reſidue of the country that is beyond the riuer of Somme, whither he feared leſt the Engliſh wold turne thẽſelues, were carefull to defend Abeuille & Amiens, & the other townes that are vpon the riuer of Somme, and to let them for paſſing the riuer, temporizing in that ſort, either vntill the cold ſeaſon came, or that the Scottiſh King (in whom he hoped much) were readie to do ſome action that might draw them from that warre, his army marching in the meane while along the riuer of Somme, to let the enemies from winning paſſage. It was beleeued that the perſwaſions of Cæſar were the cauſe of this enterpriſe of the Engliſh, in hope that if the towne of Tournay were taken, it might either then or at ſome other time diuolue into the power of his nephew, to whom it was thought it did appertaine: or elſe that it was for feare to be afflicted with want of victuals if they had bene in another place; or haply that other places whereunto they might haue gone, would be ſuccoured by the enemies. The towne of Tournay, which was not manned with forreine ſouldiers, and had no expectation to be ſuccoured, being battered with artilleries in many ſeuerall places, after it had made a ſmall reſiſtance, yeelded, vnder ſafetie of goods and liues: but paying an hundred thouſand duckats to free it from pillage. And fortune ſhewed her ſelfe no more fauourable to the French in other places, for that the Scottiſh King coming to battell with the Engliſh armie vpon the riuer of Twede, where the Ladie Katherine then Queene of England was in perſon, was ouerthrowne with a very great ſlaughter, ſeeing there died with him more then twelue thouſand men, and a baſtard ſonne of his, who was Archbiſhop of S. Andrewes, with many other Prelates and Nobles of that Realme. After which victories, about the end of October, the King of England leauing a ſtrong garriſon within Tournay, diſmiſſed his horſemen and his Lanceknights, and ſo diſpoſed himſelfe to returne into England, reaping no other fruite of a warre made with ſo great preparations and with ineſtimable expences then the towne of Tourney: for touching Terwaine, whoſe walls were throwne downe to the earth, it remained in the power of the French King. One cauſe that made the King of England repaſſe the ſeas, was, that the ſeaſon of the yeare

taking away all oportunities to continue the warre in thoſe cold regions, he held it a matter vnprofitable to nouriſh an armie there with ſo great charges: and another was, that he thought to take order for the gouernment of the yong King of Scots, who was in minoritie, and the ſonne of his owne ſiſter; whither the Duke of Albany was likewiſe gone, who was alſo of the bloud of the ſame King.

When the King of England was gone, the French King diſmiſſed all his armie except the Lanceknights: and that becauſe he ſaw himſelfe deliuered of the care of preſent dangers, but not of the feare to fall into them againe the next yeare with farre greater difficulties. For when the King of England departed out of France, he vſed high threatnings, promiſing that he would returne thither the next Sommer: and which more is, to be no more ſo long in beginning, he began already to make new preparations for the warre. And beſides, the French King knew well that Cæſar had the ſame intention to annoy him; and feared withall leſt the King Catholike, who with ſundrie ſubtilties had excuſed himſelfe of the truce made, to the end not to alienate them wholly from him, would alſo take armes with them: whereof he had great preſumptions by the diſcourſe of a letter intercepted, wherein the King Catholike, writing to his Embaſſadour reſident with Cæſar, and diſcouering an intention quite contrary to his words, in which he was wont to pretend that he had an earneſt deſire to make warre againſt the Infidels, and to go in perſon to recouer Ieruſalem, perſwaded him that ioyning their forces together, they ſhould endeuour that the Duchie of Millan might be brought to Ferdinand their common Nephew, yonger brother to the Archduke: and admoniſhed him, that this being done, all the reſidue of Italy ſhould be conſtrained to obey them, and that it would be eaſie for Cæſar, chiefly with his aide, to make himſelfe Pope, as he had alwayes deſired ſince the death of his wife, which being obtained, he might reſigne to the vſe of the Archduke the Crowne Imperiall: and his concluſion neuertheleſſe was, that matters of ſo high nature could not be brought to perfection but with time and occaſions. Beſides this, the French King doubted nothing of the will of the Swiſſers, whom he could in no wiſe appeaſe, although he made them very faire offers: and they were of new incenſed, for that the hoſtages deliuered them by Monſieur Trimouille, fearing leſt for want of obſeruation in the King, they ſhould loſe their heads, were ſecretly fled into Germanie: ſo that it was not without cauſe that he feared leſt by the occaſion of ſo many of his other troubles, they would aſſaile preſently, or at leaſt the yeare after, the country of Burgundie or Dauphiney. Theſe difficulties were partly the occaſion that made him fall to agreement with the Pope for cauſes ſpirituall: of which agreement the principall article contained the abſolute extirpation of the Councell of Piſa, which was debated many moneths with very great difficulties, ſpecially for the regard of things done either with the authoritie of the ſame Councel, or againſt the authoritie of the Pope, which ſeemed very vnworthy for the Sea Apoſtolike to approue; and to reuoke them, there was no doubt but it would cauſe great confuſion: ſo that there was a delegation of three Cardinals to deuiſe of ſome meanes by the which ſuch a diſorder might be met withall. This bred alſo ſome difficultie, that it ſeemed not conuenient to grant to the King abſolution of the cenſures vnleſſe he ſued for it: whereunto the King would not condeſcend, leſt his perſon and the Crowne of France ſhould be noted of ſchiſme. But at laſt the King made wearie with theſe perplexities, and no leſſe vexed with the importunities of all the people of his Realme, who deſired with an vniuerſall affection to be reunited to the Church of Rome, being alſo much moued by the intreaties of the Queene, who neuer tooke any pleaſure in theſe controuerſies, he determined to yeeld to the will of the Pope, and not without ſome hope, that ſuch a quarrell being ended, the Pope would ſome way ioyne to his aide, whereunto with great art he ſeemed to expreſſe a good intention: although a new complaint was added to the ancient iniuries, for that the Pope had by a Brieſe commanded the Scottiſh King not to annoy the King of England. Therefore in the eighth Seſſion of the Councell of Latran, which was in the latter end of the yeare, the French agents in the name of their King & producing his cõmiſſion, renounced the Conuenticle of Piſa, and ſtuck to the Councell of Latran, with promiſe that ſixe of thoſe Prelates that were preſent at the Councell of Piſa, ſhould go to Rome to do the like in the name of the whole French Church, and that other Prelates ſhould alſo come to diſpute of the pragmaticall ſanction, with intention to referre themſelues to the declaration of the Councell, of which in the ſame Seſſion they obtained full abſolution of all things committed againſt the Church of Rome. Theſe were the actions done in Italy, France and England, in the yeare

1514. In the beginning of the yeare following, Anne the French Queene departed from this life to a better, hauing ſcarcely taſted the ioy of the vnion with the Church, ſo much by her deſired. She was a very vertuous and Catholike Queene, and for this cauſe her death was greatly lamented of all the Realme, and of her people of Brittaine. Now when the Realme of France was reduced to the obedience of the Church of Rome, and by that meanes both the name and authoritie of the Councell of Piſa vtterly aboliſhed; ſome of thoſe that feared the greatneſſe of the French King, began to be moued, and to feare leſt his power ſhould be too much embaſed: but ſpecially the Pope, who notwithſtanding he continued in the ſame deſire that the Duchie of Millan ſhould not be recouered by him, yet fearing leſt the King, appalled with ſo great dangers, and calling to mind the matters of the yeare paſt, would ſuddenly fall to accord with Caſar (as the King Catholike continually laboured, by the conſent of Caſar,) and giue his daughter in mariage to one of the Nephewes of thoſe two Kings, granting her for dowrie the Duchie of Millan: he began to perſwade with the Swiſſers, that for too great hatred againſt the French king, they would not bring him into a neceſſitie to do a matter which ſhould be no leſſe preiudiciall to them then to him: ſpecially ſince he was not ignorant of the ill mind that Caſar and the King Catholike bare to them, who if they obtained the Duchie of Millan by vertue of accord with the French King, it would be a matter no leſſe dangerous to their libertie and authoritie, then to the libertie of the Church, and of all Italy: That they ought to perſeuer in their reſolution, not to ſuffer the French King to recouer the Duchie of Millan, but withall to take heed, leſt (as it often hapneth in humane actions) by auoiding too much one extremitie, they fell not into another more hurtfull and dangerous: and that to aſſure themſelues more then was need, that that eſtate ſhould not reuert to the French King, they were not the cauſe to make it fall into the hands of others, with ſo much the more perill and domage to all, by how much leſſe any can be found able to withſtand them, as it happened when it was needfull to reſiſt the greatneſſe of the French King: That the Commonweale of the Swiſſers hauing exalted their name to the heauens in actions of warre by ſo many glorious and worthy victories, ſhould endeuour to make themſelues no leſſe famous by the practiſes of peace, foreſeeing by the preſent ſtate of things the dangers that were to come, and to redreſſe them by wiſedome and counſell, not ſuffering things to fall into ſuch termes that they cannot be redreſſed but by armes and valour of the hand: for as dayly experience teacheth vs, it hath often happened in warre, that the valour of men hath bene ſuffocated by the too great power of fortune: That it was a far better counſel, to moderate in ſome part the accord of Dion, ſpecially the King offering them greater paiments, and promiſing to make truce for three yeares with the State of Millan, ſo far forth as they would not conſtraine him to reſigne his intereſts: which reſignation being of greater conſequence in apparence then in effect, (for when oportunitie ſhall returne to the King to recouer it, all reſignements ſhall be no other impediment to him then he himſelf liſteth) things for that difficultie ought not to be reduced to ſo great a danger. On the other ſide, he aduiſed the French King with many forcible reaſons to chuſe rather the leſſer ill, to ratifie the accord of Dion, then to returne into the danger to haue the next Sommer ſo many enemies in his Realme: That it was the dutie of a wiſe Prince, for auoiding of the greater ill to embrace as good and profitable the election of the leſſer: and not for the auoiding one danger and diſorder, to run into another of more importance and greater infamie. For what honour could it be to him to grant the Duchie of Millan with ſo manifeſt a note of cowardize to his naturall enemies, who had purſued him with ſo many deceits and ſubtilties? What reſt or ſecuritie, by diminiſhing ſo much his owne reputation, to enlarge the power of ſuch as thinke vpon nothing more then to ruinate the Realme of France? conſidering withall that he himſelfe knew well that he could not be aſſured of any promiſe, of any faith or oath that they ſhould make vnto him, as he had found by former experience to his great harmes: That indeed it was a hard matter to reſigne his rights, but the infamie was ſo much the leſſe, by how much a ſmall writing made not his enemies more mightie: and ſince the promiſe had bene made by his ſeruants, without his conſent, it could not be ſaid that his determination had bene ſuch from the beginning; but it might be the better excuſed in the execution, being as it were conſtrained by a promiſe made by his people, or ſome keeping of his faith: beſides, that all men knew well from what danger that accord had then deliuered the realme of France: That he allowed well that by other

meanes and offers he laboured to induce the Swiſſers to his intention: and for his part, he deſired for the ſuretie of his kingdome, that in ſome ſort there were made an agreement betweene them and him, and that he would omit no good office to induce the Swiſſers to be conformable to his will; but if they would be obſtinate, he exhorted him with a fatherly deuotion to obey times and neceſſitie, as well for all other regards, as not to depriue himſelfe of excuſe to depart from the alliance he had with his enemies. The King knew well that theſe reaſons were true, and yet he complained that the Pope had ſecretly mingled threats with perſwaſions: and confeſſed that it was neceſſary for him to make ſome deliberation that might diminiſh the number of his enemies; but he was reſolued rather to expoſe himſelfe to all dangers, then to renounce his rights to the Duchie of Millan: being incited hereunto by his Councell, and by all thoſe of his Court, to whom albeit it was grieuous any more to follow the warres in Italy, yet reſpecting the dignitie of the Crowne of France, it was farre more offenſiue to them to ſee their King ſo infamouſly conſtrained to diſclaime his rights. There was diſcerned the ſame obſtinacie in the aſſemblies of the Swiſſers: for notwithſtanding the King made offer to pay them foure hundred thouſand crownes preſently, and afterwards eight hundred thouſand at ſundry termes, and that the Cardinall of Sion with many of their principals conſidering the imminent danger if the French King ſhould ioyne with Ceſar and the King Catholike, inclined to accept thoſe conditions: yet the commons being very enuious againſt the name of France, and made proud by ſo many victories, were confident to defend the Duchie of Millan againſt all the Princes vnited together: and the authoritie of the Cardinall of Sion being much diminiſhed amongſt them, and their other chiefe rulers ſuſpected, by reaſon of the penſions which they were wont to receiue from the French King, they inſiſted obſtinately vpon the ratification of the accord of Dyon: and which more is, puſhed on with great raſhneſſe, they debated to enter againe into Burgundie, which the Cardinall of Sion and other Chieftaines amongſt them hindered, not with manifeſt authoritie, but indirectly, and with many ſleights, putting off that reſolution from Dyot to Dyot. Therefore the French King being neither offended by them, nor aſſured of them, ceaſſed not to continue with the King Catholike the practiſe of the mariage, wherein (as before) the principall difficultie was, whether the Damſell ſhould remaine in the power of her father in law, till time had made her able for the conſummation of mariage: for that if the father retained her, it ſeemed to Ceſar that he could in no ſort be aſſured of the effect: and the King was content to entertaine the difficulties that hapned in this action, for that he ſaw there was ſome hope that the bruite of this match (which he diligently ſpread abroad) might to his profite mollifie the minds of others, by reaſon of the intereſts they had in it. The King Catholike ſent to him Quintaine his Secretarie, whom he had ſent to him the yeare before about the ſame buſineſſe, and who going afterwards by his conſent to Ceſar, returned againe to the French King: at whoſe returne, to the end the difficulties of the peace might be reſolued the more commodiouſly, the King and Quintaine in the name of the King Catholike prolonged yet for another yeare the truce that had bene made the yeare precedent, and that with the ſame conditions that were before, whereunto was very ſecretly added, that during the truce the French king ſhould not moleſt the eſtate of Millan; in which article neither Genes nor Aſt were comprehended. This condition, which the King concealed as much as he could, the King Catholike cauſed to be proclaimed ſolemnly through all Spaine; a thing which made the world vncertaine which was moſt true, either the negatiue of the one, or the affirmatiue of the other. In the ſame couenant was reſerued to Ceſar and the king of England, a reſpite of three moneths to enter into the agreement; and Quintaine aſſured that they would both enter; which, for ſo much as concerned the king of England was vaine: but for Ceſar, the King of Aragon who always ſtood reſolued not to haue warre on the coaſt of Spaine, had perſwaded him that there was no better meane to compaſſe the mariage that was ſollicited. This prorogation of the truce aggrauated the Popes ſuſpition, that betweene theſe three Princes was either already made, or at a point to be made, ſome concluſion of greater things to the harme of Italy: and yet for all that, not going from his firſt opinions, that it would be a matter very hurtfull to the common libertie to ſuffer the Duchie of Millan to come into the power of Ceſar and the King Catholike, and no leſſe dangerous that it ſhould be recouered by the French king, he found it a hard matter for him to proceed and ſo to ballance things, that the meanes which were helping to one of his intentions ſhould not be hurtfull to the other, ſince one of the dangers came of the embaſing and the feare, and the other of the greatneſſe and ſuretie of the French King. Therefore to deliuer the King from any neceſſitie to agree with them, he continued to perſwade the Swiſſers (to whom the truce that was made was ſuſpected) that they had reaſon to compound with him: and to the end to make the deſcent of the King into Italy in all euents more hard, he tooke more paines then euer he did to agree Cæſar with the Senate of Venice, who iudging that to make truce, would be to aſſure the matters of Cæſar in the townes that remained to him, ſtood reſolued with conſtancie of mind, either to make an abſolute peace, or to continue the warre, not giuing ouer ſo honorable a reſolution for any accident or miſhap whatſoeuer. For, beſides ſo many vnhappie ſucceſſes which they had in the warre, and the deſpaire that for that yeare the French king would ſend no army into Italy, hauing alſo againſt them either the anger of heauen, or the caſuall accidents which depend vpon the power of fortune, a great fire kindled in the night in Venice, in the beginning of the yeare, at the bridge Rialto, which being carried by the violence of the North winds, notwithſtanding all the diligence and trauell of men, continued a long time, and conſumed the moſt rich and populous part of that Citie.

But the Pope ſhewing ſuch forwardneſſe to haue them accorded, he was made arbitrator betweene them, with large and vnlimited power, and reſtrained to no time, and yet with a ſecret promiſe ſubſigned vnder his hand, to pronounce nothing but by the conſent of both the parties: and when the compromiſe was made, he commanded both the one and the other by a Briefe, to ſurceaſſe from armes, which was ſlenderly obſerued by the Spaniards and Almaines, for that thoſe companies of Spaniards which were in garriſon at Poleſina and in Eſte, made pillage of the whole countrey thereabout, and the Viceroy ſent men to Vincenſa, to the end to be in poſſeſſion at the time when the ſentence ſhould be giuen. Moreouer, Captaine Frangipan did many harmes in the countrey of Friul, and the Venetians not ſtanding vpon their guard, the Lanceknights, by an intelligence with certaine baniſhed men, tooke Marano a towne in Friul neare to Aquilea, and ſeated vpon the ſea; by reaſon whereof the Venetians ſent thither by land Baltazar Scipion with a certaine number of ſouldiers, and Ierome Sauorgnano with many other bands of the countrey people, who being there incamped, and holding the towne ſtrait by the army at ſea, there came to the ſuccours thereof fiue hundred Almaine horſemen, and a regiment of two thouſand footmen: by reaſon of whoſe coming, thoſe that were within the towne iſſuing out to aſſaile the Venetian companies, they put them to flight with a great ſlaughter and the loſſe of their artillery, beſides that with certaine ſhips they tooke from them a galley with many other veſſels. After this victory the Almaines tooke Monſalcon by force: and not many dayes after, foure hundred horſemen and twelue hundred Lanceknights that had bene at Vincenſa, came and vnited to them of Marano, who ioyning with the other bands of horſemen and footmen newly come into Friul, ouerranne the whole countrey. By reaſon of which oppreſſions, Malateſta de Sogliano Gouernor of that region with ſixe hundred horſemen and two thouſand footmen, together with Ierome Sauorgnano and two thouſand of the countrey men, who were now withdrawne into Vdine, ſeeing they were not able to make reſiſtance, paſſed to the other ſide of the riuer Liquenza, giuing ſuccours where they could. But the Almaines being deuided into two armies, one part of them tooke Feltro, and ouerranne all the countrey thereabout: and it came to paſſe that the Venetians that commanded all the paſſages, charged certaine bands of them at Baſſano, where they kept no guard; and albeit they were not ſo many in number, yet they put them to flight, and ſlue three hundred footmen of the fiue hundred that were there, and tooke priſoners many ſouldiers and two Captaines. The other part of the Almaines was gone to incampe at Oſopo, ſtanding vpon the top of a ſharpe mountaine, and after they had battered the Caſtle with their artilleries, and giuen many vaine aſſaults, they hoped to carry it by ſiege, being aſſured that thoſe within wanted water: but the benefite of heauen hauing remedied that want, for that there fell at that time ſundry great ſhowers, they began againe to giue the aſſault, but in vaine, ſo that deſpairing to get it, either by aſſault or by ſiege, they raiſed their campe. Theſe things were not a litle grieuous to the Pope, but that which troubled him more, was, that he could find no meanes of agreement to content both the parties: for that becauſe of the continuall variation of things, the hopes changing according to the ſucceſſe of the ſame, it fell out that when Cæſar had conſented to leaue Vincenſa keeping ſtill Verona, the Venetians refuſed vnleſſe they might be poſſeſſed of Verona: and when the Venetians, much embaſed by their calamities, would be contented with Vincenſa onely, Cæſar on the other

ſide, not ſatisfied with Verona, required Vincenſa alſo. The Pope being wearied with theſe difficulties, and ſuppoſing that his declaration would not be accepted, yet to ſhew that it was not long of him that they were not reconciled, he pronounced a peace betweene them, with this clauſe, that armes ſhould preſently be layed downe on all ſides; reſeruing to himſelfe power to declare within a yeare the conditions of the peace: wherein, as alſo in the ſurceaſſing of armes, the King Catholike ſhould be comprehended: That Cæſar ſhould put Vincenſa into his hands; and all whatſoeuer either he or the Spaniards poſſeſſed in the countries of Padua and Treuiſa: and that the Venetians ſhould do the like for Crema: and touching other things, euery one ſhould hold what he poſſeſſed vntill the publication: That either partie ſhould ratifie his ſentence within a moneth, and vpon the ratification the Venetians to pay to Cæſar fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, and as much more within three moneths next after: and that if both the parties did not ratifie, the ſentence ſhould be of none effect. He choſe this vnaccuſtomed maner of iudgement, not to diſpleaſe either ſide. And becauſe there was no man that had power to ratifie for the King Catholike, although his Embaſſadour gaue aſſurance of his conſenting, he reſerued to either partie ſo much time to ratifie, as the commiſſion ſo to doe might conueniently be ſent. But the Venetians being reſolute not to ratifie it at all, (for they deſired that at the ſame time the conditions of peace might be pronounced) the ſentence tooke no effect. At this time the affaires of the Venetians ſtood in good caſe touching the defence of Crema, which was afflicted within with the plague and famine, and without with the campe of the enemies: for Proſper Colonno was come on the one ſide to Efenenguo with two hundred men at armes, two hundred and fiftie light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen: and on the other ſide Siluio Sauello was come to Vmbriano with his companie of horſemen and two thouſand footmen, both the places being not aboue two miles diſtant from Crema, from whence the ſouldiers made many ſallies to skirmiſh with the enemies: who as they were in their lodgings at Vmbriano, miſdoubting nothing, Ranſe de Cere with part of the companies that were within Crema, iſſued out one night, and aſſailing them in their lodgings, put them to flight, and ſlue many of their footmen; by reaſon whereof Proſper retired with his companies: and not many dayes after, occaſion being offered to Ranſe to paſſe the riuer of Adda by foord, by reaſon of the lowneſſe of the water; hauing drawne ouer his companies at Chaſtillon de Lodigiano, he ſtripped fiftie men at armes that lay there, winning ſuch reputation by theſe happie and induſtrious enterpriſes, that by an vniuerſall conſent he was now eſteemed for one of the principall Captaines in all the regions of Italy. Then the Venetians reſolued to proceed to the recouering of Friul, to which purpoſe they ſent thither Aluiano with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and ſeuen hundred footmen: who marching along the high way of Portonon, where lay part of the Almaines, his light horſemen that ſcoured before, met without the towne with Captaine Riſſan an Almaine, with two hundred men at armes, and three hundred light horſemen, and coming to blowes with him, were repulſed: but Aluiano coming to their reſcue with the reſidue of his companies, there began a furious combat, the iſſue whereof was doubtfull, vntil Captain Riſſan being wounded in the face, was taken priſoner by Malateſta de Sogliano. The ſouldiers of Riſſan being ouerthrowne, retired into Portonon; but fearing they ſhould not be able to defend it, they fled from thence, abandoning the towne, which immediatly was put to ſacke, and many of the countrey men ſlaughtered. After this Aluiano tooke the way to Oſopo, which Frangipan had newly beſieged with the other part of the Almaines, who hearing of the coming of Aluiano, raiſed their ſiege, but the light horſemen charging them vpon the taile, they loſt their baggage and artilleries. By reaſon of which ſucceſſe, almoſt all the whole country being reduced to the obedience of the Venetians, Aluiano when he had in vaine aſſayed to get Goritia, returned with his companies to Padua; hauing either ſlaine or taken priſoners (as he himſelfe certified to Rome) two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen. But by reaſon of his departing, the nimber of the Almaines being increaſed, they tooke againe Cremonio and Monfalcon, and conſtrained the Venetians to breake vp their ſiege from before Marano, where not many dayes before Captaine Frangipan had bene taken by ambuſh, and lefte priſoner to Venice: for the Venetians perceiuing ſupplies to arriue, brake vp from thence in diſorder, and as it were diſcomfited: and a litle after their eſtradiots being put to flight, Iohn Vittorio their Agent was taken with an hundred horſemen: and ſuch alterations hapned oftentimes in Friul, by the neighborhood of the Almaines, who vſed in that quarter no other ſouldiers then ſuch as were commanded, and who hauing ouerrunne and pilled the country, as ſoone as they perceiued the coming of the Venetian regiments (with whom many of the countrey ioyned) they retired immediatly to their houſes, returning againe as occaſion ſerued. The Venetians ſent thither a new ſupply of companies; by reaſon whereof the Viceroy gaue order, that Alarcon Captaine of the Spaniſh companies that lay betweene Eſte, Montagnana and Cologna, ſhould go to Friul with two hundred men at armes, an hundred light horſemen, and fiue hundred footmen: but vnderſtanding by the way that a truce was made in the countrey by reaſon of the harueſt, he brake off his purpoſe, and returned from whence he came.

Thus the warres of Italy proceeding ſlowly, the practiſes of peace and agreement were not diſcontinued: for the French king being not altogether depriued of hope that the Swiſſers would conſent to receiue recompence of money in place of reſignation of his rights, ſent to ſolicite them in that point with great inſtance. But the Communalties ſhewed themſelues ſo farre eſtranged, that after they had compelled with many threatnings the Gouernour of Geneua (when the hoſtages were fled) to deliuer them as priſoner the Preſident of Grenoble, whom the King had ſent to that Citie to negociate with them, they examined him with many torments, to know whether any of their nation receiued any penſions, or entertained ſecret intelligence with the French king: wherein no humanitie nor iuſtification could ſuffice to ſtop their barbarous crueltie. And alſo, the French king was not without ſuſpition, that the Pope (who for the diuerſitie of his plots and intentions, was conſtrained to ſaile with great warineſſe amongſt ſo many rockes) would ſecretly worke the Swiſſers not to couenant with him without his mediation: not to ſtirre them vp to make war, for he diſſwaded them from it as much as he could, but to remaine firme in the accord of Dion; or elſe for feare leſt with this beginning they might become eſtranged from him. Therefore the King threatned that he would ſpeedily come to accord with the reſidue, for that he alone would not ſtand expoſed to the battery of the whole world: and withall he was wearie of the intollerable expences and inſolencies of ſouldiers; for that hauing called into France twentie thouſand Lanceknights, whom he could not haue all together but when the King of England lay before Tournay, he would not ſend them backe againe, but retained them in France, to haue them readie hereafter in due time, if it ſhould be needfull: but they did infinite harmes in the countrey, and the King complained for that the Pope was vnwilling to haue them in Italy, and the other Princes to haue them in France. In theſe difficulties, and in ſo great confuſion of affaires, the matter that began to open to the French king the way to ſuretie and hope to returne to his former power and reputation, was, the incredible diſcontentment of the King of England, for the renouation of the truce which his father in law had made, contrary to that which he had ſo often promiſed him, to make no contract with the French king without his conſent: for complaining publikely hereof, and proteſting that this was the third time that his father in law had deceiued him, he began more and more to eſtrange his mind from the renewing of the warre againſt the French. Which being come to the knowledge of the Pope, he began to worke with the Cardinall of Yorke, to perſwade his King, that contenting himſelfe with the glorie he had gotten, and remembring what correſpondencie of faith he had found in Cæſar, in the King Catholike, and the Swiſſers, he would forbeare to trouble any more with armes the Realme of France: which he did, either for a feare he had that the French king (in caſe the King of England ſhould moleſt him) would make peace and affinitie with Cæſar and the King Catholike, as he alwayes threatned: or for that he thought that peace enſuing betweene them in what ſort ſoeuer, it were good for him interpoſing himſelfe, to winne ſome fauour with the French king in an action which was not in his power to let. It is moſt certaine, that when the Pope was told that the French king would take armes againſt the Duchie of Millan, when he ſhould be aſſured of the King of England, his anſwer was, that he knew well enough the eſtate of that danger, but on the other ſide was to be conſidered the perill that might grow of the diuiſion of thoſe Kings; and that in a matter of ſo great importance it was hard to ballance things ſo perfectly, and to find a counſel wholly cleare from theſe dangers: That in all euents the Swiſſers would defend the Duchie of Millan: and that it was neceſſary in deliberations ſo vncertaine and difficult, to referre ſomething to the arbitrement of aduenture and fortune. Howſoeuer it was, either by the authoritie of the Pope, or by the proper inclination of the parties, there began immediatly a practiſe of accord betweene

Treaty of peace betweene England & Fráce

the King of England and the French king: the motions wherof were begun by the Pope with the Biſhop of Yorke, and with diligence carried into England, whither for that buſineſſe the King ſent the Generall of Normandie, but vnder colour to treate for the deliuerie of the Marquis of Rothelin: at whoſe arriuall there was proclaimed a ſurceaſſing of armes by land onely betweene both the Kings, for ſo long time as the Generall ſhould remaine in England. The King of Englands inclination to peace was increaſed by the occaſion of new iniuries: for Cæſar who had promiſed not to ratifie without him the truce made by the King Catholike, ſent notwithſtanding to the ſame King the inſtrument of ratification, ſo that by a letter which he wrote to the French king, he ratified in the name of Cæſar, and retained the inſtrument, the better to vſe his artificiall ſemblances and ſubtilties. The negociation being begun betweene the two Kings, the Pope who deſired to purchaſe grace with them both, ſent by poſt to the French king the Biſhop of Tricaro, to offer him all his authoritie and meanes, who paſſed into England by the conſent of the ſaid King for the ſame end. At the beginning of this practiſe there fell out many difficulties, for that the King of England demanded Bulleine in Picardie, and a great ſumme of money: but at laſt all the differences falling vpon the towne of Tournay, for that the King of England would retaine it, and the French king obiected ſome difficultie; the King of England diſpatched in poſt to the French king the Biſhop of Tricaro, whom he charged, without imparting wherein particularly conſiſted the difficultie, to declare to the King from him, that in regard of ſo great a benefite, he ſhould not ſtand vpon ſo many ſubtle difficulties. Whereupon the French king, becauſe he would not do wrong to his Crowne, nor diſcontent his people, for that Tournay was a noble Citie, and very loyall to the Crowne of France, cauſed the matter to be debated in full Councell, wherein were aſſiſtant all the principals of his Court, who aduiſed him with one voice to embrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered: although at the ſame time the king Catholike did what he could to breake it, making the King many offers, and ſpecially to miniſter to him any fauour in the conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan. Then the anſwer being returned into England, that the French king ſtood contented with the matter of Tournay, the peace ſucceeded, and was concluded in the beginning of Auguſt betweene the two kings during their liues, and for one yeare after their death, vpon condition that Tournay ſhould remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king ſhould pay ſixe hundred thouſand crownes, which ſhould be diſtributed in ſuch ſort, that the French king ſhould make paiment of an hundred thouſand Frankes euery yeare, till the full paiment was ſatisfied: That they ſhould be bound to defend the eſtate one of another with ten thouſand footmen, if warre were made by land, but with ſixe thouſand onely if the warre were made by ſea: That the French king ſhould be bound to ſerue the king of England in all his affaires with twelue hundred Lances, and the king of England likewiſe to miniſter to his ſeruices with ten thouſand footmen, at the expences of him that ſhall haue need of the men. Each of them named the Scottiſh king, the Archduke, and the Empire: but Cæſar and the king Catholike were not named. The Swiſſers alſo were named, but with a condition, that whoſoeuer would defend againſt the French king, the eſtate of Millan, Genes or Aſt, ſhould be excluded out of the nomination. This peace which was made with a wonderfull readineſſe, was confirmed by the marriage of the king of Englands ſiſter with the French king, vnder condition that he ſhould acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thouſand crownes for her dowrie. Their betrothing was ſuddenly made in England, where the king Catholikes Embaſſadour was not in preſence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his maiſter: and this peace was ſcarcely concluded and eſtabliſhed when there came to the Court of France the inſtrument of ratification which Cæſar had made of the truce, together with his commiſſion and the king Catholikes, for concluſion of the mariage that was ſolicited betweene Ferdinand d'Auſtrich and the ſecond daughter of France, not yet foure yeares of age. But that practiſe vaniſhed preſently by reaſon of the peace that was eſtabliſhed: and the French king the better to ſatisfie the king of England, gaue order that the Duke of Suffolke Captaine generall of the Lanceknights that were in his pay, ſhould depart out of the Realme of France, whoſe departure notwithſtanding was without any diſcontent, by reaſon of the honour and good entertainment the king gaue him. Moreouer at this time the Pope had made new alliances, for that according to his diſſimulations, he wiſhed on the one ſide that the French king ſhould not recouer the Duchie of Millan, and on the other ſide he ſought to entertaine the King and the other Princes as much as he could with ſundry deuices. Therefore he had propounded to the King, by the Cardinall de S. Seuerin, who managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, that ſeeing the times permitted not that there might be made betweene them a more great and open alliance, yet at leaſt there might be layed a beginning and foundation, whereupon it might be hoped that at another time they might come to make a more ſtraite amitie: and to theſe ends he ſent him a draught of the articles. Which practiſe notwithſtanding the French king made demonſtration to like well of, yet for that he did not anſwer ſo ſpeedily as was expected, (for he was fifteene dayes in reſoluing, either by reaſon of other impediments, or for that he expected ſome anſwer from another place, to the end to proceed according to the traine of affaires) the Pope entred into new capitulations for a yeare with Cæſar and the king Catholike, wherein neuertheleſſe was comprehended no other matter then the defence of their common eſtates: for the king Catholike was entred afore, not without cauſe, into ſuſpition that he aſpired to the Realme of Naples for Iulian his brother, about which matter he had already entertained ſome practiſe with the Venetians. Now this new confederation was ſcarcely concluded and eſtabliſhed when the French kings anſwer came, whereby he approued all that the Pope had propounded, with this addition onely, that ſince he was to bind himſelfe to the protection of the Florentines, of Iulio de Medicis his brother, and Laurence his Nephew, whom the Pope had aduanced to the adminiſtration of the affaires of Florence, he deſired that they likewiſe ſhould reciprocally be bound to his defence. Which anſwer being receiued, the Pope excuſed himſelfe touching the action of capitulation with Cæſar and the king Catholike, that ſeeing he deferred ſo long to make anſwer to a demand ſo reaſonable, he could not but enter into ſome doubt: and yet the confederation was but for a ſhort time, and contained no matter preiudiciall to him, nor that might hinder the perfection of the practiſe begun betweene them: which iuſtifications being accepted by the King, they paſſed the couenant betweene them, not by inſtrument authentike (to the end to keepe it the more ſecret) but by a writing ſubſigned by both their hands.

The peace between the king of England and the French king, being more ſuddenly and more eaſily made then was expected, (for it was thought impoſſible that ſo great hatred ſhould ſo ſoone be conuerted into amitie and alliance) was haply not very plauſible to the Pope, who, as well as others, was perſwaded, that there might grow betweene them rather a truce then a peace, or at leaſt if peace were made, it would intangle the King with harder conditions, or at leaſt with obligation not to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan for a certaine time. But it brought incredible diſcontentment to Ceſar and the king Catholike, who (as there is no euill in humane actions which hath not ioyned with it ſome good) aſſured notwithſtanding that he receiued by it in his mind two contentments: the one, for that the Archduke his Nephew being out of hope to giue his ſiſter for wife to the French king, and entring withall into diſtruſt of the king of England, would be now compelled to do nothing without his counſell and authoritie: the other, that the French king now ſtanding in good poſſibilitie of children, the ſucceſſion of Monſieur d'Angouleſme was put in doubt, to whom he bare no litle hatred, for that he nouriſhed a great deſire to reſtore the king of Nauarre to his eſtate. The Swiſſers onely gaue out, that they were all glad of that accord, notwithſtanding they retained againſt the French king the ſame hatred they did before: the reaſon hereof was, for that it was thought that the French king being now at libertie, would make warre in the Duchie of Millan, by which meanes they ſhould haue a new occaſion to declare to all the world their vertue and fidelitie. And indeed it was not to be doubted, that the French king, being now deliuered almoſt of all feare to haue warre at home, would not be touched with his old deſire to recouer the Duchie of Millan: but it was vncertaine whether he would preſently diſpoſe himſelfe to armes, or deferre it to the yeare following, for that the occaſion was preſent, but there was diſcerned no ſigne of preparations. In which vncertainty the Pope, although it was very grieuous vnto him that the King ſhould recouer that eſtate, ſtirred him vp notwithſtanding not to deferre, nor to loſe the preſent occaſions: giuing him to vnderſtand, that all things were ill prepared to make reſiſtance, for that the Spaniſh armie was diminiſhed and ill payed, the peoples of Millan very poore and reduced into deſpaire, and there was none that was able to aduance money to make the Swiſſers march: which perſwaſions carried the greater force and authoritie, for that a litle before the peace was made with the king of England, the Pope expreſſing a deſire that the French king ſhould recouer Genes, had giuen him a certaine hope to induce Octauian Fregoſo to compound with him.

Aſſu-

Assuredly the Pope in this action proceeded not with sincerities and good meaning, and it was beleeued, that that which moued him was, that seeing all things ill prepared, and doubting lest the French king would make that expedition without his counsell, since he had his men at armes in readinesse, and many leuies of Lanceknights, he would by this deuice preuent and winne his friendship: or else (wherein he proceeded with greater subtiltie) he was induced by the knowledge he had that the affirmation of the Emperour and the king Catholike, that it was not lawfull for the French king to inuade the Duchie of Millan, was true, although the French king denied it, auouching that he was not forbidden to take arms against the estate of Millan during the truce: and therefore perswading himselfe that the King would not enter into the enterprise, he purposed to expresse to him a good disposition of his will, and that that should serue him for an excuse, if another time he required succours of him: and the matter succeeded according to his opinion. For, the King hauing resolued, either for that cause, or for his present necessitie of money, or else for the neareneſſe of the Winter, not to enter into armes afore the Spring time, and making shew that he was confident, that at that time also the Popes fauour would not faile him; in his answer to the Pope, he alledged many excuses touching his deferring, but alwayes passing ouer with silence that of the truce yet enduring, which perhaps was the principall. Neuertheleſſe he had a desire to assay if he could get Genes, or at least succour the Lanterne, which the same yeare by his direction had bene reuictualled many times with certaine proportions of victuals by sundry small vessels, who making as though they wold enter the port of Genes, drew neare to it by stealth. But at last the extremitie of victuals was such, that that fortresse being no longer able to temporize and expect succours, the garrison within was constrained to yeeld it vp to the Genowais, who rased it to the ground, a matter not a litle displeasing to the King. The losse of the Lanterne tooke wholly from the King all cogitations for the present to make warre against the Genowais, but he turned all his thoughts to make preparations to assaile the Duchie of Millan the yeare following, hoping withall, that the Pope, both for the deuout intention he protested, and for the good disposition he had shewed in the negociations with the king of England and the Swissers, and also for that he had prouoked him to the enterprise, would ioyne with him and fauour the action; the rather for that he had made him great offers, and particularly had promised to aide him to recouer the Realme of Naples, either for the Church, or for Iulio his brother: but there hapned new occasions, for the which the king began to enter into some distrust of him. The Pope would neuer put an end to the affaires that the Duke of Ferrara had with him, notwithstanding in the beginning of his Popedome, he had giuen him many faire hopes at Rome, promising to render to him Reggia, at such time as his brother the Cardinall should be returned from Hungaria: but when he was returned, he alwayes vsed delayes with many excuses: and yet he forbare not to confirme to him the selfe same promises, not onely with words, but by a Briefe, and also consented that he should take the reuenues of Reggia, as of a thing which was presently to returne vnder his dominion, although indeede his intention was farre otherwise, for a desire which he had to occupie Ferrara; whereunto he was much incited by Albert de Carpi Cæsars Embassadour and great enemie to the Duke, as also by many others, who set before his eyes the glorie of Iulio, which would be perpetuall, for that he had so greatly augmented the dominion of the Church: and sometimes they proposed vnto him the occasion to bestow an honorable estate vpon Iulio his brother, who thirsting after too great things, and nourishing himselfe with hopes immoderate, had voluntarily consented that his nephew Laurence should retaine at Florence the authoritie of the house of Medicis. The Pope then following this counsell, obtained of Cæsar, who was alwayes needie of money, to deliuer to him in morgage the Citie of Modena for fortie thousand duckats, according to the capitulation made with him a litle afore the death of the late Pope; purposing to vnite that Citie to Reggia, Parma and Plaisance, and to giue them in Vicarship or in perpetuall gouernment to Iulio, and to adde thereto Ferrara, if euer the occasion serued him to get it. This maner of morgaging put the French king into great suspition, for that in his conceit it carried a manifest signe of straight alliance with Cæsar, and he was discontent that the Pope had giuen him money: whereof notwithstanding the Pope excused himselfe, alledging that Cæsar had deliuered Modena to him for assurance of the money which he had receiued of him afore. And that which augmented the kings suspition, was, that the Prince of the Turkes hauing obtained a great victory against the Sophie king king of Perſia, the Pope, as in a matter dangerous for all Chriſtians, wrote letters to all the Princes, whereby he aduiſed them to lay downe arms among themſelues, and to turne them againſt the common enemies of the faith. But the matter that almoſt altogether diſcloſed vnto him his purpoſe, was, that he ſent vnder the ſame pretence to Venice, Peter Bembo his Secretarie, who was afterwards a Cardinall, to diſpoſe that State to agree with Cæſar, wherein the ſame difficulties continuing that had bene before, the Venetians would not conſent, but declared vnto the French king the occaſion of his coming: by reaſon whereof the King (being diſcontent that the Pope ſought to depriue him of his ſuccours at a time when he was ſo ready to aduance armes) renewed eftſoones with the King Catholike the ancient practiſes, either to the end the Pope ſhould be touched with that feare, or at leaſt if he were careleſſe, to conclude abſolutely: ſo hote was he aboue all other things, in the recouery of the Duchie of Millan.

In theſe times there was not in Italy any other war then againſt the Venetians, againſt whom were raiſed many ſecret ambuſhes and conſpiracies: for (if that which the Venetians haue left in writing be true) certaine Spaniſh footmen being entred Padua, vnder colour that they were fled from the campe of the enemies, ſought to kill Aluiano, by direction of their Captains, who hoped, by approching Padua on a ſudden, which would be in trouble and diſorder for the death of ſuch a Captaine, to take it eaſily: ſo different at this day are the ſtratagemes of warre from the vertue of the ancients, who would haue bene ſo farre from ſuborning any man to do ſuch a wicked act, that of the contrary if any ſuch thing came to their knowledge, they would lay it open to the enemie, whom they eſteemed themſelues able to vanquiſh by their valour: but the conſpiracie being detected, the Magiſtrates cauſed ſuch varlets to die the death they had deſerued. The Spaniſh armie, being now well diminiſhed in numbers, lay incamped betweene Montagnana, Cologna and Eſte: and the Venetians, to conſtraine them to returne to the kingdome of Naples, prepared an armie by ſea, whereof they made Andrew Gritti their Captaine generall, with intention to inuade Powilla: but for many difficulties that happened, that expedition went no further. Afterwards the Spaniards came to the Tower neare Vincenſa, by the perſwaſion of the Almaines that were within Verona, to the end to ioyne with them to ſpoile the corne of the Paduans. But after the Spaniards had in vaine expected them many dayes in that place, becauſe they were reduced to a very ſmall number, and could not accompliſh the promiſes for the which they had called them, they left off their purpoſe to ſpoile the corne: and after they had got of the Almaines fifteene hundred footmen, they marched with ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſemen, and three thouſand and fiue hundred Spaniſh footmen, to incampe before Ciuitella, wherein were three hundred light horſemen. Being come thither within two houres after day light (for they marched all night with great diligence) they began preſently to batter it with their artilleries, and carried it the ſame day at the ſecond aſſault, taking priſoners all the light horſemen that were there, and ſo returned to their firſt lodging within three miles of Vincenſa, Aluiano not ſtirring at all: who for that he had receiued commandement from the Senate not to fight, lay incamped vpon Brenta with ſeuen hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and ſeuen thouſand footmen, in a ſtrong place, from whence he continually troubled the enemies with his light horſemen. Neuertheleſſe a litle after, to the end to put his armie into a place of more ſuretie, he retired to Barſillon almoſt afore the gates of Padua. But the whole countrey being ſpoiled and waſted by the pillages that were made by both the armies, the Spaniards hauing want of victuals, retired to their firſt lodgings from whence they were come, leauing abandoned the Citie of Vincenſa and the Rocke of Brendola, which is about ſeuen miles from Vincenſa: and relieued themſelues with no other ſubſidies or paiments, then with the taxations which they impoſed vpon Verona, Breſſia, Bergama, and other places thereabouts. The Spaniards being retired, Aluiano beſtowed himſelfe with the armie betweene Batallia and Padua, in a very ſtrong place: and there, vnderſtanding that there was within Eſte a very ſmall and negligent garriſon, he ſent thither by night foure hundred horſemen and a thouſand footmen, who being entred afore they were diſcerned, tooke foure ſcore light horſemen of Captaine Coruera, who ſaued himſelfe in the Caſtle; and ſo retired to the armie. But the Venetians hauing ſent to the armie freſh bands of ſouldiers, Aluiano drew neare to Montagnana, and preſented battell to the Viceroy, who refuſed to accept it, becauſe he was farre inferiour in forces, and withdrew himſelfe to Poleſina de Rouigna: ſo that Aluiano hauing now no more impediments beyond Adice, made dayly incurſions euen to the gates of

Verona:

Verona: which was the cause that the Viceroy fearing the losse of that Citie, leauing within Polesina three hundred men at armes and a thousand footmen, he put himselfe thereinto with the residue of the armie.

Far greater difficulties began to appeare towards Crema, which was in a maner besieged by the companies of the Duke of Millan, bestowed in the towns and villages thereabours: for that within there was great want of victuals, the plague maruellous hote, great disorder of souldiers for want of pay, vniuersall lacke of munitions, with other particular prouisions which had bene many times demanded: by reason whereof Ranse distrusting to be able any longer to hold out, had certified so much vnto the Venetians with a protestation. And yet the same Fortune shewing her selfe somewhat fauorable vnto him, he set vpon Stuio Sauello, who had two hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and fifteene hundred footmen, and charging him vpon the sudden, ouerthrew him incontinently, so that he fled into Lode with fiftie men at armes. After this the Venetians reuictualled Crema the second time, and the Count Nicholas Scot put into it fifteene hundred footmen: by reason whereof the forces and courage of Ranse being increased, he entred a few dayes after into the Citie of Bergamo, being called thither by the townesmen, but the Spaniards fled into the Chappell. At the same time also Mercurio and Malatesta Baillon tooke three hundred horsemen that were lodged without the Citie: but not long after, as Nicholas Scot going from Bergamo to Crema with fiue hundred Italian footmen, he was encountred by two hundred Swissers, who ouerthrew his companies, tooke him prisoner, and led him to the Duke of Millan, who caused his head to be striken off. The losse of Bergamo towzed vp the Viceroy and Prosper Colonno, who went and incamped there with fiue thousand footmen, ioyned to the regiments of the Spaniards and to the bands of the Duke of Millan, and planted their artilleries against S. Katherines gate, which when it had performed much, Ranse being within, and seeing no possibilitie of long defence, left the towne to discretion, cõpounding to depart with the liues & goods of all his soldiers, but without sound of trumpet, and with their enfignes wrapped vp: and the Viceroy taxed the inhabitants of Bergamo at fourescore thousand duckats. But whilest these things were doing at Crema and Bergamo, Aluians performed another act, very famous and full of great industrie and celeritie, at the town of Rouigna, wherein there were more then two hundred men at armes Spanish, who thought themselues safe enough there, for that they had the riuer of Adice betweene them and the Venetian bands. Aluiano when no man had any doubt of him, cast a bridge neare the towne of Anguillaro, and with great diligence passed ouer the riuer, with a cõpanie of souldiers, very resolute, and without baggage: and as he was arriued at the towne, and had seized vpon the gate by the stratageme of an hundred footmen attired like paisants, whom he had sent before, vnder the occasion of the market that was kept there that day, he easily made himselfe Lord of the whole, and tooke prisoners all the men at armes that he found there. By reason of this aduenture, the residue of the Spaniards that were lodged at Polesina, retired into the Abbey as to the strongest place in the countrey, and afterwards leauing abandoned all Polesina and Legnaguo, they fled towards Ferrara. Rouigna being taken, Aluiano marched with the armie to Oppiano neare to Legnaguo, whither he caused to be brought by the riuer certaine armed barkes: and so he went on to Villutero neare to Verona, with this resolution, that if from that place he could not take Verona, wherein was a strength of two thousand Spanish footmen, and a thousand Lance-knights, at least he would torment them all the Winter long. But being aduertised that three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horsemen, and sixe thousand footmen of the enemies, were gone vp towards Legnaguo, he came out of that place, fearing lest they would either stop his victuals, or constraine him to fight: and he accoasted them going towards Adice, which they passed at Alberetto with no small difficultie of victuals, by reason of the impediments which the light horsemen and the armed barkes gaue them: and hearing there that the Spanish armie after the recouery of Bergamo, returned towards Verona, he determined not to attend them, for which cause he sent the companies of men at armes by land into Padua, and passed himselfe by night the riuer of Adice with the footmen, the artilleries and baggage, to auoide the raines and mires which were great, and not without feare to be charged by the enemies, to whom the waters that were then risen very high, gaue great impediments: and assoone as he had taken land, he retired with his accustomed celeritie to Padua, where the men at armes were entred two dayes before. Afterwards he diſtributed his armie betweene Padua and Treuiſa: and the Viceroy and Proſper Colonno, after they had ſent their men to lie in garriſon at Poleſina de Rouigna, went to Inſpruch to conſult with Ceſar of matters incident.

This ſame yeare the countrey of Friul remained in tranquillitie more then was wont, by the taking of Captaine Frangipan, who was the man that afflicted it more then any other: and therfore the Venetians knowing how much it imported them to retaine him, had refuſed to render him in exchange for John Paul Baillon; who, for that ſolicitation had bin made before to exchange him for Caruaial, had got leaue of the Spaniards to go to Rome, giuing his faith to returne priſoner, if the permutation could not be agreed vpon: but for that during the treatie, it happened that Caruaial died, John Paul affirmed, that by the benefite of the accident he was ſet at libertie, and ſo holding himſelfe acquitted, he would no more returne to him whoſe priſoner he was. Alſo at the ſame time, which was towards the latter end of the yeare, the Adorneys and Fieſquoys who were ſecretly fauoured, as was ſuppoſed, by the Duke of Millan, being entred by night into Genes, and come by intelligence as farre as the Pallace greene, were chaſed out again by Octauian Fregoſo, who meeting them beyond the barriers, accompanied with the footmen of his guard, fought valiantly in his owne perſon aboue all others, and put them to flight, being no otherwiſe hurt then a litle in the hand, and Sinibauld de Fieſque, Hierome Adorno, and Iohn Camilla of Naples, remained his priſoners. Beſides that which hath bene ſaid before, it ſeemes to me a matter worthy of memory, to report that this yeare there were Elephants ſeene at Rome, a beaſt which haply had not bene ſeene in Italy ſince the triumphs and publike playes of the Romanes: for Emmanuel king of Portugal ſending to the Pope a very honorable Embaſſage to declare his obedience, preſented him with many faire preſents, and among the reſt, with two Elephants which his ſhips had brought by ſea from India, whoſe entry into Rome was celebrated with a very great concourſe of people.

But at the ſame time the French king, who had other matter in his mind then pompes and publike ſhews, gaue order to make prouiſion for the war: and deſiring to be aſſured of the Popes will (fully reſolued notwithſtanding to follow his determined enterpriſe whatſoeuer happened) he prayed him to declare himſelfe in his fauour, and confirmed the offers he had made vnto him afore, aſſuring him, that if he were diſappointed of his amitie, he would accept of Ceſar and the King Catholike the conditions which he had already refuſed. He ſet before his eyes the power of his kingdome, the confederation with the Venetians, and the ſuccours promiſed by them: how, at that time the forces of Ceſar and the King Catholike were ſmall in Italy, and how both the one and the other of them were very needie of money, hauing no meanes to pay their owne ſouldiers, much leſſe to ſtirre the Swiſſers, who would not deſcend from their mountaines without pay: That all the people of Millan ſince they had proued the hard yoke of others, deſired nothing more then to returne vnder the iuriſdiction of the French: and that the victorie ought not to giue cauſe to the Pope to band againſt him, for that the greatneſſe of the Kings of France in Italy, and his owne in particular, had bene in all ſeaſons profitable to the Sea of Rome; and becauſe ſtanding alwayes contented with the things that of right appertained to them, they neuer had any thought to ſeize vpon Italy; a matter well teſtified by ſo many experiences: That the intention of Ceſar and the King Catholike was farre other, who ſtudied nothing more, then to ſeize vpon the Empire of all Italy; and either by armes, alliances or policies, to bring into ſeruitude the Sea and Popes of Rome, no leſſe then the other States; a deſire which all the world knows to be very ancient in Ceſar: That he ſhould therfore at one time prouide for the ſurety of the Church, for the common libertie of Italy, and for the greatneſſe of the family of Medicis, and make vſe of the occaſion, which would neuer be preſented at any other time, or with other alliance then his. On the contrary, on the behalfe of Ceſar and the King Catholike, there wanted no perſwaſions full of efficacie, to vrge him to ioyne with them for the defence of Italy: wherein they admoniſhed him, that if conioyned all together, they had bene able to chaſe the French King out of the Duchie of Millan, they were much more able to defend it againſt him: and alſo that he was to remember the wrong he had done to the King the yeare paſt, ſending money to the army of the Swiſſers at ſuch time as the French armie marched into Italy; and to conſider, that if the French king obtained the victorie, he would not be vnmindfull at one and the ſame time to reuenge himſelfe of all the wrongs he had receiued, and to aſſure himſelfe of all dangers and ſuſpitions to come. But the Pope was much more moued by the authoritie and offers of the Swiſſers, who, continuing in their firſt obſtinacies, offered to command and defend with ſixe thouſand footmen the paſſages of the mount Senis, of the mount Geneura, and Finalo, receiuing ſix thouſand florins of Rhein by the moneth: and in caſe their payes might be aduanced to fortie thouſand florins by the moneth, they offered to inuade Burgundie with twentie thouſand footmen. The Pope being doubtfull in himſelfe by reaſon of ſuch diuers propoſitions (his feare withdrawing him from the thing whereunto his deſire incited him,) deferred as much as he could, to declare his intention, giuing to euery one generall words and anſwers. But ſeeing himſelfe now almoſt importuned by the French king, at laſt he made this anſwer, that no man knew better then himſelfe, how much he was inclined to his affaires, being not ignorant with what affection he had perſwaded him to paſſe into Italy, in a time when he might haue obtained the victory without danger or great effuſion of bloud: That his perſwaſions, for that things were not kept ſecret, as he had oftentimes required him, were come to the knowledge of others, to the detriment of them both, in as much as for his part, he ſaw himſelf in danger to be aſſailed by others; and the difficulties were become greater for the enterpriſe of the King, ſince others had giuen ſuch order to their affaires, that he could not now ouercome without manifeſt perill, and without the effuſion of much bloud: And that the power of the Prince of the Turkes being newly increaſed by ſo great a ſucceſſe, it was neither conformable to his nature, nor conuenient for the office of a Pope, either to fauour or counſell Chriſtian Princes to make warre amongſt themſelues: And that he could do no otherwiſe then exhort him to ſurceaſſe, expecting ſome other facilitie and better occaſion, which when it happened, he ſhould find in him the ſame diſpoſition to his glorie and greatneſſe, which he had ſo well diſcerned certaine moneths paſt. Which anſwer, (albeit it did no otherwiſe expreſſe his conception) if it had come to the knowledge of the King, had not onely depriued him of all hope of the Popes fauour, but alſo had certified him that the Pope was banded againſt him, both with counſell and with armes. Theſe were the accidents of the yeare 1514.

But death, whoſe cuſtome is oftentimes to cut off the vaine counſels of men euen in their greateſt hopes, was the cauſe that the warre which was ſo forward in apparence, began not with that ſpeed that was expected: for, as the French king was too hote in taking his pleaſure in the excellent beautie of his new wife, who was but eighteen yeares of age, not conſidering his owne yeares, and the weakneſſe of his complexion, he was taken with a feauer, with the which a ſudden fluxe coming vpon him, he died ſuddenly, and made the firſt day of the yeare 1515, memorable by his death. He was a iuſt King, and much beloued of his people, but neither afore he was King, nor after he had the Crowne, did euer find conſtancie either in good or ill fortune: ſeeing that from a ſmall Duke of Orleance as he was, being happily come to the Crowne by the death of King Charles yonger then he, and of two of his ſonnes, he conquered with very great facilitie the Duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, all Italy being gouerned for many yeares almoſt according to his will. He recouered with great proſperitie the ſtate of Genes that was in rebellion, and vanquiſhed with no leſſe glorie the armies of the Venetians, being in perſon at both thoſe victories. But on the other ſide, when he was yet but yong, he was conſtrained by Lewis the eleuenth to marry his daughter that was both both barren and deformed, and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law: after whoſe death, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the Ladie of Bourbon, he could not obtaine the gouernment of the new King being then in minoritie, and was in a maner compelled to retire himſelfe into Brittaine: and afterwards being taken in the battell of S. Albin, he remained two yeares in priſon. To theſe afflictions may be added the ſiege and famine of Nouaro, the many diſcomfites in the Realme of Naples, the loſſe of the eſtate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and likewiſe the warre he had in France againſt very mightie enemies, at what time he ſaw his Realme brought into very great dangers. Neuertheleſſe at the time of his death, it ſeemed that good fortune returned vnto him, for that he had defended his kingdome, and had eſtabliſhed peace and alliance with the King of England, with whom he was in good amitie, which gaue him great hope to be able to recouer the Duchie of Millan.

After Lewis the twelfth, ſucceeded Francis d'Angouleſme, who was the next heire male of the bloud royall, and of the ſame line of the Dukes of Orleans. He was preferred to the ſucceſſion of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead King, according to the order of the law Salike, a law very ancient in the Realme of France, which excludeth from the royall dignitie all women, ſo long as there is any iſſue male of the ſame line. The world had ſuch an opinion of his vertues, of his magnanimitie, and of his vnderſtanding and generous ſpirit, that of very long time there had not any come to the Crowne of whom there was greater hope then of this Prince: whereunto was much helping the conſideration of his age, being then but two and twentie yeares old, his excellent beautie, his great liberalitie, the great humanitie he vſed towards all men, together with the ripe knowledge he had in many things: but aboue all he was much pleaſing to the Nobilitie, to whom he ſhewed great fauour. He tooke vpon him together with the title of the French king, the name of Duke of Millan, as appertaining to him not onely by the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleans, but alſo as comprehended in the inueſtiture that was made by Ceſar in the treatie of Cambray: and likewiſe he had the ſame deſire to recouer it as had his predeceſſor: whereunto not onely he, but alſo all the noble yong Gentlemen of France were induced by the glorie of Gaſton de Foix, and by the memorie of ſo many victories which the Kings reigning next afore had obtained in Italy: although (not to warne others afore the time to prepare to reſiſt him) he diſſembled the matter, as he was aduiſed by his Councel, and in the meane while (as is vſuall in the beginning of Kings reignes) he fell to practiſe the amities of other Princes: from whom were ſent to congratulate him many Embaſſadours, whom he receiued with countenance affable and gracious, but ſpecially the Embaſſadours of the King of England, who deſired to continue with him the amitie begun with King Lewis, (the iniuries he had receiued from the King Catholike being yet freſh in memorie.) There came alſo at the ſame time an Embaſſage from the Archduke, whereof the Lord of Naſſau was chiefe: and in this Embaſſage, for the regard of the Earledome of Flanders, whereof the Kings of France are ſoueraignes, were diſcerned demonſtrations of great ſubmiſſion, in acknowledging of ſuperioritie. Both the one and the other of theſe Embaſſages had a readie and happie expedition: for touching the King of England, the confederation made betweene him and the late King, was confirmed vnder the ſame conditions, ſo long as either of them ſhould liue, reſeruing a reſpite of three yeares for the Scottiſh king to enter into it: and touching the Archduke, ſundry differences ceaſſed, which many men ſuppoſed would haue hindered the peace. But the Archduke, who being no longer in minoritie had newly taken vpon him the gouernment of his eſtates, was moued hereunto for many cauſes, to wit, by the inſtance of the peoples of Flanders, who would in no wiſe haue warre with the Realme of France; by a deſire he had to be aſſured of ſuch impediments as might be oppoſed againſt him by the French in the ſucceſſion of the Realme of Spaine, when the death of his grandfather ſhould happen: and for that he thought it dangerous to dwell without any league of amitie in the midſt betweene the Kings of England and France being conioyned together. And on the other ſide, the King deſired greatly to remoue all occaſions that might conſtraine him to be gouerned by the authoritie and counſell of his grandfather, either by the fathers or mothers ſide. So that at laſt there was made between them in the towne of Paris, a perpetuall peace and confederation, reſeruing facultie for Ceſar and the King Catholike (without whoſe authorities the Archduke contracted) to enter within three moneths. In this capitulation was promiſed the accompliſhment of the mariage betweene the Archduke and the Ladie Renee daughter to King Lewis, which had bene ſo often ſolicited: and that the King ſhould giue in mariage with the Lady Renee ſixe hundred thouſand crownes, and the Duchie of Berry to her and her children for euer; who being then very yong, ſhould haue it aſſigned to her as ſoone as ſhe ſhould come to the age of nine yeares, with this condition notwithſtanding, that ſhe ſhould renounce all rights of inheritance either by the father or mother, and namely ſuch as might appertaine to her in the Duchies of Millan and of Brittaine: That the King ſhould be bound to aide the Archduke with men and ſhips to go to the kingdom of Spaine, after the death of the King Catholike. At the requeſt of the King, the Duke of Guelders was named; and ſome affirme, that beſides the matters afore rehearſed, it was agreed that in both their names ioyntly, Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent within three moneths to the King of Aragon, to require him to proclaime the Archduke Prince of the Realmes of Spaine (ſuch is the title of him to whom the ſucceſſion appertaineth,) and to cauſe the people to be bound to him by oath: that he would render the kingdome of Nauarre, and abſtaine from the defence of the Duchie of Millan. And it is not to be doubted, that each of theſe two Princes making this confederation, had more reſpect to the preſent commoditie that appeared, then to the obſeruation of the ſame in time to come. For what foundation could be layed vpon the mariage that was promiſed, the Ladie Renee being as yet ſcarcely foure yeares of age?

The Fr. king aſſumeth the title of Duke of Millan.

And

And how could it pleaſe the French king that Madame Renee ſhould be the wife of the Archduke, who (her eldeſt ſiſter being the Kings wife) had her action prepared for the Duchie of Brittaine? for that the Britons deſiring once to haue a particular Duke, at ſuch time as Anne their Ducheſſe maried the ſecond time, agreed that the Dukedome ſhould appertaine to the yongeſt of the children and deſcendents of her, if the eldeſt were preferred to the Crowne of France. The French king in like ſort treated with the King Catholike to prolong the truce made with his predeceſſor, but to leaue out the condition not to moleſt the Duchie of Millan during the truce; and he hoped he ſhould afterwards eaſily compound with Ceſar: for which reaſon he kept the Venetians in ſuſpence, who offered to renew the league made with his predeceſſor; becauſe he would be at libertie to accord with Ceſar againſt them. But the King Catholike, notwithſtanding he ſtood ſtill poſſeſſed of his deſire not to haue warre in the frontiers of Spaine, conſidering how great ſuſpition the prolongation of the truce would giue to the Swiſſers, and that the ſame would be the cauſe (his words being not credited, and his counſels deſpiſed) that the Pope, who till that time had bene in doubt, might turne to the French amitie, refuſed at laſt to prolong the truce, vnleſſe with the ſame conditions wherewith it had bene renewed with the late King: ſo that the King excluded from that hope, and not expecting any more to be able to contract with Ceſar againſt the will and counſels of that King, confirmed the league with the Senate of Venice, in the ſame forme it had bene made with his predeceſſor. Now there remained the Pope and the Swiſſers. Touching the Swiſſers, he required that they would admit his Embaſſadours; but they vſing the ſame rudeneſſe they had done before, refuſed to giue them ſafe conduct. And for the Pope, vpon whoſe will depended wholly the Florentines, he required no other thing of him, then that he would keep himſelf out of all bond, to the end that when the traine of affaires ſhould induce him to reſolue, it might be in his power to make choiſe of the better part; perſwading him that he ſhould neuer find, either for himſelfe or for the aduancement of his houſe, in any other, a greater amitie, a more aſſured faith, nor with better and more honorable conditions.

After the King had layed theſe foundations for his affaires, he began with great care to gather together great prouiſion of money, and to increaſe the bands of his men at armes to the number of foure thouſand, publiſhing that he did theſe things not with intention to make any warre for that yeare, but onely to make head againſt the Swiſſers, who threatned him to inuade Burgundie or Dauphiney, in caſe he refuſed to accompliſh the couenants made at Dyon in the name of the late King. Many beleeued this ſemblance, the rather for the example of former Kings, who had alwayes forborne to intangle the firſt yeare of their reigne with new warres: but that coniecture made no ſuch impreſſion in the minds of Ceſar and the King of Aragon, to whom the Kings youth was ſuſpected, and the facilitie he had (more then other Kings) to command the forces of the kingdome of France, where he was ſo much loued and eſteemed of all men; and beſides, they were not ignorant of the great preparations that King Lewis had left, by reaſon whereof (ſeeing he was aſſured of the King of England) he ſeemed not to determine to make a new warre, but rather that he recontinued the deliberation that was layed by his predeceſſor. Therefore becauſe they would not be taken vnprouided, they fell to ſolicite a confederation with the Pope and the Swiſſers: but the Pope vſing towards both the parties very gracious words, and ſtudying to entertaine them all with diuers hopes, deferred ſtill to make any certaine declaration. And touching the Swiſſers, their former heate did not onely continue ſtill, but alſo was more kindled: the cauſes that had taken their beginning of publike griefes; for the deniall of the augmentation of their penſions; for that King Lewis had entertained the Lanceknights into his pay; for the diſdainfull and iniurious words deliuered againſt their nation; being increaſed by the ſorrowes, diſpleaſures, and priuate ambition, riſing of enuie which the Commons bare to many particulars, who receiued gifts and penſions of the King, and for that thoſe that moſt hotly oppoſed themſelues againſt ſuch as followed the French amities, (which at that time were cõmonly called Gallizzanti,) being by that meanes aduanced, with the fauour of the Commons, into reputation and greatneſſe, feared a diminution of their authoritie, if the Commonweale were againe reallied with the French: in ſo much as matters being diſputed and conſulted vpon not with publik zeale, but with ambition & ciuil diſſention, and theſe men being in more credit then the Gallizzanti, they obtained that the great or rather vnmeaſurable offers of the French king ſhould be refuſed. In this diſpoſition of minds and affaires, the

Embaſſadours of Ceſar, of the King of Aragon, and the Duke of Millan, being aſſembled with the Swiſſers, contracted with them in the name of their Princes, a confederation for the defence of Italy, reſeruing a reſpite of fiftie dayes for the Pope to enter: in which capitulation it was agreed, that to compell the French king to diſclaime all right to the Duchie of Millan, the Swiſſers, receiuing monethly of the other Confederates thirtie thouſand duckats, ſhould inuade either Burgundie or Dauphiney: and the King Catholike with a mightie armie ſhould make warre vpon the Realme of France, either vpon the coaſt of Perpignan or of Fontaraby, to the end that the French king being compelled to defend his owne Realme, (although haply he ſhould determine otherwiſe) might not moleſt the Duchie of Millan. The deliberation of the King was kept ſecret vntill the moneth of Iune, but at laſt, by reaſon of the greatneſſe and ſolicitude of the ſeueral preparations, it was no longer poſſible to diſſemble ſo great & apparent ſtirres: for the prouiſion of money was vnmeaſurable; he leuied many bands of Lanceknights; he cauſed to be drawne towards Lions great ſtore of artilleries; and had a litle before ſent into Guyen to leuie ten thouſand footmen in the confines of Nauarre, vnder Peter of Nauarre, who was newly entred into his pay, for that the King of Aragon being diſcontented with him, by reaſon the ill ſucceſſe of the battell of Rauenna was much attributed to him, would not pay his ranſome which was twentie thouſand duckats, which the late King had giuen to the Marquis of Rottelin to recompence in ſome part the hundred thouſand crownes which he had payed in England; the new King determining to make vſe of him, defrayed his ranſome at his firſt coming to the Crowne, and afterwards tooke him into his pay, when the ſaid Peter of Nauarre for the ſauing of his honour, had ſent to the King of Aragon to excuſe himſelfe, for that being abandoned of him, he gaue place to neceſſitie, renouncing the eſtates which he had giuen him in the kingdome of Naples. It being then manifeſt to all the world, that thoſe preparations tended to make warre vpon the Duchie of Millan, and that the King determined to go thither in perſon; the King began openly to require the Pope to ioyne with him, vſing to this end (beſides many other inſtruments and perſwaſions) the helpe of Iulian his brother, who had newly taken for wife Philibert ſiſter to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt to the King by the mothers ſide, aſſigning him for dowrie an hundred thouſand crownes of the money which the Pope gaue him: which put him in ſome hope that the Pope in reſpect of the ſtraight alliance he had with him, would readily incline to his amitie; and the rather for that he hauing before treated with the King Catholike to marry Iulian with one of his kindred which was of the houſe of Cardona, it ſeemed that he had preferred that alliance before the other, more in regard of him thē for any other reaſon. And likewiſe he doubted not but Iulian would willingly helpe forward, by a deſire to get by that meanes ſome eſtate, by the which he might furniſh the expences conuenient for ſo great a mariage, and the better to eſtabliſh the perpetuall gouernment which the Pope had newly giuen him of the Cities of Modena, Reggia, Parma and Plaiſance: which being not ſupported by the fauour of mightie Princes, there was litle hope that he could keepe them after the death of his brother. But the King began quickly to giue ouer his hope, for that the Pope had transferred to the King of Aragon for two yeares the moneys of the Realme of Spaine appointed for the holy warres, which as was thought would amount to aboue a million of duckats: and for that he heard with great willingneſſe Albert Carpy and Ierome Vich Embaſſadours of Ceſar and the King Catholike, who were almoſt alwayes about him, and to whom it ſeemed the Pope did communicate all his counſels. Neuertheleſſe the Pope held the King in ſuſpence, giuing faire words, and making ſhew of a good intention to thoſe that negociated for the King, but without any reſolution: as one that deſired aboue all other things that the Duchie of Millan ſhould not be poſſeſſed by forreine Princes. Therefore the King purpoſing to be better aſſured of his intention, addreſſed to him new Embaſſadours, amongſt whom was William Buda of Paris, a man in humane learning, as well Greeke as Latine, of moſt abſolute and onely erudition of all the learned men of our time: and afterwards he ſent to him in the ſame Legation Anthonie Maria Paluoiſin, a man very acceptable to the Pope. But all this was loſt labour, for that before his coming, euen from the moneth of Iuly, he had very ſecretly contracted with others for the defence of the eſtate of Millan: notwithſtanding ſeeking to keepe cloſe that reſolution vntill the neceſſitie of affaires conſtrained him to declare himſelfe, and deſiring withall to publiſh it with ſome excuſe, ſometimes he required the King to conſent that the Church might retaine Parma and Plaiſance, and ſometimes he preferred other demands, to the end that any one of the things which which he demanded being refuſed, it might ſeeme that neceſſitie more then will, had incited him to ioyne with the Kings enemies: and at that time, diſtruſting that he ſhould not be denied ſome one of thoſe things, which all together he would not propound without ſome honeſt colour, he made diuers doubtfull anſwers, and irreſolute. But there were others that vſed towards him likewiſe the ſame ſleights and ſubtilties: for Octauian Fregoſa Duke of Genes, fearing the great preparations of the French king, and on the other ſide holding for ſuſpected the victorie of the Confederates, for the inclination of the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers to his aduerſaries, had made a ſecret contract with the French king by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon, and yet very firmely aſſured the contrary to the Pope, both in the time of the debating of it, and after it was reſolued. And becauſe Octauian was one of the ancient friends of the Pope, and of his brother Iulian, and that they had fauoured him at ſuch time as he was created Duke of Genes, the Pope did in ſuch ſort beleeue him, that the Duke of Millan ſuſpecting things for the rumors that went, and hauing determined to inuade him with foure thouſand Swiſſers already come to Nouaro, together with the faction of the Adorneys and the Fieſquois, the Pope was the cauſe that the enterpriſe paſſed no further.

Octauian Fregoſa Duke of Genes compounds with the French king.

This was the capitulation of Octauian Fregoſa: That the towne and iuriſdiction of Genes ſhould be rendred to the King, together with the Caſtle: That Octauian ſhould beare no more the name of Duke, but take vpon him the name of perpetuall Gouernor of Genes for the King, with power to diſpoſe of the offices of Genes: That the King ſhould giue vnto him an hundred men at armes, the Order of Saint Michael, and a yearely penſion during his life: That the King ſhould not reedifie the fortreſſe of Codifa, which was very hatefull to the Genowayes, and ſhould grant to that Citie all thoſe capitulations and priuiledges which had bene reuerſed and burned by King Lewis: That he ſhould giue a certaine proportion of Eccleſiaſticall reuenues to Federike Archbiſhop of Salerne brother to Octauian, and to himſelfe certaine places in Prouence, if euer it hapned that he were driuen out of Genes. When theſe matters were ſpread abroad, it was not hard for Octauian to iuſtifie his reſolution, for that it was diſcerned of all men, that he had great reaſon to feare the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers: and that which herein was onely found euill, was, that he had ſo many times denied the truth to the Pope, of whom he had receiued ſo many good turnes, and had broken his promiſe, in entring into couenants without his priuitie. And yet in a long letter which he wrote to him afterwards for his iuſtification, wherein he diſcourſed at large the cauſes that had moued him, together with all the excuſes wherewith he might defend his honour with him, and that which he had done; and declared vnto him that it was not done in contempt of the reſpect and deuotion which he owed him, as being Pope, and his benefactor: his concluſion was, that it would be more hard for him to be iuſtified, if he ſhould write to perſons priuate, or to any Prince that meaſured the affaires of eſtate according to priuate regards; but that writing to a Prince as wiſe as any that liued at that time, and who in his wiſedome knew that he could not otherwiſe ſaue his Eſtate, that it was a matter ſuperfluous to offer excuſes to him that ſo well vnderſtood and knew what was lawfull to Princes, or at leaſt what they haue bene wont to do, not onely when they were reduced to ſuch a neceſſitie, but alſo when there was queſtion of the increaſing or making better the condition of their Eſtate.

But now matters were come from words and counſels to deeds and executions. For the King who was come to Lions accompanied with all the Nobilitie of France, and with the Dukes of Lorraine and Gueldres, cauſed his armie to march towards Italy, which was the moſt mightie and flouriſhing hoaſt that had bene ſeene of a long time: and he was aſſured to haue no troubles beyond the Mounts, for that the King of Aragon, who fearing at firſt leſt ſo great preparations might be turned againſt him, had armed his frontiers, and perpetually vnited the Realme of Nauarre to the kingdome of Caſtile, to the end that his peoples might be the more ready to defend it: and as ſoone as he had credible vnderſtanding, that the warre ſhould be made in Italy, he diſmiſſed all the companies he had leuied, holding no more reckoning of his promiſe made the ſame yeare to the Confederates to make warre vpon France, then he had done of all other couenants and contracts made to them the yeares before. At the bruite of the deſcent of the French king, the Viceroy of Naples, who hauing bene many moneths as it were in truce with the Venetians, being come into the countrey of Vincenſa, to draw neare to the enemies that lay incamped in a very ſtrong place neare to Ormes which is not farre from Vincenſa: he remoued his armie to Verona, to go (as he ſaid) to the ſuccours of the Duke of Millan: and the Pope diſpatched into Lombardie his companies of men at armes, with the regiments of the Florentines, vnder the gouernment of his brother, choſen Captaine of the Church, to miniſter aide likewiſe to the ſame State, according to his reſolution not many dayes before with the other Confederates: although continuing ſtill in his accuſtomed faire ſhewes, he gaue out that he ſent them onely for the guard of Plaiſance, Parma and Reggia; and he had proceeded ſo farre with the Embaſſadours of the French king, that the King vndoubtedly perſwading himſelfe that he would fall to accord with him, had diſpatched from Lions to his Embaſſadours, commiſſion and authoritie to conclude, conſenting that the Church ſhould retaine Plaiſance and Parma vntill ſuch time as he ſhould giue ſuch a recompence as the Pope ſhould hold himſelfe contented. But for the cauſes that ſhall be ſhewed hereafter, all theſe remedies were to no end: for it was deſtinated that the defence or loſſe of the Duchie of Millan ſhould be performed onely with the danger and bloud of the Swiſſers, who not ſtaying for any negligence, or ſmall quantitie of money, deſcended continually into the Duchie of Millan, ſo that there was already arriued aboue twentie thouſand, of whom ten thouſand were drawne neare to the mountaines, according to a counſell amongſt them, to keepe againſt the French the ſtraight paſſages of thoſe valleys, which being at the foote of the Alpes that deuide Italy from France, come to open themſelues vpon the plaines of Lombardie. This counſell of the Swiſſers troubled greatly the mind of the King, who afore had promiſed to himſelfe an aſſured victory by reaſon of the greatneſſe of his forces, which was ſuch, that he had in his armie two thouſand and fiue hundred lances, two and twentie thouſand Lanceknights led by the Duke of Gueldres, ten thouſand Baſques (ſo were the footmen of Peter Nauarre called,) eight thouſand French men, and three thouſand labourers that were payed according to the rate of the other footmen. The King conſidered with his Captains, that in regard of the valour of the Swiſſers, it was impoſſible to driue them from thoſe ſtraight and ſtrong paſſages, but with a farre greater number: of whom notwithſtanding ſmall vſe could be made in thoſe ſtraight places, and it would be very hard to do any matter of conſequence in ſhort time, and more difficult to remaine any long ſeaſon with ſo great an armie, in a countrey ſo barren, although there came continually towards the mountaines great ſtore of victuals. Amid theſe difficulties, ſome of the Captaines that were of opinion rather to diuert and draw them away then to ſet vpon them, gaue counſell to ſend out eight hundred lances through Prouence, and Peter Nauarre by ſea with his ten thouſand Baſques which ſhould all ioyne together at Sauona. Others were of opinion that to go ſo farre about were to loſe too much time, that it would weaken the armie, and increaſe too much the reputation of the enemies, for that it would be giuen out that they had not the courage to encounter with them. Then it was reſolued, that retiring not much from the ordinary way, they ſhould ſeeke out ſome other paſſage, that was not guarded by the enemies, or at leaſt not ſo carefully: and that Emard de Prio with foure hundred lances and fiue thouſand footmen ſhould take the way to Genes, not in hope to diuert them, but to make warre vpon Alexandria and the other townes beyond the riuer of Po.

The Swiſſers ſeek to ſtop the paſſage of the Frenchmen.

The French armie.

There be two wayes in the Alpes that leade ordinarily from Lions into Italy; that of Montſenis (this mountaine is in the iuriſdiction of the Duke of Sauoy) which is the ſhorteſt, the ſtraighteſt, and the moſt beaten way: and that of mount Geneura (this mountaine is in the iuriſdiction of Dauphiney) which is the longer way, and leades by turnings to Grenoble. Both the one and the other direct to Suſa, where the plaine beginneth to enlarge: but the French armies are alwayes wont to paſſe by the mount Geneura, notwithſtanding it be ſomewhat the longer way, becauſe it is more eaſie to paſſe, and more conuenient to draw the artilleries. Now the Swiſſers being carefull to keepe theſe two wayes, and the other paſſages thereabouts, were lodged at Suſa, for that the paſſages which be lower drawing towards the ſea, were ſo ſtraight and rough, that it being very hard for the horſes of ſo great an armie to paſſe thereby, it ſeemed the artilleries could by no meanes be carried. On the other ſide, Triuulce, to whom the King had giuen that charge, being followed with a great multitude of pioners, and hauing about him men induſtrious and experienced in drawing of artilleries, whom he ſent to view thoſe places, went ſearching theſe paſſages, if any meanes could be found to paſſe without impediment of the Swiſſers: by which occaſion, the armie that for the moſt part was diſperſed betweene Grenoble and Brianſon, marched ſlowly, expecting what would be determined, whereunto unto they were alſo conſtrained by a neceſſitie to attend the prouiſions of victuals.

About this time a Gentleman ſent by the King of England, came to the French king, who was now departed frō Lions, to exhort him on the behalf of his King, that he ought not to paſſe into Italy for feare to trouble the vniuerſall peace of Chriſtendome. The cauſe of this alteration was, that that King being diſcontent with the alliance made by the French King with the Archduke, fearing leſt his affaires would take too happie a courſe, had ſince begun to lend an yeare to the Embaſſadours of the King Catholike, who ceaſſed not to put into his mind how hurtfull the greatneſſe of the French king would be to him, who, both by a naturall hatred, and for that he had made his firſt actions of warre againſt him, could be no other then a great enemy to him. But that which moſt moued him, was the emulation & enuie of his glorie, which he thought would be much raiſed if he got the victory in the State of Millan: remembring that he, notwithſtanding he found his kingdome in reſt, and very rich for the long peace it had enioyed, together with ſo great a maſſe of treaſure which his father had gathered, that he neuer had not for all ỹ the courage til within certain yeares, to inuade the French king, alone & enuironed with ſo many enemies, and wearied with ſo many aduerſities: That now the French King, ſomewhat yonger then he was at ſuch time as he came to the Crowne, although he found his kingdome ouerwearied and made poore with ſo many warres, durſt yet in the firſt moneths of his reigne, go to an enterpriſe, for the which ſo many Princes were banded againſt him: That touching himſelfe, with all his huge preparations, and ſo many occaſions, he had brought into England no other profite then the Citie of Tournay, and that with expences intollerable and infinite: but that the French king would returne with great glorie into his kingdome, by the conqueſt of ſo faire a Duchie, whereof it was thought he would carry the victory, and would alſo open a way to paſſe further, and haply take the occaſion afore he retired his armie out of Italy to inuade the Realme of Naples. Theſe were the motions that eaſily renewed in his mind the ancient hatred: but becauſe he could not as yet giue impediment to the French king with armes (whereof haply he ſought ſome occaſion or colour) he thought good to ſend him this meſſage: for the which the King not forbearing to march, tooke his way from Lions to Dauphiney, where he met with the armie of the Lanceknights, otherwiſe called the blacke bands, guided by Robert de la Marche, together with all the low Almaines, ſo greatly eſteemed for their valour, and for the loyaltie which they had alwayes ſhewed in the French ſeruices.

The king of England ſends to the French king not to paſſe into Italy

The king of England ſends to the French

At this time Iohn Iaques Triuulce aduertiſed the King that his artilleries might be carried ouer the Mounts, betweene the maritime Alpes and the Coctien hils deſcending towards the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa: and that although the paſſage was full of maruellous great difficulties, yet by the ſtrength of men and inſtruments it might in the end be accompliſhed: and becauſe there was not on that ſide, nor on the tops of the mountaines, nor in the entrie of the valleys any guard, that it was better to aſſay to ouercome the ruggedneſſe of the mountains and the ſteepnes of the valleys, which was a matter that might be done with paine, but without any danger of men, then to aſſay to winne the paſſages from the Swiſſers, who were ſo much redoubted, being reſolued either to vanquiſh or die, ſeeing withall they could not ſtay there many dayes, if any reſiſtance were made, for that no power or preparation was able to bring through places ſo impaſſable and barren, ſufficient prouiſion of victuals to feed ſo many mouthes. Which counſell being allowed and followed, the artillery that lay in a place conuenient to be turned on all parts, began immediatly to march that way. Triuulce had aduertiſed the King that the difficultie to paſſe the artilleries was very great, but when it was put to action, it was found yet more hard: for firſt they muſt of neceſſitie mount vpon very rough and high mountaines, and that not without extreme difficultie, for that there were no paths or wayes, and ſometimes not ſo much largeneſſe of roomth as was capable of the artilleries, but ſuch as was made by the aide of pioners from hand to hand, of whom there were a great number that marched before, whoſe ſeruice was readie, ſometimes to enlarge the ſtraits, and ſometimes to digge vp the hillocks and lumpes of earth that gaue impediment. From the tops of thoſe mountaines they deſcended by very ſteepe cliffes, whoſe onely aſpect gaue feare to the beholders, into moſt deepe valleys of the riuer of Argentiero. By the difficultie of theſe cliffes oftentimes the artilleries could not be ſuſtained, neither with the horſes that drew them, whoſe number was great, nor with the ſhoulders of the labourers that guided them, and therefore very often they were

driuen to diſmount them, and faſtening them to great cables, they found a way to make them deſcend by the hands of the footmen, who in ſo great difficulties tooke maruellous paines, refuſing no trauell. And yet the labour ceaſſed not when they had ouercome the firſt mountaines and the firſt valleys, for that they found others, which of neceſſitie they muſt paſſe with the ſame difficulties. At the laſt, about the end of fiue dayes, the artillerie was brought ouer the mountaines into the open places of the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa: but with ſo many difficulties, that it is moſt certaine, if they had found any reſiſtance, or if the mountaines had bene couered with ſnowes, as they were wont to be the moſt part of the yeare, they had taken in vaine ſo great trauell. But that which deliuered them from the reſiſtance and impediments of men, was, that no man beleeued that euer they could bring the artilleries by ſuch troubleſome and impaſſable mountaines; and the Swiſſers lodged at Suſa, were carefull to guard the places which muſt be paſſed by ſuch as deſcend the mount Senis, the mount Geneura, or the mountaines adioyning to them: the ſeaſon of the yeare alſo, being then vpon the tenth of Auguſt, had taken from them the impediment of ſnowes which were already melted. At the ſame time paſſed the men at armes and bands of footmen, not without the ſame difficulties, ſome by that way, and ſome by the paſſage called la Dragoniera, and the reſidue by the high tops of the rocke Perotta and of Cunie, paſſages more lower towards Prouence: by the which Monſieur de Paliſſa being paſſed, an occaſion was offered him to do an act worthy of memory. For, departing frō Singlaro with foure cornets of light horſemen, after he had marched long and with great diligence by the guiding of the countrey men, he arriued before they had ſuſpition of him at Villefranch, a towne ſeuen miles from Saluſſa, and of which there goeth a fame farre greater then the qualitie of the towne requireth, for that the head of that notable riuer of Po riſeth out of a place very neare it. In that towne lay lodged with his companies Proſper Colonno, fearing nothing for the farre diſtance of the enemies, in whom he expected not that diligence & celeritie, which himſelfe being of nature ſlow and heauie, had not wont to vſe; and ſome ſay that he meant to haue departed the ſame day to ioyne himſelfe with the Swiſſers. But howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that he was ſet at the table at dinner, when the ſouldiers of Monſieur de Paliſſa arriued, who were not diſcerned of any till they were neare the houſe: for as much as thoſe of the towne, with whom Monſieur de Paliſſa, thirſting after ſo goodly a prey, had firſt ſecretly conſpired, had with as much ſilence as they could, ſeized vpon the ſcouts & ſentinels. And thus Proſper Colonno, a Captaine of ſo great name, and who as well for his authoritie, as for the credite he had in the Duchie of Millan, was of great importance for this warre, was made priſoner the fifteenth day of Auguſt, farre otherwiſe then appertained to his ancient glorie. Peter Margano a Romane was taken with him, and part of his companie, and the reſidue at the firſt bruit diſperſed themſelues and fled into diuers places.

The paſſage of the French and the taking of Proſper Colonno, changed the counſels of euery one, and the whole eſtate of all affaires, cauſing new diſpoſitions in the minds of the Pope, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Swiſſers. For the Pope, who conſtantly perſwaded himſelfe, that the French king could not paſſe the Mounts for the impediments of the Swiſſers, and truſted much in the vertue of Proſper Colonno, being now quite diſcouraged, commanded his nephew Laurence, Captaine generall of the Florentines, to march but ſlowly, to whom he had giuen in charge to leade the armie into Lombardie, for that Iulian his brother was conſtrained to abide at Florence by reaſon of a long feuer which came vpon him. Who being come to Modena three dayes after the taking of Proſper, tooke occaſion to recouer the Rocke of Rubiera that had bene occupied by Guido Rangon, for the which he payed him at laſt two thouſand ducats, and conſumed many dayes in the countrey of Modena and Reggia. Moreouer, the Pope hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed ſubtilties, diſpatched very ſecretly to the French King, Cintio his familiar friend, to excuſe himſelfe of the things that had bene paſſed till that day, and to begin, by the meanes of the Duke of Sauoy, to ſolicite a compoſition with him, to the end that by that beginning he might haue more facilitie to paſſe further, if the defence of the Duchie of Millan ſucceeded not well. But the Cardinall of Bibiena and certaine others who were caried more by their priuate paſſions then by the intereſts of their Prince, induced him to take a very raſh counſell. For declaring vnto him that there was danger, leſt by the fame of the happie ſucceſſe of the French, and by the perſwaſions and haply by the aide of the King, the Duke of Ferrara would now ſtirre to recouer Modena and Reggia, and the Bentiuoleis to returne into Bolognia:

lognia: and that amid ſo many other troubles, it would be very hard to contend againſt ſo great a number of enemies: but that it was a farre better and without doubt a more wiſe counſell, to labour to winne them with ſome propertie of benefite, and in all euents to make them his aſſured friends: they aduiſed him to reeſtabliſh the family of the Bentiuolois in Bologna, and to reſtore to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia: which he had preſently put in execution; if Iulio de Medicis Cardinall and Legate of Bologna (whom the Pope had ſent thither, to the end that in ſo great troubles he might ſuſtaine things in thoſe parts, and was as it were moderator and counſellor of the youth of Laurence,) had not bene of a contrary opinion: who being touched with diſpleaſure, for the reproch that would haue fallen vpon the Pope by a counſell ſo full of cowardiſe, which no doubt would haue bene greater then had bene the glorie of Iulio in getting to the Church ſo great a iuriſdiction, and being moued with griefe, for that it would make the memory of his legation infamous, for that being ſcarcely entred thereinto, he ſhould reſtore Bologna, the principall Citie of all the Eccleſiaſtike State, into the power of her ancient tyrants, leauing as a prey ſo great a Nobilitie, which in fauour of the ſea of Rome had openly conſpired againſt them: and therefore hauing diſpatched an expreſſe meſſenger to the Pope, he brought him again with reaſons and requeſts, to a counſell more honorable and ſafe. Although Iulio was a baſtard, yet he was made Cardinall by Leo in the firſt moneths of his Pontificacie, following the example of Alexander the ſixt in the effect, but not in the maner. For, Alexander at ſuch time as he created Ceſar Borgia his ſonne Cardinall, cauſed to be proued by witneſſes that depoſed the truth, that his mother at the time that ſhe was conceiued of him, had an husband, inferring thereupon, that according to the meaning of the lawes, the ſonne ought to be iudged to be begotten rather by the husband then by the adulterer: but touching Iulio, the witneſſes preferred the fauour of men afore the truth, for that it was proued that the mother of whom he was begotten, being yet a damzell and not married, afore ſhe conſented to the will of his father Iulian, had obtained of him a ſecret promiſe of marriage.

Theſe new accidents were likewiſe the cauſe that the Viceroy behaued himſelfe farre otherwiſe then he would haue done: who being not yet departed from Verona, for that he could not make his ſouldiers march without money, and becauſe he expected new companies promiſed by Ceſar who was now come to Inſpruch, to the end to leaue ſufficient garriſon within Verona and Breſſia as need required, he began with theſe and other excuſes to temporize and deferre, to ſee what would happen to the Duchie of Millan. Theſe matters alſo moued the Swiſſers, who retired to Pinaruolo immediatly after the paſſage of the French armie: and albeit vnderſtanding afterwards that the King who was paſſed the Mounts, muſtered his people at Thurin, they were gone to Ciuas, and had taken and ſacked it, for that they refuſed to furniſh them with victuals, and afterwards done the like at Verceil almoſt afore the Kings eyes, who was then at Thurin: yet being at laſt drawne into Nouara, and thoſe factions of them that were not ſo farre eſtranged from the French amities, taking courage and diſcloſing themſelues the more for their aduerſities, they began to treate of peace with the French king. About this time, thoſe regiments of the French which came by the way of Genes, with whom were ioyned foure thouſand footemen waged by the Genowayes by the working of Octauian Fregoſa, entring firſt into the towne of Caſtellaccio, and then into Alexandria and Tortona, in which townes there was not one ſouldier, became Lords of the whole countrey on this ſide Po: and the King who was come to Verdait, and had there the firſt aduertiſement that the Pope was declared againſt him, which the Duke of Sauoy ſignified vnto him in his name; albeit he chafed extreamely, yet (counſell and iudgement being not troubled and hindered by diſdaine) to the end not to prouoke him, he cauſed to be proclaimed publikly, as well through his armie, as amongſt the regiments that had taken Alexandria, that no man ſhould be ſo bold as to moleſt or inuade in any ſort the lands of the Church. Afterwards the King remained many days at Verceil expecting the iſſue of thoſe things that were treated with the Swiſſers, who intermitted not the debating of matters, but on the other ſide ſhewed themſelues full of varietie and confuſion. For at Nouara, they began to fall into tumult, becauſe the money which the King of Aragon was bound to pay them was not yet come, and tooke by force from the officers of the Pope the money which he had ſent them, and with the ſame fury departed from Nouara, with intention to returne into their countrey: a matter which many among them deſired, who hauing bene already three moneths

in Italy, and laden with money and bootie, desired to conuey in safetie to their houses the riches they had gotten. But they were scarcely gone out of Nouaro, when the money which was due for the King of Aragons portion, was sent: the which although they had seized vpon as soone as it came, yet when they considered how shamefull such rash deliberations were, and being somewhat returned to themselues, they restored both the one and the other summes, to receiue them according to the accustomed manner at the hands of the officers. Afterwards they went to Galera, expecting another strength of twentie thousand footmen which was said to be newly arriued, and three thousand went with the Cardinall of Sion to be employed for the guard of Pauie. By which occasion, the King (the hope of agreement diminishing by these variations) departed from Verceil to go towards Millan, leauing in Verceil with the Duke of Sauoy, the bastard brother of the Duke, Monsieur de Lautrech, and the General of Millan, to continue the parley begun with the Swissers: and after the departing of the Swissers out of Nouaro, the Citie being brought to his obedience, he left the Castle besieged, which being battered by the artilleries, yeelded within few dayes, reseruing the liues and goods of those that kept it. Afterwards the King, to whom Pauie yeelded, passed the riuer of Thesin, and the same day Iohn Iaques Triuulce ran vp with part of his companies to S. Christopher neare to Millan, & afterwards euen to the suburbes of the gate of Thesin, hoping to be receiued by them of the towne, who being ill contented with the pillages and oppressions of the Swissers and Spaniards, desired to returne vnder the iurisdiction of the French: and also for that the towne was naked of souldiers. But the people of Millan stood in great feare of the Swissers, and the memory was yet fresh of the afflictions they had suffered the yeare before, when for the retrait of the Swissers from Nouaro, they mutined in fauour of the King. Therefore reioluing to expect the issue of things, notwithstanding they wished the victory to fal to the King, they sent to Triuulce to desire him to passe no further, and the next day dispatched Embassadors to the King being yet at Busaloro, to beseech him, that resting contented with the disposition of the people of Millan, wel affected to his Crowne, and readie to furnish him with victuals, he would not demand of them a more manifest declaration, which would stand him in no stead for the substance of the warre, no more then their declaratiõ the yeare before had helped his predecessor, which brought vpõ them great domages: That he should march on happily, and vanquish his enemies, assuring himself that the towne of Millan should be readie to open their gates to receiue him when he should be maister of the field: whereunto the King, receiuing them with good countenance, albeit at the first he was displeased that they had not receiued Triuulce, answered, that he was content to yeeld vnto their demands.

From Busaloro the King marched with his armie to Biagrassa, and whilest he remained there, the Duke of Sauoy, (after he had giuen audience to twentie Embassadours of the Swissers that were sent vnto him at Verceil, and going afterwards to Galera accompanied with the Bastard and others deputed by the King,) contracted a peace with the Swissers in the Kings name, vnder these conditions: That there should be betweene the French king and the nation of Swisserse a perpetuall peace during the Kings life and ten yeares after his death: That the Swissers and the Grisons should make restitution of those vallies appertaining to the Duchie of Millan which they had occupied: and that they should discharge and acquit that Estate of a bond to pay yearely a pension of fortie thousand duckats: That the King should endue Maximilian Sforce with the Duchie of Nemours, with a yearely pension of twelue thousand frankes, a companie of fiftie Lances, and a wife of the blood royall: That he should restore to the Swissers the ancient pension of fortie thousand franks, and defray the pay of three moneths to all the bands of Swisserse that were then in Lombardie, or on the way to come thither? That he should pay to the Cantons (at certaine termes) the sixe hundred thousand crownes promised in the accord of Dyon, and three hundred thousand for the restitution of the valleys: That he should entertaine continually in his pay foure thousand of them. In this peace were named by common consent, the Pope, so farre forth as he would render Parma and Plaisance, the Emperour, the Duke of Sauoy, and the Marquis of Montferrat, without making any mention of the King Catholike, nor of the Venetians, nor of any other Italian. But this peace was made and broken almost in one and the same day, by the coming of new bands of Swissers, who being insolent and confident for the memory of the victories past, hoped to carry away by that warre no lesse riches, then such as they saw their countrimen loaden withall; and for that cause would in no wise

heare ſpeake of peace, but to hinder and breake it, they refuſed to reſtore the valleys: in ſo much as the firſt Swiſſers being not able to withdraw them from this eagerneſſe, fiue and thirtie thouſand of them drew to Monſo to lie in the ſuburbes of Millan, Alberto Peter a notable Captaine going from them with many enſignes by the way of Coma, which way the King of purpoſe had left free and open. Thus the peace being almoſt as ſoone broken as made, things returned to the ſame difficulties and doubts, yea farre greater, by reaſon of the new armies and forces that were approched neare the Duchie of Millan. For, the Viceroy leauing for the guard of Verona Marke Anthonie Colonno with an hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand Lanceknights; and twelue hundred Lanceknights in Breſſia, was come at laſt to lodge vpon Po neare to Plaiſance, hauing in his armie ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, with a bridge prepared to paſſe the riuer. And to leaue him no occaſion to complaine, Laurence de Medicis who had with great induſtrie remained many daies at Parma with the armie, wherein there was ſeuen hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, was come to Plaiſance: who had ſent afore foure hundred light horſemen to the Swiſſers whileſt they treated of the accord, to ſerue them to fetch in victuals; which he did at their requeſt, which foure hundred light horſemen were guided by Marco Colonno and Lodowike Count de Petillano, the one a Captain of the Church, and the other a Commander of the Florentines; whom he ſent not ſo much for any deſire he had to aide the common cauſe, as to giue no occaſion to the Swiſſers not to comprehend the Pope within the peace if they accorded with the French king. On the other ſide, Bartlemew Aluiano, who had ſent word to the King that he would ſo intangle the Spaniſh armie, that they ſhould haue no meanes to hurt him, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the Viceroy was departed from Verona, he went from Poleſina de Rouigna, and paſſed the riuer of Adice; and marching all along Po with nine hundred men at armes, foureteene hundred light horſemen, nine thouſand footmen, and with ſufficient prouiſion of artillerie, he came with great diligence neare the walls of Cremona: of which diligence, vnuſuall among the Captaines of our time, Aluiano himſelfe tooke ſuch glorie, that in his vaunting he was wont to compare it with the celeritie of Claudius Nero, when, to make head againſt Aſdrubal, he led the ſwifteſt part of his armie vpon the riuer of Metauro. Thus the ſtate of the warre was not onely diuers and variable, but alſo confuſed and much intangled. On the one ſide, the French king was neare vnto Millan with an army appointed and furniſhed of all things, who was come to Marignan to giue facilitie to Aluiano to ioyne with him, and to let the vniting of the Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh companies with the enemies: and on the other ſide lay fiue and thirtie thouſand Swiſſers, which was a force of footmen full of valour, who till that day could neuer be vanquiſhed by the French. The Viceroy kept along the ſhores of Po neare to Plaiſance, and vpon the way adioyning that leades to Loda, hauing a bridge readie dreſſed to paſſe the riuer, to the end to ioyne with the Swiſſers: and Laurence de Medicis was gotten into Plaiſance with the regiments of the Pope and the Florentines, to ioyne with the Viceroy to the ſame ends: and Aluiano a circumſpect and reſolute Captaine, lay with the Venetian armie vpon the territories of Cremona, almoſt vpon the banke of Po, to aide the French king, either by ioyning with him, or by drawing away the Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh regiments. The Citie of Loda which ſtandeth in the mid way betweene Millan and Plaiſance, and of an equall diſtance from them both, ſtood abandoned of each part. It had bene ſacked before by Ranſe de Cere who had entred into it as a ſouldier to the Venetians, and who for quarrels ariſing betweene him and Aluiano, had afore, with proteſtations and almoſt with threats, got leaue of the Senate to depart, and was entred into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horſemen. But for that his ſouldiers could not follow him with that ſpeed, by reaſon the Venetians would not ſuffer many of them to depart from Padua where they lay, he went from Loda, to fill vp his numbers with thoſe companies wherewith he had bene retained. And the Cardinall of Sion, who being amazed with the practiſes which his people held with the French King, and by the wauering eſtate of the Citie of Millan, was fled to Plaiſance with a thouſand Swiſſers and with part of the regiments of the Duke of Millan, and afterwards went to Cremona to ſolicite the Viceroy to march on: and being on the way towards Millan, before that ſide was occupied by the French king, he left certaine of his companies for the guard of Loda; who when they heard that the French king was come to Marignan, abandoned the place for feare. But whileſt the Viceroy lay vpon the riuer of Po, and before Laurence de Medicis came to Plaiſance, Cintio whom the Pope had ſent to the French King, was taken by the ſouldiers of the Viceroy, who finding about him Briefes and letters of credite, although he let him ſuddenly paſſe, for the reuerence he bare to him that ſent him, yet he entred into great doubt, that the hope that had bene giuen him, that the Church armie that was ioyned with him would paſſe the riuer of Po, was but vaine: and ſo much the more, for that at the ſame time Laurence de Medicis was detected to haue ſent ſecretly to the French king one of his men; which he did either of his owne motion, or by the commandement of the Pope; to excuſe himſelfe for that he led the armie againſt him, being conſtrained by a neceſſitie to obey the Pope; but that as much as he might, without incenſing his vnkle, or ſtaining his owne honour, he would endeuour himſelfe to content him, and giue him ſatisfaction, as he had alwayes had a deſire to do, and now more then euer. Now when Laurence was come to Plaiſance, there began a diſputation betweene the Viceroy and him, with others that ſate with them in counſell, whether it were beſt to paſſe ouer the riuer of Po all together to ioyne with the Swiſſers, amongſt whom were produced diuers reaſons. Such as perſwaded to paſſe the riuer, ſaid, there was no reaſon to diſſwade them from going into Loda, for that being there, they might let Aluiano for ioyning with the French armie; and for their owne parts, they ſhould haue good oportunitie to vnite themſelues with the Swiſſers, either in going to Millan to meet them, or elſe the Swiſſers coming towards them: and if the French men came to get it (as the bruite went they would) being already vpon the way betweene Loda and Millan, they ſhould haue vpon their backes both their armies ioyned together, which would put them in trouble and danger: and that haply it would not be hard to find meanes to ioyne with the Swiſſers, notwithſtanding they ſhould be driuen to make a greater circuite: That this reſolution was very profitable, yea neceſſary to the enterpriſe, both to take from the Swiſſers all occaſions of new practiſes of accord, and to increaſe their forces with ſuch things as they ſtood in need of againſt ſo great an armie, and chiefly of horſes: That beſides this, the faith and honour as well of the Pope as of the King Catholike did ſo require, both for that the capitulations bound them to ſuccour the Eſtate of Millan, and that they had often promiſed no leſſe to the Swiſſers, who finding themſelues diſappointed of aſſured friends, might take occaſion to become moſt dangerous enemies: That it was neceſſary for the intereſt and regard of their owne Eſtates, for that the Swiſſers either loſing the battell, or making accord with the French king, there would remaine no force in Italy able to let him from ouerrunning the whole eſtate of the Church, euen to Rome it ſelfe. On the contrary were produced many reaſons, whereof this was the chiefe, that it was not credible that the French king had not alreadie ſent a great ſtrength of ſouldiers to Loda; and if it were ſo, they would be driuen to retire with ſhame, and haply not without danger, ſince they ſtood ſubiect to haue at one time the French and the Venetians either in front or in flanke: and that they could not repaſſe the bridge without confuſion & long tract of time: That ſuch a danger were not to be reiected, if the prize & the recõpence were very great. But although they ſhould be entred into Loda being abandoned, what profite could grow by the enterpriſe? how could they lay their plot, either to go and vnite themſelues with the Swiſſers, or the Swiſſers to come and ioyne with them, there being ſo mightie an armie between Millan and Loda? And beſides, haply it was not a counſell aſſured, to put into the hands of men ſo raſh and vnreaſonable, all the forces of the Pope and the King Catholike, ſeeing the greateſt part of them had made peace with the French king, and were at diſcord with their companions. At laſt it was reſolued, that the firſt day both the armies ſhould paſſe ouer Po without any baggage or cariage, leauing ſufficient garriſon within Parma and Plaiſance, for feare of the Venetian armie, whoſe light horſemen euen at that time had made incurſions and pillages through the countrey. But this reſolution was not ſincerely executed by any of the parties, for that each of them thought in making ſhew to be willing to paſſe, to lay the fault vpon another without putting himſelfe in danger. For the Viceroy that was already entred into ſuſpition for the going away of Cintio, and knowing well enough with what cunning the Pope proceeded in his affaires, was of opinion, that his will was that Laurence ſhould paſſe no further: and Laurence conſidering how hardly the Viceroy was drawne to commit his armie to the power of fortune, gaue of another the ſame iudgement that others gaue of him. In the afternoone the Spaniſh bands began to paſſe the bridge, whom the Church armie was appointed to follow with ſpeed: but by reaſon of the night that came vpon them, they deferred by neceſſitie vntill the next morning, and not onely they paſſed not, but alſo the Viceroy retired with his armie on this ſide the riuer, being aduertiſed by a ſcout of foure hundred light horſemen ſent out from both the armies to eſpie the enemies and their doings, that an hundred French lances were entred into Loda the day before: ſo that the Viceroy and Laurence returning to their firſt lodgings, Aluiano went with his armie to Loda.

About this time the French King departed from Marignan to lodge at Saint Donato, and the Swiſſers retired to Millan, one part whereof being vnwilling to heare of warre, and the other of peace, there aroſe oftentimes amongſt them diſputes and tumults. But at laſt, as they were one day aſſembled all together, the Cardinal of Sion began with words ful of affectiō & vehemency, to incite them without any more deferring to iſſue out ẏ ſame day to aſſaile the French king, & ẏ they ſhould not ſtand ſo much vpon the number of horſmen & artilleries of the enemy, as thereby to forget the ancient valour of the Swiſſers, and the victories which they had obtained againſt the French. Hath our nation (ſaid he) ſuſtained ſo many paines, bene expoſed to ſo many dangers, powred out ſo much bloud, to the end to leaue (in one day) ſo great glorie, and ſuch a reputation, to the enemies that haue ſo often bene vanquiſhed by vs? Are not theſe the ſame French men who being ioyned with vs haue obtained ſo many victories, but ſeparate frō vs, haue bene continually vanquiſhed of euery one? Are not theſe the very ſame who the laſt yeare were ouerthrown at Nouaro with ſo great glory by a ſmal cōpany of vs? Be not theſe they, who aſtoniſhed at our valour, & confuſed for their owne cowardize, haue exalted to the heauens the name of the Swiſſers? famous when we were conioyned with them, but more famous being ſeparate from them? Thoſe that were at Nouaro had neither horſes nor artilleries, and yet without expecting the ſuccours that were to come, they ranne with Captaine Motin (the ornament and glorie of the Swiſſers) to charge the French men euen in their tents, and without fearing their artilleries, ouerthrew them, and ſlue together with them ſo many Lanceknights, as they blunted their weapons and wearied their armes: and do you beleeue that now they wil haue the courage to abide fortie thouſand Swiſſers, an armie ſo valiant and ſo puiſſant, that it is able to meete in the field with all the reſidue of the world ioyned together? Be you aſſured, they will flie at the very noiſe of your coming, and that their coming to Millan is not in confidence of their owne valour, but onely through an hope they haue of your diuiſions. The perſon and preſence of their King cannot ſtay them, for as much as being in feare to put his life and Eſtate in danger, he will be the firſt that will looke to his ſafetie, and will ſerue as example to the reſidue to do the like. If with this armie, that is to ſay, with the forces of the whole countrey of Swiſſerland, you haue not the courage to ſet vpon them, with what forces can you haue hope to be able to reſiſt them? To what end are we deſcended into Lombardie? & wherfore come to Millan, if we ſhall be feareful to go charge our enemies? What ſhall become of the braue words and proud threats which we haue vſed all this yeare, when we vaunted that we would deſcend into Burgundie, and reioyced for the accord of the Engliſh King, and the Popes inclination to confederate with the French King, eſteeming our glorie would be ſo much the greater, by how much all thoſe great Princes were ioyned in conſpiracie againſt the State of Millan? It had bene better we had not enioyed the yeares before ſo many honorable victories, nor chaſed the French out of Italy, and to haue contained our ſelues within the termes of our ancient renowne, if now deceiuing the expectation of all men, we ſhall proceed with an vniuerſall cowardiſe. Now is the world to iudge, whether our vertue was the cauſe of our victorie at Nouaro, or our fortune. If we ſhew our ſelues fearfull of our enemies, euery one will aſcribe it either to chance or to temeritie: but if we ſhal vſe the ſame vertue, all men wil confeſſe, that it was our valor, and hauing (as doubtleſſe we ſhall) the ſame ſucceſſe, we ſhall not onely be feared and redoubted by the people of this age, but alſo be admired and recommended by poſterities to come, by the iudgement and praiſes of whom the name of the Swiſſers ſhall be raiſed aboue that great name of the Romanes, for that it is not read of them, that they haue euer vſed ſuch a reſolute hardineſſe, nor gotten any victory with ſo great valour, nor that euer without neceſſitie they ſet vpon their enemies with ſo great diſaduantage: but of vs may be read the battell we gaue neare to Nouaro, where, with a few ſouldiers, without artilleries, and without horſes, we put to flight a mightie armie, furniſhed with all neceſſary prouiſions, and guided by two moſt notable Captaines, the one the moſt renowmed in all France, and the other the chiefe of all Italy. We ſhall leaue behind vs alſo the memory of the encounter at S. Donato, executed on our parts with the ſame difficulties, passed not, but also the Viceroy retired with his armie on this side the riuer, being aduertised by a scout of foure hundred light horsemen sent out from both the armies to espie the enemies and their doings, that an hundred French lances were entred into Lode the day before: so that the Viceroy and Laurence returning to their first lodgings, Aluiano went with his armie to Lode.

About this time the French King departed from Marignan to lodge at Saint Donato, and the Swissers retired to Millan, one part whereof being vnwilling to heare of warre, and the other of peace, there arose oftentimes amongst them disputes and tumults. « ties, againſt the perſon of a French King, and againſt ſo many Lanceknights, who by how much « they are many in number, by ſo much will they fill and ſatisfie our hatred, and giue vs ſo « much the better occaſion to extinguiſh for euer the name of their armes, and by ſo much the « more ſhall they for euer abſtaine raſhly to compare themſelues with the Swiſſers in matters of « warre. It is not a matter certaine, but rather ſuch as ſeemes impoſſible, for many difficulties, « that we ſhould be ſuccoured by the Viceroy, or the bands of the Church, to what end then « ſhall we attend them? And beſides, their coming is not neceſſary, yea this impediment ought to « be acceptable to vs, for ỳ the glorie wil be wholy ours, together with the great ſpoiles & wealth « which are in the armie of our enemies. It is very vnlikely that Captain Motin wil cõmunicate his « glorie to ſtrangers, ſeeing he would not do it to his owne countrimen. And ſhall we be ſo « cowardly, and make ſo ſmall account of the fame of our valour, as, though they could ioyne « with vs, to attend them, to the end to communicate ſo great an honour to ſtrangers? The repu- « tation of the Swiſſers cannot endure, neither doth the eſtate of affaires require, that we ſhould « deferre, or ſtand vpon any more counſels. Let vs take the field, and preſently aſſaile « the enemies. It belongs to cowards, to whom dangers are fearfull, to conſult and ſpend « the time in counſell, and not to a nation of ſuch warlike minds as we beare, to whoſe glorie it « appertaines to make triall of the enemie as ſoone as he is diſcloſed. Therefore truſting in God, « who iuſtly purſueth the pride of the Frenchmen, take your pikes in your hands with your accu- « ſtomed courage, ſound vp your drummes, and let vs go, without loſing of time, and without « deferring an houre onely, to aduance our enſignes and ſatisfie our thirſt with the bloud of « thoſe, who by their pride ſeeke to trouble the whole world, but by their cowardiſe are alwayes « left a prey to euery one.

The Swiſſers encouraged and incited by theſe ſpeeches, ſuddenly armed themſelues with great furie: and as ſoone as they were iſſued out of the gate towards Rome, they fell into battell array; and albeit the day was almoſt ſpent, they marched with their ſquadrons towards the French armie, with ſuch cheerfulneſſe, and ſo great ſhouts, that ſuch as knew not the cauſe, might certainly haue beleeued that they had obtained ſome glorious victorie. The Captaines encouraged the ſouldiers, telling them that at what houre ſoeuer they came neare the campe of the enemies, they would ſuddenly giue the ſigne of battell, aſſuring them that they would couer the field with dead bodies, and vtterly raze out the name of the Lanceknights, and chiefly of thoſe, who prognoſticating their death, bare the blacke Enſignes. Now as in this furie they were come neare the place where the French men lay, albeit there remained no more then two houres of that day, they began the battell with a deſperate courage, charging the artilleries and fortifications of the enemies, breaking and diſperſing at this firſt charge, the bands that made head againſt them, and with their incredible valour won part of their artilleries. But the horſe- men with a great part of the armie, and the King himſelfe who was enuironed with a valiant troupe of Gentlemen, coming againſt them, their great furie was ſomewhat abated, and there began a cruell fight betweene them, which, with diuers chances, and great danger of the men at armes of France, who began to ſtagger, continued till foure houres within night, diuers French Captains lying dead on the ground, and the King himſelf, receiuing many wounds with a pike: and then, both the parties being ſo wearied, that they were no more able to hold their weapons in their hands, they ſeparated, and withdrew themſelues frõ the conflict without ſound of trum- pet, or commandement of their Captaines, and the Swiſſers incamped in the ſame place, expe- cting the next Sunne or day light, in the meane ſpace neither partie offending the other, as if there had bene a ſecret truce betweene them. But the firſt aſſault of the Swiſſers (to whom the Cardinall cauſed victuals to be brought from Millan whileſt their bodies tooke reſt) hauing ſuc- ceeded ſo happily, that there ranne a bruite throughout all Italy, that the Swiſſers had put to flight the armie of the enemies, the King conſumed not vnprofitably the reſidue of the night; for, knowing the greatneſſe of the perill, he laboured to range his artilleries into places conue- nient, to reaſſemble his horſemen, and put in order his ſquadrons of Lanceknights and Gaſcons. By this time it was day, at the beginning whereof, the Swiſſers, who not onely deſpiſed the French armie, but alſo made no reckning of al the forces of Italy knit together, recontinued their charge vpon the enemies with the ſame furie, and very raſhly: who entertaining them valiantly, but with more diſcretion and better order, the Swiſſers found themſelues beaten partly by the artilleries and partly by the crosbowes of the Gaſcons, and withall charged by the horſemen,

ſo that they were battered both in front and in flanke. Beſides, at the riſing of the Sunne came Aluiano, whom the King had ſent for ouer night, bringing with him his light horſemen and the moſt ſpeedie part of his armie: he arriued at ſuch time as the fight was moſt cloſe and furious, and all things reduced into greateſt trauell and danger: and hauing the reſidue of his armie coming on in due courſe, he ſet furiouſly vpon the backes of the Swiſſers; who, notwithſtanding they alwayes maintained the fight with great valour and reſolution, yet ſeeing the braue reſiſtance that was made, and that the Venetian armie was now arriued, they began to deſpaire of the victory, ſo that the Sunne hauing now ſhined many houres vpon the earth, they ſounded the retrait, and charging vpon their ſhoulders the artilleries they had brought with them, they withdrew their ſquadrons, and retired, keeping alwayes their accuſtomed order, and marched faire & ſoftly towards Millan, with ſo great aſtoniſhment of the French, that of the whole armie neither horſman nor footman had the courage to follow them: onely there were two companies of them, who being fled into a farme hourſe, were burned therein by the Venetian light horſemen. The reſidue of the armie returned to Millan, not breaking their order, retaining ſtill in their apparence and countenance, the ſame conſtancie and aſſurance: and ſome ſay that they buried fifteene peeces of great artilleries which they wonne at the firſt charge, for that they had no oportunitie to carry them away. All men with one common conſent do affirme, that there had not bin ſeene in Italy of long time a battell more furious and dreadful: for that, what by the deſperate valour wherewith the Swiſſers began the charge, and after by the errors of the night the order of the whole armie being confuſed, and the fight ſo mixed, that they could not obſerue any commandement nor perceiue any ſigne, all things were wholly expoſed to fortune. The King himſelfe who was many times in danger, might well diſcerne, that his preſeruation came more by his owne vertue and good fortune, then by the aide of his people, from whom he was oftentimes ſeparate by the confuſion of the battell and by the darkneſſe of the night: ſo that Triuulce (a Captaine who had ſeene ſo many things) affirmed, that this battell was fought by Giants and not by men, and that eighteene battels wherein he had bene preſent, were but combats of litle children, in compariſon of this; and was of opinion, that without the aide of the artilleries the victory had remained to the Swiſſers, who being entred at the firſt charge within the fortifications of the French, and recouering from them the moſt part of the artilleries, had alwayes wonne further into their campe. And likewiſe the arriuing of Aluiano was to great purpoſe for the French, who coming vpon them when the battell was yet doubtfull, he gaue courage to the French, and terrified the Swiſſers, who ſuppoſed that the whole Venetian armie was with him. Touching the number of the dead, if euer it was vncertaine in a battell (as almoſt alwayes it is) it was moſt vncertaine in this, men ſpeaking diuerſly, ſome by paſſion, and ſome by error. Some affirme more then foureteene thouſand Swiſſers to be ſlaine, others ſay more then ten thouſand; and thoſe that ſpeake more moderatly, eight thouſand; and there wanted not ſuch as would reduce them to three thouſand, all men of litle worth. But on the French part, in the encounter that was giuen ouer night, were ſlaine Francis brother to the Duke of Bourbon, Monſieur d'Imbercourt, the Count of Sancerre, and many other men of worth: in that of the next day, the Prince of Tallemont ſonne to Monſieur Trimouille, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, Chaſtelart of Sauoy, and Mony Enſigne-bearer to the Kings band; all perſonages of marke, either for their nobilitie and greatneſſe of eſtate, or for the honorable places they managed in the armie: and touching the number of their dead, whereof men ſpake diuerſly for the ſame cauſes, ſome hold that there died ſixe thouſand, others that there was not aboue three thouſand, amongſt whom were certaine Captaines of the Lanceknights.

When the Swiſſers were retired to Millan, they fell into great diſagreement, for that ſome were deſirous to come to accord with the French King, and others that they ſhould continue the defence of Millan: and thoſe Captaines that afore had ſolicited the accord, ſeeking ſome cauſe leſſe diſhoneſt to be gone, demãded mony of Maximilian Sforce, knowing wel inough y he was not able to pay them: and then the bands of footmen at the perſwaſion of Roſt their Colonell, departed the day following to returne into their country by the way of Coma, giuing hope to the Duke that they would returne ſpeedily to ſuccour the Caſtle, wherein remained fifteene hundred Swiſſers and fiue hundred Italians. With this hope, Maximilian Sforce accompanied with Iohn Gonzaga, and Ierome Moron with other Gentlemen of Millan, incloſed himſelfe in the Caſtle, after he had with great difficultie conſented that his brother Francis Duke of Bary ſhould go into Germany: and the Cardinall of Sion tooke his iourney towards Ceſar to ſolicite for ſuccours, hauing giuen his faith to returne ſuddenly. The Citie of Millan thus abandoned, yeelded to the French King, agreeing to pay him a great ſumme of money: but the King would not enter into the towne ſo long as the Caſtle was held by the enemies, holding it a matter vnworthy the maieſtie of a King, to enter into a towne that is not wholly in his power. The King cauſed Maſſes to be ſong ſolemnely for three dayes in the place where he had wonne the battell. The firſt was to thanke God for his victorie; the ſecond to pray vnto him for the ſoules of thoſe that were ſlaughtered in the battell; and the third for peace: and in perpetuall memory of his victory, he built in the ſame place a Chappell. All the townes and Caſtles of the Duchie of Millan followed the fortune of the victory, except the Caſtle of Cremona and that of Millan, to the ſiege whereof Peter of Nauarre being ſent, he aſſured that he would carry it in leſſe then a moneth, not without the maruell of all men, foraſmuch as the Caſtle was very ſtrong, and plentifull of all things neceſſary for to defend and keepe it, and for that there were within it more then two thouſand men of warre. The Viceroy hauing receiued aduertiſement of the victory of the French, remained a few dayes in the place where he was incamped, and that more by neceſſitie then by will, by reaſon that he could not eaſily remoue his armie for want of money. But hauing at laſt receiued a certaine ſumme, and borrowed ſixe thouſand duckats of Laurence de Medicis, he retired himſelfe to Pontenuro, with intention to go to the Realme of Naples. For, albeit the Pope vnderſtanding what was hapned, had from the beginning expreſſed to the world the conſtancie of his predeceſſor, the Embaſſadours of the Confederates perſwading him to make head againſt fortune, and to endeuour to hold the Swiſſers in good diſpoſition, or at leaſt if they would reuolt, to take in their place the Lanceknights: yet he was of opinion, that the remedies and prouiſions would fall out too ſlow for his perils, and that he ſhould be the firſt that ſhould be aſſailed: for that though the reuerence of the Church held the King from moleſting the Eccleſiaſtike State, yet he could not beleeue, that it was able to retaine him from aſſailing Parma and Plaiſance, as members depending on the Duchie of Millan, and from moleſting the State of Florence; a matter wherein all regards did ceaſſe, and for the which he would thinke himſelfe as deeply offended, as if violence were directly offered to the State of the Church. And certainly it was not without cauſe that he was in feare, for that the King had already giuen order to caſt a bridge ouer the riuer of Po neare to Pauie, to ſend to take Parma and Plaiſance, and after the taking of thoſe Cities, if the Pope refuſed his amitie, to ſend by the way of Pontreſmo to chaſe the Medices from the Citie of Florence. But now according to his commiſſion, the Duke of Sauoy and the Biſhop of Tricaro his Nuncio, treated with the King, who fearing leſt he ſhould make new alliances againſt him, and bearing great reuerence to the Sea Apoſtolik, for the terror that was through the whole Realme of France by reaſon of the perſecutions receiued by Iulio, he deſired much to be at vnitie with him. Therefore there was concluded betweene them a preſent confederation for the defence of the States of Italy, wherein was particularly expreſſed, that the King ſhould take vpon him the protection of the perſon of the Pope, the State of the Church, Iulian and Laurence de Medicis, and the State of Florence: That the King ſhould giue an Eſtate in France and a penſion to Iulian, and to Laurence a penſion and a companie of fiftie Lances: That he ſhould conſent that the Pope might giue paſſage to the Viceroy through the ſtates and iuriſdiction of the Church, to returne with his armie to the kingdome of Naples: That the Pope ſhould be bound to cauſe the ſouldiers to depart out of Verona that were there, and withall, to countermand the companies ſent to the ſuccours of Ceſar againſt the Venetians: That he ſhould giue vp to the French King the Cities of Parma and Plaiſance, and in recompence thereof, the King to agree, that from thence forward the Duchie of Millan ſhould be bound to furniſh it ſelfe with the ſalt of Ceruia, a matter of great profite to the Church, and wherein the Pope had already agreed with the Duke of Millan in the confederation he made with him: That a compromiſe ſhould be committed to the Duke of Sauoy, to iudge whether the Florentines had broken the confederation made with King Lewis; and if they had offended that way, then he to haue power to impoſe ſuch penaltie as they had deſerued: which the King ſaid, he demanded more for his honour, then for any other reſpect. As ſoone as this concluſion was made, the Biſhop of Tricaro went to Rome in poſt to perſwade the Pope to ratifie it, and Laurence withdrew to Parma and Regge the companies that were within Plaiſance, to giue occaſion to the Viceroy to depart the ſooner; and himhimſelfe went to the King to obtaine his good fauour, and to perſwade him (according to the artificiall inſtruction of his Vnkle) that in all euents he would depend vpon him. The Pope was hardly induced to this ratification, for that it diſpleaſed him much to loſe Parma and Plaiſance: and he could willingly haue temporized to ſee what the Swiſſers would firſt determine, who hauing called a Diot at Zurich (the principall Canton of all the Swiſſers, and enemie to the French) debated to giue reſcue to the Caſtle of Millan, although they had abandoned the valleys and the townes of Bellinzona and Lugarno, but not the Caſtles, of whom neuertheleſſe the King obtained that of Lugarno, by giuing ſixe thouſand crownes to the Captaine: but the Griſons would not abandon Chiauenna. At laſt the Biſhop of Tricaro laying afore him the danger leſt the King ſhould preſently inuade Parma and Plaiſance, and ſend men of warre into Tuſcane, and aggrauating much the harmes the Swiſſers had receiued at the battell of Marignan, the Pope was content to ratifie the peace, albeit vnder this moderation, that neither he nor his Agents ſhould be bound to giue vp into the Kings hands Parma and Plaiſance, but by leauing them voide of men and officers, to giue libertie to the King to enter vpon them: That the Pope ſhould not be bound to reuoke his people from Verona, for that he would not commit ſuch an iniurie againſt Ceſar: which notwithſtanding he promiſed to do as ſoone as any conuenient occaſion was offered; and that the Florentines ſhould be abſolued of the pretended breaking of the league. The accord bare alſo that the King ſhould not take vpon him the protection of any feodarie or ſubiect of the State of the Church, and that not onely he ſhould not hinder the Pope to proceed againſt them as their ſupreme Lord with correction, but alſo that he ſhould be bound to miniſter aide to him in that action when he ſhould be required. Moreouer it was agreed that the Pope and the French King ſhould haue an enteruiew together in ſome place conuenient; which was a matter propoſed by the King, but deſired indifferently by them both: by the King, the better to eſtabliſh that amitie, to aſſure the eſtates of ſuch friends as he had in Italy, and for that he hoped with his preſence, and by offering great aduancements to the Popes brother and nephew, to obtaine, that with his conſent he might inuade the Realme of Naples, a matter which he deſired moſt ardently: by the Pope, to the end that by this office, and maner of dealing, moſt fit to winne grace and amitie with euery one, to entertaine the King whileſt he ſtood in ſo great proſperitie: although many approued not of this deliberation, as an action vnworthy the maieſtie of a Pope, and as though it had bene fit that the King ſhould haue come to him to Rome, if he would haue had any conference with him. But the Pope affirmed, that he condeſcended hereunto for a deſire he had to induce the King not to moleſt the Realme of Naples during the life of the King Catholike, which to the iudgement of man could not long endure, for that it was more then a yeare ſince he was very ill diſpoſed. In the meane while Peter of Nauarre was labouring to get the Caſtle of Millan, and hauing won a murdring houſe which ſtood on the right hand at the entrance of that gate of the Caſtle which is towards Coma, and afterwards approching nearer the ditch and the Caſtle wall by the helpe of pauiſſes and engines of wood, he began to worke a mine within the ſaid ditch; and all other defences being ouerthrowne, he began to labour more mines, taking away with the helpe of his Engines a great pane of the wall in a corner of the Caſtle, and applied his hooks and rammes to make it fall at the ſame inſtant that he put fire to his mines: matters which albeit in common iudgement ſeemed not ſufficient to carry the Caſtle but with great difficultie and long time, and that already there was certaine knowledge that the Swiſſers according to that which had bene reſolued at the Diot of Zurich, prepared to ſuccour it: yet a practiſe being begun between Iohn Gonſaga the Duke of Millans Captaine which was within the Caſtle, and the Duke of Bourbon his kinſman, and Ierome Moron, with two other Swiſſer Captaines interpoſing, who were alſo in the Caſtle, the reſolution was concluded the fourth day of October, to the great admiration of all men: and there wanted not ſuch as blamed Ierome Moron ſpecially for this concluſion, for that either through too great feare, or with very litle faith, he had vſed his authoritie to perſwade the Duke to ſuch an agreement: whereof he excuſed himſelfe by the diſcord that was among the footmen of the Swiſſers and Italians. The accord was, that Maximilian Sforce ſhould immediatly giue vp into the hands of the French King, the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona: That he ſhould yeeld vnto him all the rights and intereſts he had in that State, and receiue of the King a certaine proportion of money to pay his debts, and that he ſhould go into France, where the King ſhould giue him a yearely penſion of thirtie thouſand duckats, or procure him to be made Cardinall with the like reuenue: That the King ſhould pardon Galeas Viſconte with certaine other Gentlemen of that Duchie, who had done their beſt endeuours for Maximilian: That he ſhould giue ſixe thouſand crownes to the Swiſſers that were within the Caſtle: That he ſhould confirme to Iohn Gonzaga the goods that he held in the State of Millan by the gift of the Duke, and enlarge his liuing with ſome yearely penſion: That he ſhould in like ſort ratifie to Moron, as well the goods that appertained to him in propertie, as others that he had of the Dukes gift, together with the offices he exerciſed, and ſhould make him Maiſter of Requeſts in the Court of France. Vpon the publication of this accord, Maximilian ſurnamed the More, according to the name of his father, departed out of the Caſtle, and went into France, ſaying, he was deliuered from the ſeruitude of the Swiſſers, the ill dealings of Cæſar, and the deceits of the Spaniards: and yet all men praiſed Fortune more for hauing ſo ſpeedily depoſed him from ſuch a degree, then for that ſhe had afore exalted a man, who, for his incapacitie, extrauagant thoughts, and moſt foule manners of life, was vnworthy of all greatneſſe.

But afore the Caſtle of Millan was giuen vp, there were ſent to the King as Embaſſadours foure of the moſt principall and honorable perſons of the Senate of Venice, to wit, Anthonie Grimani, Dominicke Treuiſan, George Cornaro, and Andrew Gritti, to congratulate his victorie, and to beſeech him to aide them to recouer their townes, as he was bound by the capitulations of the confederation: an enterpriſe wherein they had no other impediments then the forces of Cæſar, and the Popes regiments that were within Verona vnder the charge of Marke Anthonie Colonno: for, the Viceroy after he was gone from the territories of Plaiſance, and had repoſed ſome few dayes vpon the frontiers of Modena, expecting whether the Pope would ratifie the accord with the French King; as ſoone as he heard of the ratification, he returned with all diligence to the Realme of Naples by the way of Romagna. The King gaue ſpeedie order, that the baſtard of Sauoy and Theodore Triuulce ſhould go to their ſuccour with ſixe hundred Lances and ſeuen thouſand Lanceknights: who, whileſt they deferred to depart, either to ſee what would become of the Caſtle of Millan, or for that the King had a meaning to ſend out the ſame bands againſt the Caſtle of Cremona; Aluiano drew with his armie towards Breſſia, for that the Venetians would not conſent that he ſhould follow the Viceroy, becauſe they deſired to recouer Breſſia and Verona (if it were poſſible) without forreine ſouldiers. But becauſe that Citie was newly reſupplied with a thouſand Lanceknights, (Bergamo being rendred to the Venetians many dayes before) Aluiano reſolued to go firſt to beſiege Verona, as being the leaſt fortified, hauing there greater commoditie of victuals; and for that Verona being taken, Breſſia being alone, and the ſituation bearing no oportunitie to be eaſily ſuccoured by the Almaines, was eaſie to be taken. But he forbare to giue beginning to his enterpriſe, for feare leſt the Viceroy and the Popes bands that were in the countries of Reggia and Modena, ſhould repaſſe ouer Po at Oſtia, to reſcue Verona: of which doubt when he was deliuered by the departure of the Viceroy, he fell into another impediment of ſickneſſe, whereof he died in the beginning of October at Gueda in the countrey of Breſſia, hauing not yet attained threeſcore yeares of age. The Venetians were much grieued for his death, but much more the ſouldiers, who being not ſatisfied with grieuing for him, kept his bodie in the armie the ſpace of fiue and twentie dayes, carying it about with them with very great pompe, at ſuch time as they were to march: and when he ſhould be conueyed to Venice, Theodore Triuulce would not ſuffer that ſafeconduct ſhould be demanded of Marke Anthonie Colonno to carry him by the marches of Verona, as many aduiſed him to do; ſaying, it was not conuenient that he who in his life had neuer feare of enemies, ſhould now being dead make ſhew of fearing them. He was buried at Venice by publike decree, with very great honour in S. Stephens Church, where yet remaineth the monument of his ſepulcher; and Andrew Nauaier a very eloquent yong Gentleman of Venice, made his funerall Oration. He was a Captaine (in all mens opinion) of great reſolution and courage, and a diligent executioner of things determined: and yet, either by the malice of fortune, or (as many thinke) for that he was ſudden and raſh in counſell, he receiued many foiles by his enemies; yea haply, when he was ỹ chief cõmander in ỹ armie, he neuer obtained any victory. By reaſon of the death of Aluiano, the French King being required by the Venetians, gaue to them for Gouernour of their armie, Triuulce, whom they deſired much, as well for his experience, as for his reputation in the ſcience of warre: and withall for that by the common inclination of the faction of the Guelfes, there had bene alwayes a ſetled amitie and goodwill betweene him and that Commonweale. Whileſt he went to the armie, to take his charge, the Venetian bands tooke Peſquiero, but a litle before they ouerthrew certaine troupes of horſemen, and three hundred Spaniſh footmen that went to their reſcue, recouering alſo Aſola and Lona, which the Marquis of Mantua had abandoned. As ſoone as Triuulce was come to the armie, they beſieged Breſſia at the inſtance of the Senate, notwithſtanding it ſeemed a matter of great difficultie to carry it without the French armie, for as much as the towne was ſtrong, and well manned with two thouſand footmen as well Lanceknights as Spaniards, and for that a great number of the Guelfes had bene conſtrained to go away, the Winter alſo drawing on, and the ſeaſon much diſpoſed to raine. Neither did the ſucceſſe of the matter beguile the iudgement that the Generall gaue. For as they had begun to batter the walls with their artilleries, which they had planted vpon the brinke of the ditch, on that ſide where iſſueth the ſmall riuer of Garzetta, thoſe within making many ſallies, brake forth at laſt with fifteene hundred Lanceknights and Spaniards, to charge the guard of the artillerie, which was an hundred men at armes and ſixe thouſand footmen: and beating them alſo with the ſhot that for that end was ranged vpon the towne wall, they put them eaſily to flight, notwithſtanding John Paul Manfron with thirtie men at armes ſuſtained ſomewhat their furie. They ſlue about two hundred footmen, burnt the powders, and drew into Breſſia ten peeces of artilleries: by reaſon of which diſorder, Triuulce thought good to retire and incampe more at large, expecting the coming of the French men, and withdrew himſelfe to Coccaio, which is ten miles from Breſſia, the Venetians looking in the meane while to make new prouiſions of artillerie and munitions. But as ſoone as the French men were come to the campe, they returned to beſiege the towne, and began to batter it in two ſundry places, on that ſide of the gate of Piles towards the Caſtle, and on that ſide of the gate of S. Iohn. In one of thoſe quarters the French men were incamped, and after they had giuen leaue to the Lanceknights, for that they refuſed to do ſeruice againſt the townes of Caſars obedience, Peter of Nauarre arriued at the campe with fiue thouſand Gaſcons and French men: and in the other quarter lay with the Venetian regiments, Triuulce, in whom reſted almoſt the whole ſuperintendencie of thoſe affaires, for that the baſtard of Sauoy being fallen ſicke, was gone from the army. When they had battered the wall, they went not to the aſſault, for that thoſe within had made ſundry rampiers, and with great care and valour had prouided all things neceſſary for defence: but Peter of Nauarre hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed remedies, began to vndermine the walls. At which time Marke Anthonie Colonno iſſuing out of Verona with ſixe hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, encountred in the plaine John Paul Manfron and Marke Anthonie Bua, who were beſtowed in garriſon within Valegge with foure hundred men at armes and foure hundred light horſemen, & ouerthrew them: in which skirmiſh was taken Iulio the ſon of John Paul, his horſe being killed vnder him as he fought, and his father fled to Goito. Immediatly after, Marke Anthonie occupied Legnago, where were taken priſoners certaine Gentlemen of Venice. At laſt the taking of Breſſia appearing dayly more difficult, for that the mines made by Peter of Nauarre did not anſwer the hopes that he had giuen, and vnderſtanding that eight thouſand footmen were to come out of Germany, which the Captains that lay about Breſſia had no confidence to be able to hinder; the Venetians were content, ſomwhat to couer the ignominy of their retrait, to agree with thoſe within Breſſia, that if they were not ſuccoured within thirtie dayes, they ſhould abandon the Citie, and go out of it with their enſignes diſplayed, their artilleries, and what elſe appertained to them; a promiſe which euery one knew would ſerue to no purpoſe for the aſſurance they had of ſuccours: onely it was a thing profitable to them of Breſſia, to be deliuered in the meane while from aduerſities and afflictions. Afterwards the Venetians put eight thouſand footmen within Bre, a towne ſubiect to the Counts of Lodron; but as ſoone as they heard that the Lanceknights marched, to whom the borough of Anfo was rendred, they retired cowardly to the armie. The Captaines themſelues ſhewed no greater courage; for fearing to be charged at one time by theſe bands, and by thoſe that were within Breſſia, and alſo by Marke Anthonie Colonno with the regiments that were within Verona, they retired to Gueda, whither likewiſe, being already aſſured of this accident, they had ſent their greateſt artillery and almoſt all their baggage: and the Lanceknights that entred into Verona without impediment, returned into Germanie, after they had refurniſhed it with victuals, and reenforced the garriſon.

In

In the meane while the Pope and the French King had agreed to meet together at Bologna, a place which the King accepted afore Florence, becauſe he would not be far remoued frō the Duchie of Millan, and chiefly for that the Duke of Sauoy managed continually the negociation of accord betweene him and the Swiſſers, and for that (as he ſaid) in paſſing into Tuſcane he ſhould be conſtrained to leade with him a great traine of ſouldiers, for that it was not for his honour to enter into Florence with leſſe pompe then the late King Charles had done before: for the preparing whereof, it behoued him to deferre for certaine dayes; a matter grieuous to the King, as well for other reſpects, as for that he was conſtrained to retaine yet longer the whole armie, whereof albeit the expences were very great, yet he had not till that day determined, nor as yet made any reckoning to ſend away any part, ſo long as he remained in Italy. The Pope then entred into Bologna the eight day of December, and the King made his entrie within two dayes after, to receiue whom, the Cardinall de Fieſque and the Cardinall de Medicis, Legates Apoſtolike, were gone to the confines of the country of Reggia: and he entred without many bands of ſouldiers, and not with any great Court; and being conueyed, according to the cuſtome, into the publike Conſiſtorie afore the Pope, he offered in his owne perſon (his great Chancellor deliuering the ſpeech for him) the obedience which he had not as yet till then lent him. Then they were lodged three dayes together in one Pallace, ſhewing one to another right great ſignes of good will and amitie: in which time they not onely confirmed with words and promiſes, the obligations and contracts paſſed afore, but debated beſides of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King being not then ready to aſſaile, he contented himſelfe with the great hope and aſſurances which the Pope gaue him to be fauourable to him in that enterpriſe whenſoeuer the King of Aragon ſhould happen to die, which in the iudgement of all men would be very ſhortly; or when the confederation which he had with him ſhould be ended, which endured yet for ſixteene moneths. The King intreated him to render to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia, and the Pope condeſcended therein vnto him, the Duke paying fortie thouſand duckats which he had giuen to Cæſar for Modena, and repaying likewiſe a certaine ſum of money for the expences which he had bene at in both the Cities. The King was a ſuter alſo for Franciſco Mario Duke of Vrbin, who being entertained by the Church with two hundred men at armes, and appointed to go with Iulian de Medicis to the armie, when that charge was afterwards transferred to Laurence, by reaſon Iulian was ſick, he had not only refuſed to go thither, alledging that he would not condeſcend to Laurence to go with him as a ſimple Captaine, and vnder the authoritie of another, in the armie of the Church, wherein he had ſo often bin General and ſuperiour to them all, although by reaſon of the long friendſhip he had had with Iulian, he had againſt his dignitie conſented thereunto; but alſo had reuoked the ſouldiers that were in his pay, as they were on the way, notwithſtanding his promiſe to ſend them: for that he had already ſecretly compounded, or at leaſt was in the way of compoſition with the French King, and euer ſince the Kings victorie, had not ceaſſed by the working of particular men, to kindle him againſt the Pope, as much as he could. But the Pope calling to minde thoſe iniuries, and ſtudying more to make that Duchie fall into his houſe, he refuſed the King this demand, declaring vnto him with ſweete words, of what conſequence it would be for the affaires of the Church, by ſo pernicious an example to giue boldneſſe to his ſubiects to rebell. The King tooke theſe reaſons for payment, and accommodated himſelfe to the Popes will, although in regard of his honour, he would gladly haue purchaſed ſafetie for him that was fallen into danger for adhering vnto him: whereunto he was perſwaded by many of his Councell and of his Court, who ſhewed vnto him, how vnwiſe a deliberation it was of the late King to haue ſuffered the Duke Valentinois to oppreſſe the inferiour Lords of Italy; which had raiſed him to ſuch a greatneſſe, that if his father Alexander had enioyed longer life, he had without doubt bene very preiudiciall to the affaires of France. The Pope promiſed the King to giue him power to leuie for one yeare the tenth part of the reuenues of the Churches of France. Alſo it was agreed, that the King ſhould haue the nomination of Benefices, which alwayes afore appertained to Colledges and Chapters of Churches; a matter that fell out well for the Kings of France, who haue by that meanes power to diſpoſe of ſo many rich Benefices to whom they pleaſe; and on the other ſide, that the Annates of the French Churches ſhould afterwards be payed to the Pope, according to the true value, and not according to the ancient taxations, which are farre leſſe, wherein the Pope found himſelfe deceiued: for, when his Deputies and Com-

Commiſſaries for the Realme of France, ſought to proceed againſt thoſe that concealed the true value, they could find no proofe nor teſtimonie, nor get execution againſt the parties, ſo that diſpatches went out ſtill according to the old rates. The King alſo promiſed not to take into his protection any of the Cities of Tuſcane: and yet ſhortly after he made inſtance vnto him to conſent that he might take the people of Lueques into his protection, who offered him fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, ſaying; he was bound thereunto by the obligation of his predeceſſors; but the Pope would giue no conſent, but promiſed for his part that he would forbeare to moleſt them in any ſort. Beſides theſe things, they agreed to ſend Frier Giles Generall of the Auguſtine Friers and an excellent Preacher, to Ceſar in the Popes name, to diſpoſe him to render to the Venetians, Breſſia and Verona, taking a recompence of money. Which things being diſpatched, but not ſet downe by writing, except that which concerned the nomination of Benefices and paiment of the firſt fruites according to the true value, the Pope in fauour of the King, pronounced Adrian de Boiſi Cardinall, brother to the great Maiſter of France, who in matter of gouernment was in greateſt authoritie next the King. At laſt the King departed very well contented, and in great hope of the good will of the Pope, who for his part expreſſed no leſſe with all poſſible demonſtrations, but in his mind nouriſhed other impreſſions: for that it was yet no leſſe grieuous to him then afore, that the Duchy of Millan ſhould be poſſeſſed by the French King, and yet more to haue releaſed Parma and Plaiſance, and likewiſe to render to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia; although not long after all this came to nothing, for as much as the Pope hauing receiued in Florence (where after he departed from Bologna he remained about a moneth) a promiſe of the money that ſhould be payed as ſoone as he ſhould enter into poſſeſſion, and the inſtruments that were to paſſe betweene them being there ſet downe in writing by common conſent, the Pope not denying, but interpoſing many excuſes and delayes, and alwayes promiſing, refuſed to giue perfection thereunto. The King being returned to Millan, preſently diſmiſſed his armie, except ſeuen hundred Lances, ſixe thouſand Lanceknights, and foure thouſand French men of thoſe which are called aduenturers, whō he left for the guard of that State. And for his owne perſon he returned into France with great ſpeed about the firſt beginning of the yeare 1516, leauing behind him as his Lieutenant, Charles Duke of Bourbon, perſwading himſelfe that he had left his affaires in Italy in good ſuretie, both for the alliance contracted with the Pope, and alſo for that about that time he had newly compounded with the Swiſſers, who, notwithſtanding the King of England perſwaded them to take armes againe againſt the French king, renewed with him the alliance, by the which they bound themſelues to furniſh alwayes for his ſeruice and at his pay, both in Italy and out of Italy, for defence and offence, and againſt all nations, ſuch numbers of footmen as he would require, vnder their publike name and enſignes, except againſt the Pope, the Empire and the Emperour: and on the other ſide, the King confirmed to them of new their ancient penſions, with promiſe to pay vnto them within a certaine time the ſixe hundred thouſand duckats agreed vpon at Dion, with three hundred thouſand if they gaue vp to him the villages and valleys appertaining to the Duchie of Millan: a matter which the fiue Cantons that poſſeſſed thoſe places refuſing to do, as alſo to ratifie the accord, the King began to pay to the other eight Cantons that part and portion of the money that appertained to them: who accepted it, but vnder this expreſſe condition, that they would not be bound to take his pay againſt the fiue Cantons. About the beginning of this yeare, the Biſhop Petruccio an ancient familiar of the Pope, hauing by the aide of the Pope and the Florentines, chaſed out of Sienna, Borgueſo ſonne to Pandolfe Petrucci his couſin, in whoſe hand was the gouernment, he tooke the ſame authoritie vpon himſelfe: and that which induced the Pope, was, that that Citie ſtanding betweene the Eſtate of the Church and the dominion of the Florentines, might be gouerned by a man wholly at his deuotion: and haply much more for that he hoped with the fauor of ſome good occaſion, to make it fall into the gouernment of his brother or his nephew, by the conſent of the Biſhop himſelfe. The warre continued ſtill in Italy betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, who deſired to recouer by the aide of the French king, Breſſia and Verona: and in regard of other things, they ſeemed peaceable enough. But there began ſpeedily to burſt out motions of new troubles that were ſtirred vp by the King of Aragon, who fearing leſt the greatneſſe of the French king would bring ſome aduerſities to the Realme of Naples, dealt with Ceſar and the King of England, to renew the warre with him: a matter not onely of no great difficultie to draw Ceſar vnto, being deſirous al-

always of new things, and who of himſelfe could not eaſily keep the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: but alſo it was agreed vnto by the King of England, the remembrance of the late breach of promiſe of his father in law, being of leſſe power in him, thē the iealouſie or ỹ preſent hatred againſt the French King: beſides, that he was deſirous that the Scottiſh King being in minoritie, ſhould be gouerned by people of his appointment, or ſuch as depended of him. Theſe matters had bene followed both with better counſell and greater forces, if during the negociation, the death of the King of Aragon had not hapned; who, after he had bene vexed with a long indiſpoſition, died in a paltrie village called Madrigalegio, as he was going to Sinile with his Court. He was a King excellent in counſell and vertue, and in whom, if he had bene conſtant to keepe his promiſe, there could hardly be found any matter worthy of reprehenſion: for, touching the imputation of niggardneſſe, or the report that went of him to be ſtrait in expences, it was proued vntrue by the diſcouery of his eſtate after his death, who, notwithſtanding he had reigned two and fortie yeares, left behind him no maſſe of treaſure. But it happeneth for the moſt part, by the corrupt iudgement of men, that prodigalitie is more praiſed in a King, though the racking and oppreſſion of ſubiects be ioyned therewith, then frugalitie, whereunto is ioyned abſtinence from the goods of others. The excellent vertue of this Prince, was accompanied with a moſt rare and perpetuall felicitie during the whole courſe of his life, excepting the death of his onely ſonne: for the accidents of his wiues and his ſonne in law, were the cauſe that he kept his greatneſſe vntill his death; and the neceſſitie to depart with Caſtile after his wiues death, was rather a ſport then a blow of Fortune. In all other things he was right happie. For, being the ſecond ſonne to Iohn king of Aragon, he came to the Crowne by the death of his elder brother: he was King of Caſtile by Iſabel his wife: he ſubdued the Competitors of the ſame kingdome, and expulſed them: he recouered afterwards the Realme of Granado, which the enemies of the Chriſtian faith had vſurped almoſt eight hundred yeares: he annexed to his Empire the Realmes of Naples and Nauarre, with the principalitie of Orano, and many other places of importance vpon the coaſt of Africa: he bare alwayes the victory and vpper hand of his enemies: he couered almoſt all his ambitions and couetouſneſſe vnder the colour of an honeſt zeale to Religion, and of an holy affection to the publike good, wherein fortune appeared manifeſtly conioyned with induſtrie. About a moneth afore his death, died the great Captaine, both abſent from the Court, and ill contented with him: and yet the King gaue order, in remembrance of his valour, that there ſhould be done to him both in the Court and through the whole Realme, thoſe honours that in Spaine are not accuſtomed to be done, but at the death of Kings; a matter much approued and applauded by all his ſubiects, who bare great reuerence to the name of the great Captaine, for his ſingular liberalitie, for the opinion of his great wiſedome, and for that in the militarie ſcience he excelled all the Captaines of his time.

The death of the King Catholike.

The death of the great Captaine.

The death of the King Catholike enflamed the mind of the French king to the enterpriſe of Naples, to the which he was in mind to ſend forthwith the Duke of Bourbon with an army of eight hundred Lances, and ten thouſand footmen; perſwading himſelfe, that the kingdome being in ſome tumult vpon the death of the king, and ill prepared for defence, and for that the Archduke could not come thither in time conuenient to ſuccour it, he might eaſily conquer it: and he made no doubt of the Popes fauour; for the hopes he had giuen him at the enteruiew of Bologna; for the alliance contracted with him; and no leſſe for his owne intereſt, as though he ſhould be iealous of the wonderfull greatneſſe of the Archduke, heire preſent to ſo many kingdomes by the death of the king Catholike, and future ſucceſſor of Caſar. He hoped beſides, that the Archduke would giue him no great impediment, knowing how hurtfull his ill will might be to him touching the Realme of Spaine, but ſpecially for that of Aragon, whereunto ſome of the ſame family would haue aſpired, if their power had bene as great as their right. For albeit in the life of the late king and Iſabel his wife, it was interpreted in an open and generall aſſembly of the whole Realme, that the ancient conſtitutions of that kingdome, which admit not women to the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, were not preiudiciall to the iſſue males borne of them, when in the line maſculine was to be found neither brother, vncle, nor nephew of the dead king, or any that was more neare to him then they that were deſcended of the womans ſide, or at leaſt in equall degree: and that for this reaſon it was declared, that after the death of Ferdinand, the ſucceſſion appertained to the Archduke Charles, producing for example, that after the death of Martin king of Aragon, who died without iſſue male, by the ſentence of

the Iudges deputed to that matter by the whole kingdome, Ferdinand grandfather to this Ferdinand was preferred, notwithstanding he came of the womans side, afore Count Vrgello and others ioyned to Martin by the masculine line, but in degree further off then Ferdinand: neuertheleſſe the people had alwayes ſecretly complained, euen to that very time, that in that interpretation and declaration the power and authoritie of Ferdinand and Iſabel had bene of more power then iuſtice and equitie, for that it ſeemed to many an vniuſt interpretation, that the women being excluded, ſuch as deſcended of them might be admitted, and that in the ſentence giuen on the behalfe of old Ferdinand, the feare of his armies was of more force then reaſon. Which things being well knowne to the French king, and manifeſt likewiſe that the peoples of the prouince of Aragon, of Valence, and of the Earledome of Catelognia, (all theſe are comprehended vnder the kingdome of Aragon) were very deſirous to enioy a King of their owne: he hoped that the Archduke, not to bring into danger ſo great a ſucceſſion, and ſo many Eſtates, would in the end not make ſtrange to leaue vnto him the kingdome of Naples vnder ſome reaſonable compoſition. At which time, to the end to preuaile by benefites as well as by forces, he commanded that Proſper Colonno who had conſented to pay for a ranſome fiue and thirtie thouſand duckats, ſhould be ſet at libertie paying one moytie onely: which cauſed many to beleeue, that Proſper had made ſecret promiſe not to beare armes againſt him, and haply to aide him in the warre of Naples, albeit with ſome limitation or reſeruing of his honour. The Kings mind being occupied with theſe thoughts, and now determining to deferre no longer to raiſe armes, he was driuen by new accidents to looke to his owne defence: for that the Emperour hauing receiued an hundred and twentie thouſand duckats, according to the former negociation begun with the King of Aragon, made preparation (as he had accorded with the ſaid King) to inuade the Duchie of Millan, as ſoone as he had giuen ſuccours to Verona and Breſſia. For the armie of the Venetians (commanded by Theodore Triuulce, who was made Gouernour when the other Triuulce was returned to Millan) lying incamped within fixe miles of Breſſia, their eſtradiots made incurſions through the whole countrey: who being one day charged by thoſe within the towne, and either partie running to the ſuccour of their friends, they repulſed them and draue them into Breſſia, hauing long fought for the victory, and ſlue many of them, taking priſoner the Gouernours brother of the Citie. Not many dayes after Monſieur Lautrech Generall of the French armie and Theodore Triuulce vnderſtanding that a ſtrength of three thouſand Lanceknights came to Breſſia to conduct the money that was ſent thither for the pay of the ſouldiers, ſent Ianus Fregoſo and John Conrado Vrſin, with certaine bands as well of the one as of the other armie, to the Caſtle of Anſo to hinder their paſſage, who ſlue about eight hundred of them, and the reſidue ſaued themſelues flying with the mony into Lodron. Afterwards the Venetians ſent a regiment of fiue and twentie hundred footmen into the valley of Sabia to fortifie the Caſtle of Anſo, who burnt Lodron and Aſtorio. The danger leſt Breſſia, ſo diſtreſſed, and in ſo great troubles, ſhould yeeld, compelled Ceſar to aduance, who came by Trent to Verona with fiue thouſand horſemen, fifteene thouſand Swiſſers ſent to him by the fiue Cantons, and ten thouſand footmen as well Spaniſh as Lanceknights. By reaſon whereof, the French armie and the Venetians leauing ſufficient garriſons within Vincenſa and Padua, went to Peſquiero, reſoluing to hinder Ceſar in paſſing the riuer of Mincia. But (as it often hapneth) the execution was not correſpondent to the counſell: for when they ſaw the enemies approch, they had not the heart to performe that in the field which they had ſo reſolutely aduiſed in their pauillions, but paſſing Oglia, they retired to Cremona, augmenting the reputation and courage of the enemie, and diminiſhing their owne. But Ceſar, either carried by an vndiſcreete counſell, or puſhed on by his euill fortune, incamped before Aſolo, which was guarded by an hundred men at armes, and foure hundred footmen of the Venetians, where he conſumed vnprofitably many dayes; and it was aſſuredly beleeued that the reſpite which he gaue to the enemies by that meanes to prouide for themſelues, tooke from him the oportunitie of the victory. As ſoone as he brake vp from before Aſolo, he paſſed the riuer of Oglia at Orcinous, and the enemies leauing in Cremona three hundred lances & three thouſand footmen, retired on the other ſide the riuer of Adda, with intention to ſtop his paſſage: by whoſe retiring, all the countrey betweene Oglia, Po and Adda, was at the deuotion of Ceſar, except Cremona and Cremis, whereof the one was guarded by the French, and the other kept by the Venetians. The Cardinall of Sion with many of the baniſhed people of the

Duchie of Millan, followed Cæſar, Marke Anthonie Colonna doing the like with two hundred men at armes of the Popes pay: by reaſon whereof the feare of the French was ſo much the more increaſed, whoſe hopes were reduced to this, that the ten thouſand Swiſſers who had bin payed for ten moneths, would no more deferre their comming. After Cæſar had paſſed the riuer of Oglia, he drew neare to the riuer of Adda, to make his paſſage at Piſqueton, but finding many difficulties to paſſe in that place, he came to Riuolta, the French men lying at Caſciano on the other ſide of the riuer, who for that the Swiſſers were not come, and the riuer of Adda had many foords that yeelded facilitie of paſſage, retired the day after to Millan, not without infamie to Monſieur Lautrech, who had publiſhed, and written to the King, that he would ſtop Cæſars paſſage at that riuer. But Cæſar being paſſed without any impediment, the Citie of Lode rendred to him forthwith: and when he was within a few miles of Millan, he ſent an Herald to ſummon the Towne, threatning the inhabitants, that if within three dayes they expulſed not the French armie, he would deale worſe with them then did Federike Barberoſſo his predeceſſor, who not ſatisfied to haue waſted and burnt Millan, cauſed ſalt to be ſowed there, in memory of his anger, and of their rebellion. But among the French men that were retired to Millan in great feare, the counſels were diuers: ſome were of opinion to abandon Millan, for that they thought themſelues vnable to reſiſt the enemie, and withall they had no great confidence in the coming of the Swiſſers, although they knew they were already vpon the way; and for that they had aduertiſement that the Cantons either had already ordered, or were at point to command, that the ſouldiers of the Swiſſers ſhould depart from the ſeruice of both the one and the other: and it was thought very likely, that thoſe bands that were vpon the way, would be more readie to obey then thoſe that were already in the campe of the enemie. Others were not of opinion that they ſhould depart, and reproued that counſell as a matter full of infamie: and hauing better hope in the coming of the Swiſſers and their owne abilitie to defend Millan, they aduiſed to ſticke to the defence of the towne, and that to that end they ſhould keepe retained in Millan all the footmen, and eight hundred Lances, making diſtribution of the reſidue, together with the Venetians and the light horſemen, into places adioyning, to keepe them, and to cut off victuals from the enemies. Neuertheleſſe the firſt counſell had bene followed, if Andrew Gritti and Andrew Trewiſan, Venetian Commiſſioners, had not ſtrongly perſwaded the contrary, who preuailed ſo much by their authoritie (for otherwiſe they could obtaine nothing) that they haſted not ſo much to deliberate of departing: ſo that euen as they would haue bene gone, there came certaine newes, that the day following Albert Peter would be in Millan with ten thouſand Swiſſers and Gaſcons. By this occaſion their courages reuiued, and yet hauing no confidence to be able to defend the ſuburbes, they burnt them, by the counſell of the Venetian Commiſſioners, who aduiſed them ſo, either for that they ſuppoſed it neceſſary for the ſafetie of the towne, or elſe vnder that occaſion to ſatisfie the ancient hatred remaining of long time between them of Millan and Venice. They expulſed likewiſe out of the Citie, or retained vnder honeſt guard, many of the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, as inclining to the name of the Empire, by affection of the partie, and for that there were in the armie many of the ſame faction. In this meane while Cæſar incamped with his army at Lambra two miles from Millan, where he was no ſooner arriued, then the Swiſſers arriued at Millan, who ſhewing themſelues ready for the defence of that Citie, refuſed to fight againſt the other Swiſſers. Their coming gaue new life to the French men, and no leſſe terror to Cæſar, who conſidering the ancient hatred of that nation againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and calling to mind what had hapned to Lodowike Sforce by hauing Swiſſers in his armie and the French armie his enemies, he began to feare leſt they ſhould play him the ſame pranke: for that it ſeemed to him very likely, that they would rather practiſe ſome trechery againſt him, who wanted money to pay them, then againſt the French men, to whom was wanting no mony, either to pay their wages, or to corrupt their minds. And that which brought him into greateſt doubt, was, that Iames Staffler Generall of the Swiſſers, had asked him his pay with great arrogancie, which neuertheleſſe was deferred, beſides many other difficulties, becauſe the treaſure that was ſent to him out of Germanie, was retained by the Spaniſh regiments that were within Breſſia, for the paiment of that which was due vnto them. The Emperour then being much moued with the feare of this danger, cauſed his campe ſuddenly to be raiſed, and retired towards the riuer of Adda: and it was not doubted that if he had approched Millan but three dayes afore (a time which he vainly conſumed afore Aſola) the French men that liued

in great doubt & vncertaintie of the coming of the Swiſſers, had returned beyond the Mounts: and it was not doubted likewiſe that (if he had not ſo ſoone diſcamped) either the French men, not repoſing fully in the Swiſſers, for the reſpect they ſeemed to haue of their countrymen that ſerued in Ceſars campe, had followed their firſt counſell; or that the Swiſſers themſelues taking their excuſe vpon the commandement of their ſuperiours, would haue abandoned the French men. The Emperour paſſed the riuer of Adda, and was not followed of the Swiſſers, who remained at Loda, proteſting that if their payes came not within foure dayes, they would depart and leaue his ſeruice: but Ceſar making his abode vpon the territories of Bergama, gaue them continuall hopes to be ſatisfied, for that he expected a new ſupply of money to be ſent him out of England, threatning to returne to Millan; which held the French men in great doubt, who were now more then euer vncertaine of the fidelitie of the Swiſſers, for that beſides that they had willingly prolonged their coming, with proteſtation that they would neuer lift vp their weapons againſt their countrymen in the other campe, there was come to them a commandement from the Cantons to forſake the pay of the French: by reaſon whereof there were already two thouſand of them gone away, and there was great feare leſt the reſidue would do the like, although the Cantons on the other ſide had aſſured the King that they had giuen ſecret commandement to their footmen to the contrary. At laſt Ceſar, after he had drawne from the towne of Bergama ſixteene thouſand duckats, and was gone towards Crema vnder hope of an intelligence, returning eftſoones vpon the territories of Bergama without doing any thing, he determined to withdraw himſelfe to Trent. Therefore when he had communicated his deliberation with the Captaines of the armie, and aſſured them that his principall intention was to take order for money, whereof he meant to make a new leuie, with the which, and with the treaſure of England that was vpon the way, he would make a ſhort returne, he exhorted them to expect his coming: and they hauing ſacked Loda, and forced the Caſtle without artillerie, retired to Guiaradadda for want of victuals, after they had alſo made pillage of the towne of S. Angel. After the departing of Ceſar, there was ſome hope that the Swiſſers, with whom was ioyned the whole armie at Romans, would eftſoones paſſe the riuer of Adda, the rather for that the Marquis of Brandenbourg was come to the campe, and the Cardinall of Sion to Bergama with thirtie thouſand duckats which the King of England had ſent: for feare whereof, the Duke of Bourbon whom almoſt all the Swiſſers and the Venetian ſouldiers had forſaken, was come vpon the ſhore of the riuer. But the determination of the enemies was ſuddenly changed, for that the Swiſſers, the money not ſufficing to ſatisfie their whole pay, returned into their countrey by the valley of Voltolina. And for the ſame cauſe a regiment of three thouſand footmen, part Spaniſh and part Almaines, came and rendred themſelues to the campe of the French men and Venetians, who being paſſed the riuer of Adda, had not ceaſſed to trouble the enemies with ſundry incurſions, and to skirmiſh with them with diuers fortunes & accidents: the French men hauing ſometimes the worſe, who in a hote skirmiſh made neare Bergama, loſt about two hundred horſe: and ſometimes the aduerſitie fell vpon the contrary part, of whom in a like encounter Ceſar Fieramoſquo fell into the fortune of a priſoner. The reſidue of the armie drew neare to Breſſia, hauing receiued euery man a duckat: but for the impediment that the light horſemen gaue him, Marke Anthonie Colonno entred into Verona with the Lanceknights and certaine bands of Spaniſh footmen, and all the others ſeparated themſelues.

This was the end of the mouing of Ceſar, wherein the French king had great ſuſpition of the Pope, for that hauing required him that according to the bond of the league made betweene them, he ſhould ſend to the defence of the Eſtate of Millan fiue hundred men at armes, or at leaſt bring them neare the confines, and that he ſhould wage three thouſand Swiſſers, according to his offer made to Anthonie Maria Palauiſin: the Pope anſwering but coldly touching the paiment of the Swiſſers, and excuſing himſelfe that his men were ill appointed, he promiſed to ſend him the bands of the Florentines, who with ſome of his ſouldiers marched very ſlowly towards Bologna and Reggia. And his ſuſpition that he was participant and conſenting to the coming of Ceſar, was yet more increaſed, for that as ſoone as he vnderſtood that Ceſar was entred into Italy, he had created Legate with him Bernard de Bibiena Cardinall of Saint Maria in Portico, who vſed alwayes to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the French in their affaires with the Pope; and much more for that he ſuffered Marke Anthonie Colonno with the regiments to follow Ceſars armie. But the truth was, that the Pope in reſpect of his owne intereſt, was not a litle diſpleaſed for the deſcending of Ceſar with ſo great forces, fearing if he remained victor, leſt he would aſſay to oppreſſe all Italy, according to his ancient inclination: but both for doubt, and that ſuch a maner of proceeding was conformable to his nature, he concealed his thoughts, laboring to make himſelfe as litle hatefull as he could to either partie. This was the cauſe why he was bold to call home againe Marke Anthonie, and that he durſt not ſend to the King the ſuccours he had promiſed: that he created a Legate with Ceſar; and on the other ſide, that Ceſar being departed from Millan, the Legate vnder a fained colour of ſickneſſe ſtayed at Rubiero, to ſee afore he paſſed further, what would be the iſſue of ſuch an enterpriſe: and afterwards to pacifie the Kings mind, he thought good, that his nephew Laurence (continuing in the ſame demonſtration to depend of the King that he ſhewed when he went to him at Millan) ſhould cauſe money to be giuen him by the Florentines to pay 3000 Swiſſers for one moneth: the which money although the King accepted, yet (diſcloſing that he knew the Popes drifts) he ſaid, that ſince he was always againſt him in the war, and that the alliance made with him had ſerued him to no vſe in times of danger, he wold make a new confederation, wherin he wold not be bound, but in peace and times of ſuretie. The armie of Ceſar being diſperſed, the Venetians without tarrying for the French men, approched Breſſia ſuddenly one night to ſcale the walls, preſuming of the ſmall number of defendants, ſince there remained no more but ſixe hundred footmen Spaniſh, and foure hundred horſemen; but their ladders not being long enough, and thoſe within defending themſelues valiantly, they could not take it. Afterwards the French armie arriued vnder the charge of Odet de Foix, whom the King had newly created his Lieutenant in the place of the Duke of Bourbon, who of his owne motion had willingly reſigned that gouernment into the Kings hands. Theſe armies aſſailed Breſſia with the artilleries in foure quarters, to ſ end the defendants might not be able to make reſiſtance in ſo many places: who maintained themſelues ſo long as they had hope that a regiment of ſeuen thouſand footmen of the country of Tyrol, being come by Ceſars commandement to Montagnana, would come forward: but that reſcue being diſappointed by the impediments which the Venetians beſtowed in the Caſtle of Anſo and other paſſages, and the defendants not willing to abide the aſſault which was to be giuen the next day (a great pane of the wall being already beaten downe to the ground) the ſouldiers couenanted to leaue the towne and Caſtle, onely with their goods ſaued, if they were not reſcued within a day.

The Venetians recouer Breſſia

About theſe times the Pope preparing to take the Duchie of Vrbin from Franciſco Maria de la Rouera, began to proceed againſt him with Church cenſures, cauſing an admonition to be publiſhed, wherein was expreſſed, that being in the pay and wages of the Church, he had denied him thoſe regiments of men for the which he had receiued pay, and had ſecretly compoumded with the enemies: That long before he had killed the Cardinall of Pauie, of the which he was abſolued by grace and not by iuſtice, together with many other murders committed by him: That in the greateſt heate of the warre betweene Pope Iulio, to whom he was nephew, ſubiect, and Captaine, he had ſent Baltaſar de Chaſtillon to take the Kings pay: and that at the ſame time he had denied paſſage to certaine bands that marched to ioyne with the armie of the Church; and in the iuriſdiction which he poſſeſſed as freeholder of the Sea Apoſtolike, he had purſued the ſouldiers of the Church that fled from the battell of Rauenna. The Pope was determined many moneths before to make warre vpon him, whereunto, beſides the late iniuries, he was puſhed on by a diſdaine for that he refuſed to aide him and his brother to returne to Florence: and yet the ſhame that he had to perſecute the nephew of him by whoſe meanes the Church was riſen to ſuch a greatneſſe, did ſomewhat retaine him; but much more the intreaties of his brother Iulian, who in the time of their exile, hauing remained many yeares in the Court of Vrbin, with Duke Guido, and after his death, with the preſent Duke, could not endure to ſee him depriued by them, of the Duchie wherein he had bene entertained and honored. But Iulian de Medicis being dead at Florence of a long ſickneſſe, and the ſtirres of Ceſar being come to nothing, the Pope at the perſwaſion of his nephew Laurence and his mother Alfonſina, thirſting after that Eſtate, reſolued to deferre no longer, alledging for excuſe of his ingratitude (which many reproched him withall, and caſt in his teeth) not onely the treſpaſſes he had receiued by him, and the penalties which the rigour of the lawes impoſe vpon a ſubiect that offends in contumacie againſt his Lord, or a Captaine who contrary to his bond denieth to leade the men for the which he is waged and entertained: but much more that it was to him a

matter very dangerous, to endure in the intrals of his Eſtate, a man hauing already begun to offend him without all regard to faith and honour; he might be certaine, that by how much a greater occaſion ſhould be offered, by ſo much the more would he be readie to do the like hereafter. The progreſſe of that warre was this: as ſoone as Laurence ſhewed himſelfe vpon the frontiers of the Duchie, with an armie compounded of the ſouldiers and ſubiects of the Church and the Eſtate of Florence, the Citie of Vrbin with other townes of that iuriſdiction made a voluntary rendring to the Pope, the Duke who was retired to Peſera, giuing his conſent that they ſhould ſaue themſelues, ſince he was not able to defend them: and as ſoone as the armie drew neare, Peſera followed the example of Vrbin, foraſmuch as, although there was a garriſon of three thouſand footmen, the towne well fortified, and the ſea at command, Franciſco Maria leauing within the Caſtle Tranquillo Mandolfo, in whom he repoſed much, went to Mantua, whither he had ſent before his wife and ſonnes: the cauſe of his going to Mantua, was, either for that he durſt not truſt the ſouldiers, of whom the greateſt part was vnpayed, or (as ſome report) for that he was impatient to be abſent from his wife, excuſing his feare with loue. Thus the Duchie of Vrbin, together with Peſera and Sinigale, came in foure dayes into the obedience of the Pope, except the Caſtles of Sinigale, Peſera, and Saint Leo, and that of Maiuolo. But the Caſtle of Sinigale made no delay to follow the courſe of the victorie, as alſo the ſtrong Caſtle of Peſera after it had bene two dayes battered with artilleries, compounded to giue vp if within twenty days it were not reſcued, ſo far forth as during that time, there were no caſting of rampiers or other ſort of fortifications: which condition being ill performed, was the cauſe that Tranquillo receiuing no reſcue within the time appointed, refuſed to deliuer it vp, and began afreſh to ſhoote and make ſallies vpon them without: but that made his deſtinie the harder, for that after the taking of the Towne, Laurence being returned to Florence, the Captaines that remained in the armie had made trenches about the Caſtle, and placed certaine veſſels on the ſea, to keepe that no ſuccours might enter. Then the terme being expired, they began incontinently to batter the Caſtle, but the ſame day the ſouldiers within mutined againſt Tranquillo, and deliuered him vp into the hands of the Captaines, who condemned him to be hanged for breaking his promiſe. Not many dayes after was rendred the Caſtle of Maiuola, which is a place very neceſſary to beſiege S. Leo, for that it is but a mile diſtant, and hath his ſituation directly oppoſite. They beſtowed about S. Leo two thouſand men, to the end to keepe it beſieged: for by reaſon of the ſtrong ſituation thereof there was no hope to carry it but by the laſt neceſſitie, which is hunger: and yet it was ſurpriſed by ſtealth within three moneths after by the inuention of a maiſter Carpenter, who climbing vp by night with a very long ladder to a cliffe or dependant ſuppoſed to be moſt inacceſſible of all that mountaine; after he had taken away his ladder, and remained there all the night, he began at the firſt appearing of the day to climbe higher with certaine faſtening inſtruments of iron, vntill at laſt he got to the top of the mountaine, from whence deſcending againe, and with his iron inſtruments making eaſie certaine of the places that were of moſt difficultie, he returned the night following to the campe by the helpe of the ſame ladder: and after he had ſhewed the meanes how to get vp, the night that was appointed he returned thither with the ſame ladder, being followed by an hundred and fiftie choiſe men, with whom ſtaying vpon the ſaid cliffe or dependant, as ſoone as day began to peepe (for it was impoſſible to climbe vp higher by night) they began one after another to mount vp thoſe very hard and narrow places: and about thirtie of them were now got vp to the top of the mountaine with a drumme and ſixe Enſignes, and hiding themſelues vpon the ground, expected their companions that were climbing: but there being on the top of the mountaine a watchman, who as he departed from his charge (for it was now high day) perceiuing them lying on the ground, cried out incontinently; they ſeeing themſelues diſcouered, without otherwiſe attending their companions, gaue the ſigne to them of the campe, as they were appointed, who according to the order giuen, aſſailed the mountain incontinently with many ladders in ſundry places, to the end to diuert thoſe within: who ran preſently euery man to his owne place; but when they diſcerned ſix enſignes already within that marched on the plaine of the mountaine, and had ſlaine ſome of their men, they were much amazed, and ran to incloſe themſelues within the Caſtle that was cut out of the mountaine: whereupon ſome others being now aſcended after the firſt, they opened the gate which is the entrance into the mountaine, that all the reſidue might enter; and thus the mountaine being taken, thoſe within the Caſtle rendred it the ſecond day, although it was well prouided of all things. This Eſtate being conquered, which together with Peſera and Sinigale, ſeparate members from the Duchie of Vrbin, was not worth in reuenue aboue fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, Pope Leo purſuing the proceſſe he had begun, publiſhed ſentence, and depriued Franciſco Maria, and in the Conſiſtorie inueſted his nephew Laurence: and (to make the matter more effectuall) he annexed to the Bull which he diſpatched for that action, the ſubſcription of the hands of all the Cardinals; with whom Dominicke Grimani, Biſhop of Vrbin, and a great friend to the Duke, would not be concurrant, and for that cauſe fearing the Popes indignation, after a few dayes he departed from Rome, whither he neuer returned as long as the Pope liued. The French king was diſcontented with the oppreſſion of the Duke of Vrbin, whom he ſaw depriued of his Eſtate for being confederate with him: but he was much more diſpleaſed for many other things that the Pope did. For Proſper Colonno when he returned out of France, ſtaying at Baſſeta a town of the Paluoiſins, and afterwards for feare of the French men being come to Modena, whither likewiſe Ierome Moron was retired, who ſtood in doubt of thē, for that contrary to their promiſes they had cōmanded him to go into France: there was continual debating whileſt Proſper lay at Modena, and afterwards at Bolognia, to ſurpriſe ſecretly ſome place of importance in the Duchie of Millan, by the helpe of ſome of the baniſhed men; in which practiſe was alſo concurrant Mucio Colonno, to whom the Pope, conſenting to theſe actions, had granted harbour for his ſouldiers vpon the territories of Modena. Moreouer, the Pope had perſwaded the King Catholike (for ſo was the Archduke called ſince the death of his grandfather by the mother ſide) to make no new conuentions with the French king. And on the behalfe of the Swiſſers, Ennius Biſhop of Verula, and the Popes Nuncio, who was afterwards euen in his lateſt yeares made Cardinal, ſtirred vp ſ fiue Cantons to follow the amitie of Cæſar, beſides many other things diſpleaſing to the King: foraſmuch as at the ſame time a practiſe was treated betweene Cæſar (who remaining betweene Trent and Inſpruch, terrified the French men more with demonſtrations then with effects) the King of England and the Swiſſers, to make a new inuaſion vpon the Duchie of Millan; the French king feared leſt theſe matters were wrought with the conſent of the Pope, whoſe euill affection alſo appeared in other actions, for that with many exceptions he made difficultie to confirme vnto him the tenths of the Benefices of the Realme of France, which he had promiſed him at Bolognia: and yet (ſo great is the maieſtie of the Pontificacie) the King laboured to appeaſe him with many kind offices, ſo that albeit he had determined after the departure of Cæſar to moleſt Mirandola, Carpy and Correge, as townes Imperiall, to the end to draw ſome money from them, yet he forbare in regard of the complaints of the Pope, who had receiued afore into his protection the Lords of thoſe townes: and the Moores of Africa ſcowring the inferiour ſea with ſmall veſſels, he offered to ſend him for the ſuretie of thoſe ſeas many ſhips, which Peter of Nauarre armed at Marſeilles by his conſent, onely in hope of prey, to ſcowre the ſhores of Barbary with ſixe thouſand footmen. And yet the Pope perſeuering in his opinion, although he partly denied, and partly excuſed ſuch things, would neuer ſo much as conſent to the demand which the King had made to him with great inſtance to call out of Swiſſerland the Biſhop of Verula; neither would he remoue Mucio Colonno from the territories of Modena (whom he fained to remaine there of his owne authoritie) vntill Proſper was departed from Bolognia, and all that was debated being come to nothing, there was no more neceſſitie of his abiding there; whoſe departing was very vnfortunate vnto him, for that not long after, entring ſecretly by night into the towne of Fermo with the forces of the Colonnois, and certaine bands of Spaniſh footmen, as he was buſie in ſacking the Citie, he receiued a blow the ſame night, whereof he died within a few dayes after.

In this eſtate of affaires, the Senate of Venice making inſtance for the recouerie of Verona, Monſieur Lautrech who had in his armie ſix thouſand Lanceknights whom the Venetians agreed to pay for that enterpriſe, came to the riuer of Adice, to the end to paſſe to Vſolingo, and to incampe themſelues together with the Venetian armie afore Verona. But afterwards the rumour of the coming of the Swiſſers being increaſed, and the ſuſpition augmented that Proſper Colonno was ſtayed at Modena, for that the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico remained in the ſame Citie, he retired to Peſquiero, not without the complaints of the Venetians, and diſtributed his bands both on this ſide and beyond the riuer of Mincio: in which place, although the ſaid ſuſpitions were ceaſſed, and that from Verona more then two thouſand footmen as well Spaniards as

Lanceknights, were gone to the pay of the Venetians, and more went dayly, he remained more then a moneth, expecting (as was ſaid) money out of France, and a greater proportion of artillerie, munitions and mony from the Venetians. But the trueſt cauſe was, to obſerue what would be the iſſue of the treatie betweene his King and the King Catholike. For the French king knowing how neceſſary his amitie was for the King Catholike, both to remoue the difficulties of his paſſage into Spaine, and to aſſure him of the obedience of his kingdomes, not content with the matters that had bene agreed vpon afore at Paris, ſought to impoſe vpon him harder conditions, and by his meanes to haue peace with Ceſar, which could not be brought to paſſe without rendring Verona to the Venetians: and the Spaniſh King, by the counſell of Monſieur de Cheures, by whole authoritie he being but fifteene yeares of age, was wholly gouerned, refuſed not to accommodate his deliberations to the preſent time, and neceſſitie of things. By reaſon whereof, on the behalfe of the French king were ſent to Noyon the Biſhop of Paris, the great Maiſter of France, and the Preſident of the Parliament of Paris: and for the King Catholike Monſieur de Cheures and the great Chancellour of Ceſar: and Monſieur Lautrech expecting what would be the iſſue, the rigour of armes (according to the cuſtome of the warfaring of our time) was continually employed againſt the poore paiſants. For Monſieur Lautrech hauing cauſed a bridge to be built at the village of Monzarban, began to cut downe the corne of the countrey of Verona, and gaue libertie to his light horſemen to make incurſions in all places: and hauing ſent part of his armie to incampe vpon the territories of Mantua, he ſpoiled that countrey with very great domage. To free himſelfe of theſe harmes, the Marquis of Mantua was contented to pay him twelue thouſand crownes: and the ſouldiers of Verona executing dayly hoſtilities vpon the territories of Vincenſa and Padua, put to ſacke the wretched Citie of Vincenſa. Afterwards Monſieur Lautrech moued by the great complaints of the Venetians, paſſed the riuer of Adice by a bridge which he cauſed to be ſet vp at Vſolingo; and afterwards hauing made a great prey of the countrey (for it was neuer thought that the armie would paſſe on that ſide) he drew neare to Verona to beſiege it, winning Chiuſa in the meane while by the aide of the countrey men, to make more hard the paſſage of ſuccours that were to come out of Germanie. But the ſame day that he approched Verona, the Lanceknights, either of their own motion, or by the ſecret ſubornation of Ceſar (although it was now three moneths ſince they were entertained with the money of the Venetians) proteſted openly, that they would not ſerue at the ſiege of a towne poſſeſſed by Ceſar, and whereto the French king had no principall intereſt. By reaſon whereof, Monſieur Lautrech repaſſing Adice, remoued a mile from the walls of Verona; and the Venetian armie conſiſting of fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, thinking it not ſafe for them to remaine on the other ſide the riuer, went and ioyned with him. At which time the Deputies of both the Kings paſſed capitulations in the towne of Noyon in this ſort: That there ſhould be a perpetuall peace betweene the French King and the King of Spaine, with confederation for the defence of their Eſtates againſt all men: That the French king ſhould giue his daughter who was then but one yeare of age, to the King Catholike in marriage, and endue her for dowrie with the rights which he pretended to appertaine to him in the kingdome of Naples, according to the partition formerly made betweene their predeceſſors; but vnder this couenant, that vntill the time that ſhe were mariageable, the King Catholike ſhould pay to the French king an hundred thouſand crownes yearely to helpe to defray her expences: That if ſhe died before the mariage, and the King ſhould haue another daughter, then he ſhould beſtow her likewiſe vpon the King Catholike with the ſame conditions: and in caſe he had no other, that he ſhould haue Madame Renee, who had bene promiſed to him in the capitulation made at Paris: and in caſe that any of them ſhould die in mariage without children, then that part of the kingdome of Naples to reuert to the French King: That the King Catholike ſhould reſtore the Realme of Nauarre to the ancient King within a certaine time, which if he performed not, it ſhould be lawfull to the French King to aide him to recouer it: but (as the Spaniards affirmed afterwards) ſo that the ſaid King ſhould firſt make his rights appeare: That Ceſar might enter into the peace within the terme of two moneths, which although he did, it ſhould be lawfull to the French king to aide the Venetians to recouer Verona; which Citie, if Ceſar wold put into the hands of the king Catholike, with power to giue it freely to the French King within ſixe weekes, to diſpoſe thereof as he thought good, the King ſhould pay him an hundred thouſand crownes, and the Venetians as much,

whereof the one part to be payed vpon the consignation, and the other within sixe moneths, and also that he should remaine acquited of about three hundred thousand crownes which he had receiued of King Lewis whilest they were confederates: and that in that case there should be truce for eighteene moneths betweene Cæsar and the Venetians, and that to Cæsar should remaine Riua de Trent and Rouera, with all that he possessed then in the countrey of Friul, and the Venetians should continue to keepe the places which at that time they held of Cæsar, vntill the French and Spanish Kings had determined the differences that were betweene them for their confines. Both the one and the other of the parties named the Pope. By reason of the accord made at Noyon, the Venetians ceassed not to stirre vp Monsieur Lautrech to besiege Verona, for that they were vncertaine whether Cæsar would accept the peace, and also for that by reason of the summe of money which they were to pay, they desired rather to recouer it by force of armes. But the way of peace was more acceptable to the French King then that of warre, for the desire he had to be at vnitie with Cæsar: and yet Monsieur Lautrech, who had now no more excuse, for that the Venetians had made great leuies of souldiers, and prepared all the prouisions by him required, and for that the Lanceknights refused no more to go thither with the residue, consented to their will. Then the armies passed seuerally ouer the riuer of Adice, the one by a bridge that was builded aboue the Citie, the other by a bridge set vp beneath the Citie: and part of the artillerie of the French armie that lay incamped at Tomba, was planted before the gate of Saint Lucie, and the other with the Lanceknights was bestowed at the gate of Saint Maximo, to batter afterwards all together on that part where the wall betweene the Citie and the Citadell ioyneth with the wall of the towne, and that to the end that hauing the meanes at one time to enter into the Citie and into the Citadell, the defendants should be constrained to deuide themselues into two parts, in regard of the wall in the midst. The Venetian armie passed beneath Verona into the field of Mars, and remained incamped at Saint Michaels betweene the riuer and the Channell, both to beate downe the defences of that place, and to batter the gate called the Bishops gate, which was a place of most weakenesse and least fenced. The two first dayes the defences which were of sufficient strength and beate flanking, were cast downe by the artilleries, but with greater difficulties on the quarter of the Venetians, to whom it was no small labour to batter the defences of the three bastillions: which being done, both parts began to execute the wall with eighteene peeces of great artilleries, and fifteene smaller peeces of batterie; and either armie hauing throwne downe the third day twentie fadomes of the wall, they forbare not to batter still, to make the entrie much the larger. And yet the Venetians, on whose side the wall was most weake, notwithstanding they had almost reuersed all the bastillions and rampiers, had not yet wholly remoued all the defences within, that played in flanke, because they lay so low and almost within the ditch, that either the bullet went ouer them, or else was grazed in the earth afore it came at them. Moreouer, at the same time they vndermined the wall, which though they had vnderset and propped vp, yet it fell downe before the time appointed by the Captaines. There was within Verona eight hundred horsemen, fiue thousand Lanceknights, and fifteene hundred Spaniards, vnder the gouernment of Marke Anthonie Colonno, who was now no more in the pay of the Pope, but of Cæsar: which garrison looking carefully to reparations, making necessarie prouisions, and defending valiantly, shewed great courage, to the great praise of Marke Anthonie, who receiuing a small hurt in his shoulder by the shot of an harquebuse, forbare not to offer himselfe day and night to all paines and dangers. By this time the artilleries planted by the French men in foure places against the towers betweene the gate of the Citadell and the gate of Saint Lucie, had made so great ruines, that euery breach was able to receiue the souldiers marshalled in order, the artilleries of the Venetians hauing performed litle lesse; and yet Monsieur Lautrech demanded new artilleries to make the breach greater, embracing readily all occasions that were offered to defer (contrary to the wil of the Venetians, who called vpon him to giue the assault). Moreouer, eight hundred barrels of powder, together with many other sorts of munitions, comming to the armie in carts, by the plaine of Verona, it happened that the desire of those that guided the cattell to enter one afore another, caused them to make such haste, that the chafing and mouing of the wheeles bred to a fire, which burned the powder, with the carts and the cattell that drew them. Moreouer,

there was another difficultie added to the beſieged, for that in the Citie which had bene ſo many moneths afflicted by the neareneſſe of their enemies, the victuals began to faile, neither could any be gotten, but in very ſmall quantitie, and that by ſtealth, by the way of the mountaines.

The affaires of Verona ſtanding on theſe termes, there came to the reſcue of that Citie a regiment of nine thouſand Lanceknights ſent by Caeſar, who arriuing at Chiuſa, tooke it by compoſition, and ſeized vpon the Caſtle of Coruara, ſtanding vpon the next hill to Adice drawing towards Trent, which had bene commanded many times by both the parties in the warre betweene Caeſar and the Venetians. By reaſon of the approch of the Lanceknights, Monſieur Lautrech either fearing, or making ſhew of feare, raiſed his campe againſt the minds of the Venetians, and retired his armie to Villefranche, taking with him part of the Venetian regiments, and the reſidue vnder John Paul Manfron withdrew to Boſeto beyond Adice by a bridge prepared: in ſo much as the Venetians deſpairing to be able to take Verona, ſent all their great artilleries to Breſſia: and ſo the Lanceknights without any impediment incamped at Tomba, where the French armie was lodged afore, one part of them entring into the Citie, and the reſidue remaining without to victuall Verona, which being done, they departed, leauing for the guard of Verona a ſtrength of ſeuen or eight thouſand Lanceknights, for that the moſt part of the Spaniſh bands, who could not agree with them, were paſſed to the Venetian campe vnder Colonell Maldonato; & in the iudgement of all men y ſuccors was of ſmall moment, for that they brought with them no other ſtore of money then twentie thouſand Florins of Rhein, which the King of England had ſent; and whileſt they remained there, they conſumed ſo much victuals, that it almoſt equalled the quantitie which they brought with them. The companies being retired to Villefranche, where they conſumed the countreys of Verona and Mantua, the Venetians were compelled to take order, leſt the French men whom no commandement from their King could cauſe to ſtay, ſhould depart to their garriſons, that the Citie of Breſſia ſhould wholly furniſh them of neceſſarie victuals; an expence amounting to aboue a thouſand crownes a day. At laſt things began to incline manifeſtly to peace, for that it was knowne that Caeſar (notwithſtanding his former ſolicitation to his ſonne in law, not to compound with the French King) preferring the couetouſneſſe of money afore the hate he bare naturally to the French, and alſo afore his ancient ambition to make himſelfe Lord of Italy, had not onely accepted and ratified the peace, but alſo determined to render Verona according to the forme of thoſe conuentions: from whence ſucceeded another matter to the benefite of the French King, that all the Cantons of Swiſſers ſeeing armes layed downe betweene Caeſar and the King, were contented to compound with him, as the Griſons had done before; in which action Galeas Viſconte did what he could, who being baniſhed and declared a rebell by the King, obtained of him by this meanes libertie to returne into his countrey, with reſtitution of all his goods, and receiued in time many graces and honours. The compoſition was, that the King ſhould pay to the Swiſſers within three moneths an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and from thence forward a perpetuall yearely penſion: That the Swiſſers ſhould be bound to deliuer to his pay by publike decree ſo often as he ſhould demand it, a certaine number of footmen, wherein notwithſtanding the proceeding was diuers; for that the eight Cantons were bound to furniſh that proportion, whenſoeuer he ſhould enter into any enterpriſe to offend the Eſtates of others, and the fiue Cantons no otherwiſe then for the defence of his owne eſtates: That it ſhould be in the power of the Swiſſers to render to the French King the Caſtles of Lugan and Lugarno, which be paſſages of great ſtrength, and of no leſſe importance for the ſuretie of the Duchie of Millan: and in caſe they would make reſtitution, that the King ſhould pay them three hundred thouſand duckats: which Caſtles they raſed to the ground as ſoone as the compoſition was made. This was the diſcourſe of things in Italy, in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and ſixteene. But in the beginning of the yeare following, the Biſhop of Trent, who was come to Verona, made offer to Monſieur Lautrech 1517.
to deliuer vp that Citie to the French King within ſixe moneths, according to the contents of the capitulation, which he ſaid he held in the name of the King of Spaine. But there remained one difficultie, to wit, whether the terme ſhould begin from the day of the ratification of Caeſar, or from the time it was acknowledged that Verona was holden by the King Catholike, like, and vpon this there was a diſputation held for certaine dayes: yet for that the garriſon of footmen that were within Verona drew to mutinies vpon the demand of money, the Biſhop of Trent was conſtrained to haſten the buſineſſe: and therefore taking beginning from the day that he had receiued commiſſion from Cæſar, he agreed to deliuer vp Verona the fifteenth day of Ianuarie: at which day hauing receiued of the Venetians the firſt fiftie thouſand duckats, and the fifteene thouſand which by the capitulation they were bound to pay to the footmen that were in Verona, together with the promiſe of Monſieur Lautrech to ſee the artilleries that were within Verona drawne to Trent, he paſſed the aſſignement to Monſieur Lautrech, who receiued it in the name of the French King: and at the ſame inſtant Monſieur Lautrech, in the name of the ſaid King, deliuered it vp to the Senate of Venice, and for the ſame Senate to Andrew Gritti their Deputie, to the great contentment of the Nobilitie and all the people of Venice, who reioyced greatly, for that they had obtained ſo happie an end of ſo long and ſo dangerous a warre, although after infinite calamities and expences: for by the report of ſuch as haue written of their doings, they conſumed, during all the warres they made ſince the league of Cambray, fiue millions of duckats, whereof they leuied fiue hundred thouſand of the ſale of offices. But the inhabitants of Verona reioyced no leſſe then the reſidue, together with all other Cities and iuriſdictions ſubiect to their Commonweale, hoping now that by the meanes of peace they ſhould be deliuered from ſo many miſchiefes and ſo great afflictions, which they had ſo long a time miſerably ſupported, ſometimes by the one armie, and ſometimes by the other.

FOraſmuch as armes were now layed downe betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, and all occaſions taken from the French king to make warre againſt Ceſar or the King Catholike, it ſeemed that Italy, afflicted and tormented with ſo many calamities, ſhould now haue reſt and tranquillitie for ſome yeares: foraſmuch as the Swiſſers (a mightie inſtrument to any that ſought to innouate and trouble things) ſeemed now to be reclaimed to their ancient amitie with the French King, and yet had not their minds eſtranged from other Princes: and in the accord made at Noyon, there appeared ſuch a hope, that to eſtabliſh a greater alliance betweene the two Kings, there was debating to draw them to an enteruiew at Cambray, whither were gone to that end Monſieur de Cheures the great Maiſter of France, and Robertet: and likewiſe there was expreſſed no leſſe readineſſe in Ceſar, who, beſides the rendring of Verona, ſent two Embaſſadours to the French King, to confirme and ſweare the peace. It was not then without iuſt cauſe that men iudged, that the peace and concord betweene ſo mightie Princes, would extinguiſh all the ſeeds of diſcords and warres in Italy: and yet, either by our aduerſe deſtinie, or for that Italy being deuided into ſo many ſeuerall Principalities and States, it was almoſt impoſſible, by reaſon of the diuerſitie of wils and intereſts of ſuch as had it in hand, that it ſhould not be ſubiect to continuall trauels: yea armes and hoſtilitie were ſcarce layed aſide betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, and the Citie of Verona not yet reſigned, when beginnings of new tumults were diſcloſed, whereof Franciſco Maria of Rouero was the cauſe, who had practiſed and drawn to his faction, ſuch bands of Spaniſh footmen as had ſerued both within Verona & afore Verona, to follow him for the recouery of his Eſtates, out of the which the Pope had expulſed him the ſame Sommer; whereunto they were eaſily perſuaded, for that to mercenarie ſouldiers, accuſtomed in the time of warre to ſacke townes and ſpoile and ouerrunne countries, there was nothing more contrary then peace, whereunto they ſaw all the affaires of Italy diſpoſed. There drew to him about fiue thouſand Spaniſh footmen, whereof was chiefe one Maldonato, a man of the ſame nation, and exerciſed in many warres. To theſe there ioyned about eight hundred light horſemen, led by Federike de Boſſolo, Gaioſo a Spaniard, Succre a Bourgonian, Andrew Bua and Conſtantine Boccalo Albanois, all experienced Captaines, and not to be deſpiſed for feates of armes. Amongſt whom he that bare the greateſt reputation, either for the nobleneſſe of his houſe, or for the charges & degrees which from his youth he had borne in warre, was Federike Gonzago Lord of Boſſolo, who haply was one of the greateſt perſwaders to this enterpriſe, being moued not onely by a deſire he had by new warres to increaſe his fame in martiall feates, together with the great amitie he had with Franciſco Maria, but alſo by an ancient hatred which he bare to Laurence de Medicis, chiefly for that at ſuch time as the charge of all the armies of the Church and the Florentines was transferred

to Laurence, by reaſon of the ſickneſſe of Iulian his Vncle, he had denied to make him Captaine generall of the footmen, which Iulian had aſſigned to him afore. Now this armie being more to be eſteemed for their valour then for their number, or any other meanes they had to ſuſtaine the warre (for they had neither money, artilleries, nor munitions; nor, beſides their horſes and armour, any one of thoſe prouiſions which are accuſtomed to follow armies:) they departed to go to the State of Vrbin the ſame day that the Citie of Verona was giuen vp to the Venetians: whereof the Pope being aduertiſed, he was much troubled. For he conſidered the qualitie of the armie, which was to be feared, for the hatred of the Captaines, and for the valour and reputation of the Spaniards: and he was not ignorant with what inclination the peoples of that Duchie fauoured Franciſco Maria, hauing long liued vnder the eaſie gouernment of the houſe of Montfeltro, the affection whereof they had transferred to him, as to one that had bene trained and nouriſhed in that Duchie, and borne of a ſiſter of the Duke Guido. Beſides, it grieued the Pope not a litle that he was to maintaine warre againſt an armie, which hauing nothing to loſe, marched onely for the deſire of prey and pillage, for the ſweetneſſe whereof he feared leſt many ſouldiers who by meanes of the peace that was made would draw others to ioyne to their faction, remaining without hauing gotten any thing, would ioyne with them: but that which aboue all other things troubled his mind, was a ſuſpition that the French King did communicate in this conſpiracie: for as much as beſides that he knew the King was diſpleaſed with the warre made againſt Franciſco Maria, he was touched in his conſcience with the conſideration of many cauſes which he had giuen him to be diſcontented with him, to wit, for not obſeruing the confederation made after the conqueſt of Millan, when Ceſar deſcended into Lombardie: for that after he was returned to Rome, he ſent to him a Bull touching the collation of Benefices in the Realme of France, and in the Duchie of Millan, much different from the conuention made at Bologna, which for the ſhortneſſe of time was not then ſubſigned, which Bull, the King being much moued, would not accept: for his ſecret negociations entertained againſt him with other Princes, and with the Swiſſers: for that a litle before, puſhed on by a deſire directly to hinder the recouerie of Verona, he had ſuffered the regiments of Spaniſh footmen coming from Naples to the reſcue of it, to paſſe in ſeuerall troupes through the dominion of the Church, excuſing himſelfe that he would not giue them occaſion to paſſe in one ioynt ſtrength, being in that caſe not able to ſtop them: and for that he had not performed vnto him his promiſes touching the tenths, but vnder conditions ſubtle and intangled, nor rendred the townes to the Duke of Ferrara: and withall he ſeemed to perceiue certaine ſignes of his mind eſtranged, all which gaue him very iuſt cauſe to doubt of the Kings will, in that this leuie of men being made in the parts of Verona, it was impoſſible that Monſieur Lautrech could be without knowledge of it many dayes before, and ſeeing he was ſilent in it, it was a manifeſt preſumption of his conſent: whereunto was added, that Federike de Boſſolo had bene till that verie day in the Kings pay; and it was doubtfull whether that was true that Monſieur Lautrech alledged for his excuſe, that the time of his entertainment was finiſhed. Moreouer, the Pope ſtood doubtfull of the inclination of the Venetians, hauing an opinion that their Commiſſioners had made themſelues parties to this vnion; for that Senate ſtood very much diſcontented with him, as well for the memory of things paſt, as for his preſent greatneſſe, which was ſuch, that being ſucceſſor of ſo great a power and reputation of a Popedome, he diſpoſed of the Eſtate of the Florentines at his pleaſure. Theſe things amazed the Pope, to whom the confidence and alliance that he had with other Princes, gaue no comfort nor hope: for that, beſides that they were newly reconciled or confedered with the French King, not one of them was pleaſed with his maner of proceeding by ſecret counſels and ſubtilties, wherein albeit he had inclined to their ſide, yet deferring to diſcouer himſelfe, and being ſlow in the execution of his intentions and promiſes, he gaue litle or no ſatisfaction to any of them: and which more is, doubting oftentimes of them all, he had diſpatched afore to the King Catholike, Frier Nicholas an Almaine, and Secretarie to the Cardinall de Medicis, to draw him from the enteruiew and parley which was ſolicited with the French king, fearing a contract of greater alliance betweene them to his preiudice. The Pope being in ſo great doubt, he and his nephew Laurence ceaſſed not to ſend ſouldiers into Romagna, part of whom were newly leuied, and the reſidue drawne out of the regiments of Florence, to the end that ioyning with Ranſe de Cere and Vitelli, who lay at Rauenna with their companies of men at armes, they might giue impediment to the paſſage of the enemies. But they hauing already paſſed the riuer of Po at Oſtia, and preuenting with their celeritie the preparations of otheirs, were entred vpon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara, by the way of Cento and Burio, hauing trauerſed the countrey of Bolognia. In this iourney they ſacked Granarolo, which is a borough vpon the territories of Faenza, and from thence they drew neare to Faenza, to proue if for the loue of a yong Gentleman of the family of the Manfredi, that was in the armie, they could raiſe any mutation there: but the inhabitants of Faenza not ſtirring at all, the armie paſſed further, not trying to get any other of the townes of Romagna, for there was in euery of them a garriſon, either of men at armes, or of footmen: and for the better ſuretie of Rimini, Ranſe and Vitelli were gone thither by ſea. Laurence came to Ceſena to aſſemble his companies there and at Rimini: but the enemies being already paſſed, he ceaſſed not in the meane while to leuie ſouldiers in many places, whereof there flocked vnto him more then he required. For fiue and twentie hundred Lanceknights that were diſmiſſed by Monſieur Lautrech to returne to their houſes, and likewiſe more then foure thouſand Gaſcons, were retained by Iohn Poppy Secretarie to Laurence: wherein he vſed his owne authoritie, being perſwaded that the armie of footmen would follow Franciſco Maria if they were not waged by others; or elſe beleeuing lightly that with theſe forces the victorie might eaſily be gotten, he ſtayed them of his owne authoritie, vſing the credite of Monſieur Lautrech with the Captaines, whom with their ſeuerall bands and regiments he conuerted immediatly towards Bolognia: ſo that the Pope and Laurence being diſcontented therewith for a doubt they had of the Kings indignation, could not refuſe them, for feare (ſith they were come ſo farre) leſt they would ioyne with the enemie. In the meane while Franciſco Maria aduanced dayly, and when he was come into the Duchie of Vrbin, he was receiued in euery place with great ioy, finding no ſouldiers in any of the townes; for that Laurence hauing no leiſure to make prouiſion for ſo many places, tooke care onely to defend the Citie of Vrbin, the ſeate and chiefe head of that Duchie: and for that cauſe he had ſent thither (by the counſell of Vitelli) a ſtrength of two thouſand footmen from Citta de Caſtello, and in place of Vitelli who refuſed to go thither, that charge was committed to Iaques Roſſetto of Citta de Caſtello, who notwithſtanding he was aduiſed by many, becauſe the people of Vrbin were holden ſuſpected, to expell out of the towne all ſuch as were able to beare armes, yet he forbare ſo to do. But Franciſco Maria without loſing time in any other place, drew directly to Vrbin, where albeit he could do litle at the firſt approch, yet at the ſecond Iaques Roſſetto agreed to deliuer the towne into his hands, puſhed on either by infidelitie, as many thought, or for feare, becauſe the people were riſen into tumult: for he had no reaſon to feare the ſole forces of the enemies, who had neither artilleries nor other prouiſions ſeruing for the taking of townes. The ſouldiers according to the compoſition went out of the towne, their goods and liues ſaued: but the Biſhop Vitelli remained priſoner, who gouerned that Eſtate for the new Duke, and vnder whoſe gouernment, it ſeemed, nothing had happily ſucceeded. All the whole Duchie followed the example of Vrbin, except S. Leon, which being well fortified and of ſtrong ſituation, was eaſie to be defended, yea with a very ſmall garriſon. The Citie of Agobbio that in the beginning was declared for Franciſco Maria, and eftſoones returned to the obedience of Laurence, ſeeing ſo happie a ſucceſſe, did as the reſt. Onely Peſera, Sinigale, Gradara and Mondauio, townes ſeparate from the Duchie, remained vnder the iuriſdiction of Laurence.

Vrbin returneth to the obedience of the naturall Duke.

When Franciſco Maria had recouered Vrbin, he entred into a deuice to make himſelfe Lord of ſome place vpon the ſea ſhore: and making ſhew as though he would go to Peſera, there being already gone thither and to Sinigale many bands of ſouldiers, he drew towards Fano, a Citie which at all times had bene more eaſie to be taken, and whereof there was leaſt doubt, for that it had neuer bene vnder his iuriſdiction. But Ranſe de Cere who was at Peſera, knowing his intention, diſpatched thither preſently Troylo Sauello with an hundred men at armes, and ſixe hundred footmen. The enemies approched with fiue peeces of artillerie, not very great, which they had found in Vrbin, and hauing alſo want of powder, they beate not downe to the earth any more then twentie fadomes of the wal, which notwithſtanding was not done without great difficultie: and yet they gaue the aſſault, wherein they loſt more then an hundred and fiftie men. But being nothing amazed with this, they recontinued the charge the day following, and that with ſuch valour, that the breach was almoſt abandoned, and without doubt they had entred the wall, had it not bene for Fabian de Galleſe Lieutenant to Troylo, who being left vpon the wall with a very ſmall companie of men at armes, made a wonderfull defence, and ſuſtained the charge. The day after they were prepared to giue the third aſſault, but vnderſtanding that a ſtrength of fiue hundred men ſent from Peſera, were entred in the night by ſea, they raiſed the ſiege, and retired to the borough & caſtle of Monte Baroccio, which ſtandeth vpon a high hil, & is of very ſtrong ſituation, the deſcent whereof is eaſie towards Foſſombrono and Vrbin, but very difficult and rough towards Peſera: and remaining in that place, for that then there was no conuenient occaſion offered, they guarded the Duchie of Vrbin which lay at their backes. On the other ſide, the Lanceknights and Gaſcons being come to Rimini to Laurence de Medicis, who had alſo hired many Italian footmen, and fifteene hundred other Lanceknights, of thoſe that had bene at the ſeruice of Verona, and aſſembled almoſt all the horſemen of the Pope and the Florentines, he marched with his men at armes to Peſera: and being wholly gouerned by the counſell of his Captaines, for the ſmall experience he had to manage an enterpriſe, he ſent his footmen to incampe vpon the mountaines oppoſite to the enemies. The Citie of Peſera ſtandeth at the entrie of a litle valley, which comes from Vrbin, out of which iſſueth a riuer which they call Porto, for that by the oportunitie of his deepneſſe ſhips are brought vp euen to that place: this riuer runnes neare to the Citie on that ſide which is towards Rimini: the Caſtle is towards the ſea, and betweene the riuer and the Citie be many ſtore-houſes, which Ranſe cauſed to be reuerſed for the ſuretie of the towne. A great part of the Citie is enuironed with mountaines on all parts, which ſtretch out euen to the ſea, but betweene them and the ſea remaineth a certaine ſpace of plaine, containing two miles in largeneſſe on that ſide towards Fano, and vpon the banke riſe two hils, the one right ouer againſt the other: that towards the ſea is called Candelaro, and that towards Vrbin Nugolara, and on the top of each of them is a borough bearing the ſame name. The Italian footmen were lodged at the borough of Candelaro, and to the Lanceknights and Gaſcons was appointed Nugolara, which lay neareſt to the enemie: and this was not done with intention to fight with them, no otherwiſe then by light skirmiſhes, to hinder them from ouerrunning the countrey, and to keepe them from reſoluing vpon any enterpriſe. For the Popes reſolution was not to come to battell, vnleſſe there were almoſt an aſſured hope of the victory, for that he knew how dangerous it was to fight againſt valiant ſouldiers, who would aduenture themſelues for the inequalitie of the reward of the victorie: and that if they remained victors, the whole Eſtate of the Church and of the Florentines would be in manifeſt danger: That it was farre more ſafe to temporiſe, looking to his owne defence, ſpecially for the great likelihood that for want of money and victuals in a countrey ſo poore and barren, the enemie would fall into ſome diſorder; and no leſſe, for that his armie would become better, as well through experience, as alſo for that from moneth to moneth it was furniſhed with more braue and reſolute ſouldiers; beſides the aide which he expected dayly, ſince that from the beginning, making vſe alſo of the Pontificall authoritie, he had vehemently craued ſuccours of all the Princes, and made his moane to their Embaſſadours that lay at Rome, and by Apoſtolicall Briefes and meſſages to the Princes themſelues; but not to all after one and the ſame manner. For, ſignifying to Ceſar and the King of Spaine, the conſpiracie made by Franciſco Maria de la Rouera, and the Spaniſh footmen, in the campe of the French King, before the face of his Lieutenant, he ſet downe ſuch clauſes in the Briefes which he ſent vnto them, that it might be eaſily comprehended that he had a ſtrong opinion that theſe things were done by the Kings conſent: but to the French king himſelfe, ſhewing that he had ſome iealouſie of Monſieur Lautrech, he complained no further. The matter was diuerſly taken by the foreſaid Princes: for Ceſar and his nephew were very glad to heare that the Pope interpreted that iniurie to the French king: beſides, that Ceſar who for his ancient hatred, ioyned to his inconſtancie, had alreadie eſtranged himſelfe from the French king, and was newly confederate with the King of England, and hauing talked with his nephew neare Antwerpe, he diſſwaded him from hauing conference with the French king, which accordingly was at laſt intermitted by the conſent of both the one and the other King: and the confederation which the King Catholike had made with the King, was not ſufficient to aboliſh his iealouſie and doubt. They made therfore a readie offer to aide the Pope, and commanded all their ſubiects to depart from the warre that was made againſt the Pope. The King Catholike ſent the Count Potenza to the Realme of Naples, to the end that vpon the view and muſter of his men at armes, he ſhould leade to his ſuccours foure hundred lances: and for a more full teſtimonie of his will, he depriued Franciſco Maria,

as disobedient, of the Duchie of Sora, an Estate lying vpon the confines of Terra di Lauoro, which had bene purchased by his father. But the trauels and perplexities of the Pope were well pleasing to the French king, as a Prince that had a mind estranged from him: and therefore from the beginning following his example, he determined to entertaine him with vaine hopes, and answered him, that he was much displeased therewith, promising him to take such order that Monsieur Lautrech should fauour his affaires: and yet he forbare not to say, that the Pope himselfe had bene the causer of that which he now suffered: for that the Spaniards had neuer taken that boldnesse, if their numbers had not bene increased by such as vnder his licence were passed from Naples to Verona. This was the Kings intention at the beginning: but considering afterwards, that the Pope being left abandoned by him, would runne headlong without any bridle into the amitie of the King Catholike, he determined to aide and fauour him, and according to the qualitie of the time, to make some profit of his necessitie: in so much as the Pope sending eftsoones to demand succours of him, he tooke order to refurnish him from Millan with three hundred lances, requiring withall to haue a new league to passe betweene them, sith that that was contracted afore at Bologna, being violated by the Pope sundry wayes, was no more of any consideration. He added many complaints to the offers which he made him: for sometimes he said, he suffered wrong in matters wherein the Pope charged him to other Princes: and sometimes for that to do him iniury, and to please the Cardinall of Sion, he had excommunicated George Sopressan, who solicited for him with the Swissers. Moreouer, the Ladie Regent, mother to the King, and of no small authoritie with him, reprehended without respect, the impietie of the Pope, for that not satisfied to haue chased a Prince out of his owne Estate, he had also subiected him to the censures of the Church, and denied to the old Ducheſſe her dowrie and maintenance, and also to the yong Ducheſſe his wife, in such sort that they had no meanes to maintain themselues: which words coming to the eares of the Pope, increased his suspition. Neuertheless the Pope, who in these difficulties desired the Kings succours, not so much for the effect, as for the name and reputation of them, being not able to dissemble his suspition, caused the three hundred lances that went from Millan, to stay vpon the territories of Modena and Bologna for many dayes; and afterwards Laurence bestowed them within Rimini, as hauing lesse meanes to annoy him by lying there, for that that Citie was farre distant from the enemies. But the Pope could not be drawne out of these iealousies, notwithstanding almost at the same time there was set downe in Rome a conclusion of confederation betweene him and the French King, forasmuch as before it was ratified the King obiected new difficulties, for the which the matter remained many dayes in suspence, yet at last, the Pope yeelding to many things, the King ratified it. By the articles of ratification, the Pope and the King were reciprocally bound to the defence of their Estates, with a certaine number of souldiers, and with twelue thousand duckats for euery moneth. The same bond was betweene the French king and the Florentines, with whom was conioyned the authoritie of Laurence de Medicis, the Duchie of Vrbin being comprehended therein, but with a lesser number of men, and pay of sixe thousand duckats monethly. The King was bound to aide the Pope whensoeuer he would proceed against the subiects and feodaries of the Church. The Pope confirmed to the King the nomination of the Benefices and Tenths, according to his promises made at Bologna, vnder this condition, that the moneys should be put into the hands of a third person, to be employed against the Turkes. The tenths were granted vnder this honest colour; but there was hope giuen to the King secretly, that after the consignation of the whole quantitie, the condition being changed by another writ, his Maiestie might conuert them to what vse he would. The Pope by a seuerall Briefe promised the King neuer to demand of him any aide or succours against the Duke of Ferrara, and which more is, he consented that the King might take him into his protection. There was long dispute vpon the rendring of Reggia, Modena and Rubiero, which the King demanded with great instance, according to the promise which the Pope had made him at Bologna, which the Pope refused not, but referred it to another time, alledging that it would be an action farre vnworthy of him, and almost a confession of his extreme necessitie and compulsion, to redeliuer them at a time when he stood oppressed with the warre: yet the King stood still vpon it to haue them rendred presently. At last the Pope making shew that he would vtterly estrange himselfe from the King if he sought to constraine him any further, the King hauing for his enemie the King of England, and was in doubt of Cæsar, the King of Confederation betweene the Pope and the French king.

Spaine, and the Swiſſers, he accepted that the Pope, by a Briefe deliuered into his hands, ſhould promiſe that within ſeuen moneths next following, he would put into the poſſeſſiõ of the Duke of Ferrara, Modena, Reggia and Rubiero; the Pope hauing this intention, that if the dangers wherein he was, ceaſſed afore, he would make no more account of this Briefe, then of that which he had promiſed at Bologria. But the King, ſince he could obtaine no more of him without the hazard of his extreme indignation, held himſelfe contented, eſteeming it ſomewhat ſufficient, that he had appearing in writing the aſſurance and teſtimonie of his word and faith.

But whileſt theſe things were in debating, Laurence hauing much increaſed his armie, both by many regiments of Italians leuied of new, and alſo by a thouſand footmen Spaniſh, and a thouſand Lanceknights waged by the Pope at Rome, the time ſeemed now fit to aſſay to deliuer himſelfe of this warre; wherein, for the ſtrength and ſituation of the place where the enemies lay, his onely hope was to compell them to diſcampe for want of victuals: and for this cauſe Camilla Vrſin was ſent with ſeuen hundred light horſemen, to ouerrunne all that countrey which is called the Vicarage, from whence came the greateſt part of their victuals. At this time a Trumpet came to Peſera from the campe of the enemie, who required of Laurence a ſafe-conduct, to the end that Captaine Suares a Spaniard whom Franciſco Maria had in his companie, might come to him; which Laurence eaſily granted, ſuppoſing it had bene a Captaine with whom he had ſecret intelligence: but there came to him another Captaine of the ſame name, and with him Horacio de Fermes Secretarie to Franciſco Maria, who after he had demanded publike audience, declared (according to the inſtructions of Franciſco Maria) that ſince the quarrels that were betweene them might be decided by ſingle combat of their owne perſons, or with a determinate number of men indifferently agreed vpon by them both, it were better to chuſe the one of thoſe two meanes, then to perſeuere in that courſe whereby ſo many people might be deſtroyed, contrary to all pietie, to the preiudice of whõſoeuer ſhould carie the victory; & that for this reſpect Franciſco Maria offered him to make election of whether of theſe two waies he wold. When he had ſpoken, he would haue read a writing that he had in his hand, but that was forbidden him. Laurence anſwered by the counſell of his Captaines, that he willingly accepted this offer, ſo far forth as Franciſco Maria would firſt leaue that which he occupied by force: after which words (by the inſtigation of Ranſe de Cere) he cauſed them both to be made priſoners, Ranſe maintaining that they had deſerued to be puniſhed for performing an action ſo inſolent. But the other Captaines ſhewing him that he brake his faith and word, he let go Suares, and retained Horacio onely, excuſing with falſe colours, the infamie of his faith-breaking, as though it had bene neceſſary in the ſafeconduct expreſly to haue nominated Horacio, who for the place of his birth was ſubiect to the Church, and Secretarie to the enemie: but his chiefe end was, to draw from him the ſecrets of Franciſco Maria, and among other things, by whoſe counſell and authoritie he had begun the warre: whereupon being examined with torments, it was publiſhed, that his confeſſion was found ſuch, that it increaſed the ſuſpition conceiued againſt the French king. But the deſire of Laurence, to cut off from the Spaniards the traffike of victuals out of the countrey of the Vicarage, ſtood needfull of greater forces, both for that his light horſemen with their incurſions did no matter of great importance, and now his armie was ſuch, that he might boldly make head againſt his enemies. For, beſide a thouſand men at armes and a thouſand light horſemen, he had leuied fifteene thouſand footmen of diuers nations, amongſt whom was aboue two thouſand Spaniards muſtered at Rome: which was a footband of ſpeciall choiſe, and of great exerciſe and training in armes, for that the warre being in no other place then in Italy, the Captaines had good meanes to exchange for better, all ſuch bands of Italian footmen as were leuied in haſte: ſo that thoſe which they had, were the flower of the footmen of all Italy. He determined then to go incampe at Sorbolongo, a borough in the countrey of Fano, fiue miles from Foſſambrono, from whence it was eaſie for him to reſtraine the enemie from all reliefe coming out of the Vicarage. The Citie of Foſſambrono ſtands vpon the riuer of Metro, which is a riuer famous for the victorie which the Romanes had againſt Aſdrubal of Carthage; which running to this place by a narrow channell betweene the mountaines, when it is paſt Foſſambrono, begins to runne through a valley more at large, which enlargeth it ſelfe ſo much the more, by how much it approcheth nearer the ſea, which is fifteen miles beyond Foſſambrono, and there it falleth into Metro neare to Fano, but but on that ſide towards Sinigale. On the right hand, according to the courſe of the riuer, is the countrey which they call the Vicarage, which is full of litle fertile hils and boroughs, and lieth ſtretched out in great length towards the ſea: and on the left hand of the riuer are alſo litle hils, but paſſing further, there are found very high and ſharp mountains; and touching the plaine which extendeth towards Fano, it containeth more then 3. miles in largenes. At ſuch time therefore as Laurence determined to incampe at Sorbolongo, fearing leſt his enemies, perceiuing his remouing ſhould preuent him, he ſent on the morrow afore day Iohn de Medicis, Iohn Baptiſta Stabbio, and Brunault de Furly, with foure hundred horſemen, to ſurpriſe Sorbolongo, and gaue order to the footmen that were at Candelaro and Nugolaro, that croſſing the mountaines, they ſhould draw towards Metro, to ioyne with the reſidue; and himſelfe with the reſt of the armie, leauing for the guard of Peſera, Guido Rangon with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, tooke his way at Sunne riſing from Peſera towards Fano along the ſea ſhore, and afterwards turning towards Foſſambrono where the valley beginneth, he arriued about noone at a place called our Ladies Mill built vpon the riuer. All the horſemen and regiments of Italian footmen paſſed the riuer by foord, but the bands of Gaſcons and Lanceknights were ſo long in paſſing the bridge prepared to that end, that ſ armie being not able that day to reach Sorbolongo according to ſ direction that was ſet downe, they thought it conuenient to incamp at S. Georges Orciano and Mondano, boroughs halfe a mile diſtant one from another. The direction that was giuen to the light horſemen, ſucceeded not much better: for, as they marched, Iohn de Medicis (in whom in this firſt exerciſe of warre, appeared ſignes of future valour) doubting leſt by error they tooke the longer way, he left the reſidue that contemned his counſell, and entred into Sorbolongo long time before night: and the other two Captaines, after they had fetched a long compaſſe, returned at laſt to the armie, being abuſed (as they ſaid) by their guide: neither could Iohn de Medicis (who had with him onely his regiment) abide that night within Sorbolongo, for that the ſame morning Franciſco Maria doubting the diſcamping of his enemies, and imagining which way they would draw, had with great celeritie taken the field with all his armie: who finding no impediment to paſſe the riuer, but vſing the helpe of a ſtone bridge at Foſſambrono, he came to Sorbolongo afore night, and becauſe of their coming, Iohn knowing that he was not able to reſiſt them, retired towards Orciano, and was followed by the horſemen of the enemie, who tooke many of his people. Being at Orciano he went to find Laurence in his lodging, and told him in great choler, that either the negligence or the cowardize of Brunault and Iohn Baptiſta Stabbio, ſtanding then in his preſence, had that day taken out of his hand the victorie of the warre. This was the firſt, but it was not the onely occaſion of good lucke that the armie of Laurence did loſe, ſeeing afterwards he loſt farre greater, and was followed continually with farre more dangerous diſorders, his ill fortune being alwayes accompanied with ill counſels. The boroughs of Orciano and Sorbolongo haue their ſituation in a place eminent, and are diſtant one from the other ſomewhat more then two miles: the mid way betweene them is full of litle hils and mountaines, where is a borough called Barry, wherein were lodged part of the bands of Franciſco Maria, and in this neighbourhood and neareneſſe of the armies, all the day following was ſpent in skirmiſhes. Amongſt the Captaines of Laurence his armie, the counſels were diuers: for ſome (and chiefly thoſe vpon whoſe aduice depended not the reſolution of things) perſwaded to giue a charge vpon the enemies, thinking perhaps, without putting themſelues or others in any danger, by propoſing vainly bold counſels, they ſhould get the name of valiant men. But this counſell was impugned by Ranſe and Vitelli, whoſe aduice was alwayes followed by Laurence, for as much as the enemies were lodged in a place of ſtrength, and had the borough at their backe, whither they could not come but by a very troubleſome way: and likewiſe they thought it not good that the armie ſhould continue in thoſe places, as a matter vnprofitable, and by meanes whereof they could not obtaine the purpoſe for which they were remoued from Peſera, for that Sorbolongo being at the deuotion of Franciſco Maria, it would be hard to reſtraine victuals from the countrey of the Vicarage. For theſe reaſons all other counſels being reiected, they obtained by neceſſitie that the armie ſhould returne. And to the end their retiring ſhould not reſemble a manifeſt flying, they propoſed that the armie ſhould not onely returne to their firſt lodging place, but that they ſhould go ſeize vpon Montebaroccia and the places left abandoned by the enemies, from whence they might draw towards Vrbin. With this reſolution the armie departed the morning following at the appearing of day:

Deſcription of the countrey called the Vicarage.

but it was thought to be rather a flying then a retraite, by the diuulging of which opinion through the campe, it hapned that Francisco Maria was aduertised by two men at armes, that the enemies in great feare were broken vp almost in disorder, and flying: in so much as Francisco Maria seeming to be almost certaine of the victory, he presently caused his armie to march by the way that leades athwart the mountaines, hoping to encounter them at their descending into the plaine: for he thought they would take the way that was most short and passable; which if they had done, neither the one nor the other armie could haue auoyded the battell.

But Fortune would, that to saue a Cannon which was left behind the day before, for that one of the wheeles of the cart was broken, the armie of Laurence went to repasse the riuer of Metro at our Ladies Mill, which is a place foure miles lower then that whereunto the short and easie way would haue brought him. All the horsemen and footmen of Laurence his armie passed ouer at the foord, but they were very long in passing, and those that were passed cast themselues with great celeritie into order, keeping along the plaine that draweth towards Fossambrono. The footmen being passed, as the men at armes and light horsemen which marched in the reare ward of the campe would haue passed, the light horsemen of the enemies, both many in number and of the most resolute, began to skirmish with them; in which encounter was taken prisoner Constantine the sonne of John Paul Baillon, whom we may as well call his nephew as his sonne, since he begat him of one of his owne sisters: by reason whereof John Paul who was come to the armie not many dayes before, and led the vantguard, striuing to do his best to recouer him, stayed so long, that from the auantguard he became the reareward, Laurence that led the battell entring into the first place, and Troylus Sauello that gouerned the areareguard, into the battell, for that Ranse and Vitelli marched before with the footmen. But when Francisco Maria and his Captaines saw that the enemies, by the same measure and numbers wherewith they passed the riuer, turned towards Fossambrono, they perceiued that they remoued not like men that fled, but with intention to surprise Montebaroccio; and therefore forgetting their former disposition to fight, which was grounded vpon the supposed feare of the enemies, they left their baggage, and ranne presently, with great haste, and no lesse disorder, with their ensignes vpon their shoulders, to get a very narrow passage of the riuer called Tauernelle, where nature had made a confused trench full of cliffes, which runneth all along through the whole plaine euen to the mountaine, and where was no passage but by one path which was made for the way, whereunto if their bands had come (who alwayes as they passed ouer turned from that side,) the Spaniards had bene reduced into manifest danger. And albeit Laurence and his Captaines were aduertised of this by Lodowike the sonne of Liuerot de Fermes, who the same day was come to the armie with a thousand footmen, together with a Spanish Sergeant that could well discouer the countrey, yet their espiall was of litle profite. For notwithstanding the Lanceknights and Gascons shewed a wonderfull disposition to fight, the same being desired throughout the whole campe, and the will of Laurence being also concurrent: yet Ranse de Cere and Vitelli counselled him not to go meete the enemie, but to retire to a litle hill fast by, from whence without exposing themselues to any danger, they might do many grieuances to the enemies with the light horsemen, if they attempted to passe the riuer. Thus leauing that place of strength, Ranse turned towards the mountaine, and as soone as the Spaniards had seized vpon it, they began to salute the Lanceknights that lay nearest them with their harquebuses, and to signifie vnto them with cries full of reioycing, that they saw themselues reduced from a manifest danger, into most assured safetie. Thus either by indiscretion or by cowardise (if malignitie did not partake in it) did Laurence lose that day (in the iudgement of all men) the occasion of the victorie. That night the armie was lodged in a borough not farre off, called Saltaro: but the armie of Francisco Maria coming on with great diligence, marching a good part of the night, he gate Montebaroccio, preuenting a regiment of two thousand footmen which Laurence sent thither to surprise it, who went the day after and incamped two miles aboue Saltaro, neare the mountaine, in a place towards Montebaroccio, but somewhat lower, & vpon the sea shore. The two armies being within a mile one of another, stayed in these places, but with the greater discommodities to Laurence, who had often want of victuals, for that they being brought by sea from Pesera to Fano, it was needfull when the winds were contrary to bring them by land, whereunto the light horsemen of Francisco Maria

gaue no ſmall impediment, for that being aduertiſed by the paiſants of euery litle mouing of the enemies, they made continuall roades ouer the whole countrey. About this time Franciſco Maria ſent a trumpet to ſhew to the Gaſcons certaine letters which had bene found among the papers of the Secretaries of Laurence, which, together with part of his baggage, had bene taken from him by the horſemen of the enemie the ſame day that he departed from the borough of Saltaro: by which letters it was diſcerned, that the Pope being wearied with the great couetouſneſſe of the Gaſcons, whoſe payes he was conſtrained immoderatly to augment euery moneth, he wiſhed that all poſſible meanes might be vſed to induce them to returne home. And for this cauſe there had bin great danger of a tumult the ſelf ſame day, if Carbon their Captain & Laurence de Medicis had not ſo ingeniouſly perſwaded them that they were forged letters and deceits of the enemie, that they reſtrained and appaiſed them. Neuertheleſſe the doubt of this matter, the neceſſitie of victuals, and the place wherein they were incamped, where without compariſon the danger to loſe appeared greater then the hope to winne, were the cauſe that they determined to breake vp from thence, and to enter into the countrey of the Vicarage on that ſide that is neareſt the ſea, and ſo to march on till they approched Foſſambrone, (albeit it was not without ſhame to retire ſo often from the enemies.) This reſolution was allowed through the whole campe, but not without the great infamie of Ranſe and Vitelli, for that all the ſouldiers ſaid openly, that if from the beginning they had reſolued thus, they had brought the enemies into great want of victuals, and Laurence himſelfe blamed them more then the reſidue, complaining that either to prolong the warre for their particular profite, or to hinder his reputation in armes (fearing haply the like effects by his greatneſſe, which the greatneſſe of Valentinois had procured againſt their houſes) they had brought into ſo many difficulties and dangers ſo puiſſant an armie, and ſo farre ſuperiour to that of the enemies in number and in forces. Then the armie went and incamped before S. Conſtans, a borough of the Vicarage, the walls whereof they began to batter with their artilleries: and albeit the inhabitants in a parley offered to render it, yet knowing the facilitie to force it, there was giuen to the Gaſcons onely full libertie to aſſault it, withdrawing all the other ſouldiers from the walls, with a deſire to pacifie the angrie minds of the Gaſcons by the ſpoile and ſacke of that place, whereof the whole profite was transferred to them. Saint Conſtans being taken, the campe marched two miles further, and went the ſame day to Mandolfo, the beſt and ſtrongeſt borough of the Vicarage, ſeated vpon a hill, in a very eminent place, enuironed with walls and trenches not to be contemned, whereunto the ſituation of the place ſerueth as a rampier, hauing alſo therein a garriſon of two hundred Spaniſh ſouldiers. The ſame night they planted the artilleries on the South ſide; but either by the negligence or indiſcretion of Ranſe de Cere, to whom was appointed the managing of that charge, they were planted in an open place, and without rampiers: ſo that before the Sunne had ſhone vpon the earth one houre, there were ſlaine by the artilleries within, eight Cannoniers with many pioners, and Anthonie Saint Croſſe the Captaine of the artillerie wounded: by reaſon whereof Laurence being much moued in his mind (notwithſtanding all his Captaines aduiſed him to forbeare in his owne perſon to execute with ſo great danger that which he might commit to the charge of another,) he went in perſon to cauſe the artilleries to be rampiered and defended. Now when he had laboured there vntill noone, and made all neceſſary prouiſions, he retired behind the place to repoſe himſelfe vnder the ſhade of certaine trees, thinking the height of the hill to be a ſufficient couer for him: but in the way the height of the hill failing him, he deſcried in flanke the Rocke ſituate on the Weſt ſide, which he had no ſooner diſcouered, then he had in his eye the fire giuen to an harquebuze, to auoid the ſhot whereof he caſt himſelfe flat on his face, but before he could fall to the earth, the bullet that otherwiſe had run through his bodie, tooke the top of his head, and raſing vpon the bone, paſſed along the braine-pan towards the necke. Laurence being thus wounded, the Captaines who perceiued that notwithſtanding they had battered the wall, the earth was yet too high behind, began to caſt a mine, wherewith being entred vnder a litle turret adioyning to the wall which they had battered, they put fire to it the fifth day, which about noone caſting downe the turret with great violence, and a great pane of the wall ioyning to it, the aſſault was preſently giuen, but with litle order, and (as it were) at aduenture, the ſame yeelding no other fruite then ſuch as is wont to grow vpon aſſaults ill directed. Neuertheleſſe the night drawing on, the ſouldiers that had no expectation of ſuccours, for that

Laurence de Medicis hurt.

Franciſco Maria either not to loſe the aduantage of the ſituation of the place, or for other occaſion, ſtirred not from Montebaroccio, yeelded vp the place, vnder condition of goods and life ſaued, leauing in vile manner the people of the towne as a wretched prey to the enemies.

Now becauſe Laurence was hurt and in danger of his life, the Pope ſent as Legate to the armie, the Cardinall de S. Maria in Portico, who, ill fortune being already ioyned to ill gouernment, began with very bad ſignes to exerciſe his Legation. For, the day after he came to the armie, there hapned a quarrell by chance betweene an Italian and a Lanceknight, when ſuch as were neareſt running to the fray, and euery one calling vpon the name of his nation, the tumult ſo increaſed through the whole campe, that without knowing how ſuch a matter might happen, or for what cauſe, all the bands of footmen ranne in great mutinie to the lodgings of their fellowes to arme themſelues, and thoſe that in retiring met with the footmen of another language, were for the moſt part ſlaine by them: and, which was the cauſe of greater diſorder, the Italian footmen going in battell ray towards the place where the tumult began, their lodgings and houſes were ſacked by the Gaſcons. The principall Captaines of the armie ranne thither, who were then in counſell to put ſome remedie to this diſorder, but finding the tumult to be great and dangerous, euery one for his owne intereſt abandoned the care of the common buſineſſe, and retiring into their lodgings, put their men at armes preſently in order, thinking onely of their owne ſafetie, for the accompliſhment whereof they withdrew themſelues about a mile from the campe with their companies: onely the Legate Bibiena, vſing the conſtancie and readineſſe that appertained to his office and honour, would neuer abandon the common cauſe, but putting himſelfe oftentimes, by reaſon of the great commotion, in danger of his life, he did ſo much, not without many difficulties and by the helpe of many Captaines of the footbands, that at laſt the tumult ceaſſed, during the furie whereof there were ſlaine in many parts of the campe, more then an hundred Lanceknights, and twentie Italians, with ſome Spaniards. This accident was the cauſe that they determined for the preſent to enter into no enterpriſe, but for a time to keepe the armie ſeparate: for, it was feared, if the armie ſhould keepe together, leſt the ſouldiers exaſperated by the harmes receiued, would fall together by the eares for euery light occaſion. Therefore the companies of men at armes of the Church and of the Florentines were beſtowed in the Citie of Peſera, together with the regiments of Italian footmen: for, touching the French Lances, they had not ſtirred from Rimini, by reaſon the difficulties betweene the Pope and their King were not yet reſolued. The Gaſcons were incamped vpon the plaine within halfe a mile of that Citie, and the other footmen were diſperſed vpon the mount Imperiale, which is aboue Peſera, on that ſide towards Rimini, where there is a Pallace built by the anceſtors of the family of Malateſta, and they were lodged in ſuch order, that the Spaniards were placed vpon the top of the mountaine, the Lanceknights ſomewhat lower, all along the deſcent of the mountaine, and the Corſicans at the foote of the hill. They continued in this order three and twentie dayes, executing no other thing in that reſpite of time, then certain skirmiſhes of the light horſemen. For Franciſco Maria ſtirred not, both for a deſire to hold that he had gotten, and for that he was without hope either to breake ſo great an armie in the plaine field, or to take any place ſo neare the enemies. But the foure and twentieth day, departing by night from Montebaroccio, he came by the breake of day to the top of the mountaine, where the Spaniards lay incamped, and with whom, either generally or ſeuerally, it was beleeued (by reaſon of the ſucceſſe) that he had ſome ſecret intelligence. For as ſoone as he was come thither, the Spaniards began to crie vnto the others, that if they would ſaue themſelues they ſhould follow them; at which voice the moſt part of them put vpon their heads a branch of greene leaues, according to their example, and followed them, onely their Captaines retired to Peſera, and drew with them about eight hundred footmen. When the Spaniards were thus ioyned into one ſtrength, they went all together to the tents of the Lanceknights, who kept no great guard on that ſide, for the ſuretie of the neighbourhood of the Spaniards, and taking the aduantage of their ſecuritie, they ſlue and hurt more then ſixe hundred of them, and the reſidue fled towards the campe of the Corſicans, who retired together with them towards Peſera. The Gaſcons perceiuing the tumult, put themſelues in battell ray, and would not once moue from the place where they were. Franciſco Maria, after this ſlaughter of the Lanceknights, and the moſt part of the Spaniſh footbands being drawne to this ſide, went to incampe be-betweene Vrbin and Peſera, full of great hope that the Gaſcons and Lanceknights, who were at the ſame time come from the campe of Monſieur Lautrech, and had alwayes marched and lodged together, would ioyne with him. There was amongſt the Gaſcons Captaine Ambra, who bare enuie to Captaine Carbono; this Ambra was yong, of more noble bloud, and kinſman to Monſieur Lautrech, and of greater authoritie among them. This yong Gentleman had ſecretly practiſed many dayes to paſſe with his footmen to the part of Franciſco Maria, taking this occaſion, that not ſatisfied with the immoderate augmentation of their payes, they redemanded inſolently farre greater payes, which the Popes miniſters would not giue way vnto: and becauſe there was ſtrife among them, Captaine Carbono and the Captaine of the French Lances, who for the ſame cauſe were come from Rimini to Peſera, did what they could to reconcile them. But fiue or ſixe dayes after the aduenture of the Spaniards and Lanceknights in the hil Imperiale, Franciſco Maria with his whole armie diſcouered himſelf neare vnto them, of whom a part put themſelues in battell ray vnder the leading of Captain Ambra with ſix Sakers, who being followed by ℈ Lanceknights, they ioyned with him, notwithſtanding ℈ praiers and moſt vehement perſwaſions of Carbono to retaine them, with whom abode ſeuen Captains with thirteene hundred footmen, but all the reſt, together with the Lanceknights, forſooke him: and (as in warre one miſchiefe alwayes breeds another) the Italian footmen perceiuing what need there was of them, began the next morning to fall into tumult, ſo that to appeaſe them, it was neceſſary in their payes to agree to immoderate conditions, the Captaines ſhewing themſelues no leſſe ſhameleſſe and greedie then the ſouldiers. And truly it was a maruellous matter to ſee in the armie of Franciſco Maria, where the ſouldiers were not payed, ſo great concord, obedience and vnitie, which proceeded not ſo much of the vertue or authoritie of the Captaine (as is ſaid of Hannibal the Carthaginian, to his great praiſe,) as of the exceeding affection and conſtancie of the ſouldiers: and of the contrary, to ſee in the armie of the Church (where there was no want of exceſſiue payes in due times) ſo many confuſions and diſorders, with ſo great a deſire of the footbands to paſſe to the enemies campe; whereby it is manifeſt that oftentimes armies are not kept in concord and obedience ſo much by money as for other cauſes.

The Legate and thoſe that were preſent at the counſell were much aſtoniſhed with theſe great accidents, and after they had long debated by what meanes they might relieue the afflicted eſtate of things, ſhewing themſelues neither more wiſe nor better aduiſed to redreſſe diſorders, then they had bene in preuenting them, moued alſo with their owne couetous deſires and particular intereſts, they concluded to perſwade the Pope to reſtore Bologna to the Bentiuoleys, before they being encouraged by the ill eſtate of his affaires, or incited by others, ſhould make ſome commotion, the which how vnable they were to reſiſt, was euident by the difficulties they had to ſuſtaine the warres in one place onely. Therefore to giue the more authoritie to this counſell, and for the better iuſtification of them all in all euents, when they had ſet downe in writing the generall opinion, they ſent the ſame to the Pope by Count Robert Buſchet a Gentleman of Modena, ſubſcribed with the hands of the Legate and the Archbiſhop Vrſin, of whom the one was linked to the Bentiuoleys in ancient amitie, and the other by affinitie. The Pope not onely deſpiſed this counſell, but alſo complained greatly, that his owne miniſters, and ſuch as had receiued of him ſo many benefites, and might hope dayly to receiue more, had propoſed vnto him with ſo litle faith and loue, counſels no leſſe pernicious then the very euils which the enemies did him: but he was chiefly diſcontented with the Archbiſhop Vrſin, for that haply he had bene the chiefe author of this counſell; and peraduenture this was the occaſion that he loſt the Cardinals Hat, which was promiſed him by all men at the firſt promotion. Now Franciſco Maria ſeeing his ſtrength ſo much increaſed, and the forces of his enemies abated, raiſed his thoughts to greater attempts, being likewiſe puſhed on by neceſſitie, for that the footmen which came with him, had bene three whole moneths without pay, and he had no meanes to giue money to thoſe that were newly come; and alſo the Duchie was ſo pilled and harried, that the ſouldiers had not onely no meanes of prey and bootie, but alſo with great difficultie could find wherewith to ſuſtaine themſelues. But in the election of the enterpriſe, he was to follow other mens wils, for that for his owne part before he aſſayed any other matter, he deſired to aſſault againe Fano or ſome other towne on the ſea coaſt, to the end to aſſure his Eſtate: and yet by the inclination of the ſouldiers, greedie of prey and bootie, he determined termined rather to turne into Tuſcane, where the region being plentifull of all things, ſuſpecting nothing, and ill prouided for warre, the ſouldiers hoped to raiſe great ſpoile. Furthermore, he was carried with a hope to make ſome mutation in Perouſa and Sienna, by the meanes of Charles Baillon and Borgueſe Petrucci, a matter much helping to his affaires, and much augmenting the moleſtations and perils of the Pope and his Nephew. Therefore the next day after he had aſſembled the Gaſcons, he cauſed his armie to march towards Perouſa: but when he was come to the plaine of Agobbio, he determined to make manifeſt his ſuſpition, or rather the certaine knowledge which he had of the treaſon of Colonell Maldonato and others ioyned with him in the ſame conſpiracie. The matter hapned and was diſcouered in this ſort: When the armie marched by Romagna, Suares one of the Captaines of the Spaniards ſtayed behind, making ſhew of ſickneſſe, and of purpoſe ſuffered himſelfe to be taken priſoner; and when he was conueyed to Ceſena to Laurence, he declared to him in the name of Maldonato, and the other two Spaniſh Captains, that they were conioyned to Franciſco Maria for no other cauſe, then to take occaſion to do ſome notable ſeruice to the Pope and to him, ſeeing it was not in their power to let the accident of this commotion, promiſing him in their names, that as ſoone as the oportunitie was offered, they would put it in execution. Now Franciſco Maria, who knew nothing of this, began to enter into ſuſpition by certaine words which were very inconſiderately vttered by Ranſe de Cere to a drumme of the Spaniards: for he demanded of him, as it were in ieſt, When will theſe Spaniards deliuer vs your Duke priſoner? which words making deepe impreſſion in the mind of Franciſco Maria, gaue him cauſe diligently to obſerue whether there were any trecherie in the armie. But at length by letters intercepted with the carriages of Laurence, he diſcouered that Maldonato was the author of ſome dangerous ſtratageme; the which hauing bene diſſembled by him till then, and not thinking good any longer to conceale it, he calling together all the Spaniſh footmen, and ſetting himſelfe in the midſt of them in an eminent place, he began to giue them great thankes, with words full of efficacie, for thoſe things which for his ſake they had vndertaken with ſo great inclination of mind, & to confeſſe that it was not found in hiſtories either ancient or moderne, that any Prince or Captaine was more beholding to men of warre, then he acknowledged himſelfe to be vnto them: ſeeing that although he was without money, and without meanes to be able to reward them, (for albeit he ſhould recouer all his patrimonie, yet he was but a meane Prince) and that he was not of their nation, nor had euer done them any good turn, or bin known by them to haue ſerued with them in the field, they had with ſo ready a diſpoſition followed him againſt ſo mightie a Prince and of ſo great authoritie, and that not for hope of ſpoile, ſince they knew they were led into a barren and poore region: which good ſeruices he had no meanes to recompence to them but with goodwill and gratification of mind: And he added, that he was infinitely glad, that not onely through all Italy, but alſo through the prouinces of Europe they had purchaſed perpetuall fame and reputation, and that euery one of thē had raiſed their faith and ſingular vertue to the heauens; for that being very few in number, without money, without artillerie, or any warlike furniture, they had ſo often conſtrained to turne their backes, an armie moſt rich in treaſure and all other prouiſions, with whom were ioyned ſo many warlike people, chiefly againſt the forces of a mightie Pope and the State of the Florentines, with whom the name and authoritie of the Kings of France and Spaine was ioyned: and that to ſupport and preſerue themſelues in the faith and honour of men of ſeruice, had neglected the commandement of their proper Princes: That as he tooke exceeding pleaſure in theſe things (for the glorie of their name,) ſo on the other ſide, whatſoeuer might obſcure ſo great a glorie, both had and would bring vpon him intollerable griefe: That very vnwillingly, and no otherwiſe then with manifeſt dolour, he could be induced to open vnto them matters which might be offenſiue vnto any one of them, to euery particular of whom he had vowed whileſt he drew breath to be a ſeruant: and yet (leſt this euill begun ſhould be increaſed by his ſilence, and leſt the malice of ſome particulars ſhould extinguiſh ſo great a glory gotten by that army, it being alſo conuenient that the honor of them all ſhould be more deare vnto him, then the reſpect of a few) he would not conceale from them, that there were foure perſons in that armie who went about to betray the glorie and ſafetie of them all, That touching his owne ſafetie, he would make no mention thereof, nor complaine, for that he was tormented with ſo many accidents, and without his fault ſo cruelly perſecuted by Fortune, that many times he deſired death rather then life: but that neither the obligations

he ought to them, nor the setled affection which so deseruedly he bare to them, would suffer him to conceale from them, that Colonell Maldonato, who ought to haue bene most carefull of the safetie and glorie of them all, and Captaine Suares, who to contriue so great a wickednesse, dissembling to be sicke, suffered himselfe to be taken of his enemies in Romagna, together with two other Captaines, had conspired and promised vnder wicked counsels, to betray them into the hands of Laurence de Medicis: which counsels had bene interrupted by his diligence, whereby being made confident, he would no sooner reueale so great a treason: but now supposing that he ought not any longer to leaue either himselfe or others in such a danger, he had opened vnto them the thing which long before was knowne to himselfe: That these things may appeare by certaine letters authentike found amongst the writings of Laurence intercepted by him: That there be many apparent signes and great coniectures, all which he thought good to lay afore them, to the end they might be iudges of such a hainous conspiracie, and hauing heard the things propounded, and what the offenders can say for themselues, they might proceed to such a deliberation as should seeme vnto them most conformable to iustice, & to the glorie and profite of the armie. When he had made an end of speaking, he commanded the euidences of the crime obiected against them to be read and declared; which being heard with very great attention of euery one, Maldonato, Suares, and the other two Captaines not being suffered to answer, were condemned by the common iudgement of the armie, as of a matter most manifestly proued, which sentence was put in execution, by causing them to passe the pikes. After they had (as they said) by this meanes purged the armie of all treason, they followed on their iourney towards Perousa, into the which was already entred Iohn Paul Baillon, being departed from Pesera as soone as he had knowledge of their intention, who prepared himselfe to defend it, and to this end had armed all his friends, and put into the towne many companies of paisants leuied in the country and places confining: to whom the Legat had sent for succor, Camillo Vrsin his sonne in law, Captain of the Florentines, with his companie of men at armes, and two hundred and fiftie light horsemen; with which forces it was thought he might sustain the fury of his enemies, the rather for that many preparatiõs were made to hinder their proceedings. For Vitelli with his regiment of men at armes, and Monsieur de Sissey with the French lances, who were now no more suspected, for that the confederation was established betweene the Pope and the French king, were marched to Citta de Castello; and Laurence de Medicis, who being newly cured of his wound and lately come from Ancona to Pesera, was gone in post to Florence to draw from thence things necessary for the conseruation of that Estate and the Cities adioyning: and there he tooke order, to the end to constraine Francisco Maria to abandon the expedition of Tuscane, that the Legate with the rest of the armie, should march towards the Dukedome of Vrbin, for the guard whereof was left no other souldiers then the inhabitants. Francisco Maria, not without the hope of some intelligence, approched Perousa, where Iohn Paul riding about the Citie, was assailed in the midst of the streete by a man of the towne, who missing to hit him, was suddenly slaine by those that accompanied Iohn Paul: who in this tumult, caused certaine others whom he suspected to be slaine, and when he saw himselfe deliuered from such ambushes, he thought himselfe out of all perill, for that the enemies who had now many dayes lien about Perousa, had no meanes to take it by force. And yet at that time when the Pope least expected such a matter, he couenanted with the enemies to pay tenthousand duckats, to giue them victuals for foure dayes, not to take armes against Francisco Maria in that warre, and that they should presently depart out of the territories of Perousa; alledging for his excuse and iustification, that the people of Perousa, whom he was not able to resist, would no longer endure the spoiling of their countrey. The Pope tooke this in ill part, and was very angrie: for hereby he was confirmed in the opinion he had conceiued of him from the beginning of this war, when he went so slowly to the armie with the succorus promised, that because the power of Laurence was suspected vnto him, he wished that Francisco Maria should remaine Duke of Vrbin: whereunto was added, that whilest he was in the campe with Laurence, he shewed himselfe discontent that Ranse and Vitelli bare greater authoritie then he: the memorie of which things was haply the chiefest cause of his calamities afterwards. After Francisco Maria had made agreement with the Perousins, he marched towards Citta de Castello, where he made certaine excursions, with intention to enter vpon the State of Florence by the towne of Sansepulcro, but the danger of his owne State con-conſtrained him to take other counſell. For the Legate Bibiena, who had made a new leuie of many Italians, following the deliberation made at Peſera, was remoued with the reſt of his armie to Foſſambrono, which Citie being battered with the artillerie, was taken and ſacked the third day. This done, he led his armie to Pergola, where the day following the Earle of Potenza with foure hundred Spaniſh lances ſent from the King of Spaine to the aide of the Pope, ioyned with the armie. Within Pergola there was not one ſouldier, but onely a Spaniſh Captaine and many people of the countrey, who by reaſon of their feare, began to commune of yeelding. But whileſt they were in parley, the Captain who ſtood vpon the wall was wounded in the face, which was the cauſe that the ſouldiers, without any order or commandement of their Captains, went to the walls and tooke the towne by force. From Pergola they conſulted to bring their armie to Cagli, but being aduertiſed that Franciſco Maria hauing heard of the loſſe of Foſſambrono, was returned into that region with great celeritie, they determined to retire: ſo that the ſame night in which the Legate receiued the intelligence, they departed from Pergola to Montſion, where as they began to make their lodgings to ſpend the night there, they had aduertiſement that the enemie was nearer then was ſuppoſed, and that he ſent before him a thouſand horſemen, euery one carrying a footman behind him, to the end that being conſtrained to trauell with more leiſure, time might be giuen to the armie to ouertake them: which was the cauſe that they marched ſeuen miles from thence, to a place called Boſco, from whence they departed the morning following before day, ſo that they came in the euening to Fano, hauing now almoſt vpon their backes the horſemen of the enemies, which came with ſo great celeritie, that if they had departed onely foure houres later, they had hardly eſcaped the neceſſitie to fight.

At this time the affaires of the Pope proceeded with no better felicitie in other actions then in the euents of the warre, againſt whoſe life Alphonſo the Cardinall of Sienna layd ambuſhes, being much offended, that the Pope (forgetting the trauels and dangers which Pandolfe Petrucci his father had ſometimes endured to reſtore him and his brethren to the gouernment of Florence, together with that which he with the other yong Cardinals had done to aduance him to the Popedome,) had in recompence of ſo many benefites cauſed him and his brother Borgueſe to be thruſt out of Sienna: ſo that being ſpoiled of his fathers goods, he could not maintaine himſelfe magnificently in his degree of Cardinall, as he was accuſtomed: and therefore burning in hatred, and almoſt reduced to deſpaire, he caſt in his mind, being a yong man, to giue the Pope a deadly blow with his owne hands. But being reſtrained more by the perill and difficultie of the fact, then by the example and common infamie that would runne throughout all Chriſtendome, if a Cardinall ſhould with his owne hands take away the life of a Pope, he turned all his thoughts to take him away by poiſon, with the helpe of Baptiſta Vercelli, a famous Chirurgion, and very familiar with him. This counſell (if ſo wicked a furie be worthy ſuch a name) ſhould haue bene in this ſort put in execution: The Pope had vnder his fundament an old Fiſtula, for the which he dayly vſed the helpe of Chirurgions: and for as much as there was no other occaſion offered, this Chirurgion was much commended to the Pope, and his skill and experience ſo much praiſed, that he deſired to be dreſſed by him. But the impatience of Alphonſo made the hope of this matter very difficult, the which being long in execution, Alphonſo who could not containe himſelfe from complaining openly againſt the ingratitude of the Pope, began dayly to grow more hatefull vnto him, and to be ſuſpected to conſpire ſome thing againſt his eſtate, ſo that in the end he was almoſt conſtrained for his owne ſafetie to depart from Rome, leauing neuertheleſſe behind him Anthonie Nino his Secretarie, to whom he wrote often. At laſt it happened that ſome of his letters were intercepted, whereby the Pope diſcerned that he practiſed ſome conſpiracie againſt his life: and therefore vnder colour to make ſome prouiſion for the affaires of Alphonſo, he called him to Rome, ſending him a ſafeconduct, and gaue with his owne mouth his word and faith to the Spaniſh Embaſſador, not to violate it. Vnder which aſſurance (notwithſtanding he was guiltie of ſo great wickedneſſe) he went vnwiſely to the Pope, who immediatly cauſed him to be apprehended in his chamber together with the Cardinal Bandinello de Sauly a Genoway, for that he was ſo great a friend and familiar to Alphonſo, that he thought the matter was not agreed vpon without his conſent, although he had bin a great furtherer to bring him to the Popedome: and then he ſent them priſoners to the Caſtle Saint Angelo; and gaue preſent direction, that Baptiſta Vercelli, who

then was following his art at Florence, ſhould be made priſoner, and ſent to Rome. The Spaniſh Embaſſadour laboured with vehement complaints and proteſtations, to haue Alphonſo ſet at libertie, alledging that the Popes faith giuen to him as the Kings Embaſſadour, ought to be obſerued with the ſame fidelitie, as if it had bene giuen to the King himſelfe. But the Pope anſwered, that no ſafeconduct, how ample ſoeuer it was, and full of clauſes pregnant and ſpeciall, was any aſſurance in crimes conſpired againſt the life of the Pope, without peculiar and ſpeciall nomination: That there was the ſame prerogatiue when there was queſtion of poiſoning; a matter ſo greatly abhorred both by diuine and humane laws, and ſo hateful to the ſences of all men, that they haue reſerued no ſafeconduct or aſſurance for the offenders that way, but vnder particular and ſpeciall mention. The Pope gaue the charge of their examination to Mario Peruſco the ouerſeer of his Exchequer, by whom being examined with ſeueritie and rigour, they confeſſed the treaſon conſpired by Alphonſo, with the priuitie of Bandinello; which confeſſion was verified by the Chirurgion Baptiſta, and confirmed by Poconteſta of Bagnacauallo, who vnder Pandolfe his father and Borgneſe his brother, had long bene Captaine of the garriſon of Sienna, and for this offence was publikely quartered together with the Chirurgion. After this confeſſion, in the next ſitting of the Conſiſtorie, was apprehended and carried to the Caſtle, Raphael Riario Cardinall of Saint George, Chamberlaine to the ſea Apoſtolike, who for his wealth and riches, for the magnificence of his Court, and his long time and continuance in that dignitie, was, without doubt, the principall Cardinall of all the Colledge: He maintained that this treaſon had not bene imparted to him, but that the Cardinall of Sienna complaining and threatning the Pope, had many times vttered words vnto him, whereby he might well conceiue that he purpoſed in his mind to do ſome violence againſt his perſon if occaſion were offered. Afterwards the Pope complained in another Conſiſtorie, wherein the Cardinals (not accuſtomed to be violated) were all amazed in their mind, and much aſtoniſhed; complaining that with ſuch crueltie and iniquitie his life ſhould be betrayed by thoſe, who for their place and dignitie, which made them principall members of the Sea Apoſtolike, ſtood more then all others bound to defend it: deploring greatly his ill fortune, and that to haue bene continually ſo beneficiall and liberall to all men, that many blamed him for it, had ſtood him in no ſtead. He added, that there were yet many Cardinals guiltie of this conſpiracie, who if afore the Conſiſtorie were diſſolued, they would frankly confeſſe their offence, they ſhould find him readie to vſe clemencie, and to giue them pardon; but if they deferred till the Conſiſtorie were broken vp, he would vſe the ſeueritie of iuſtice againſt the partakers of ſo great a miſchiefe. Becauſe of theſe words, Adriano Cardinall of Cornetto, and Francis Soderin Cardinall of Volterra, falling vpon their knees afore the feete of the Pope, confeſſed that the Cardinall of Sienna had vſed the ſame ſpeeches to them, which the Cardinall of Saint George had expreſſed. As ſoone as theſe examinations were taken and publiſhed in the Conſiſtorie, Alphonſo and Bandinello by publike ſentence of the Conſiſtory, were depriued of the dignitie of Cardinals, and deliuered ouer to the ſecular Court. The night following Alphonſo was ſecretly ſtrangled in priſon, but the ſentence of Bandinello, by the Popes grace, was changed into perpetuall impriſonment, from the which neuertheleſſe not long after for a certaine ſumme of money he was deliuered, and reſtored againe to the dignitie of Cardinall, notwithſtanding he had iuſter cauſe of indignation againſt him, for that hauing beſtowed vpon him many benefites and graces, he became eſtranged from him for no other cauſe then for the great loue which he bare to Alphonſo, and for a diſdaine that the Cardinall de Medicis was preferred afore him in the ſuites of certaine benefices: and yet there were not wanting malicious interpreters, who iudged that afore he was deliuered out of priſon, there was giuen to him by the Popes commandement, a potion confected with that kind of poiſon which killeth not ſuddenly, but conſumeth with time the life of him that receiueth it. And touching the Cardinall of Saint George, albeit the lawes ordained by Princes for the ſecuritie of their ſtates, command that in the crime of high treaſon, as well the acceſſarie as the principall be puniſhed by death, yet the Pope dealt more mildly with him, hauing reſpect to his age and authoritie, and to the long friendſhip which had bin betweene them afore his aſcending to the Popedome, and alſo for that his offence was not ſo great. For theſe cauſes then, although for the authoritie and reputation of iuſtice, he was by ſentence depriued of the dignitie of Cardinal, he was almoſt immediatly by grace reſtored, binding himſelfe to pay a great ſumme of money, except his voice actiue and paſſiue, whereunto notwithſtanding he was reſtored within the reuolution of a yeare. There was no other hurt done to the Cardinals of Cornetto and Volterra, ſauing that they payed vnderhand a certaine ſumme of money: but ſeeing that neither of them could ſafely abide in Rome, nor with ſuch dignitie as was conuenient, Volterra with the Popes licence went to Fondy, where vnder the wings of Proſper Colonno he remained till the Popes death: and Adrian departed ſecretly out of Rome, but whatſoeuer became of him, he was neuer after found nor ſeene in any place, that could be knowne. The ſtrangeneſſe of this accident conſtrained the Pope to conſider of the creation of new Cardinals, knowing that almoſt all the Colledge had minds much eſtranged from him, as well for the puniſhment of thoſe, as for other cauſes. In which action he proceeded ſo immoderatly, that in one morning in the Conſiſtorie (the Colledge conſenting more for feare then of will) he pronounced one and thirtie Cardinals, in the exceſſe of which number, there was good meanes for him to ſatisfie many ends, and to make election of men of all qualities. For he preferred to this dignitie two ſonnes of his ſiſters, with ſome others who had done him ſeruice, both before he was Pope and after, and who were as acceptable to the Cardinall de Medicis as to him for diuers reaſons, but for any other reſpect were not capable of ſo great a dignitie. In the creation of ſome, he ſatisfied the humours of great Princes, creating them at their inſtance: and ſome he raiſed for money, for that he found his treaſure much conſumed and in great neceſſitie. Some he called who were famous for the opinion of their learning, amongſt whom were three Generals (which is the higheſt degree among them) of the Orders of Saint Auguſtine, Saint Dominicke, and Saint Francis: and (which was a matter very rare at one and the ſame promotion) he preferred two of the family of Triuulce, taking his inducement for the one, for that he had bene his Chamberlaine, and alſo vpon a deſire to ſatisfie John Iaques; and touching the other, he was moued with the fame of his learning, with the helpe of a certaine ſumme of money. But that which bred matter of greateſt admiration, was the election of Franciot Vrſin and Pompey Colonno, with other fiue Romans of the principall families, who were followers of this or that faction; which he did with a counſell altogether contrary to the reſolutions of his predeceſſor, and which was reputed not very diſcreete, and had no happie iſſue for his friends and kindred. For, the greatneſſe of the Barons of Rome being alwayes the debaſing and ſcourge of the Popes, Iulio the ſecond, when the ancient Cardinals of thoſe families failed whom Alexander the ſixt had bitterly perſecuted to make prey of their eſtates, would neuer ſuffer that dignitie to be reinueſted in any of them: but Leo with great immoderation did the contrary, not that it could be ſaid, he was drawne thereto by the merit of the men; for that Franciot of a ſouldier was created Cardinall; and touching Pompey, the memorie of his doings paſt ought to haue bin obiected againſt his preferment, for that though he was a Biſhop, taking occaſion of Pope Iulios ſickneſſe, he laboured to raiſe the people of Rome into tumult, for which cauſe Pope Iulio depriued him of the Epiſcopall dignitie.

In the meane time Franciſco Maria (who by the retiring, or rather manifeſt flying of the enemies, could haue no meanes to fight with them, hauing a puiſſant armie by reaſon of the continuall reſort of new ſouldiers from all parts, vpon the bruite that he was Maiſter of the field, and partly carried with hope of prey) entred into the Marque, where Fabriano and many other townes compounded with him, redeeming with ready money the perill of ſacking and robbing their houſes. But ſome others were committed to the mercie of the ſouldiers, amongſt which was the Citie of Ieſi, whereinto entrie was made during the negociation of accord: and then the armie approched to Ancona, for the defence whereof the Legate had ſent ſouldiers, and they remained about it many dayes to their great hinderance, by reaſon of the loſſe of time, which was not employed in fighting, but in debating of compoſition with them of Ancona, who in the end becauſe they would not ſuffer the loſſe of their haruеſt, payed eight thouſand duckats, without ſwaruing in other ſort from the obedience of the Church. Afterwards he inuaded the Citie of Oſimo with very ill ſucceſſe: and at laſt he planted his campe afore the towne of Corinaldo, wherein were two hundred footmen forreiners, by whom together with the townesmen it was ſo valiantly defended, that after he had conſumed two and twentie dayes about it, in the end deſpairing to be able to take it, he raiſed his ſiege, with great diminution of his reputation, for that he had not made conqueſt of any of thoſe townes that refuſed to compound with him, and yet this proceeded not of the vnskilfulneſſe of the Captaine, nor of the idleneſſe and cowardiſe of the ſouldiers, but for that they had but very few, and thoſe very ſmall field peeces, and

almoſt no munitions. Beſides, touching thoſe townes which would not yeeld to him, it was neceſſary they ſhould make demonſtration of their conſtancie and valour, for that the Captaines of the Church armie, of whom Count Potenza was the chiefe, (although they had ſent troupes of men to ouerrunne and ſpoile the countrey euen to the walls of Vrbin, and that Monſieur Siſe being returned from Citta de Caſtello into Romagna, was afterwards entred into the country of Montfeltro, and tooke by force Secchiano with certaine other ſmall townes) were incamped within fiue miles of Peſera, with intention not to miniſter ſuccours to any place, nor once to ſtir, vntill they were conſtrained by neceſſitie to retire: for they thought, that if when they were ſuperiour in forces, their affaires had fallen out ſo vnhappily, that now being much inferiour in footmen, they ſhould not haue the courage to endure the onely fame of the approch of their enemies: in which reſolution (made according to the Popes mind) they were confirmed by a hope of the coming of ſixe thouſand Swiſſers, whom the Pope by the aduice of the French king had ſent to leuie. For, the French king after he was entred into league with the Pope, began to deſire that he might be victorious, and yet at the ſame time he retained the ſame ſuſpition of him that he did before. That which kept him in this ſuſpition, was the relations that Galeas Viſconte and Marke Anthonie Colonno made vnto him, of whom the one was reſtored to his countrey from baniſhment, and the other, not thinking his ſeruices well recompenced by Ceſar, was entred with honorable conditions into the pay of the French king, they had reported vnto him that the Pope had laboured Ceſar and the Swiſſers againſt him. But much more was the French king moued, for that the Pope had ſecretly contracted a new confederation with Ceſar, with the King of Spaine, and the King of England, which did not a litle trouble his mind, albeit it was lawfull for him ſo to do, for that it was made onely for their defence. That which cauſed him to deſire to be deliuered from the warre, was his feare leſt the Pope not finding his ſuccours ready, would enter into a greater coniunction with the foreſaid Princes; and likewiſe the proſperitie of the armie of the Duke of Vrbin, the chiefe ſtrength whereof was compounded of Spaniards and Lanceknights, began to moue him and put him in ſome doubt. Therefore, beſides that he aduiſed the Pope to make himſelfe ſtrong with footmen of the Swiſſers, he offered to ſend him of new three hundred lances vnder Thomas de Foix brother to Odet Lord d'Eſcut, alledging that beſides the reputation and valour of ſuch a perſonage, he would ſtand him in good ſtead to cauſe the Gaſcons to depart from the armie of Franciſco Maria, with whom thoſe brethren and race of Foix, being deſcended of the nobleſt bloud in Gaſcoigne, had great authoritie. The Pope accepted this offer, but with a mind very ſuſpitious, for that he ſtood doubtfull as he did before, of the Kings will; which ſuſpition was more increaſed by the withdrawing of the Gaſcons, fearing leſt that action had ſecretly proceeded from Monſieur Lautrech: and certainly he that in thoſe times had obſerued the actions of Princes, might apparently diſcerne, that no benefite, nor any alliance was ſufficient to remoue out of their hearts the iealouſies which they had one of another. For, the ſuſpition was not onely reciprocall betweene the Pope and the French King, but the King of Spaine hearing of the coming of the Swiſſers, and the preparation of Thomas de Foix, was not without his feare, that the Pope and the French King ioyned together, would deuiſe to ſpoile him of the kingdome of Naples: which ſuſpitions were thought to profite the affaires of the Pope, ſince each of them to giue him no cauſe or pretext to eſtrange himſelfe from them, laboured to confirme him, and aſſure him with benefites and with aides. Now when Franciſco Maria was departed from before Corinaldo, he returned into the Duchie of Vrbin, to protect his people for the getting in of their haruеſt: and there, deſiring greatly, as he had alwayes done, to get Peſera, which was guarded by Count Potenza and his ſouldiers, he approched neare to it with his armie, and put to the ſea certaine ſhips to cut off their victuals. But againſt that force they of Rimini rigged out ſixteene veſſels, as well barks and brigantines, as skiffes; which being armed, as they went to conduct other ſhips loden with victuals for Peſera, they encountred the nauie of Franciſco Maria, with whom being come to blowes, they ſunke the Admirall, and tooke all the reſidue; by reaſon whereof Franciſco Maria deſpairing of the enterpriſe of Peſera, departed from thence.

In this meane while Monſieur d'Eſcut aduanced with his three hundred Lances, but the Swiſſers were ſlow in coming, for that the Cantons denied their conſent, vnleſſe the Pope would firſt pay their old penſions: from which obſtinacie the King being not able to remoue them, and the Pope hauing no abilitie to ſatisfie them, for the intollerable defrayments he had expended, when his Agents had consumed many dayes in that solicitation, they entertained without common consent, here and there, two thousand footmen of that nation, and foure thousand others, as well Germanes as Grisons: who being at last come to Rimini, and lodged in the suburbes, which being deuided by the riuer from the residue of the Citie, are enuironed with wals, Francisco Maria entred by night by the arches of that notable bridge of Marble which vniteth the suburbes with the Citie, but could not passe ouer the riuer, which was swelled by the ouerflowing of the sea. There was a strong fight betweene his souldiers and the footbands of the Pope that lay in the suburbes, in which was slaine Iasper Captaine of the Popes guard, who had conducted them thither: but greater was the losse of the enemies, for that Balastichino and Vinea Spanish Captaines were slaine, Federike de Bossolo hurt, and Francisco Maria receiued a blow with an harquebuse in his brest-plate. Afterwards he turned his armie towards Tuscane, being moued more by necessitie then by hope, for that in a region so much drained and consumed, so great an armie could not be nourished. When he had remained certaine dayes in Tuscane betweene the Parish of S. Steuen, the borough of S. Sepulcher, and Anguiari, townes of the Florentines, and had taken Montedoglio, a place very weake and of litle importance, he gaue a very long assault to Anguiari, a towne more strong by the fidelitie and valour of the inhabitants, then by the strength of the wals, or other kind of munitions: but perceiuing he could not carry it, he retired vnder the Appenine, betweene Burgo and Citta de Castello, where hauing caused foure peeces of artilleries to be brought from Mercatello, he incamped within lesse then halfe a mile of Burgo, vpon the way that leadeth to Vrbin; not well knowing what course to take, for that his enemies were come after him into Tuscane, many Italian bands entred into Burgo, Vitelli with the residue was got into Citta de Castello, and the footbands of the Germaines, Grisons and Swissers entred into Anguiari, the parish of S. Steuen, and the other townes conioyning. Laurence de Medicis likewise came from Florence (although somewhat late) to Burgo; where Francisco Maria had lyen many days without doing any thing: in which places he begã to know that his affaires would haue no good successe, forasmuch as in his armie there was great discommoditie of victuals, no present hope appearing to be able in any sort to performe any good action, and his souldiers, who were driuen by necessitie to maintaine themselues by prey and pillage, were no lesse terrible to his friends then to his enemies: and touching the bands of footmen who had followed him, they receiued no pay, and were likewise without hope to be able to get any more booties, or make any profite, for that hauing want of victuals, and perceiuing that their enemies were increased in force and reputation, so many Princes being discouered in their fauour, they began to be weary with the longnesse of the warre, hoping for no good issue or successe thereof, either by the oportunitie of present battell, or by the benefite of longer time. On the other side, the like happened to the Pope, who being both made naked of money, and of himselfe vnable to make necessary prouisions for his campe, standing also more doubtfull then euer of the fidelitie of the Kings, but chiefly of the French King, who was slow to send him the money which was due to him by the capitulation: and likewise for that Monsieur d'Escut who remained in Romagna by the Popes direction, refused to send part of his souldiers into Tuscane, alledging that he would not deuide them. For these reasons, and before the armies were passed the Appenine, and much more for that things were brought to this passe, there arose many arguments and perswasions of accord betweene the Legate and Francisco Maria assisted by his Captaines, Monsieur d'Escut interposing therein, and Don Hugo de Moncado Viceroy of Sicilia, whom the King Catholike had sent to that end: but vntill that day nothing could be done, for the hard conditions which Francisco Maria vrged. At length the Spanish footmen, induced by the difficulties that appeared, and at the instance of Don Hugo, who ioyning threats to the authoritie of his place, gaue them to vnderstand, that such was precisely the will of the King of Spaine, they inclined to accord: the which (Francisco Maria giuing his consent, although very vnwillingly, and the Bishop of Auellino sent thither for the Pope by the Legate being present) was contracted in this sort, with the consent of the Gascon footmen, by the interposing of Monsieur d'Escut: That the Pope should pay to the Spanish footmen fiue and fortie thousand duckats which was due, as they said, for foure moneths pay, and to the Gascons and Germanes ioyned with them, threescore thousand duckats: That they should all depart within eight dayes out of the state of the Church, the iurisdiction of Florence, and the territories of Vrbin: That Francisco Maria leauing abandoned all that he possessed in that State within that terme, might paſſe in ſecuritie to Mantua, and that he might carry with him his artilleries with all his moueables, and namely that famous Librarie of his, which with ſo great charge and diligence had bene erected by Federike his grandfather of the mothers ſide; a man moſt famous among the Captaines of his time, but more renowmed and recommended, amongſt all other his vertues, for that he was a louer of learning and learned men: That the Pope ſhould abſolue him of all cenſures, and giue pardon to all the ſubiects of the State of Vrbin, and to whomſoeuer had bene oppoſite to him in this warre. Whileſt the ſubſtance of theſe capitulations were more amply ingroſſing, Franciſco Maria ſought to haue inſerted certaine words, whereby ſhould be inferred, that the Spaniards were they who promiſed to deliuer vp to the Pope the State of Vrbin; which they refuſing in regard of their honour, there aroſe contention among them: by reaſon whereof Franciſco Maria ſuſpecting leſt they would ſell him to the Pope, went ſuddenly to Piuiero of Seſtina with part of the light horſemen, together with the footmen Italians, Gaſcons and Germanes, and foure peeces of artilleries. As ſoone as perfection was giuen to the peace, and that the Spaniards had receiued the money promiſed them, they went into the Realme of Naples, being at their departure a few more or leſſe then ſixe hundred horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen. The other bands of footmen did the like, when they had receiued the reward of their diſloyaltie: onely to the Italians, nothing was either giuen or promiſed; and Franciſco Maria (ouer whoſe ſafetie it ſeemed Monſieur d'Eſcut had a particular care) ſeeing himſelfe abandoned of euery one, challenged the benefite of the firſt peace, and went through Romagna and the country of Bologna to Mantua, being accompanied with Federike de Boſſolo, an hundred horſe, and ſixe hundred footmen.

In this ſort ended the warre of Vrbin, which had continued eight moneths with great expences and ignominie to the Victors: for on the Popes part were expended eight hundred thouſand duckats, the greateſt part whereof was drawne out of the Commonweale of Florence, for the authoritie he had in that Citie: and the Captains who had the ouerſight of theſe warres, were eſteemed by all men to be faint-hearted, of ill gouernment, and (by ſome) to be of an euill mind: for that in the beginning of the warre when the forces of Laurence were the mightier, and the enemies the weaker, they could neuer, either by true valour, or by induſtrie and prouidence, make vſe of any occaſion; whereof proceeded (their reputation being loſt) the confuſion and diſobedience of the armie, whereunto was adioyned ſhortly after the want of many prouiſions in the campe: and that in the end Fortune taking her pleaſure in their errors, did ſo multiply diſorders, that the warre was reduced to ſuch termes, that the Pope (who then diſcouered the ſnares that were laid againſt his life) being much moleſted in the dominion of the Church, and ſometimes fearing, and that not a litle, the Eſtate of Florence, was conſtrained with petitions and new obligations to implore the aide of all men: and yet neuertheleſſe he could not free himſelfe from ſo many troubles, but by paying with his owne mony, thoſe bands of the enemies armie, which either had bene the originall cauſe of the warre, or hauing bene leuied by his owne pay, after many robberies and ſpoiles, had ſhamefully reuolted againſt him. In this ſame yeare, and almoſt in the end thereof, the King of Spaine went with a proſperous nauigation, to take poſſeſſion of his kingdomes, hauing obtained of the French King (betweene whom were many demonſtrations of amitie, each of them couering the ſecret intention of their minds) forbearance for ſixe moneths of the firſt payment of an hundred thouſand duckats, which he was bound to pay him, by the laſt accord contracted betweene them: and the Venetians renewed for two yeares the league defenſiue which they had with the French King, with whom ſtanding moſt firmely conioyned, they made ſmall account of the amitie of all others: ſo that they had not yet ſent to offer their obedience to the Pope, who was much diſcommended for that he had ſent Legate to Venice, Altobello Biſhop of Pola, as a matter vnworthy of his Maieſtie.

Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and eighteene, in which the regions of Italy, contrary to the preſident of many yeares before, felt not the leaſt impreſſion or motion of warre, the ſelfſame diſpoſition appearing alſo in all the Princes of Chriſtendome, betweene whom (by the working of the Pope) was ſolicited, though rather in apparence then in good earneſt, an vniuerſall expedition of all Chriſtendome againſt Selim Prince of the Turkes, who the yeare before had ſo enlarged his eſtate, that conſidering his power, and no leſſe his ambition to command, his courage and hardineſſe, it might well be doubted, that if the Chriſtians preuen- 1518.

ted him not, he would ſhortly turne his victorious armes againſt them. For Selim knowing before, that Baiazet his father being now very old, purpoſed to eſtabliſh his elder brother Achomat in the ſucceſſion of the Empire, corrupting the Ianiſaries and ſouldiers of his guard, he conſtrained him by force of armes to reſigne vp to him the gouernment: and likewiſe it was beleeued of all men, that for his more abſolute aſſurance, he tooke away his life by poiſon. Afterwards hauing ouerthrowne his brother Achomat in an encounter, he put him to death publikly, doing the like afterwards to Corcu his yonger brother: and being not ſatisfied, according to the cuſtome of the Ottomans, with the ſlaughter of his Nephewes, and all that deſcended of that ſtocke, it was thought (ſuch was the wayward and vnplacable diſpoſition of his mind) that ſometimes he thought to take away the life of Solyman his onely ſonne. After theſe beginnings, proceeding from one warre to another, he ſubdued the Adulians a warlike people of the Mountaines: then he paſſed into Perſia againſt the Sophi, to whom he gaue battell and ouerthrew him, and tooke the Citie of Tauris the ſoueraigne ſeate of that Empire, together with the greateſt part of Perſia, which he was conſtraiued to abandon, not through the valour of his enemies, who diſtruſting to be able to abide his armie, were retired into mountainous and deſert places; but for that by the barrenneſſe of that yeare, he fell into want of victuals. After this expedition he returned to Conſtantinople, where he cauſed many ſouldiers who had raiſed ſedition to be puniſhed; and when he had refreſhed his armie for certaine moneths, making ſhew that he would returne into Perſia, he turned his forces againſt the Soldan of Syria and Egypt, a Prince not onely much reuerenced and eſteemed by thoſe of that religion, but alſo moſt puiſſant, as well for the amplitude of his dominion and great reuenues, as for the warlikneſſe and militarie diſcipline of the Mammelukes, who by their armes had poſſeſſed that Empire with great reputation for the ſpace of 300 yeares. For in that Empire, being gouerned by Soldans, who aſcend to this ſupreme degree not by ſucceſſion but by election, the gouernment of prouinces and of armies was giuen to none but men of manifeſt vertue, and ſuch as had paſſed by all the degrees of war: and their principall force ſtood not vpon ſouldiers mercenarie and forreine, but of choiſe men, who being taken of children in the prouinces adioyning, and trained vp many yeares in hardneſſe of fare, in ſuffering of labour and toile, and in the exerciſe of armes, and all cuſtomes appertaining to the diſcipline of warre, were afterwards enrolled in the order of the Mammelukes: and there ſucceeded from hand to hand in this order, not the ſonnes of the Mammelukes that were dead, but others, who hauing bene taken in their yong age for ſlaues, had their riſing by the ſame diſcipline and meanes that their predeceſſors had. Theſe being in all not aboue ſeuenteene or eighteen thouſand men, held in very ſtraight ſubiection al the people of Egypt and Syria, whom they forbad the vſe of all weapons, and to ride vpon a horſe: and being men of ſuch courage and boldnes, who made war of themſelues, (for amongſt them and by them were the Soldans choſen, and to them belonged the honors and profits, and the adminiſtration of that moſt opulent and rich Empire,) they had not onely ſubdued many nations adioyning, and beate the Arabians, but alſo maintained many warres againſt the Turkes, of whom they were often times victors, and ſeldome or neuer vanquiſhed by them. Againſt theſe people did Selim conuert his forces, whom he ouerthrew in many battels fought in plaine field, wherein was ſlaine the Soldan, and afterwards in another battell he tooke priſoner the other Soldan his ſucceſſor, whom he put to death publikely and ignominiouſly: ſo that when he had made a great ſlaughter of the Mammelukes, and almoſt extinguiſhed their name, and taken Cairo, which is a moſt populous Citie, wherein the Soldans made their reſidence, he ſubdued in ſhort time after Syria and all Egypt: in ſo much as hauing ſo ſuddenly and ſo greatly increaſed his Empire, almoſt doubled his reuenues, and remoued the impediments of a people ſo puiſſant and of ſo great reputation who enuied his gouernment, it was not without cauſe that all the Chriſtian Princes ſtood in feare of him. Moreouer, this alſo much increaſed their feare, that to ſuch a power and valour was ioyned an ardent deſire to beare rule, and by victories to make his name glorious to all poſterities; for which cauſe reading oftentimes the exploits of Alexander the Great and Iulius Cæſar, he (as the report went) was much troubled in mind, that the actions performed by him, could not in ſome ſort hold compariſon with their infinite triumphs and victories; and refurniſhing continually his armies, building a great number of ſhips, and leuying all prouiſions neceſſary for the warre, it was feared, leſt (when his preparations were readie) he would inuade Rhodes, the bulwarke of Chriſtendome in the Eaſt parts, or elſe (as ſome thought) the kingdome of Hungaria, heretofore fore fearefull to the Turkes for the valour of the inhabitants, but at that time much weakened by the minoritie of their King, who was gouerned by Priests and Barons of the Realme, who were at discord among themselues. Others were of opinion, that he turned all his thoughts to the inuasion of Italy, as being encouraged thereunto by the discord of the Potentates, and for that he knew how much it had bene shaken with long warres, together with the memorie of Mahomet his grandfather, who with a power farre lesse then his, and with a small Natie sent to the Realme of Naples, had wonne (when men doubted nothing) the Citie of Otronto, and (if he had not bene preuented by death) had opened a way, and established a meanes continually to torment the regions of Italy. Now therefore the Pope together with the whole Court of Rome being astonished with so great a successe, and making demonstration, to the end to prouide for so great a danger, that he would first craue the helpe of God, caused most deuout processions to be made at Rome, wherein he went bare footed: and afterwards turning himselfe to thinke vpon and looke after the helpe of men, he wrote letters to all Christian Princes, and admonished them of so great a perill, intreating them that laying aside all ciuill discords and contentions, they would speedily looke to the defence of Religion and their common safetie, which was continually exposed to very great dangers, if with vnitie of minds and conioyned forces the warre were not transferred into Turkie, and that the enemie were not assailed in his owne countrey. Whereupon these admonitions being well considered of by many persons skilfull in the art of warre, and others who knew the countries, and the disposition as well of the Prouinces, as the nature of the forces and weapons of the Turke, it was resolued that it was necessary to make great prouision of money, by a voluntary contribution of the Princes, and an vniuersall impost of all the people of Christendom: That Cesar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and exercised continually in wars against the Turke, and with an armie of Rutters and Lanceknights fit for so great an enterprise, should saile along Danubi into Bossina (anciently called Misia) to approch Thracia, & so to Constantinople, the seate of the Ottoman Empire: That the French King with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other Potentates of Italy, accompanied with the Swissers, should passe from the port of Brundusium into Albania (which is a passage easie and very short) to inuade Greece, a country full of Christian inhabitants, and as well in that regard, as for the rigorous gouernment of the Turkes, most ready to rebell: That the Kings of Spaine, of England and Portugal, assembling their forces by sea in Cartagena and the ports thereabouts, should take their course with two hundred ships full of Spanish footmen and other souldiers, to the strait of Gallipoli, to assaile Constantinople, hauing first taken the Castles standing vpon the mouth of the straite: That the Pope himselfe should take the same course, embarking at Ancona with an hundred great Galleys. With which preparations both sea and land being couered, and the estate of the Turkes so many wayes assailed, who make their principall foundation to fight in the plaine field, it was likely (chiefly adding hereto the helpe of God) that there might be hoped of so holy a warre, a most happie issue. The Pope, to entertaine these matters, or at least that it might not be imputed to him to haue failed of his dutie, after he had sounded the minds of the Christian Princes, published in the Consistorie an vniuersall truce for fiue yeares among all the Christian Potentates, vpon paine of most grieuous censures to such as should impugne it. And to the end that matters appertaining to so great an enterprise might be resolued and agreed vpon, whereof he consulted continually with the Embassadours of the Princes, he sent for Legate to the Emperour the Cardinall of Saint Sisto, to the French King the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, to the King of Spaine the Cardinall Giles, and to the King of England the Cardinall Laurence Campeius; all Cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience and dexteritie to manage affaires, for the opinion of their learning, or for their great familiaritie and friendship with the Pope. Now though these things were begun with great expectation, and that the vniuersall truce was also accepted of all parts, and that euery one with no litle ostentation and brauery of words, made shew of their readinesse with their forces to aduance so good a cause (if others would be concurrant with them:) yet euery one esteeming the perill vncertaine and farre off, and extending more to the Estates of one then of another, the matter being also difficult, and such as required a long tract of time to introduce such a zeale and so vniuersall an vnion, priuate interests and profites ouerruled them: in so much as these proceedings were not onely not brought to such passe as any hope could be had of them, but they were followed slightly, and as it were in shew onely; the nature of men being ſuch, that thoſe things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do dayly ſo diminiſh and vaniſh, that vnleſſe the firſt feares be reuiued by new accidents, they will in ſhort time become almoſt ſecure: which negligence in publike affaires, and the exceſſiue deſires of particular profite, was ſo much the more confirmed by the death of Selim which happened ſhortly after, who, by reaſon of a long maladie, hauing ſuſpended the preparations of the warre, and being in the end conſumed by his diſeaſe, died, leauing ſo great an Empire to Soliman his ſonne, yong in yeares, but iudged to be of a more milde ſpirit, and of a courage not ſo diſpoſed to warres (although afterwards the effects declared the contrarie.)

At this time there appeared betweene the Pope and the French King a very ſtraight coniunction. For the King gaue for wife to Laurence his Nephew Magdalene nobly deſcended of the houſe of Bulleine, with a yearely reuenue of ten thouſand crownes, whereof part was of the Kings gift, and the reſidue of her owne patrimonie: and the King hauing a ſonne borne to him, required the Pope that in his Baptiſme he would cauſe his name to be giuen him. By which occaſion Laurence who prepared himſelfe to go marrie his new wife, making haſte to be gone, went in poſt to the Court of France, where he was well entertained, and much honored by the King, to whom making demonſtration that he gaue vp himſelf wholy vnto him, promiſing to follow his fortune in all aduentures, he became much in his fauour. He brought to the King a Brieſe from the Pope, by the which he granted him power to vſe at his pleaſure the moneys collected of the tenths and of the Croiſado, vntill ſuch time as they were to be employed againſt the Turke, ſo farre forth as he would make promiſe to reſtore it when need ſhould require; and neuertheleſſe that of this money fiftie thouſand crownes ſhould be turned to the profite of Laurence: and the King who till that day had winked at the Pope who executed not his promiſe made to him in writing, for the reſtoring of Modena and Reggia to the Duke of Ferrara, notwithſtanding the terme was paſt ſeuen moneths before, knowing that he could not more offend the Pope then to vrge him to that reſtitution, and making greater reckoning (as it often happeneth) of the ſtronger then of the weaker, he redeliuered into the hands of Laurence the ſaid writ of promiſe. Almoſt at the ſame time, the Venetians by the helpe of the French king prolonged the truce they had with Cæſar for fiue yeares, with condition to pay him euery one of the fiue yeares twentie thouſand crownes, and alſo to euery one of the exiles that had followed Cæſar, the fourth part of the yearely reuenues they had before, which was eſteemed to be fiue thouſand duckats; and peraduenture if they had giuen Cæſar a greater ſumme of money he would haue bene induced to haue made peace. But the truce was farre more plauſible to the French King, for that the Venetians not ſtanding fully aſſured, ſhould haue the greater reaſon to make great account of his armie, and that Cæſar might haue no power to innouate any thing, by reaſon of the money he had receiued of them. Moreouer, matters on all ſides tending to peace and concord, the differences betweene the French King and the King of England were reconciled, and things confirmed for more ſuretie by a new alliance; for the King of England promiſed to giue his onely daughter (to whom, for that he had no more children, there was hope that the ſucceſſion of the kingdome would belong) to the Daulphin, eldeſt ſonne to the French King, with a dowrie of foure hundred thouſand duckats: both the one and the other of whom were of ſo tender age, that infinite accidents might happen before they came to yeares fit for the conſummation of mariage. There was made betweene them a league defenſiue, wherein were principally comprehended Cæſar and the King of Spaine, in caſe they would ratifie it within a certaine time; and the King of England bound himſelf to reſtore Tournay, for the keeping whereof he was at great charges, receiuing preſently of the French King for the charges he had bene at, two hundred and threeſcore thouſand duckats, three hundred thouſand which he ſhould confeſſe to haue receiued for the dowrie of his daughter in law, and three hundred thouſand more which he ſhould pay within the ſpace of twelue yeares, and alſo with promiſe, to deliuer vp Tournay if the peace and alliance followed not. Many Embaſſadours were ſent from both the Realmes to negociate this league, and to receiue the ratifications and oathes, by whom in the Courts of both the Kings the acts of the accord were diſpatched with great ſolemnitie and ceremonie, with reſolution of an enteruiew of both the Kings betweene Callice and Bulleine, immediatly after the reſtitution of Tournay. About the ſame time, the daughter of the French king being dead, who was appointed to be maried to the King of Spaine,

the former peace and capitulation was eftſoones reconfirmed betweene them, wherein was promiſed the mariage of the ſecond daughter of the French king, both the Kings celebrating this coniunction with moſt great demonſtrations of perfect amitie. The King of Spaine who had already cauſed to be payed at Lions the hundred thouſand duckats, did publikely weare the Order of Saint Michael vpon the feaſt day of that Saint, and the French King, vpon the day dedicated to Saint Andrew, more publikely the robes for the Order of the Golden Fleece.

Thus the affaires of Italy and the parts beyond the Mounts being at reſt, there remained onely diſcontented Iohn Iaques Triuulce, whom neither his yeares, reduced almoſt to extreame old age, nor his vertue, ſo oftentimes proued in the ſeruice of the houſe of France, could any way helpe: for that (his ambition and impatience haply being in ſome part the cauſe) finding himſelfe croſſed by the ſubtle humors of ſuch as enuied him, & being perſecuted in many things by Monſieur Lautrech, the King was drawne into ſuſpition, for the intereſt of the faction of the Guelfes, and by reaſon of that which he had done in times paſt to keepe himſelfe in the grace of the Venetians, of whoſe companies Theodore Triuulce was the gouernor, and who had taken into their pay Renie a member of the ſame family, that as wel himſelfe as thoſe of his houſe were too gracious with the Venetians. By reaſon whereof, after Galeas Viſconte by the death of Francis Bernardin Viſconte, was become chiefe of the Gibelin faction, the King to the end to oppoſe him againſt Triuulce with the greater authoritie, indued him with the Order of Saint Michael, and allowed him a penſion; and the King and Monſieur Lautrech aduanced his reputation as often as occaſion was offered. Theſe things brought no litle diminution to the authoritie of Triuulce, who had no patience to diſſemble his wrongs, but complaining ordinarily of them, was ſo much the more hated and ſuſpected. But that which gaue greater occaſion to Monſieur Lautrech and others that accuſed him to the King, was, that he had made himſelfe a Burgeſſe with the Swiſſers, as though he would by their meanes ſupport himſelfe againſt the King, and haply aſpire to greater things. And going into France (old and decrepit as he was) to iuſtifie himſelfe of thoſe ſlanders, not onely Monſieur Lautrech after his departure, retained vnder reaſonable guard at Vigeuena, by the Kings cõmandement, his wife & grand child borne to the Count of Muſocco his onely ſon deceaſſed, but withall he was not receiued by the King either with the countenance or honor accuſtomed, but reprouing him for that he was become a Swiſſer, he told him, that no other thing held him from puniſhing him as he had deſerued, then the vniuerſall renowne that ranne (though more then indeed was true) of the ſeruices he had done to the Crowne of France: and ſo he was conſtrained to renounce his Bourguerſhip. Not many dayes after, following the Court, he fell ſicke at Chartres, where he ended his life. He was a man in the iudgement of all men, (confirmed by ſundry experiences,) of ſingular worth in the diſcipline of warre, and ſubiect all the days of his life to the inconſtancie of Fortune, who ſometimes cheriſhed him with happy, and ſometimes tormented him with vnhappie ſucceſſe: and to whom agreed very well that which by his commandement was written vpon his Tombe, viz.

Iealoſie againſt Iohn Iaques Triuulce.

The death of Iohn Iaques Triuulce.

I finde the reſt within my graue, which in my life I could not haue.

In this ſame yeare, Ceſar deſiring after his death to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the Romane Empire in the perſon of one of his Nephewes, treated with the Electors to chuſe one of them King of Romanes, a dignitie which draweth with it an immediate ſucceſſion to the Empire after the Emperours death, without any other election or confirmation. And becauſe no ſuch election can be made, vntill ſuch time as he that is already choſen had obtained the Crowne Imperiall, he made inſtance to the Pope, that by a new example, he would cauſe him to be crowned in Germanie by the hands of certaine Cardinals deputed Legates Apoſtolike for that end. And albeit Ceſar had afore wiſhed that that dignitie might be conferred vpon Ferdinand his grandchild, for that he thought it reaſonable, that the elder brother hauing ſo great a puiſſance of Eſtates diuolued to him, the other ſhould ſupport himſelfe with this degree: and he iudged that for the better continuance of his houſe in honor, and to meet with all ill accidents that might fall vpon the eldeſt, it were better that two perſonages were great then one alone; yet being incited to the contrary by many of his Courtiers, and by the Cardinall of Sion, and all ſuch as feared and hated the power of France, he reiecting his firſt counſell, turned his mind in ſuch ſort, that the King of Spaine was elected to that dignitie, being perſwaded by theſe, that it would be more profitable for the exaltation of the houſe of Auſtria, to bring all the power to one alone, then then by deuiding it to many parts, to make them leſſe able to obtaine their purpoſes: That the foundations of the greatneſſe of Charles were ſuch and ſo mightie, that the Imperiall dignitie being added thereunto, there was hope that he might reduce all Italy and a great part of Chriſtendome into one Monarchie: which was an action not onely appertaining to the greatneſſe of his progenie and deſcendants, but alſo to the tranquillitie of his ſubiects, and in regard of the Infidels, to the benefite of the whole common weale of Chriſtendome: and that it was his dutie to thinke vpon the augmentation and exaltation of the Imperiall dignitie, continued ſo many yeares in his perſon, and in the houſe of Auſtria, and which till that day, by the weakneſſe of him and his predeceſſors, hauing bene greater in title and name, then in ſubſtance and effect, there was no hope that that dignitie could be raiſed and reſtored to his ancient renowme, but by tranſporting it into the perſon of Charles, and annexing it to his power: and ſeeing ſuch an occaſion was offered him by the order of nature and fortune, that he ought not to hinder it, but to increaſe and augment it: That it might be ſeene by the example of ancient Emperours, that Cæſar Auguſtus and many of his ſucceſſors, who wanting ſons, or other iſſue of the ſame line, being iealous leſt the dignitie which had bene reſident in their perſons ſhould die with them, haue ſought by the meanes of adoption, for ſucceſſors very far remoued from their alliance, yea ſuch as touched them nothing in bloud: and that the example was freſh of the King Catholike, who albeit he loued Ferdinand as his ſonne, hauing bene alwayes trained vp about him, and neuer ſeeing Charles, yea finding him in his laſt age very diſobedient to his commandements; yet without hauing compaſſion of the pouertie of him whom he loued as his ſonne, he imparted vnto him none of thoſe eſtates which he held, nor of ſuch as he might diſpoſe of by the right of conqueſt, but left all to him whom he ſcarcely knew but as a ſtranger: That he ſhould remember how the ſame King would alwayes vrge him to purchaſe new Eſtates for Ferdinand, but to leaue the Imperiall dignitie to Charles: and that for the augmentation of the greatneſſe of his ſucceſſor, he with a counſell reproued of many, and haply vniuſt, puſhed on with no other cauſe then this, had bereft his owne houſe ſo noble and renowned, of the kingdome of Aragon, and againſt the common deſire of moſt men, conſented that the name of his owne family ſhould be annihilated. Againſt this inſtance of Cæſar, the French King oppoſed himſelfe with all the induſtrie and meanes he poſſibly could, taking not a litle diſpleaſure, that to ſo many kingdoms and eſtates holden by the Spaniſh King, there ſhould alſo be added the Imperiall dignitie, which reſuming vigour by ſo great a puiſſance, would become fearefull and terrible to all other: He ſought to deale ſecretly in ſuch ſort with the Electors, that this matter ſhould ſort to no effect: He made inſtance to the Pope that he ſhould not conſent by a new example to ſend the Crowne to Maximilian: and ſent Embaſſadours likewiſe to the Venetians, to induce them to hinder it with the Pope, whom he admoniſhed of the perils that might fall vpon them both by the courſe of ſuch a greatneſſe. But the Electors for the moſt part were already drawne to the opinion of Cæſar, and no leſſe aſſured of the ſummes of money promiſed them for that election by the King of Spaine, who for that purpoſe had ſent into Germanie two hundred thouſand duckats: neither could they in honeſtie, nor haply without danger of ſlander in regard of the examples paſt, denie him ſuch a demand: neither was it beleeued, that the Pope (although it was diſpleaſing to him) would refuſe to conſent, that Cæſar ſhould receiue the Imperiall Crowne in Germanie in his name, by the hands of Legates Apoſtolike, ſeeing that to make a voyage to Rome to be crowned, albeit it brought greater authoritie to the ſea Apoſtolike, yet in all other regards it was a matter rather ceremonious then ſubſtantiall.

The French king aſpireth to be Emperor.

1519. With theſe thoughts and accidents ended the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and eighteene, the Electors hauing not yet reſolued vpon their deliberation, which was made more doubtfull and full of difficulties by the death of Cæſar, which happened in the beginning of the yeare a thouſand, fiue hundred and nineteene. He died at Linz, a towne vpon the marches of Auſtria, deuoted, as alwayes, to the hunting of wilde beaſts, and accompanied with the ſame fortune wherewith he had almoſt alwayes liued, which hauing bene alwayes very benigne vnto him in offering him great occaſions, I know not whether ſhe were not alſo oppoſite vnto him, in not ſuffering him to make vſe of them, or whether by his inconſtancie and ill digeſted conceptions, oftentimes contrary to the iudgement of other men, together with his exceſſiue prodigalitie and expences of money, which interrupted all his occaſions and ſucceſſes, he depriued himſelfe

of that which fortune brought euen to his owne houſe: for otherwiſe he was a Prince moſt expert in warre, diligent, ſecret, very laborious, courteous, benigne, and repleniſhed with many other excellent gifts and ornaments. Maximilian being dead, the French King and the King of Spaine began manifeſtly to aſpire to the Empire, and although this controuerſie was a matter of ſuch importance, and betweene two ſo mightie Princes, yet it was paſſed betweene them with great modeſtie, without vſing of either iniurious words or threats of armes, but each of them labouring by his authoritie and meanes, to draw the minde of the Electors vnto his ſide: and the French King ſpeaking very laudably to the Embaſſadours of the King of Spaine touching this election, ſaid, It was a matter both decent and conuenient, that either of them ſhould ſeeke by honeſt meanes to increaſe his honour by the excellencie of ſo great a dignitie, which ſundry times had bene in the families of their predeceſſors, and that therefore neither of them ought to eſteeme himſelfe wronged, nor their good will and amitie any whit diminiſhed; but that they ought to follow the example which is ſometime ſeene betweene two yong louers, who albeit they both loue one Ladie, and either of them labour by all meanes and induſtrie to obtaine her, yet they forbeare to come to contention. The King of Spaine was of opinion, that the Empire by good right appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long ſucceſſion of time in the houſe of Auſtria, and that it had not bene the cuſtome of the Electors to depriue the deſcendants of the dead without manifeſt cauſe of their diſabilitie, neither was there any in Germanie of ſo great puiſſance and authoritie, that he might be competitor with him in that election: and likewiſe he held it not iuſt, or very likely, that the Electors would tranſport to a forreine Prince, ſo great a dignitie, continued now ſo many ages in the nation of Germanie; and although ſome among them corrupted with mony, or for ſome other cauſe, might be allured to another intention, yet he hoped both to ſtop him with force of armes prepared in time conuenient, and that the other Electors would oppoſe againſt him, and at leaſt that all the other Princes and free townes of Germanie would not endure ſo great an ignominie and ſo vniuerſall an infamie, ſpecially to ſuffer it to be layed vpon the perſon of the French king, which would be no other thing then to increaſe the puiſſance of a King enemie to their nation, and from whom they might aſſure themſelues that ſuch a dignitie would neuer returne into Germanie. He thought therefore it would be an eaſie matter to reduce to perfectiō that which had bene ſolicited with his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompences and gifts with euery one of the Electors. On the other ſide, the deſire of the French king was as great, and no leſſe his hopes, grounded principally vpon an opinion he had, that with a great ſumme of money he might eaſily get the voices of the Electors, whereof ſome were his ancient friends and Penſioners, who encouraging him with the facilitie of the matter, ſtirred him to the enterpriſe: and (as men are apt to beleeue the thing they deſire) he nouriſhed this hope with reaſons more apparent then true. For he knew that commonly it was a matter grieuous to the Princes of Germanie that the Emperours ſhould be ſo puiſſant, for doubt leſt they would either in part or in all, take knowledge of the Imperiall iuriſdictions and authorities occupied by many of them, and therefore he perſwaded himſelfe that they would in no ſort conſent to the election of the King of Spaine, and ſubmit themſelues to an Emperour more mighty then any had bene ſince the time of the ancient Emperours: a matter which was not altogether ſo in him, for that hauing neither Eſtates nor ancient alliances in Germanie, they could haue no ſuch ſuſpition of his greatneſſe; for which reaſon likewiſe he beleeued, that the free townes would not onely not be won, but rather reſtrained, in regard of the glorie of the nation, the prouocations of priuate intereſt being ordinarily more powerfull in men without compariſon, then the reſpect of common profite. He knew well that it was not a litle grieuous to many noble houſes of Germanie, who thought themſelues capable of ſuch a dignitie, to ſee the Empire continue ſo long time in one houſe, and that that which ought ſometimes to be giuen to one, and ſometimes to another, became perpetuall as it were, by ſucceſſion in one line; and that they might call that election a ſucceſſion, which durſt not leaue the next deſcendants of the deceaſſed Emperours: That in that ſort the Empire was tranſlated from Albert of Auſtria to Federike his brother, from Federike to Maximilian his ſonne, and that now they went about to paſſe it from Maximilian to the perſon of Charles his grandchild. Theſe humors and indignations of the Princes of Germanie, gaue him hope that the diſcords and iealouſies among themſelues might be helping to his cauſe, for that it often hapneth in contentions, that he that

ſees himſelfe reiected, or the partie whom he fauoureth, will rather (ſetting aſide all other reſpects) proceed raſhly to aduance a third perſon, then giue place to him that hath oppoſed againſt his intention. Moreouer the French King hoped in ꝧ fauour of the Pope, as well in regard of the amitie and alliance which he thought he had now made with him, as for that he beleeued it could not be pleaſing to him, that Charles ſo puiſſant a Prince, and who by reaſon of the neighbourhood of the Realme of Naples to the Eſtate of the Church, hauing intelligence with the Barons of the Gibelins, might haue open paſſage euen to the gates of Rome, ſhould obtaine the Imperiall Crowne alſo: and herein he conſidered not, that the ſame reaſons which were true againſt Charles, were alſo againſt himſelfe, for that the Empire being ioyned to his perſon, the Pope and all others were no leſſe to feare him then Charles; for that though the one of them poſſeſſed haply more Realmes and States, yet the other was not to be leſſe eſteemed, for that his power was not diſperſed and ſeparate in many places, but his Realme was all aſſembled and vnited together, with a maruellous obedience of his ſubiects, and full of great riches: neuertheleſſe not acknowledging in himſelfe that which he eaſily conſidered in another, he had recourſe to the Pope, intreating him to fauour him, for that he might make reckoning of him and his kingdome as of his owne ſonne. The buſineſſe of this election cauſed the Pope to be very carefull, to whom it was not a litle grieuous, for the ſuretie of the Sea Apoſtolike, and the reſidue of Italy, that either of theſe two Kings ſhould be elected Emperour; and his authoritie not being ſuch with the Electors that he might hope to preuaile much with them, he iudged it neceſſary to carry himſelfe wiſely, and to vſe induſtrie in a matter of ſo great conſequence. He perſwaded himſelfe, that the French King, deceiued by ſome of the Electors, would haue no part in this election, and that corruptions in men that will be hired for money, would not be of ſuch force as might ſuffice to tranſport the Empire from the Germaine nation to the perſon of a French King. But he ſuppoſed it would be very eaſie to the King of Spaine, for that he was of the ſame nation, for the practiſes begun by Maximilian, and for many other regards, to obtaine his purpoſe, if he obiected not ſome great impediment, which he iudged he could no otherwiſe do, then by cauſing the French King to reſolue to turne vpon the perſon of one of the Electors the ſame fauors and diſtributions of mony, which he aduanced for his owne election: but he eſteemed it a matter impoſſible to induce the King hereunto whileſt he was yet poſſeſſed with the heate of vaine hopes. Therefore he hoped, that by how much more earneſtly & with the greater hope he ſhould plonge himſelfe in that practiſe, by ſo much the more eaſily would he ſuddenly fauour the election of a third perſon, no leſſe then he had affected his owne, when finding himſelfe diſcouered and prouoked in the heate of the buſineſſe, he ſhould perceiue he could not attaine to the end of his deſires: and that he might at ſuch a time (when he ſhould haue made the King conſtantly beleeue that he was his friend, and that he had the ſame deſire with him) cauſe him to heare and receiue his authoritie and counſel. Beſides that it might likewiſe happen, that in fauoring much at the beginning the affaires of the French king, the other King perceiuing he ſhold haue difficultie to obtain his deſire, & fearing leſt the French King would win ſome aduantage, would in like ſort diſpoſe himſelfe to elect a third perſon: for which reaſons he did not onely ſignifie to the French King, that he had a great deſire that he might be raiſed to the Empire, but encouraged him with many reaſons to proceed reſolutely in the enterpriſe, promiſing him with ample words, to fauour him with all the Pontificall authoritie: and ſuppoſing that he could not better imprint in the Kings mind the ſinceritie of his intention, then by vſing for that purpoſe an inſtrument whom the French King would thinke depended more vpon him then of any other, he gaue preſent direction to his Nuncio in Germany, called Robert Vrſin Archbiſhop of Reggia, whom the King truſted much, with commiſſion that both ſeuerally and ioyntly with the French Agents there, he ſhould vſe his beſt endeuour to ſolicite the Electors, aduertiſing him notwithſtanding, that he ſhould proceed either more or leſſe moderately, as he ſhould find the Electors diſpoſed in Germanie, and the affaires aduanced. Which actions being diſcreetly diſcourſed by the Pope, and couered with a wonderfull ſimulation, required greater prudence, as well in the King as in his Agents in Germanie, and in the miniſters of the Pope more grauitie and fidelitie.

But whileſt theſe matters were managed by practiſes and by armes, the French King gaue direction to Peter of Nauarre to go to the ſea with a Nauie of twentie galleys and other veſſels furniſhed with foure thouſand ſouldiers, entertained vnder colour to repell the foiſts of the

Moores,

Moores, who hauing for many yeares ouer-runne our ſeas without any impediment, had ſcowred them this yeare more then euer; and to inuade (if the Pope thought it good) the Moores of Africa: but chiefly that the Pope, who diſcouered himſelfe wholly for him in the cauſe of the Empire, might not be daunted by the forces of the King Catholike, who more for a feare to be offended in his owne Eſtates, then for any deſire he had to offend others, prepared with great diligence an armie by ſea, to ſend for the guarding of the Realme of Naples. And yet notwithſtanding amidſt theſe diſtruſts and ſuſpitions, both the Kings continuing to make faire ſemblances of amitie, there was ſent from them to Montpellier, the great Maiſter of France, and the Lord Cheures, in each of whom conſiſted almoſt all the counſels and intentions of their Kings: and it was to confirme the mariage of the ſecond daughter of France with the King of Spaine, but much more to reſolue the affaires of the kingdome of Nauarre, the reſtitution whereof promiſed to the ancient King in the accord made at Noyon, although the French king had much ſolicited it, was till that day deferred by the King of Spaine with diuers excuſes: but by reaſon of the death of the great Maiſter, which happened before they ſpake together, there was nothing done. At this time died Laurence de Medicis, who had languiſhed in a continuall ſickneſſe euer ſince his returne from France, where he had conſummated his mariage with wretched predictions, by the death of his wife, who not many dayes before, after her deliuerie of a daughter, departed this life, as though ſhe would prepare him the way. By reaſon of the death of Laurence, the Pope deſiring to keepe the power of the Florentines conioyned with the Eſtate of the Church ſo long as he liued, making no reckoning of the counſell of ſuch as aduiſed him, that ſince (beſides himſelfe) there remained no more of the line maſculine of the lawfull deſcendants of Coſmo de Medicis the firſt founder of that greatneſſe, he ſhould reſtore libertie to his countrey, he preferred the Cardinall de Medicis to the adminiſtration of that Eſtate, either in a deſire to perpetuate the name of his houſe, or for a hatred, cauſed by his exile, againſt the name of that Commonweale: and iudging that the Duchie of Vrbin, for the vniuerſall loue which the people bare to their ancient Duke, would hardly be holden vnder the name of the onely daughter remaining of Laurence, who was comprehended in the inueſtiture of her father, he rendred it, together with Peſera and Sinigale, to the Sea Apoſtolike; and ſuppoſing that this was not ſufficient to repreſſe the vehement affection of the people, he threw downe to the earth the walls of the Citie of Vrbin, and of the other principall places of that Duchie, except Agobbio, which Citie, for that by reaſon of the emulation it bare to the Citie of Vrbin, was not ſo much inclined to Franciſco Maria, he fauoured, and put it in reputation, appointing it as chiefe ouer all that Duchie; and to weaken this Duchie the more, he gaue to the Florentines in recompence of the money expended for him in the warre of Vrbin (for the which he had before made the Chamber Apoſtolike debter to the State of Florence) the fortreſſe of Saint Leo, with all Montfeltro and the Pariſhes of Seſtina, which were wont to be of the territorie of Seſena; the Florentines being not well content with ſuch ſatisfaction, who notwithſtanding could not oppoſe againſt his will.

The death of Laurence de Medicis.

Now we muſt returne to the ſute for the Empire, which held all Chriſtendome in ſuſpence, and was purſued by both the Kings more hotely then euer. The French King was dayly more beguiled by the great promiſes of the Marquis of Brandenburg, one of the Electors, who was allured with no ſmall offers of money, and haply ſome round ſumme in preſt, for the which he did not onely bind himſelfe with ſecret capitulations to giue him his voice, but alſo had promiſed him that his brother the Archbiſhop of Magunce, one of the three Prelate Electors, ſhould do the like. The King in like ſort promiſed himſelfe much of another part of the Electors; and in caſe it came to an equalitie of voices, he hoped not a litle in the voice of the King of Bohemia, by the voice of whom the controuerſie was to be decided, if the ſixe Electors, whereof three be Eccleſiaſtike and three ſecular, were diſcordant. Therefore he ſent to the Admirall, who was gone before into Germanie about this buſineſſe, a great quantitie of money to be diſtributed among the Electors; and vnderſtanding that many of the free Townes, together with the Duke of Wirtemberg threatning thoſe that would conferre the dignitie of the Empire vpon ſtrangers, made leuies of men of warre, he made prouiſion of other money, to oppoſe by force of armes ſuch as put the Electors in feare to make choiſe of him. But great was the inclination of the people of Germanie to keepe the Imperiall dignitie within the compaſſe of that nation, yea euen among the Swiſſers, who for the loue they bare to their common countrey of Germanie, beſought the Pope, that in that election he would not beare fauour to any that were not of the naturall language of Germanie: who perſeuered neuertheleſſe to fauour the French King, hoping that in ſhewing himſelfe ſo affectionate towards him, the King would with more confidence hearken to his counſels, whereby he laboured in the end to perſwade him, that ſhaking off all hope to be elected himſelfe, he would endeuour with the ſame feruency to cauſe ſome other of the Princes of Germanie to be elected; which was a counſell that ſerued to no purpoſe, for that the Admirall and Robert Vrſin, deceiued by the promiſes of ſuch, as to draw money from the French men, gaue them moſt certaine hope, and being paſſionate, the one of a French nature and the Kings ſeruant, and the other of a light nature and deſirous to winne grace with the King, confirmed him dayly more and more with vaine aduertiſements in hope to carry the election. With theſe practiſes, thoſe to whom the power to elect the Emperour of Rome belongeth (not by any more ancient cuſtome or well grounded reaſon, but by permiſſion and priuiledge of Pope Gregorie the fift, a Germaine of nation) being come according to the ancient cuſtome to Francfort a town of low Germanie, whileſt they were diſputing of many things to proceed to election in due time, according to their ordinances, they were aduertiſed of an armie put to the field by the King of Spaine, (who was more ready to wage ſouldiers with his money, then to giue it to the Electors) which being approched neare to Francfort, vnder colour to bridle all ſuch as ſhould offer to force the election, increaſed the courage of thoſe Electors that fauoured his cauſe, reduced to their opinion thoſe that ſtood doubtfull, and ſo aſtoniſhed the Marquis of Brandenburg who was for the French King, that deſpairing of the concurrance of the other Electors, and fearing the hatred and infamie of the whole nation, he had not the courage to diſcouer his intention: ſo that coming to the act of election, Charles of Auſtria King of Spaine was elected Emperour the eight and twentieth day of Iune, by the concordant voices of foure Electors, viz: the Archbiſhop of Maguncе, the Archbiſhop of Colleine, the Count Palatine, and the Duke of Saxonie: but the Archbiſhop of Treues gaue his voice for the Marquis of Brandenburg, who alſo was concurrant in the election of himſelfe. And it is not to be doubted, that if by equalitie of voices the election had come to the gratification of the ſeuenth Elector, that the like would haue happened, for that Lewis King of Bohemia, who was alſo King of Hungarie, had promiſed his voice to Charles.

This election maruellouſly depreſſed the heart of the French King, and of thoſe that in Italy depended of him: and on the contrary, encouraged thoſe that had other hopes and thoughts, ſeeing ſo great a power conioyned in the perſon of one onely Prince, being yong, and to whom there was promiſed by many predictions great Empire, together with maruellous felicitie: and albeit he was not ſo rich in money as was the French King, yet it was eſteemed a matter of right great importance, that he was able to furniſh his armies with Lanceknights and Spaniards, people much eſteemed and valiant; whereas the French King, not hauing in his kingdome footmen to oppoſe againſt theſe, had no meanes to make ſtrong warre, but by drawing with great expences, and ſometime with much difficultie, bands of footmen out of forreine countries; which conſtrained him to entertaine with great charge and diligence the Swiſſers, and to endure of them many iniuries, without being euer fully aſſured either of their conſtancie or fidelitie. And it was not to be doubted, but that betweene theſe two yong Princes, betweene whom there were many cauſes of iealouſie and debate, there would in the end ariſe a great and dangerous warre. For the French King deſired much to recouer the kingdome of Naples, pretending that he had iuſt title thereto; and alſo took much to heart the reſtoring of King Iohn to the Realme of Nauarre, touching the which he diſcerned now that he had bene fed with vaine hopes. It troubled the Emperour to pay the hundred thouſand duckats promiſed in the accord of Noyon; and he was of opinion that the King, reiecting the accord made before at Paris, and vſing immoderately the occaſion of his neceſſitie to paſſe into Spaine, had almoſt forced him to make a new accord. The cauſe of the Duke of Gueldres was ſtill freſh betweene them, which of it ſelfe (for that the French King had taken him into his protection, and the people of Flanders held him as a great enemie) was ſufficient to ſtirre them vp to armes. But aboue all, the Duchie of Burgundie wrought in the mind of the new Emperour no ſmall emulation. This Duchie being poſſeſſed by Lewis the eleuenth, by reaſon of the death of Charles Duke of Burgundie grandfather by the mothers ſide to the Emperours father, had alwayes troubled the minds of his ſucceſſors. Alſo there wanted no prouocations or cauſes of ſtrife touching the Du-

Occaſions of contention betweene the French king and the Emperour.

chie of Millan, whereof ſince the death of Lewis the twelfth, the King had not obtained nor demanded the inueſtiture: and likewiſe there were many exceptions pretended to the rights which were fallen to him by the inueſtiture which had bene made to his predeceſſor, as well touching the inualiditie as the loſſe of thoſe rights, which was a matter ſufficient to ſtirre vp warres betweene them: neuertheleſſe neither the times nor the occaſions ſuffered them at that ſeaſon to enter into any troubles. For beſides that it was neceſſary for the Emperour elect to repaſſe firſt into Germanie, to receiue at Aix the Crowne of the Empire, according to the cuſtome, they were each of them ſo puiſſant, that the difficultie to offend one another, kept them reſtrained from all inuaſion vntill they had perfect information of the intention and diſpoſition of other Princes, and ſpecially (if the war were to begin in Italy) of the Popes mind, which was ſo couered with artificiall and faire ſhewes, that it was knowne to none, and haply at ſome times not reſolued in himſelfe; although he had diſpenſed with Charles for the acceptation of the election made of his perſon, contrary to the tenor of the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples, wherein (being made according to the forme of ancient inueſtitures) that was expreſly forbidden him: but this proceeded not ſo much of good will, as for that he had no occaſion to denie it, without offending him greatly.

Italy then for theſe cauſes was conſerued in peace, notwithſtanding the Pope in the end of the ſame yeare ſought to ſeize vpon the Citie of Ferrara, not by open warres, but by ſecret ambuſhes. For although it might haue bene beleeued, that by reaſon of the death of his Nephew Laurence de Medicis (there being now in his houſe rather want of men then of Eſtates) he would haue layed aſide all thoughts to get Ferrara, whereunto he had alwayes aſpired before: yet being puſhed on by a hatred conceiued againſt the Duke, or by a deſire to equall the glorie of Iulio, or at leaſt to come as neare it as he could, he had not, either for the death of his brother, or of his nephew, any whit diminiſhed that burning ambition: whereby it may eaſily be diſcerned, that the ambition of Prieſts hath no greater nouriture then of it ſelfe. But the qualitie of the time, and the ſituation and ſtrength of that Citie, which Alphonſo had fortified with great diligence, not ſuffering that he ſhould thinke to take it with open forces, ſeeing there was within it almoſt an infinite quantitie of faire peeces of artilleries and munitions, and that the Duke improuing his reuenues to the vttermoſt, limiting all his expences, impoſing new taxations and tributes, and ſeeming in all things rather a Merchant then a Prince, had gathered together (as many beleeued) a huge maſſe of money, ſo that there remained to the Pope, if the conditions of the time changed not, no other hope to carry it, then by ſecret ambuſhes and intelligences. Whereof he hauing in vaine made experience in times paſt by Nicholas d'Eſte and many others; and Alphonſo not knowing that he went any more about ſuch practiſes, held himſelfe almoſt aſſured, not of his will, but of his ambuſhes; the Pope was of opinion (for the meanes that were offered him, and for that Alphonſo oppreſſed with a long ſickneſſe, was reduced to ſuch termes that there was almoſt no hope of his recouerie, and that his brother the Cardinall, becauſe he would not remaine in the Court of Rome with diſgrace, was gone into Hungarie) that it was now a fit time to execute ſome plot preferred by certaine exiles of Ferrara, and through their meanes, by Alexander Fregoſo Biſhop of Vintemille, who was then at Bolognia, for that aſpiring to be Duke as his father the Cardinall had bene, he was ſuſpected to Octauian Fregoſo. This Biſhop hauing had ill ſpeed in the practiſes which he managed to bring him againe into his owne countrey, promiſed himſelfe better ſucceſſe in thoſe things which he ſhould performe for another in a ſtrange countrey. Therefore hauing ſecretly receiued of the Pope ten thouſand duckats, he leuied (vnder colour to reenter Genes by force) a power of two thouſand footmen, partly in the territories of Rome, and partly within the iuriſdiction of Lunigiana: at the bruite whereof, Octauian Fregoſo for doubt of him, hauing armed himſelfe both by ſea and land; and he (as if his drifts being diſcouered, he were fallen from all hope to be able at that time to alter the eſtate of Genes) hauing giuen aduertiſement to Federike de Boſſolo (by whoſe aide the towne of Concorda was chiefly maintained againſt Count Iohn Francis of Mirandola) that he might vſe the ſeruice of his forces vntill the expiration of their pay, which yet continued almoſt a moneth, he paſſed the Appenine, and deſcended into the countrey of Correggio, paſſing very leiſurely to Concorda. The foundation of this matter, was to paſſe the riuer of Po, for which purpoſe certaine ſeruants of Albert Carpi who was priuie to this conſpiracie, had vnder colour to be Merchants of corne, hired many barkes which were in the mouth of the riuer of Secchio (ſo do the people of the countrey call the place where the waters of Secchio do enter into Po,) and paſſing in them the riuer of Po, the Biſhop had a purpoſe to approch vpon the ſudden neare to Ferrara, where hauing bene not many moneths before, he had carefully ſurueyed one part of the towne vpon the riuer ſide, where fortie fadomes of the wall were caſt downe to the earth, which was a breach ſufficient enough to enter the towne, the which wall being but lately fallen, was not ſo ſoone made vp again, for that the nearneſſe of the riuer, and the priuation of feare, had increaſed the negligence of ſuch as were wont to haue made prouiſion for ſuch diſorders. But when it was knowne in the countrey, that the Biſhop of Vintemille was paſſed the Appenin with his ſouldiers, the Marquis of Mantua, not for any particular ſuſpition, but following his ancient cuſtome to take away all meanes from ſtrangers to paſſe the riuers, retired to Mantua all the barkes that lay in the mouth of Secchio: ſo that the Biſhop loſing the oportunitie of thoſe barkes which he had hired, and hauing no meanes to recouer other ſo ſoone as was needfull, chiefly for that the officers for the Church that were neareſt that place, were not made priuie to the practiſe, nor had any commiſſion (in caſe they had bene priuie to it) to deale in it: whileſt he ſearcheth with the Agents of Albert ſome remedie, and ſoiourneth the confines of Corregia, where he ſpake inconſiderately to many, and diſcouered to ſome, all the particularities of his purpoſe; the Marquis of Mantua being aduertiſed thereof, ſendeth one of his men to diſcouer the enterpriſe to the Duke of Ferrara, who doubted ſo litle of any ſuch matter, that he was hardly induced to beleeue it. Neuertheleſſe the part of the wall that he ſaw ruinate mouing him more then any other thing, he began to wage men of warre: and making as though he had no ſuſpition of the Pope (although he thought otherwiſe) he aduertiſed him of the ambuſhes dreſſed againſt him by the Biſhop of Vintemille, beſeeching him to giue direction to the Gouernours thereabouts to miniſter ſuccours to him if need required; which was readily granted and executed by the Pope, with Briefes and letters of fauour, ſending notwithſtanding ſecretly at the ſame time commiſſions to the contrary. The rumour that ranne of the preparations which were made at Ferrara, together with the difficulties to paſſe the riuer of Po, tooke from the Biſhop all hope, by reaſon whereof drawing with his armie towards Concorda, whileſt he treated with thoſe that were within (who were already entred into ſuſpition of him) to inuade Mirandola, he preſented himſelfe ſuddenly one night before the walls of Concorda, and gaue the aſſault, to giue men cauſe to beleeue that he was come into thoſe places, not to go to Ferrara, but to ſeize vpon Concorda. This aſſault was to no purpoſe, after which he diſmiſſed the moſt part of his ſouldiers. He left many in opinion, and Alphonſo himſelfe, that if the meanes to paſſe the riuer of Po had not bene taken from him, the breach or ruine of the wall that was reuerſed, had miniſtred to him a great commoditie to take Ferrara, whrein there was not one regiment of men of warre, and where there was no doubt of any thing, the Duke being extremely ſicke, and the people in ſuch diſcontentment with him, that in ſo ſudden an accident, there were few that would haue taken armes, and oppoſed themſelues to the danger.

Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and twentie, wherein the peace of Italy continuing for the ſame reaſons for which it had bene preſerued the yeare before, new doctrines began much to increaſe, firſt againſt the authoritie of the Church of Rome, and afterwards againſt the authoritie of Chriſtian Religion: which doctrine tooke beginning in Germanie in the countrey of Saxonie, by the preachings of Martin Luther, a Frier of the Order of Saint Auguſtine, who at the firſt renewed, for the moſt part, the ancient errors of the Bohemians, reproued by the vniuerſal Councel of the Church holden at Conſtance, by the authoritie whereof Iohn Hus and Ierome of Prague, two principall heads of thoſe hereſies, were burned, and had bin for a long time reſtrained within the limits of Bohemia. The cauſe that ſtirred them vp againe in Germanie, was the authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike which Pope Leo vſed too licentiouſly, in that following the counſell of Laurence Puccio Cardinall of the Foure Saints, touching the adminiſtration of graces which the Court of Rome diſtributeth in things ſpirituall and beneficiall, he had diſperſed throughout the world, without diſtinction of times or places, moſt ample Indulgences, not onely for the helpe of ſuch as are yet liuing, but alſo to deliuer the ſoules of the dead out of the paines of Purgatorie: and becauſe it was manifeſtly knowne, that thoſe Indulgences were granted onely to draw money from men, which was impudently demanded by the Commiſſaries deputed for that exaction, who for the moſt part had bought their authoritie of the Popes officers,

ceers, they had in many places runne into great hatred, and cauſed many ſlanders, and eſpecially in Germanie, where might be ſeene many of his miniſters ſelling for a ſmall price, yea ſet vpon a game at tables in a Tauerne, power to redeeme the ſoules of the dead out of Purgatorie. This indignation was alſo increaſed for that the Pope (who for the facilitie of his nature managed the office of Pope in many things with very litle maieſtie) gaue to his ſiſter Magdalene the profite of the exaction of the Indulgences in many quarters of Germanie, who aſſigned for her Commiſſarie the Biſhop of Arembauld, a man fit for ſuch a commiſſion, which he executed with no litle auarice and extortion. And forasmuch as it was knowne through all Germanie, that the money which he got by theſe Indulgences, went not to the Pope, nor to the Chamber Apoſtolike, who haply might haue expended ſome part of it in good vſes, but was appointed to ſatisfie the couetouſneſſe of a woman, not onely the exaction was deteſtable, and the officers of the ſame, but alſo the name and authoritie of him who with ſo litle diſcretion granted ſuch things. Luther tooke this occaſion, and began to contemne theſe Indulgences, and therein to taxe the authoritie of the Pope; and a great number of auditors running to heare him (for it was a matter very plauſible in the eares of the people) he began to denie and dayly to quarrell more openly the authoritie of the Pope. After theſe beginnings, haply honeſt, or at leaſt excuſable in ſome part, for the iuſt occaſion that was giuen him (being ſtirred vp by ambition, popular affectation, and the fauour of the Duke of Saxonie) he not onely carried himſelfe outragiouſly aginſt the power of the Popes, and againſt the authoritie of the Church of Rome, but running into the errors of the Bohemians, he began with time to take the Images out of Churches, to depriue holy places of their goods, and to permit mariage to Monkes and Nunnes profeſſed, confirming his opinion not onely with authoritie and with arguments, but alſo by his owne example: to denie that the power of the Pope was to extend out of the Biſhopricke of Rome, and to affirme that euery other Biſhop had as much authoritie in his particular Dioceſſe, as the Pope had within the Biſhopricke of Rome: to reiect all matters determined in Councels, all things written by thoſe that are called Doctors of the Church, all the Canons & Decrees of Popes, holding himſelf onely to the old Teſtamẽt, to the book of the Goſpels, to the Acts of the Apoſtles, to all that is comprehended vnder the name of the new Teſtament, and to the Epiſtles of Saint Paul; but giuing to all theſe writings a new ſence, and interpretation dangerous, and ſuch as neuer had bene heard of. But the folly of Luther and his adherents ſtayed not onely there, but being followed (as we may ſay) almoſt of all Germanie, and running dayly into more deteſtable and dangerous errors, he came to deale euen with the Sacraments of the Church, to deſpiſe faſtings, penances, and confeſſions; and afterwards ſome of his followers (but ſuch as ſome way differed from his opinion) ſpake diuelliſh and peſtiferous things of the Euchariſt. All which things hauing for their foundation the contempt of the authoritie of Councels and holy Doctors, haue giuen an entrie to all new and peruerſe inuentions and interpretations, and are amplified in many places out of the bounds of Germanie, for that they containe ſuch a doctrine, as deliuering men from many commandements layed vpon them for the publike good by the generall Councels of the Church, by the decrees of Popes, by the authoritie of the Canons, and ſound interpetations of holy Doctors, they bring them backe to a maner of life more full of libertie, yea euen according to their owne fancie and luſt. The Pope laboured in the beginning to quench this peſtiferous doctrine, forbearing notwithſtanding to vſe remedies and medicines proper and conuenient to cure ſo great a maladie. For he cited to Rome Martin Luther, he forbad him to preach, and afterwards for his diſobedience, impoſed vpon him the cenſures of the Church; but he abſtained not from many things of ill example, and ſuch as being reaſonably reproued and blamed by Luther, were very offenſiue to all men: in ſo much as his proceeding againſt him with ſpirituall armes, did nothing diminiſh, but rather augment the reputation of Martin in the minds of the people, as though thoſe perſecutions had taken their beginning of the innocencie of his life and for his ſound doctrine, rather then for any other cauſe. The Pope ſent into Germanie many religious men to preach againſt him, and wrote many Brieſes to the Princes and Prelates: but neither this nor many other meanes which he vſed to repreſſe him, ſtood him in any ſtead, by reaſon of the inclination of the people, and for the great fauour which the Duke of Saxonie ſhewed him in his iuriſdiction. This matter began dayly in the Court of Rome to ſeeme of greater importance, and to augment the feare leſt there might ariſe ſome great detriment to the power of Popes, to the profites of the Court of Rome, and to the vnion of Chriſtian Religion: for which occaſion in that yeare were ſummoned many Conſiſtories at Rome, and many conſultations in the chamber of the Pope amongſt the Cardinals and Diuines deputed to deuiſe a remedie for ſuch an euill, which increaſed dayly. And albeit there wanted not ſuch as admoniſhed them, that the perſecutions which had bene made againſt him vntill that time, ſince they were not accompanied with correction of things blameable among themſelues, had increaſed his reputation and good will with the people, and that it had bene a leſſe euill to diſſemble the knowledge of ſuch a folly, which perhaps would haue diſſolued of it ſelfe, then by blowing the fire, to kindle it, and make it the greater: neuertheleſſe as the nature of men is to proceed with remedies fierce and violent, the perſecutions were not onely increaſed againſt him and his followers, commonly called Lutherans, but alſo a wonderfull excommunication reſolued vpon againſt the Duke of Saxonie, which exaſperated him in ſuch ſort, that he became a more vehement protector of his cauſe: which for the ſpace of many yeares went on increaſing in ſuch ſort, that there was great danger leſt almoſt all the reſidue of Chriſtendome ſhould be infected with this contagion: and there is nothing that hath ſo much reſtrained his courſe, as the knowledge that the followers of this doctrine were no leſſe enemies to the power of temporall Princes, then to the authoritie of the Popes of Rome; which hath bene the cauſe that many Princes for their proper intereſt, haue laboured with care and ſeueritie to keepe that contagion out of their Realmes: and on the contrary, nothing hath ſo much ſupported the obſtinacie of theſe errors, (which ſometimes haue bene at the point to confound and fall, both for the immoderate intemperancie of their heads and chieftaines, and for the diuerſitie and contrarietie of opinions among themſelues) as the licentious libertie which the people haue taken in their maner of liuing, together with the couetouſneſſe of great men, who would not ſuffer themſelues to be depriued of the goods which they had gotten from Churches.

There happened nothing this yeare worthy of memorie, ſauing that Iohn Paul Baillon and Gentil of the ſame family being at Perouſa, either for that a quarrell fell betweene them, or elſe for that Iohn Paul not contenting himſelfe that he had the greateſt part and more authoritie in the gouernment, ſought to get the whole to himſelfe, he chaſed Gentil out of Perouſa, which being diſpleaſing to the Pope, he cauſed him to be cited to appeare perſonally at Rome; but he fearing to go thither, ſent Malateſta his ſonne with his iuſtifications, and to make offer of his obedience to all his commandements. Neuertheleſſe the Pope inſiſting ſtill vpon his perſonall appearance, after he had bene many dayes in great perplexitie, at laſt he was reſolued to go to Rome, truſting partly in the ancient ſeruices which at all times he had done to his houſe, and partly at the perſwaſions of Camilla Vrſin his ſonne in law, and of other his friends, who vſing all their authoritie, and applying all the meanes they could with the Pope, either they obtained of him expreſſe promiſe and aſſurance (though not ſet downe in writing,) or at leaſt the Pope with great art vſed with them ſuch words, and made ſuch demonſtrations vnto them, that they truſting therein, encouraged him to appeare, giuing him to vnderſtand that he might ſafely go. But when he was come to Rome, he found that the Pope, vnder colour of his recreation, according to his cuſtome, was gone a few dayes before to the Caſtle S. Angelo, whither Iohn Paul going the morning following to preſent himſelfe before him, was made priſoner by the Captaine of the Caſtle before he came into his preſence, and afterwards rigorouſly examined by Iudges aſſigned, to whom he confeſſed, that he had committed many great offences, as well for the conſeruation of the tyrannie, as for his diſordered pleaſures, and other his particular intereſts: for which cauſe, after he had bene priſoner more then two moneths, he was beheaded according to the ſentence of the law: the Pope being moued hereunto, as it was beleeued, for that he diſcerned in the warre of Vrbin by many ſignes, that Iohn Paul bare a mind eſtranged from him, and had entertained conſpiracies with Franciſco Maria, and that in any accident that might happen, he could not aſſure himſelfe of him, and conſequently of the affaires of Perouſa, ſo long as he was in that Eſtate, the which to eſtabliſh according to his owne fantaſie (the children of Iohn Paul being fled as ſoone as they they heard of the retaining of their father) he gaue the legation thereof to Siluio Cardinall of Cortona his ſeruant, and of his ancient bringing vp. He reſtored Gentil into Peruſa, to whom he gaue the goods which Iohn Paul had poſſeſſed, and leaning vpon a very weake foundation, he conuerted vnto him all greatneſſe and reputation. In like ſort this yeare, the Pope, who attributed the occaſion which the Biſhop of Vintemille had loſt, more to fortune or want of diſcretion, then to any other thing, began to practiſe new ambuſhes againſt the Duke of Ferrara, by the meanes of Hubert Gambara the Pronotarie Apoſtolike, to whom Rodolph a Captaine of certaine bands of Lanceknights which Alphonſo held for his guard, had promiſed to giue him entrie at his pleaſure by the gate of the Caſtle Tialto, whither the ſouldiers that were to be ſent from Bologna and Modena, hauing no meanes to come without paſſing the riuer of Po, but by the woodden bridge which is before that gate, direction was giuen to Guido Rangon and the Gouernour of Modena to aſſemble a certaine number of ſouldiers vnder ſome other colour, and to go make a ſurpriſe of that gate, and to defend it vntill the others that were to come from Bologna and Modena were arriued, who were to come thither almoſt in a throng. But the day to execute the enterpriſe was no ſooner determined vpon, then it was diſcouered that Rodolph, to whom by the Popes appointment were giuen about two thouſand duckats by Hubert de Gambaro, had from the beginning communicated all the matter to Alphonſo, who, after he was well informed of the Popes intention and of his plots, purpoſing that things ſhould proceed no further, handled the matter in ſuch ſort, that the deceit of Rodolph was knowne to all men.

In this yeare the Emperour elect paſſed by ſea out of Spaine into Flanders, and in his paſſage he deſcended into England, not by neceſſitie, as his father did, but voluntarily to ſpeake with the King of England, with whom he was in good agreement. From Flanders he went in the moneth of October into Germanie, where at Aix (a noble Citie and renowmed for the ancient reſidence and ſepulcher of Charlemaine) he receiued the firſt Crowne, which is (as men ſay) the ſelfe ſame wherewith Charlemaine was crowned: and it was deliuered to him according to the ancient cuſtome, by the authoritie of the Princes of the Empire. But this felicitie was troubled with new accidents happening in Spaine, for that the people of thoſe kingdomes were grieued with his promotion to the Empire, as knowing that to the great incommoditie and harme of them all, he ſhould for ſundry occaſions be conſtrained to ſpend the moſt part of his time out of Spaine: but the principall cauſe that made them thus to ſtirre, was the great hatred which they had conceiued againſt the couetouſneſſe of ſuch as gouerned him, eſpecially againſt Monſieur de Cheures, who ſhewing himſelfe inſatiable, had raked together by all meanes a great maſſe of treaſure, as the other Flemmings had likewiſe done, ſelling for ready money to ſtrangers thoſe offices which were wont to be beſtowed vpon Spaniards, and putting to ſale all the graces, priuiledges and expeditions which were wont to be ſought for at the Court: in ſo much as all the people being inflamed againſt the name of the Flemmings, thoſe of Valliadolid began to draw into mutinie, at ſuch time as the Emperour departed: and he was hardly gone out of Spaine, when they all gathered into commotion, not againſt their King (as they proteſted) but againſt his wicked gouernours: and after they had communicated their counſels together, they would no more obey the Kings officers, but of themſelues ſet downe a forme of gouernment, dreſſed by the counſell of the vniuerſall multitude, which they called La ſanta Giunta: ſo called they the vniuerſall counſell of the people. Now the Captaines and officers of the King hauing taken armes againſt them, and ſo things being reduced to a manifeſt warre, the diſorders were ſo much increaſed, that the Emperour elect held amongſt them very ſmall authoritie: which was the cauſe that in Italy and out of Italy, the hope of thoſe increaſed, who deſired the diminution of ſuch a greatneſſe. Neuertheleſſe his armie by ſea wonne vpon the Moores the Ile of Gerbes, and in Germanie the reputation of the French King was ſomewhat embaſed. For, the French King to nouriſh the troubles in Germanie, fauouring in that Prouince the Duke of Wirtemberg, who was at diſcord with the league of Suaube, the people of the league being grieued at it, chaſed him by force out of his Eſtate; and when they had gotten it, they ſold it to the Emperour, who deſired to pull downe the partakers with the French King, binding himſelfe to defend that Eſtate againſt whom ſoeuer would aſſaile it : in ſo much as the Duke ſeeing himſelfe ruined vnder hope to be ſuccoured by the French King, was conſtrained to haue recourſe to the clemencie of the Emperour, and to receiue of him ſuch lawes as he would preſcribe, without being reſtored for all that to the poſſeſſion of his Dukedome.

In the end of this yeare, about three thouſand Spaniſh footmen who had bene many moneths in Sicilia, hauing no minds to returne into Spaine, according to a commandement which they receiued of the Emperour, and litle eſteeming the authoritie of their Captaines, paſſed to Reggia in Calabria: and from thence, committing many inſolencies as they paſſed, they drew towards the territories of the Church, and put the Pope (in whoſe mind was fixed the memory of the accidents of Vrbin) in great feare, leſt being either ſtirred vp by other Princes, or ioyning themſelues with Franciſco Maria, and with the ſonnes of Iohn Paul Baillon, or ſome other enemies of the Church, they would be the cauſe of ſome great emotion, chiefly ſince they refuſed the offers made to them by him and the Viceroy of Naples, to entertaine part of them, and to giue money to the reſidue: by which offers taking the more courage, they marched towards the riuer of Tronto, not by the ſtraight countrey of Capitinato, but by the large way of Powilla: and other ſouldiers ioyning with them dayly, together with certaine horſemen, they cauſed him dayly to feare more. Neuertheleſſe, this emotion tooke end more eaſily and more ſuddenly then was expected: for as ſoone as they had paſſed Tronto to enter into the Marque of Ancona, whither the Pope had ſent many ſouldiers, and that they were incamped before Ripatranſona, they were compelled to retire for the great loſſe of men they had ſuſtained in a fierce aſſault they gaue; which tooke from them ſo much courage and reputation, that they accepted willingly of the Emperours officers, conditions farre inferiour to thoſe which they had litle eſteemed before.

The Argvment.

Italy having bene ſomewhat peaceable for the ſpace of three yeares, beginneth to enter againe into warre, whereof the Pope is the cauſe. He ioyneth in league with the Emperour againſt the French King. The French King loſeth the Duchie of Millan. Pope Leo dieth. Adrian the ſixt is created Pope. Francis Sforce reentreth vpon the Duchie of Millan. Warre is made in Tuſcane by Ranſe de Cere.

IN the beginning of the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and one, that little ſtirre was appeaſed, whereof men had bin more feareful for the freſh memorie of thoſe bands of Spaniſh footmen that inuaded the State of Vrbin, then for any likely cauſes of feare that appeared. But not many moneths after, Italy began to be vexed with greater wars, of longer continuance, and more dangerous, then thoſe that were paſt: the ambition of two moſt mightie Kings, puffed vp with mutuall iealouſies, hatreds, and deepe ſuſpitions, inciting them to exerciſe all their power, and to diſcouer all their diſdaine in Italy, which hauing bene about three yeares in peace, though doubtfull and full of ſuſpitions, it ſeemed that heauen, deſtinie, and fortune, enuied her tranquillitie, or elſe feared leſt repoſing any longer, ſhe would returne to her ancient felicitie. Such perſonages were the beginners of theſe new emotions, who albeit they were farre more bound then others to procure the preſeruation of peace, troubled it neuertheleſſe more often then others, and with all their induſtrie and authoritie, ſought to kindle the fire, which they ought to haue quenched with their proper bloud, if other remedies could not ſuffice. For, notwithſtanding the euill inclinations betweene Caſar and the French King increaſed continually, yet there was no cauſe whereby they were much preſſed to make preſent warre, neither did the one ſo farre ſurmount the other in Italy, either in force, or any other commoditie, that they were able to offend one another without the aide of the Italian Princes: for that the French King hauing the Venetians conioyned with him for the defence of the eſtate of Millan, and the Swiſſers being not ſo ready to make warres in their owne names, but diſpoſed onely to ſerue as ſouldiers to whom ſoeuer would giue them pay, he had no cauſe to feare any ſtirring of the Emperour, neither on the quarter of Naples, nor on the coaſt of Germanie; and in reſpect of himſelfe, he had no meanes to offend the Emperour in the Realme of Naples, vnleſſe the Pope were concurrant with him in the action, who ſtood ſolicited by them both by many offers and meanes to be their friend: in ſo much as it was beleeued, that if the Pope continuing indifferent betweene them, were carefull to temper and range with his Pontificall authoritie (and with the reputation which neutralitie would giue him) the diſdaines and quarrels that were betweene them, and to cut off and ſtop their troubleſome counſels, that peace might haue bin preſerued. And there was not diſcerned any cauſe whereby he was cõſtrained to deſire, or to ſtirre vp the warre, for that he had with ill ſucceſſe raiſed armes before, and theſe two Princes being ſo great, he ought to ſtand in an indifferent feare of the victorie of either of them, knowing euidently, that he that remained ſuperiour, could no way be ſtayed from ſubiecting all Italy to his obedience. The Pope poſſeſſed peaceably and with very great obedience the large eſtate of the Church, and Rome; and all the Court flouriſhed wonderfully vnder him, and enioyed great felicitie. He had full authoritie ouer the State of Florence, which at that time was a mightie State, and very rich: and he was naturally inclined to eaſe and pleaſures, and 1521.

and then by too much licentiouſneſſe and greatneſſe, he was exceedingly eſtranged from affaires; and employed all the day in hearing of Muſicke, & beholding gibers and ieſters; ſo that being inclined to his pleaſures more then was either conuenient or honeſt, he ſeemed to be altogether eſtranged from the warre. Beſides, being full of great magnificencie and glorie, and ſuch as in any other, though deſcended by long ſucceſſion from great Kings, had bene admirable, he had not onely, as well by his incredible expences, as by giuing without diſtinction, conſumed with ineſtimable prodigalitie the treaſures gathered by Iulio; but alſo hauing exacted an infinite quantitie of money of the expeditions of the Court, and many new ſorts of offices inuented to raiſe gaine, he had waſted all ſo exceſſiuely, that he was continually conſtrained to deuiſe meanes how to entertaine thoſe immoderate expences, which he not onely continued but rather increaſed. He was not prouoked with any deſire to make great any of his kindred: and though the deſire to recouer Parma and Plaiſance troubled him, and the longing he had to obtaine the Eſtate of Ferrara, yet he thought not theſe cauſes ſufficient to ouerthrow the peaceable condition of things, but rather to temporiſe and expect oportunitie and occaſions. But right truly is it ſpoken, that there is no greater enemie to a man, then too great proſperitie, for that it makes him impatient of himſelfe, full of libertie, bold to do euill, and deſirous to diſturbe his owne good, by innouations and new things.

Leo being eſtabliſhed in this eſtate, eſteeming it a great infamie to him to haue loſt Parma and Plaiſance gotten by Iulio with ſo great glorie, or elſe not being able to bridle his earneſt deſire to get Ferrara, or ſuppoſing that if he ſhould die without doing ſome thing of importance, the memorie of his Pontificacie would remaine diſhonored: or fearing (as he ſaid) leſt thoſe two Kings (each of them being excluded of the hope to haue him on their ſide, and for that cauſe being leſſe able to offend one another) would grow at laſt to contract betweene themſelues ſome league which would be to the diſaduantage and debaſing of the Church, and of all the reſidue of Italy: or elſe hoping (as I haue heard the Cardinall de Medicis ſay ſince, who knew all his ſecrets) that the French men being chaſed out of Genes and the Duchie of Millan, he might the more eaſily expulſe the Emperour out of the kingdome of Naples, and appropriate to himſelfe the glorie of the libertie of Italy, whereunto his predeceſſor had manifeſtly aſpired, and whereunto foraſmuch as he could not attaine with his owne forces, he hoped by appeaſing ſomewhat the mind of the French King, by the election of ſome Cardinall whom he would preferre, and by ſhewing himſelfe ready to gratifie him in other matters, to draw him to giue him ſuccours againſt the Emperour, as though it were a great comfort to the King to ſee that as much was done to the Emperour as to him. Which ſoeuer of theſe cauſes it was that moued him, whether one, or more, or all together, he turned all his thoughts to the warre, and to ioyne himſelfe with one of theſe two Princes, to the end that being allied with the one, he might moue warre in Italy againſt the other. Now to make himſelfe ready hereunto, and not to be oppreſſed in the meane while by either of them; whileſt he negociated with them both, but more ſtrictly with the French King, he ſent into Swiſſerland Anthonie Puccio Biſhop of Piſtoya, who was afterwards Cardinall, to leuie and leade into the eſtate of the Church ſixe thouſand Swiſſers; which armie being granted him by the Cantons without difficultie, becauſe of the confederation which ſince the warre of Vrbin he had renewed with them, and the paſſage likewiſe agreed vpon through the Eſtate of Millan, they were brought vpon the dominions of the Church, where he entertained them many moneths, as well in Romagna as in the Marque: and all men being vncertaine to what end he made ſo great expences vnprofitably, ſeeing there was no ſtirre or alteration in Italy; for his part he auouched that he had called them for his proper ſuretie, for that he knew well that the rebels of the Church conſpired dayly new practiſes: which cauſe ſeeming not very probable, men ſpake and diſcourſed of it diuerſly. Some ſuppoſed that he called in thoſe forces for feare of the French King; others for ſome deſigne to get Ferrara; and ſome thought that he would chaſe the Emperour out of the kingdome of Naples. But there was ſecret practiſe betweene him and the French King, to inuade the kingdome of Naples with their ioynt forces, vnder this condition, that Caietta and all that is contained betweene the riuer of Garillan and the confines of the Eccleſiaſtike State, ſhould be for the Church, and the reſidue of the Realme ſhould belong to the ſecond ſonne of France, who, for that he was vnder age, ſhould be gouerned till he came to riper yeares, together with the kingdome, by a Legate Apoſtolicall that ſhould reſide at Naples. Moreouer, it was an article in the capitulation, that the King ſhould aide him againſt the ſubiects and freeholders of the Sea Apoſtolike, which was a condition added for the better aſſuring of that which the Church held already, and no leſſe tending to the deſire which the Pope had to get Ferrara.

At this time, and very ſeaſonably for theſe practiſes, the French King incited by the occaſion of the tumults of Spain, & (as he afterwards auouched in his complaints) at the perſwaſion of the Pope, ſent an armie into the kingdome of Nauarre, vnder Monſieur d'Aſparrot brother to Lautrech, to recouer that Realme for the ancient King; and at the ſame inſtant Robert de la Marche and the Duke of Gueldres, beganne to make warre vpon the confines of Flanders. The ſeditions of Spaine were the cauſe that Monſieur d'Aſparrot made an eaſie conqueſt of the kingdome of Nauarre, being deſtitute of all ſuccours, and where the memorie of the late King was not yet extinguiſhed: and after he had forced with his artilleries the Caſtle of Pampeluna, he entred the frontiers of the kingdome of Catelognia, and tooke Fontaraby, running vp to Logrogna. By meanes whereof it came to paſſe (as it oftentimes happeneth in humane things) that that which men thought would haue bene preiudiciall to the Emperour, turned greatly to his benefite: for that the affaires of Spaine being trauelled till that time with diuers aduentures, were reduced into very great troubles, the popular ſort being banded together on the one ſide, and many Nobles & Barons on the other ſide hauing taken armes for the ſeruice of the Emperour, who for the intereſts of their Eſtates feared the popular libertie, which was now come euē to a manifeſt rebellion, and ſuch, as for a deſire to haue a head of authoritie, the Commons had drawne out of the Caſtle of Sciatiua the Duke of Calabria, who refuſed to take armes againſt the Emperour, and would not come out of priſon. But when the Spaniards ſaw that the French King inuaded their countrey, that touched them in ſuch ſort, (although they had willingly ſuffered the loſſe of the Realme of Nauarre, which was become a member of their dominions, by the vnion which the King Catholike made) that partly for this cauſe, and partly for ſome happie ſucceſſe which the armie of the Emperour had obtained, all the Realme of Spaine laying aſide their domeſticall contentions and hatreds, returned to the obedience of their King, the Nobilitie and the Commons falling to agreement. After this eaſie conqueſt of the Realme of Nauarre, there happened to the King a farre greater ſucceſſe (if he could haue vſed the occaſion.) For the Swiſſers, hauing with them his Embaſſadours and thoſe of the Emperour, each of them ſtriuing to draw them to their ſide, refuſed the amitie of the Emperour (contrary to the opinion of many, and againſt the hope they had giuen him) and embraced the alliance of the French King, binding themſelues to furniſh him with as many footmen as he would, and for what enterpriſe ſoeuer, and not to ſuffer them to be leuied for any other againſt him. There reſted the execution of the capitulation made at Rome betweene the Pope and the King, whereof when the ratification was required of the King, he began to ſtand in ſuſpence, for that many told him, that he ſhould haue no aſſurance in the Pope, who was double, and ſince he was become Pope, had alwayes ſhewed ſmall friendſhip towards the French: That it was to be feared leſt there were ſome deceit, ſince it was not very likely ỹ the Pope ſhould deſire that the Realme of Naples ſhould fall into his power, or into the power of his ſonnes, for as much as the French holding the kingdome of Naples and the Duchie of Millan, the Pope ſhould be leſſe aſſured, and his power would be too fearfull to him: That vndoubtedly ſo great a ſhew of amitie breaking out vpon a ſudden, could not be without ſome myſterie: and that he ought to take good heed, that he were not deceiued, and that when he thought to conquer the kingdome of Naples, he loſt not the Duchie of Millan: for that by ſending his armie into Naples, it would be in the power of the Pope, who had ſixe thouſand Swiſſers (practiſing with the Captaines of the Emperour) to ouerthrow him; and the armie ouerthrowne, what defence would there remaine for the Duchie of Millan? And that it was not to be maruelled, if the Pope who had aſſayed to take that Duchie from him by force, deſpairing to be able otherwiſe to get it, ſhould ſeeke to depriue him of it by circumuentions. Theſe reaſons ſo wrought with the King, that being doubtfull whether he ſhould ratifie or no, and expecting haply the anſwer of ſome other practiſes, he ſent no diſpatch to Rome, leauing his Embaſſadours and the Pope in ſuſpence. But the Pope, either for that indeed he gouerned himſelfe with ỹ accuſtomed ſhews, had his mind eſtranged from the King, or for that ſeeing all the termes of anſwer paſt, he began to ſuſpect that which was true, and to feare leſt the King would diſcouer his practiſes to the Emperour, and by that meanes ſome alliance might be made betweene them to his preiudice; puſhed forward likewiſe

by

by a vehement deſire he had to recouer Parma and Plaiſance, and to do ſome memorable thing: and further, being diſpleaſed with the inſolence of Monſieur Lautrech and the Biſhop of Tarba his agent, who making no account of his commandements in the Eſtate of Millan, and not admitting ſome Eccleſiaſticall prouiſions, diſdained him with very proud and inſolent words, he determined to enter league againſt the French King with the Emperour, who being kindled for the warre of Nauarre, and puſhed on by many of the exiles of Millan, and induced by ſome of his Councel, who deſired to abaſe the greatneſſe of Monſieur de Cheures, who had always perſwaded him not to ſeparate himſelf frō the French King, he reſolued to ioyne in confederation with the Pope againſt the King: which he was thought to haſten the more, vnder a hope that by the Popes authoritie and his owne, he might eaſily diſſolue the alliance made with the Swiſſers, afore it were confirmed by gifts and gratifications. Moreouer, the Pope was the more confident, for that the Emperour, who had heard Martin Luther in the Diot of Wormes, whither he was come vnder ſafeconduct, and when he had cauſed him to be examined by many Diuines, who reported that his doctrine was erronious and dangerous for Chriſtendome, had baniſhed him to gratifie the Pope; which ſo aſtoniſhed Martin, that if the iniurious words and full of threats, which the Cardinall S. Xiſte, Legate Apoſtolike ſpake to him, had not brought him into vtter deſpaire, it was thought it would haue bene very eaſie to cauſe him to depart from his errors, giuing him ſome dignitie, or any honeſt meanes to liue. But howſoeuer it was, there was contracted betweene the Emperour and the Pope, without the knowledge of Monſieur de Cheures (who till that time had bene of great authoritie with him, and died almoſt at the ſame time) a confederation for their common defence, including alſo the family of the Medices and the State of Florence: and it was alſo added, that they ſhould raiſe warre againſt the ſtate of Millan, at ſuch time and in ſuch maner as ſhould be reſolued vpon betweene them; and that if it were conquered, then Parma and Plaiſance ſhould remaine to the Church, vnder the ſame rights wherewith it had holden them before: That Francis Sforce, who had bene chaſed from Millan, and remained at Trent, ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of that Eſtate, as hauing right thereunto by the inueſtiture of his father, and by the renunciation of his brother: and that the Confederates ſhould be bound to defend him: That the Duchie of Millan ſhould vſe no other Salts then thoſe of Cerua: That it ſhould not onely be lawfull for the Pope to proceed againſt his ſubiects and freeholders, but alſo that the Emperour ſhould be bound (after the conqueſt of the eſtate of Millan) to ioyne with him againſt them, and namely for the recouerie of Ferrara. The tribute of the Realme of Naples was increaſed; and there was alſo promiſed to the Cardinall de Medicis a penſion of ten thouſand duckats out of the Archbiſhopricke of Toledo, which was newly voide: and to Alexander de Medicis baſtard ſonne to Laurence, and lately Duke of Vrbin, was promiſed an Eſtate in the dominion of Naples of ten thouſand duckats of reuenue. For the declaration and clearing of theſe things, it ſeemeth to me neceſſary to ſet downe in briefe what were the rights at that time which Charles pretended to the Duchie of Millan, as he was Emperour. The Lawyers of the Empire alledged, that the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleans were of no conſideration, for as much as whatſoeuer had bene accorded touching the ſucceſſion of Madame Valentina, was not confirmed with the Imperiall authoritie; and that for the preſent, that Duchie appertained immediatly to the Empire, becauſe the inueſtiture made to Lodowike Sforce for him and his ſonnes, was reuoked by Maximilian grandfather to Charles, with ſo many and ample clauſes, that the reuocation had iudicially his effect, to the preiudice chiefly of his ſonnes, who neuer poſſeſſing it, their right was in hope, and not in effect. Therefore that the inueſtiture was auailable which was made to King Lewis for him and his daughter Clauda, in caſe ſhe were maried to Charles, and with condition that the mariage not going forward without that there were fault in Charles, it ſhould be nothing, and that the Duchie of Millan ſhould paſſe directly to Charles, who in that caſe was inueſted of it in the preſence of his father Philip: That it followed hereupon that the ſecond inueſtiture made to the ſame King Lewis, for him, for the ſame Ladie Clauda, and for Francis Lord of Angouleſme, was of no value, as being made to the preiudice of Charles, then but yong, and vnder the tutorſhip of Maximilian: ſo that the King then reigning could make no foundation of that: That he could alſo leſſe alledge that that Duchie appertained to him by new rights, for as much as he was ſo farre from obtaining the inueſtiture from the Emperour, that he had not ſo much as demanded it; and that it was manifeſt, that the ſurrender made to him

The titles of the Empire to the Duchie of Millan.

by Maximilian at ſuch time as he yeelded to him the Caſtle of Millan, could not helpe him: for as much as a Chiefe aliened of proper authoritie, reuerteth immediatly to the ſupreme Lord: and for that Maximilian Sforce, notwithſtanding he had bene admitted by the conſent of the Emperour, and died in that Eſtate, without hauing euer receiued the inueſtiture, could not tranſport to another the rights that appertained not vnto himſelfe.

Practiſes againſt the French king.

Thus as ſoone as the confederation was paſſed betweene the Pope and the Emperor againſt the French King (but very ſecretly,) they conſulted together (afore they entred publikly into armes) to proceed by wiles, and by the meanes of the exiles, to aſſaile at one time the Duchie of Millan and Genes with a ſudden inuaſion. It was therefore determined, that the Emperours galleys which were at Naples, and thoſe of the Popes, ſhould fall at vnawares into the port of Genes, being armed with two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, hauing with them Ierome Adorno, by whoſe authoritie and traine of followers, thoſe of the riuers which were of their faction drawing into commotion, they hoped that that Citie would eaſily fall into tumult. On the other ſide, Francis Sforce and Ierome Moron, who were with him at Trent, with many of the chiefe of the exiles, had conſulted that the French bands that were within Parma, Plaiſance and Cremona, ſhould be charged at vnawares; and that the like ſhould be done at Millan, and that Manfroy Paluoiſin and Matto de Brinzi a chiefe commander in thoſe mountaines, ſhould leade thither by the lake of Coma certaine Lanceknights, and aſſaile that Citie, where they aſſured themſelues to haue ſecret intelligence: and that if theſe things ſucceeded well, or at leaſt any of the moſt importance, then the exiles of Millan, who were many of them Gentlemen, conueying themſelues ſecretly into Reggia (where they ſhould meet Ierome Moron at the day appointed) ſhould riſe in commotion to enter into that State, leuying with all poſſible diligence a campe of three thouſand footmen: to which effect the Pope ſent to Francis Guicciardin, who had many yeares gouerned Modena and Reggia, ten thouſand duckats, with commiſſion to deliuer them to Moron to leuie footmen ſecretly, to be ready vpon the euent of theſe things, to whom Guicciardin ſhould ſhew fauour, but ſecretly, and in ſuch maner, that the French King might neither complaine of the actions of his Officers, nor make ill interpretation of the Pope. But not one of theſe deuices ſucceeded to any purpoſe. The armie by ſea that went to Genes, which was compounded of ſeuen galleys, foure Brigantines, and certaine ſhips, preſented themſelues in vaine afore the port, for that the Duke Fregoſa, knowing beforehand of their coming, had well manned and furniſhed the towne: inſomuch as finding no mutinies, they retired into the riuer of Leuant: and in Lombardie all that had bene negociated, and that Ierome Moron was to come to Reggia, being in the mouth of many of the exiles, Federike de Boſſolo hauing intelligence of it, went to Millan to giue knowledge thereof to Monſieur d'Eſcut, who ſupplied the place of his brother that a litle before was gone into France. By reaſon of which aduertiſement, he aſſembled the bands of men at armes that were lodged in diuers places, and after he had giuen order that Federike ſhould leade thither a thouſand footmen of his ſubiects, he went ſuddenly to Parma with foure hundred lances; and in the way he was from time to time made more certaine of thoſe things which Federike had reported to him, by reaſon the baniſhed men, not obſeruing the order that was giuen them to make their aſſemblies ſecret, were openly gone to Reggia, requiring men in all places, and giuing manifeſtly to vnderſtand, that they would immediatly attempt ſome new enterpriſe: in which maner of proceeding continued Ierome Moron that came after them, puſhed on perhaps with this reaſon, that by how much they ſhould diſcouer themſelues, by ſo much would it breed hatred and enmitie betweene the Pope and the French King. The vanitie of theſe ſubtill plots and enterpriſes appeared now manifeſtly to all men: and yet Monſieur d'Eſcut being arriued at Parma, determined in the morning following (a ſolemne day for the natiuitie of S. Iohn the Baptiſt) to preſent himſelfe afore the gates of Reggia, hoping to find an occaſion to take all or part of the exiles, either thinking that they hearing of his coming, would flie out of the towne, or elſe that there being no ſtrength of forreine ſouldiers, the Gouernour (being a perſonage eſtranged from the profeſſion of warre) would for feare deliuer them priſoners vnto him: or poſſibly hoping that the townesmen being in feare, he ſhould get ſome occaſion to enter. The Gouernour had ſome inkling of this matter, and albeit (the aſſailing of Genes being not yet come to his knowledge) he thought it not very likely, that Monſieur d'Eſcut giuing as it were a beginning to the warre without the Kings commandement, would enter in warlike manner vpon the lands of the Pope: yet looking into the ordinary furies and importunities of the French nation, to the end not to be altogether vnprouided, he ſent preſent direction to Guido Rangon lying vpon the confines of Modena, to come the ſame night to Reggia, and appointed that that part of the footmen leuied by Moron, which lodged neareſt that place, ſhould likewiſe march thither: That the people of the towne, in whom he knew was no great loue to the French, at the ſounding of the great bell, ſhould be at the guard of the gates, where euery one ſhould receiue his charge. The morning following, Monſieur d'Eſcut arriued with foure hundred lances, and Federike de Boſſolo who was ſome mile behind him, came after with a thouſand footmen. When Monſieur d'Eſcut was neare the towne, he ſent to the Gouernour a Captaine of his, called Monſieur Bonneual, to tell him that he would ſpeake with him: and it was agreed, that Monſieur d'Eſcut ſhould come to the poſterne that entreth vpon the Rauelin of the gate that looketh towards Parma, and that the Gouernour ſhould come to the ſame place, and that each ſhould aſſure the other vpon their faith. Thus Monſieur d'Eſcut being firſt come, and alighted from his horſe, he approched the gate, accompanied with many Gentlemen; and the Gouernour iſſuing out of the wicket, they began to parley together: the one complained, that contrary to the articles of confederation, there was receiued and ſupported in the townes of the Church, the baniſhed men, which were drawne into companies to trouble the eſtates of the King: and the other, that he was entred at vnawares with an armie vpon the lands of the Church. But as they were debating theſe complaints, certaine of the inhabitants (contrary to the order ſet downe) hauing opened one of the gates, to let in a cart loaden with meale; Monſieur de Bonneual who ſtood right againſt the gate (for the traine of Monſieur d'Eſcut which were diſperſed about the walls, enuironed a part of it) aduanced with certaine men at armes to enter the gate: but he was repulſed, and the gate ſhut with a great clamour, which piercing euen to the place where Monſieur d'Eſcut and the Gouernour conſulted together, was the cauſe that they of the towne and certaine of the exiles of whom the walls of the Rauelin was full, diſcharging their harquebuſes vpon ſuch as ſtood neare to Monſieur d'Eſcut, they hurt Alexander Triuulce, in ſuch ſort that he died of it within two dayes after, although he had not deſerued ſuch a ſtroke, for that he had diſſwaded the enterpriſe of Reggia. The reſidue fled, and no other thing preſerued Monſieur d'Eſcut, but the feare of him who aimed at him, leſt he ſhould hit the Gouernour. Monſieur d'Eſcut was aſtoniſhed much, and began to complaine of the breach of faith, and not knowing what courſe to take, whether to tarry or to flie, the Gouernour tooke him by the hand, and perſwading him to follow him vpon his faith, he led him into the Rauelin, being accompanied with none other of his traine, then Monſieur de la Motte, a Gentleman of France: and it was a wonderfull thing, that all the bands of men at arms when they heard that Monſieur d'Eſcut was entred within, for the opinion they had that he was taken priſoner, betooke themſelues to flight, with ſuch feare, that many of them caſt away their lances by the way; and a very few taried for Monſieur d'Eſcut, who after long reaſoning, being certified that the diſorder grew by his owne people, was immediatly diſmiſſed by the Gouernour, who would not retaine him, becauſe of the faith giuen, and for the commiſſions he had from the Pope to make no demonſtration againſt the King: of the retaining of whom, the rebellion of the Eſtate of Millan would not haue followed, as many beleeued. For although the men at armes had betaken themſelues to flying, yet being purſued by none, for that there were but very few horſemen within Reggia, and meeting vpon the limits and confines of the countrey of Reggia with Federike de Boſſolo, who haſted to march on with a thouſand footmen, they ſtayed and drew themſelues againe into order: and the feare that was begun at Parma and at Millan, by the firſt rumors that came that Monſieur d'Eſcut was holden priſoner, and the men at armes broken, had not continued, if it had bene knowne that the bands of men at armes had bene whole, chiefly ſeeing there was neare at hand neither armie nor forces to make any ſtirre, and that many other Captaines of men at armes were remaining there. As ſoone as Monſieur d'Eſcut had reaſſembled his companies of horſemen and footmen, he retired to Coriago, a village in the countrey of Reggia not ſixe miles from the Citie; and a few dayes after, he withdrew himſelfe beyond Lenzo into the confines of Parma, and ſent Monſieur la Motte to Rome, to tell the Pope what moued him to go to Reggia, and to ſolicite that according to the capitularions which were betweene the French King and him, he would chaſe out of the dominions of the Church ſuch as had rebelled againſt the King.

Now

Now about this time there happened at Millan a matter which brought to the French men no ſmall aſtoniſhment, as if the heauens would admoniſh them by maniteſt ſignes of their future calamities. For, vpon Saint Peters day, the Sunne being now ſet, and the firmament cleare, there fell from the aire as it were a fire afore the gate of the Caſtle, whither were brought many barrels of gunpowder, drawne out of the Caſtle to be ſent to certaine places of ſtrength; and the fire hauing taken the powder with an horrible noiſe, there was a very faire tower of marble builded ouer the gate, on the top whereof was the clocke, which was caſt downe euen to the foundation; and not onely the Tower, but the wals and chambers of the Caſtle, with other buildings adioyning to the Tower: and at the ſame time the whole Caſtle, together with all the Citie of Millan trembled for ſuch a ruine and ſo great a tempeſt, which blew into the aire from ſundry places huge and great ſtones, whereby many people were hurt, and ſome cruſhed together and buried vnder the ruines, wherewith the Caſtle greene was ſpred and couered in ſuch ſort, that all men were maruellouſly aſtoniſhed, but chiefly when they ſaw the ſtones of incredible greatneſſe which the furie of the tempeſt had caſt more then fiue hundred paces from the place. This accident happened in the very houre wherein the people of all ſorts were gone for their recreation to take the aire vpon the greene, ſo that there were ſlaine more then an hundred & fifty footmen of the caſtle; and the Captains of the Rock and of the Caſtle, together with others ſo amazed and deſperate both in courage and counſell, and ſo great a ſpace of the wall broken downe, that if the people would haue taken armes, they might eaſily haue taken the Caſtle that night. Lightning vpon the Caſtle of Millan.

But when the Pope was aduertiſed that Monſieur d'Eſcut was come euen to the gates of Reggia, taking occaſion thereby to iuſtifie his actions, he complained greatly thereof in the Conſiſtorie of Cardinals, and concealing the confederation made ſecretly afore with the Emperour, and alſo the direction that both their galleys ſhould be armed to aſſaile Genes, he declared, that ſince Monſieur d'Eſcut had attempted to take Reggia, it was to be ſuppoſed that the French King bare no good mind to the Sea Apoſtolike; and therefore that for the defence thereof he was conſtrained to ioyne with the Emperour, in whom had neuer bin diſcerned any thing vnworthy of a Chriſtian Prince, as well in all his other actions, as in that he had lately ſhewed himſelfe at wormes ſo zealous a protector of Religion. Making ſhew then preſently to contract with Don Iohn Emmanuel the Emperours Embaſſadour, the confederation which had bene concluded afore, Proſper Colonno, to whom it was determined to giue the charge of that buſineſſe, was preſently ſent for to Rome, to the end to conſult with him, both in what maner, and with what forces they ſhould enter into open warre, ſeeing that ambuſhes and ſudden aſſaults had not ſucceeded well, as indeed the deſigne of Coma had no better iſſue then the enterpriſe of Genes. For, as Manfroy Paluoiſin and Matto de Brinzi were by night drawne neare the walls of Coma with eight hundred footmen, as well Italians as Lanceknights, hoping that Anthonie Ruſqua a Citizen there, would breake downe ſo much of the wall next adioyning to the houſe where he dwelt, as they ſhould haue meanes to enter into the Citie; where, for that there were very few French men, they ſuppoſed to find no reſiſtance; and after they had expected a good ſpace of time, the Gouernour of the place, aſſembling together all the French men, with certaine of the townesmen, whom he held for the moſt faithfull (who were notwithſtanding fewer in number then they that were without) came and charged them againſt their expectation, and turned them ſo eaſily to flight, that many were of opinion, he had corrupted the Almaine Captaines both with money and promiſes. Vpon the lake three barkes were ſunke, and ſeuen taken, a many of the enemies made priſoners, and amongſt others Manfroy and Matto, who fled by the way of the mountains: and ſuffering the Lanceknights to go their way, the reſidue were led to Millan, where Manfroy & Matto were publikly quartered, who firſt confeſſed that Bartlemew Ferrier of Millan, a man of authoritie, was conſenting to the practiſes of Moron; by reaſon whereof he was impriſoned together with his ſonne, and afterwards condemned to the ſame puniſhment, for that he had not reuealed that Moron had induced him by ſecret meſſages, to practiſe innouations, and to raiſe enterpriſes againſt the King. At which time, the Pope knowing of what oportunitie the Eſtate of Mantua was for the warres of Lombardie, he tooke into his pay Federike Marquis of Mantua with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horſemen, and indued him with the title of Captaine generall of the Church: and before the Marquis entred into the Popes pay, he renounced the Order of Saint Michael, and The Marquis of Mantua for the Pope.

and returned the Coller and Enſigne that the King accuſtomed to giue to thoſe that were receiued into that Order.

The reſolution for the warre againſt the Frenchmen.

It was reſolued at Rome by the Pope and the Emperours Embaſſadour, touching the maner to proceed in this warre, according to the counſell of Proſper Colonno: That along the frontiers of the Church, inuaſion ſhould be made with all ſpeed poſſible vpon the eſtate of Millan, with the companies of men at armes of the Pope and the Florentines; the which (comprehending therein the bands of the Marquis of Mantua) amounted to the number of ſixe hundred men at armes, to them were to be adioyned all the bands of men at armes which the Emperour had in the Realme of Naples, almoſt equall in number to theſe: That there ſhould be leuied ſixe thouſand footmen Italians: That the regiment of two thouſand Spaniſh footmen which were with Adorno in the riuer of Genes, ſhould come to the armie, which was to aſſemble and ioyne together betweene the countreys of Modena and Reggia: That the Marquis of Peſquiero ſhould bring thither two thouſand other footbands from Naples: That there ſhould be leuied of the common purſe of the Pope and the Emperor, foure thouſand Lanceknights and two thouſand Griſons: That hereunto ſhould be alſo ioyned the two thouſand Swiſſers which remained voluntarily in the Popes pay: for the reſidue being diſcontent becauſe they remained ſo long without doing any thing, and for that the ſeaſon of haruelt approched, were now returned to their countrey afore Monſieur d'Eſcut came to Reggia, neither could the Pope retaine them any longer, notwithſtanding he had vnprofitably conſumed amongſt them an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats. Beſides theſe prouiſions, it was determined, that with the authoritie of the Pope and the Emperour, there ſhould be inſtance made to the Cantons of the Swiſſers, to aduance ſixe thouſand footmen, as they were bound by the contract which the Pope had made with them, and to refuſe to miniſter any ſuccours to the French King: to which end, the Pope alledged, that the confederation which he had made with them, was afore that which they had contracted with the French King: That if theſe demands were obtained, the Duchie of Millan ſhould be inuaded on that ſide towards Coma, in which quarter was hope that there would eaſily be made ſome inſurrection, by reaſon of the great multitude of baniſhed men, being of many honorable families, and for that the reuerence and affection which the people were wont to beare to the name of King Lewis, was conuerted into hatred, and that not litle; ſeeing the men at armes ordinary for the guard of that Eſtate, being ill payed, through the bad order the King vſed in his affaires (who partly by neceſſitie and partly by will, was ſurcharged with huge expences) liued at great libertie: the Gouernours who tooke the more boldneſſe by the negligence of the King, did not miniſter ſuch iuſtice as they had bene accuſtomed to do, and in the time of the late King, who bearing much affection to the Duchie of Millan, had alwayes a particular care to the intereſts of the people of that Duchie: and (which preſſed them much) they were conſtrained, according to the cuſtome of France, to lodge continually in their houſes the officers and ſouldiers of the French, which although it was not at their charges, yet the trouble being perpetuall, it was very intollerable and grieuous. And albeit it was a yoke which they bare during the time of the late King, who enforcing the example of Paris, would neuer exempt the ſubiects of Millan, yet for that ſuch a diſcommoditie brought with it the other euils that were ſpoken of, it ſeemed to them for the preſent much more grieuous: and hereunto was added the nature of the people, deſirous of new things, together with a vehement inclination which men haue to deliuer themſelues from preſent perplexities, not conſidering what will follow afterwards.

The rumour of this warre intended by the Pope and the Emperour with ſo mightie preparations coming to the eares of the French King, conſtrained him to looke to the defending of Millan with no leſſe mightie prouiſions: wherein the firſt deliberation was, that Monſieur Lautrech who was gone to the Court for certaine particular affaires, ſhould preſently returne to Millan. And albeit Monſieur Lautrech doubting the inconſtancie and negligence of the King and ſuch as gouerned, refuſed to go, vnleſſe they firſt deliuered him in preſt three hundred thouſand duckats, which he affirmed to be neceſſary for him for the defence of that Eſtate: neuertheleſſe being ouerruled by the importunities of the King and his mother, and beguiled with the promiſes and oathes as well of them, as of ſuch as had the charge of the treaſure, that he ſhould no ſooner arriue at Millan, then the money ſhould be there preſent, he returned thither with great diligence, putting order carefully for all things neceſſary for defence: for the which he ſet

downe this order with the King: That to the Kings men at armes which were then in Lombardie, ſhould be ioyned the ſixe hundred men at armes, and ſixe thouſand footmen which the Venetians were bound to contribute to the Kings ſeruice, whom they offered to aduance ſpeedily, making their men at armes to march by the countrey of Verona and Breſſia: That there ſhould be leuied ten thouſand Swiſſers, holding for certaine that they would not be denied, by vertue of the new confederation: That they ſhould cauſe to paſſe into Italy ſixe thouſand aduenturers; and to adioyne to the whole armie certaine bands of Italian footmen. With which forces he hoped without great danger to be able to aduenture y fortune of a battel, or not being ſtrong enough ſo to do, that at leaſt ſufficiently furniſhing his places with garriſons of men, and temporizing in defending of them, he ſhould bring to paſſe that the enemies would become wearie and diſcontented: of whom, the one by his naturall prodigalitie and huge expences diſburſed in the warre of Vrbin, was drained of money; and for the other he could not draw ſo great a quantitie from his kingdomes, as was thought could ſuffice to furniſh the expences of ſuch a warre for any long ſeaſon. Furthermore they thought that Alphonſo d'Eſte deſpairing of his owne eſtate if the victory fell to the Pope, would either riſe to recouer that which he had loſt, or at leaſt ſtanding vpon his guard, would ſo hold the Pope in ſuſpition, that he ſhould be conſtrained to leaue many bands of ſouldiers for the guard of the townes adioyning to his confines and limits. Theſe were the counſels and preparations of both parts, the King neuertheleſſe labouring by all meanes (but in vaine) to appeaſe the Pope. At this time Proſper Colonno was at Bolognia, from whence without tarrying for the regiments that were to come from the kingdome of Naples, or the Lanceknights, (after he had muſtered his other companies, and left ſufficient garriſons within Modena, Reggia, Bolognia, Rauenna and Imola, for feare of the Duke of Ferrara) he marched and incamped vpon the riuer of Lenſa within fiue miles of Parma, full of great hope that the French men could haue no Swiſſers, and that as well for that, as for the ill diſpoſition of the people, he ſuppoſed they would rather abandon then defend the Duchie of Millan; but it happened otherwiſe. For the Cantons, notwithſtanding the Cardinall of Sion, and the Embaſſadours of the Pope and the Emperour, made great inſtance to the contrary, determined to giue men to the King, as they were bound by the laſt conuentions: and whileſt they were in preparing, George Sopreſſan was deſcended to Millan with foure thouſand footmen Valeſians: by reaſon whereof Monſieur Lautrech deſirous to defend Parma, ſent thither Monſieur d'Eſcut his brother with foure hundred lances and fiue thouſand Italian footmen, ouer whom Federike de Boſſolo was Colonell. Moreouer, it was vnderſtood that the Venetians muſtered their men at Pontuiquo, to ſend them ſpeedily to the aide of the French King, and alſo that the Duke of Ferrara leuied footmen. Therefore Proſper knowing he ſtood in need of greater forces, kept himſelfe incamped ſeuen dayes in that place, during which time, there ioyned to the armie foure hundred Spaniſh lances led by Anthonie de Leua, which came out of the kingdome of Naples, together with the Marquis of Mantua with part of his regiments; and yet for his coming, being Captaine generall of all the ſouldiers of the Church, the authoritie of Proſper Colonno was nothing diminiſhed, in whoſe perſon, according to the will of the Pope and the Emperour, reſted the gouernment of the whole armie, but without any ſupreme title, for that Francis Guicciardin had abſolute power to command ouer the whole regiments of the Church, and namely ouer the Marquis of Mantua, vnder the title of Generall Commander ouer the armie; a place which he exerciſed with right great authoritie, and otherwiſe then the Commiſſaries had bene accuſtomed. After this, Proſper led the armie to S. Lazaro within a mile of Parma, by the way that goeth to Reggia; with purpoſe to paſſe no further till the Marquis of Peſquiero were arriued, who was expected to come from Naples with three hundred lances and two thouſand Spaniſh footmen; and vntill the Lanceknights were come. At that time there were no other violences done to the countrimen of Parma, then by deuiſing to turne the waters, and breaking downe their mils, to take from them all meanes of grinding. But euery one expected when the Lanceknights would come; and to hinder their paſſing, the Venetians at the inſtance of the French, ſent part of their regiments vpon the territories of Verona; for that being come to Inſpruch, they ſought to receiue at Trent their firſt moneths pay, and required that there might be ſent to meete them, a certaine number of horſemen, to the end that when they had deſcēded to Montbaldo, they might with more ſuretie paſſe on with their bands: whereupon Proſper Colonno had diſpatched to Mantua two hundred light horſemen, to the end that ioyning with two thouſand footmen commanded by the countrey of Mantua, they might aduance together with the artilleries of the Marquis, who (to be the more acceptable to the Pope and the Emperour) proceeded in all things as if it had bene his owne cauſe, and not as one that was in their pay. But it was much more difficult to ſatisfie the pays of the Lanceknights at Trent, for that the Pope payed not onely his owne part, but alſo the Emperours portion, and there could no money be paſſed ouer the lands of the Venetians but with great perill. Then the Lanceknights vnderſtanding in what ſort they ſhould be hindered by the Venetians, required greater forces, varying euen in the time and way of paſſing the mountaine, notwithſtanding that the Marquis of Peſquiero, who was arriued vpon the lands of Modena, and to whom there was ſent from the campe two hundred men at armes and three hundred Spaniſh footmen, turned vpon the territories of Mantua. At laſt the Lanceknights hauing no patience to attend the time they had ſet downe and ſignified, ſent a new aduertiſement that they would come fiue dayes ſooner, affirming that they would not expect the horſemen more then one day at the foote of Montbaldo, and that if they came not, they would returne backe againe. At which time foraſmuch as the Marquis of Peſquiero could not come thither, they were conſtrained to ſend from the campe in great diligence Guido Rangon and Lewis Gonzaga, which neuertheleſſe was to no purpoſe, for that (as Proſper had alwayes affirmed) the Venetians were not able to ſtop the paſſage to ſixe thouſand footmen, being as well Lanceknights as Griſons, who had encountred their horſemen; and for the Italian footmen, they had no courage to oppoſe againſt them. For which reaſon, and for that the Senate (who abhorred that the warre ſhould be managed vpon their owne Eſtate) ſought to ſatisfie the French men more with demonſtrations then with effects, they cauſed to retire towards Verona all their bands and regiments the day before the Lanceknights ſhould paſſe; ſo that the Lanceknights went to Valegge without any impediment, and the day after they drew vpon the confines of Mantua: and as ſoone as the Marquis of Peſquiero was come to the campe, the armie that had remained three dayes at S. Lazaro, marched the day following to S. Martin, where the Lanceknights and Griſons ioyned with them the ſame day.

The Captaines of the League take counſell together.

Thus all the forces appointed being come together, the Captaines began to conſult what was to be done: Some gaue counſell to beſiege Parma, for that it was the firſt and chiefe towne of the frontier, and that it was not ſafe for the armie that was to come on to leaue it behind, in regard of the incommodities of victuals, and conduct of money, and other prouiſions that might be neceſſarie; nor profitable for the townes that ſhould remaine betweene Parma and Bolognia. They alledged, that the footmen that were within Parma were of no great worth, becauſe the moſt part of them were leuied in haſte, and that among ſuch there were alwaies ſome that would flie from the campe, as well for the difficultie of their payes, as for want of foode: that the circuite of the towne was great, and the people ill diſpoſed, who, though they were abated in courage, would yet take heart when they ſaw the armie neare the wals; ſo that battering the Citie in many places, it would be hard for the French men at one time both to reſiſt the enemie without, and to keepe guard vpon the people that were within. Others affirmed that the Citie was well fortified, that it had a ſufficient garriſon, and touching the footmen that were fled from them, they were cowardly and vnprofitable people, but that thoſe that were reſolute and experienced in warre remained ſtill, together with many bands of the French men at armes, all well reſolued to defend themſelues valiantly: and that otherwiſe Monſieur d'Eſcut, Federike de Boſſolo, and ſo many other Captaines, would not haue ſhut vp themſelues therein: That it was well knowne (the maner of warfaring and to keepe and defend a place being of late time changed) how difficult the taking of townes was become: and that it was diligently to be conſidered, in what degree of reputation the armie ſhould ſtand, if they did not accompliſh the firſt enterpriſe: That all men held it neceſſarie to plant before Parma their artilleries in two ſeuerall places, but where were the artilleries and other prouiſions neceſſary in the field? That they could not be brought thither without the loſſe of certaine dayes, which would be an intermiſſion (beſides too much time already loſt) during the which the Venetian companies and the moſt part of the Swiſſers would ioyne themſelues with Monſieur Lautrech, who was dayly expected at Cremona: That part of the regiment of Swiſſers was already arriued, and the aduenturers of the French armie came on apace. And what may be expected of the armie being intangled with the ſiege of Parma, if Monſieur Lautrech ſhould come and plant his campe in ſome

place adioyning? from whence, vnleſſe we could force him to fight, he might vexe the conuoyes of the forragers, and giue impediments to the victuals which dayly were brought from Reggia, as already thoſe within Parma continually did: That it were a better counſell, to make prouiſion of victuals for certaine dayes, to leaue Parma behind, and to proceed to ſurpriſe Plaiſance, in which Citie, being of a farre greater circuite, were but a few ſouldiers in garriſon, the place voide of fortifications and artilleries, and the people of the ſame diſpoſition with them of Parma, but more able to reuenge, and themſelues not being ſo much afflicted, and hauing ſo few ſouldiers within: That for theſe reaſons it was not to be doubted, that making their approches, they ſhould preſently take it. Furthermore, Proſper Colonno being of the ſame aduice, ſaid he knew a place, by the which it was impoſſible to hinder their entrance, which was the ſame by the which Francis Sforce (at that time Captaine ouer the peoples of Millan) made his victorious entrie againſt the Venetians, who had occupied it after the death of Philip Maria Viſconte: That Plaiſance was a Citie very plentifull of victuals, and was a place ſo fit to aſſaile Millan, that the French men would be conſtrained to retire thither the moſt of their forces, by which meanes the Cities adioyning to Parma ſhould ſtand in no danger. Laſtly, Proſper held himſelfe aſſured, that paſſing the riuer of Po onely with light horſemen, and ſo marching with diligence to Millan, that Citie would draw into tumult, hearing of the rumor of his name: and ſuch was his opinion afore he parted from Bologna, by reaſon whereof, not thinking it needfull to ſtay about the taking of any particular place, he would not haue a plentifull prouiſion of artilleries nor munitions. In this varietie of opinions, it was very ſecretly reſolued by ſuch as had authoritie to determine, that as ſoone as ſufficient prouiſion might be made of meale and bread to nouriſh the armie for foure dayes, a regiment of fiue hundred men at armes, part of the light horſemen, the regiments of Spaniſh footmen, and fifteene hundred Italian footmen, ſhould march with great ſpeed towards Plaiſance, and that the reſidue of the armie ſhould come after, the which could come on but with a ſlow pace, by reaſon of the artilleries, victuals, and many other impediments: and it was aſſuredly beleeued, that vpon the arriuall of the firſt companies, either the Citie would declare it ſelfe for the Church, or if that happened not, they would be a reaſonable let for the entring of ſuccours, ſo that the reſidue of the armie arriuing, they made no doubt to carry it. But it happened that the day before the armie ſhould remoue, certaine troupes of French horſemen hauing paſſed the riuer of Po, ranne vp euen as farre as Buſſetto, which cauſed a bruite to runne, that the whole French armie was come ouer Po; and therefore that accident breaking the deliberation that had bene made, the departing of the bands was deferred vntill the truth were knowne; for the diſcouery whereof they diſpatched Iohn de Medicis Captaine of the Popes light horſemen with a troupe of foure hundred horſe. But that which moſt troubled this deliberation, was the ambition and controuerſie that fell betweene Proſper and the Marquis of Peſquiero, betweene whom was no great agreement before. Proſper contended to leade the vantguard, and the Marquis on the other ſide alledged that it was not reaſonable that the regiments of Spaniſh footmen ouer whom he was Colonell, ſhould go to any expedition without him. For which iealouſie of the Captaines, dangerous (moſt commonly) for the affaires of Princes, notwithſtanding it was knowne within few houres after, that thoſe bands of French men were returned beyond Po, and that Monſieur Lautrech ſtirred not, yet the firſt reſolution was not followed: but what by the diuerſitie of opinions, and for the naturall ſlowneſſe of Proſper, things had proceeded with greater delayes, if the Popes Agent had not ſtirred them vp, declaring with words full of efficacie, how much the Pope might take offence (and that iuſtly) that they proceeded ſo ſlowly; and that they could not in any ſort excuſe themſelues towards him of the delayes and reſpites they had vſed till then, firſt in expecting the Spaniards, and then the Lanceknights: which words being ſcarcely vttered, they reſolued (but more in maner of tumult, then by maturitie of counſell) to plant the campe before Parma, wherein euen ſuch as the day before had aſſured the contrary, affirmed that they might haue hope of the victory, chiefly for that many footmen ceaſſed not to iſſue out of Parma for want of money and food. But it was neceſſary to ſtay yet certaine dayes, both to tary for two other Cannons that were expected from Bologna, and to make prouiſion of many things neceſſary for the aſſailing of townes with artillery; matters which Proſper had before refuſed: the which, either by negligence, or mutation of counſell, brought no litle preiudice to the enterpriſe, for that Monſieur Lautrech wonne ſo much the more time to aſſemble his companies which he expected out of France, from the Venetians, and from the Swiſſers: ſo much doth it import wiſe Captaines (remembring how neceſſary it is in warres oftentimes to change counſels according to the varietie of accidents) to accommodate from the beginning as much as they can, prouiſions againſt all accidents, and counſels. In this meane while, the armie remaining idle, there was executed nothing touching the ſeruice of Parma, but certaine very light skirmiſhes: neuertheleſſe the third day after the campe was reduced to S. Martin, the armie paſſing beyond the riuer of Parma in the night, incamped vpon the way of Rome, in the ſuburbes of the gate that leadeth to Plaiſance, called S. Croſſe: which ſuburbes Monſieur d'Eſcut had burned the day before, doubting their coming.

The towne of Parma is deuided by a riuer that beareth the name thereof, the water whereof is not ſo deepe, but it may be paſſed by foord, ſauing in very rainie ſeaſons: and the leſſer part of the towne, inhabited by people of baſe condition, which is about the third part of the whole, called by the inhabitants Codipont, is ſituated on that ſide towards Plaiſance. The Captaines made choſe of this place, the more eaſily to ſtop the entrie of ſuccours into Parma, but much more for that on that ſide the wall was weake, and of ſuch ſituation that it could not beate in flanke. The Marquis, who the day before went with certaine other Captaines to take view of the place, made his report that the battery might be begun the ſame day: but becauſe it was neceſſary (the better to remoue their defences) firſt to batter a tower vpon the top of the gate, where the wall was ſtrong and well cemented, all the day was waſted in that action, and a great Culuerin broken in the execution. The night following, the artillery was planted againſt the wall vpon the left hand of the gate to ſuch as entred, their purpoſe being to do the like on the right hand, and to leaue the gate in the midſt; for that hauing no conueniencie to beſtow the artilleries in two places ſeparate, there being brought to the campe no more then ſixe Cannons and two great Culuerins, it ſeemed that by conſtraining the defendants to extend themſelues for defence in a long ſpace, it would worke all one effect: but that deuice was not put in execution, for that there was on that ſide vpō the compaſſe of the trench that enuironeth the wals, a riſing or mount, ſo high, that vnleſſe it were either made plaine or layd open (which could not be done in ſo ſhort time) it would giue great impediment to the artillery to batter the wall. The wall being old and weake, made no great reſiſtance to the artilleries, which hauing now made two ſufficient breaches, the Captaines ſpake of giuing the aſſault the ſame day, notwithſtanding without any firme reſolution. But the Marquis, who with his Spaniſh footmen had the whole charge of the battery, hauing ſent certaine footmen to the breach, to diſcouer if they could, what fortifications they had within, as they were vpon the wall, began to make ſhouts and ſignes to the army to approch and enter, in ſo much that the footbands of the Spaniards and Italians ranne to the wall by heapes, and without any order. But being approched, and beginning to climbe the breach, vpon the which was ſlaine Ierome Guicciardin Leader of the footmen, the Captaines who at the bruite ranne thither, conſidering that of ſuch an aſſault, or rather a feeble and diſordered tūmult, could come no profite, cauſed them immediatly to retire: and this accident either qualified the deſigne, or at leaſt ſo ſerued for excuſe, that that day they forbare to follow the aſſault in order of warre. The day after they continued to batter the wall which ſtood whole in the midſt of the two breaches, and alſo a flanke, which had bene made within vpon the tower of the gate: but a bruite running through the armie, that by reaſon of the great rampiers which the French men had made, it would be hard to carry it with a ſimple aſſault, the Captaines ſent out to diſcouer the battery two footmen of each language, who, either for feare, or by their litle diligence, or perhaps being ſuborned (as ſome ſuppoſed) by others, brought word that there remained of the wall which had bene battered to the ground, more then fiue fadomes in height, and that thoſe within had caſt a very deepe ditch, and ſuch other fortifications, that it was determined to make mines neare to the wall that was battered, and to open the wall faſt by, and ſo with the ruines of the ſame, to fill the ditch that was reported to be made within, thereby to make the entrie more eaſie; and that when theſe things were brought to perfection, and that there were added to the artilleries of the armie two Cannons that came from Mantua, there ſhould be made another battery, in that place where the wall by turning makes an angle after it hath gone forthright a long ſpace, on the right ſide of the gate, on which ſide, the wall being caſt downe, they might beate the defendants in flanke. So they began then to caſt a trench on that ſide which had bene battered, and within a few dayes after,

after another, the better to caſt downe the wall with the working of the mines: but thoſe works proceeded ſlowly, as well for that all the prouiſions neceſſary for ſuch actions were not yet in the campe, becauſe Proſper had diuers thoughts, as for that the earth where they digged was hard and difficult to open. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, with intention not to aſſault the towne vntill they were finiſhed, Monſieur Lautrech (who had bene ſlow to march, for the long tarying of ſuch as came to the armie) perceiuing that the moſt part of his men of warre were come, aduanced and marched fiue miles, holding alwayes along the riuer, hauing with him fiue hundred Lances, about ſeuen thouſand Swiſſers, foure thouſand footmen brought the ſame day by Monſieur de S. Valier out of France, and foure hundred men at armes with foure thouſand footmen vnder Theodore Triuulce Commander of the Venetian bands and Andrew Gritti their Commiſſary. There followed this armie the Duke of Vrbin, and Marke Anthonie Colonno, the one as ſouldier to the French King, but without title and charge; and the other following the common hope of ſuch as were baniſhed. He expected alſo ſixe thouſand Swiſſers which the Cantons had made him grant of, who were already vpon the way, but according to their cuſtome, they marched ſlowly and with many difficulties; who being ioyned to his armie, he would not haue refuſed for the reſcue of Parma to aduenture the fortune of battell: and for this cauſe ſoliciting them and expecting, he ſtayed on the way, and went not farre from the ſhores of the riuer of Po. But fearing leſt in the meane while his brother might compound with the enemies, he ſent him word, that the cauſe why he ſtayed ſo long, was, that he tarried for a greater force of Swiſſers, who were neare at hand, and without whom thoſe that were already with him made difficultie to paſſe Po: yet that he would draw neare to Parma, and giue him a ſigne thereof by ſhooting off certaine peeces of artilleries; and that the day following he would accoaſt the enemies more neare, and prouoke them to fight, ſending out certaine troupes of his horſemen to skirmiſh with them, to the end he alſo might with better oportunitie iſſue out and ioyne with them; a matter which Monſieur d'Eſcut did chiefly ſolicite, affirming that he was not able to hold out aboue two or three dayes in that part of the towne, and not aboue two dayes more beyond the riuer, for that the towne was large and weake, and his forces remaining not aboue two thouſand footmen, for that many of them were ſtraggled away, and the men at armes, whereof there were no more but three hundred, vpon whom lay the burden of the ſeruice, were not able to make reſiſtance if the towne were aſſaulted in many places. Afterwards he came the ſame day he had promiſed to accoaſt the enemies, to the borough of Zibello, which is about twentie miles from Parma, and from thence he ſent foure hundred horſemen, to runne vp euen to the tents of the enemies, who hauing brought their mines euen to the wall, and afterwards turning and redoubling them in the place where the fire ſhould be put, Count Guido Rangon with the Italian footbands ouer whom he was Captaine generall, began to plant the artilleries on the other ſide of the wall: but the French men hearing the noiſe that was made in managing them, hauing abandoned the Codipont with their artilleries two houres before, retired in order and without noiſe to the other ſide the riuer: which being knowne to thoſe without, they entred the Codipont the ſame morning at the breake of day, ſome by the breach, and ſome by ſcaling ladders, and were receiued with great ioy by the Parmeſans, who were very deſirous to returne vnder the dominion of the Church: but their ioy was ſoone turned into heauineſſe, for that their houſes were ſacked and ſpoiled, no otherwiſe then as if they had bene enemies: and it was not to be doubted, that if certaine dayes before the artilleries had bene planted in the ſame place, but the French men had in the ſame maner abandoned the Codipont. After this they fell to breaking open the gates, which afore had bene rammed vp, and ſo the artillerie hauing paſſage euen to the ſhore of the riuer, they began to batter the wall that defendeth the other banke of the riuer: but it was now ſo late, that it was well knowne they could do no great matter for that day. The ſame day Monſieur Lautrech came and incamped vpon the riuer of Taro within ſeuen miles of Parma: and ſome ſuppoſed his coming ſo neare was to bid battell to the enemie, but others perſwaded themſelues that it was to the end that either he might be readie to receiue his brother and his companies if they iſſued out of Parma by night, being no longer able to hold out, or elſe (in caſe of compoſition) that he might come out of Parma in ſafetie with all his ſouldiers, and without any obligation, according to that which not many dayes after Federike de Boſſolo (who, as he walked about the rampiers, was hurt in the ſhoulder by the ſhot of an harquebuze) had begun to debate by meanes of the Marquis:

quis: but the parley was not ſo forward, as that there could be made any certaine coniecture of the will of Monſieur d'Eſcut. The truth was (according to the knowledge that was had afterwards) that Monſieur Lautrech was not determined to fight vnleſſe the Swiſſers came to him: for as much as notwithſtanding he was ſomewhat ſuperiour in numbers and valour of men at armes, and more mightie in artilleries, yet the armie of the enemie was ſtronger then he in footmen, wherein (reckoning the iuſt number) were found nine thouſand Lanceknights and Spaniards, two thouſand Swiſſers, and more then foure thouſand Italians.

But let all men conſider vpon how ſmall accidents in warre depend the things of greateſt conſequence. For it happened in the nicke, that the night after the day that the armie entred the Codſpont, aduertiſement came from Modena and Bologna that Alphonſo d'Eſte iſſuing out of Ferrara with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen, amongſt whom were a thouſand as well Corſicans as Italians which Lautrech had ſent him, and with twelue peeces of artillerie, had ſurpriſed the boroughs of Finalo and S. Felix, and that it was feared leſt he would paſſe further: which troubled much the minds of the Captaines, notwithſtanding they had feare of ſuch a leuie long before, being not ignorant what inſtance the French men had made to him to that end: and yet they had not made at Modena ſuch prouiſion as might ſuffice for the ſuretie of that Citie; for that Proſper maintaining to the vttermoſt the contrary opinion, would neuer conſent that ſouldiers ſhould be drawne out of the armie to be ſent to Modena; either becauſe he repoſed much in the promiſes of the Duke, who was his deare friend, and with whom, euen by the Popes direction, he was interpoſed to ſolicite ſome accord; or for that he had no will to diminiſh the number of his men of warre, in a time when it was feared the enemie would approch, chiefly being of this nature, that he would do things ſurely, and deſired alwayes to haue in his armie more then was needfull; or for ſome other ſecret ends and conſiderations for which ſuch a matter was not diſpleaſing to him. But when newes came to them in the night, the Captaines preſently aſſembling together, determined that Count Guido Rangon ſhould preſently depart for Modena with two hundred light horſmen and eight hundred footmen, which being ioyned to the ſeuen hundred footmen that were left there before, they thought would be a garriſon more then ſufficient againſt the forces of Alphonſo. Now when they had taken order for this buſineſſe, there remained yet certaine houres afore it was day: and for as much as they had heard a litle before the aduertiſemẽt came, that Monſieur Lautrech was incamped the euening before vpon Taro, which aduertiſement was partly true and partly falſe (for it was reported that the Swiſſers were ioyned with him, and alſo it was not knowne that thoſe which were then in the armie, notwithſtanding his infinite requeſts, had promiſed him to come no further then Taro,) the Captaines, though they were not aſſembled for that matter, ſeeing (for that it was not yet day) that they had no occaſion or neceſſitie to employ themſelues ſeuerally in other affaires, began to reaſon among themſelues rather in forme of paſtime, then by way of counſell, into what eſtate things would be reduced now that Monſieur Lautrech did approch: and in this conference it ſeemed that the words of Proſper, the Marquis of Peſquiero, and Vitelli, tended to this end: That it would be hard to take Parma, if they planted not a batterie alſo on the other ſide the Citie; for that though the wall beyond the water ſhould be beaten downe, which they had begun to batter the day before, yet there would be a wonderfull difficultie to climbe vp from the bottome of the riuer to the banke, and that ſuch a matter could not be aſſayed without great danger, for that the artilleries and ſmall ſhot beſtowed vpon the three bridges ſtanding vpon the ſame riuer, and in the houſes there adioyning, would beate in flanke ſuch as offered to climbe the banke: They reaſoned, that the neareneſſe of Monſieur Lautrech, if he ſhould incampe in ſome place not far off towards Po, though he would not tempt Fortune, might be the cauſe that the aſſault could not be giuen without great danger: and that it was to be conſidered, that by reaſon of the pillage and ſacke which had bene lately made of part of Parma, there were many footmen gone away with their bootie, and the reſidue were more carefull to ſaue the things they had gotten then diſpoſed to fight: and that there was no ſoiourning there without many difficulties, diſcommodities and dangers, for as much as it would be neceſſary to ſend out euery day very great conuoyes, not onely to defend the forragers, but alſo for the ſuretie of victuals and money which came dayly, making a long circuite about the walls of Parma: and whileſt ſuch troupes ſhould be in the fields, it might come to paſſe that the reſidue of the campe ſhould haue occaſion at one and the ſame time to fight with the French men that were without, and with thoſe alſo that were within. They diſcourſed alſo, that if the Duke of Ferrara ſhould reenforce himſelfe with moe bands of ſouldiers, they ſhould be driuen of neceſſitie to leuie from the campe farre greater forces for the ſuretie of Modena and Reggio: and that in ouerrunning the countrey with ſuch bands as he had, he might ſo hinder the reſort of victuals, that they ſhould be driuen to raiſe the campe; which haply could not be done without danger, matters being brought to ſuch a ſtrait. Theſe reaſons albeit they expreſſed an inclination to leuie the ſiege, yet were they ſo vttered, that it could not be diſcerned that they had any ſuch counſell and intention. At laſt, after they had ſpoken in this ſort a good ſpace of time, the Marquis of Peſquiero ſeeming to haue already comprehended the intention of the reſidue, ſaid vnto them: I perceiue wel enough that there is amongſt vs all one opinion, but euery one ſeuerally reſpecting his particular, is content to vſe ſilence, expecting that another ſhould make himſelfe the author, but for my part, I will haue no ſuch reſpect: It ſeemeth vnto me, that we remaine about the confines of Parma with danger, and without hope to do any good; and therefore to auoide a greater euill we ought to depart. Proſper added: The Marquis hath ſaid that which I purpoſed to ſpeake, if he had not preuented me. Vitelli confirmed the opinion of them both. But Anthonie de Leua, liking well that they ſhould ſtay no longer there, propounded, that it was to be conſidered, whether it were not better to go and aſſaile Monſieur Lautrech? But hereunto it was anſwered, that it would be very hard to conſtraine the enemie to fight; and to remaine there, would be a matter impoſſible, for that the difficulties that fell into conſideration if they remained about Parma would become farre greater, and alſo it might eaſily come to paſſe, that the regiment of two thouſand Swiſſers would not follow them, both for that many dayes before they had receiued commandement from the Cantons to depart out of the Popes pay, and alſo it was not likely that they would diſpoſe themſelues to fight againſt an armie wherein were ſo many footmen of the ſame nation; and that it could not be denied, but that by reaſon of the pillage made the day before, it would be very hard to moue the footmen that were diſordered. Therefore this counſell being reiected, it ſeemed that the opinion of all the Captaines drew to this, that it were beſt to breake vp the Campe from before Parma: but Proſper Colonno and the Marquis of Peſquiero, withdrawing themſelues apart from the reſidue, after long conference together, demanded of the Popes Legate, what he thought the Pope would ſay if they leuied the Campe; and the Legate anſwering the Marquis, What? ſhall we not take Parma to day, according as you aſſured vs yeſternight? the Marquis replied in his Spaniſh language, Neither to day, nor to morrow, nor after to morrow. Then the Legate replied, that it could not be doubted, but the Pope would be much diſcontented with the matter, for that it would wholly depriue him of the hope of the victorie: but the point of that deliberation conſiſted in the truth or error of the preſuppoſitions by them ſet downe; for that if to ſurceaſſe were a matter dangerous and without hope, it could not be doubted that to remaine there were great indiſcretion; but if it were otherwiſe, it would be a great diſorder to depart: and therefore he willed them to conſider well, both the eſtate of the armie, and the importance of things, weighing whether was the greater, either the danger or the hope. To which words Proſper and the Marquis replying, that all reaſons of warre aduiſed them to retire, the Legate not hauing the courage to oppoſe himſelfe againſt Captaines of ſo great authoritie, it was reſolued that the Campe ſhould breake vp the ſame day, and that preſent order ſhould be giuen to retire the artilleries from the walls; which being publiſhed through the Campe, it was blamed as too timorous by all thoſe that were not preſent at the counſell: in ſo much as the Legate and Moron ioyning together, laboured to draw Proſper from this deliberation: who making not ſtrange to conſult againe, but telling them (with words ſo much the more laudable, by how much was great or wiſe the perſonage that ſpake them) that he was of ſuch a nature that he thought it no ſhame to change counſell when better reaſons were ſhewed him, he cauſed all ſuch to be called together againe as were at the firſt reſolution: but the Marquis of Peſquiero, who was buſie about the retiring of the artillerie, and would not heare ſpeake of changing the firſt concluſion, refuſed to come; in ſo much as the matter remaining rather confuſed then reſolued, they proceeded to execute the firſt determination. Thus the ſame day, which was the twelfth from the day of their incamping, they returned to S. Lazaro; and at the departing there wanted not much of a very great diſorder, for that the Lanceknights demanding ſuch diſhoneſt conditions touching their payes, as could not be agreed vnto, refuſed to follow the armie; and forſaking the old Captaines that contradicted them, they created for Captaine one among themſelues who was ſ author of that ſedition; and it was feared leſt they would compound with the French men: neuertheleſſe in the end the armie being already gone, and all men deſpairing that they would alter their mind, they followed the armie. In which confuſion the armie being full of feare for ſo ſodaine a breaking vp, and for the tumult of the Lanceknights, if Monſieur Lautrech had come vpon them, without all doubt he had eaſily put them to flight. This deliberation grieued the Pope maruellouſly, who expected from day to day that newes ſhould be brought him that his ſouldiers were within Parma: and he ſuppoſed, that againſt all reaſon he was depriued of his hope of the victorie, finding himſelfe plunged into a moſt deepe ſea, and ſubiect to a heauie and intollerable charge, for that beſides the men at armes and the Spaniſh footmen, he ſupported all the charge of the warre: and which is yet worſe, he was doubtfull of the faith of the Captaines Imperials, as alſo were many others, who perſwaded themſelues, that the retiring of the Campe from before Parma, proceeded not of feare, but of art and cunning, as though they had ſuſpected that after the Pope had recouered Parma and Plaiſance (nothing elſe appertaining to him in the Eſtate of Millan) he would waxe wearie of the warre and the thoughts thereof, forbearing any longer to ſuſtaine ſo great a charge and trauel for the intereſts of another: and this was made apparent by the long tract and delay that was vſed in planting the campe afore Parma, and that they had beſtowed it in a place ſo inconuenient, ſeeing the leſſer part of the towne being taken, they were to deuiſe to take the other part with the ſame difficulties: and then they proceeded ſlowly in the ſiege, and alwayes deferring, as though they meant expreſly to giue time to the ſuccours of the French: and at laſt being in poſſeſſion of one part of the towne, they cowardly left it abandoned at the onely bruite that Monſieur Lautrech approched, who notwithſtanding was not the ſtronger. There were ſome others who ſuppoſed that it might proceede (without the priuitie of Proſper) of the cunning of the Marquis of Peſquiero, who detracted as much as he could, and was enuious at the glorie of Proſper. Neuertheleſſe it may be, that thoſe were of the ſoundeſt opinion, who beleeued that all was done with ſincerite, and that they were not moued with any other thing then a feare for the approching of Monſieur Lautrech, wherein they were greatly beguiled by the firſt aduertiſements, whereby they were giuen to vnderſtand that his forces were farre greater. But it is certaine that the French Captaines maruelled more then all the reſidue, being reduced into a very ſmall hope to be able to defend Parma, for that the Swiſſers, being gouerned more by their owne nature, then according to the neceſſities of thoſe that payed them, were very long in coming: which was the cauſe that many among them, not attributing to feare ſo ſodaine a diſcamping, iudged rather that Proſper, as a wiſe and very circumſpect Captaine, knowing what diſorder the ſacking of Cities brings vpon armies, and conſidering how hard it would be to reſtraine the ſouldiers from ſpoiling of Parma, eſteemed it a matter very dangerous to take it, the enemies being ſo neare. Whatſoeuer the cauſe was, Monſieur Lautrech after he had refurniſhed Parma with new bands, incamped at Fontanella, and three dayes after ſent part of the armie to take Roccabianqua, a borough of the territories of Parma neare to Po, which after it had bene battered with artilleries, the borough and the Caſtle were rendred by Rowland Paluiſin Lord of the place, himſelfe hauing libertie to depart. After this the armie pitched their tents betweene S. Secondo and Taro, to gouerne it ſelfe according to the proceedings of the enemies: and ſtood well reſolued, as well for the defence of Parma, as for that the new regiments of Swiſſers which were expected, were now arriued at Cremona; the coming of whom (although Monſieur Lautrech had commanded them to ſtay at Cremona) was the cauſe that the army of the enemies ſuppoſing themſelues not to be in ſafetie at S. Lazaro, retired to the riuer of Lenſa, on that ſide towards Reggia, with intention to draw yet further off, if the French men aduanced: yea the Captaines without further tarrying, had made a greater retrait if they had not bene retained by the complaints of the Pope and the Agents of the Emperour, together with the blame which they ſaw layed vpon them by the whole armie. The armies maintained themſelues in this ſort for many dayes, Monſieur Lautrech notwithſtanding making diuers incurſions with his horſemen and the ſouldiers of Parma, euen vp to Reggia by the way of the mountaine: wherein he gaue great impediment to the victuals which were brought to the enemies from Reggia, and that to the great diſcommendation of Proſper, who would hardly ſuffer his light horſmen to do ſeruice, and prouided ſlowly for the ſafetie euen of ſuch things as he might eaſily

haue remedied. The affaires of the Emperour ranne the ſame fortune beyond the Mounts, for that being entred into the dominions of the French king on the coaſt of Flanders, with a mightie armie, and hauing beſieged Meſieres with great hope to carrie it, he found it could not eaſily be taken; and a ſtrong ſuccour of the French King coming to reſcue it, he retired, with great perill leſt his armie ſhould be ouerthrowne.

The Popes captaines and the Emperors take counſel to paſſe further.

But in Italy the thoughts of war were nothing diminiſhed for the ill ſucceſſes: becauſe the enemies to the French, not thinking any more to take Parma or any other towne, determined to enter further into the Duchie of Millan, adding to the armie ſo many bands of Italians, that in all they contained ſixe thouſand, which were leuied continually: and they were the more emboldened to take this reſolution, by a hope they had that there would of new deſcend to the pay of the Pope twelue thouſand Swiſſers: who albeit they had bene refuſed by the Cardinall of Sion, who ſolicited openly in their Diot againſt the French, and by Ennius Biſhop of Verula the Popes Legate, and the Emperours Embaſſadours, for that the Cantons would not deliuer them but for the defence of the dominions of the Church, and with expreſſe direction not to march to offend the Eſtates of the French King: yet for that they could not otherwiſe haue them, at laſt they accepted them vnder the ſame condition, hoping that when they were once deſcended into the regions of Italy, they might be induced to follow the armie againſt the Duchie of Millan, by meanes of their auarice and inconſtancie, or by the ſleights and corruptions that might be vſed with their Captaines. And in this deliberation to paſſe further, there was no great doubt made into what quarter they ſhould draw: for that, to continue the warre on this ſide the riuer of Po, they ſaw manifeſtly it could not be without right great difficulties, ſeeing there was no hope to take Parma: and if they ſhould leaue that Citie behind, they muſt go fight with the enemies; which would be an action euidently dangerous, for that they were lodged in a place of aduantage and well fortified with artilleries: to remaine betweene Parma and them, or to paſſe further without fighting, that could not be, for that being betweene the townes that were poſſeſſed by them, and the armie, they ſhould within a few dayes fall into want of victuals, by reaſon they could get none out of the countrey of the enemie, nor cauſe them to be brought further off: all which difficulties would be auoided in transferring the warre beyond Po, for that in that countrey, naturally abounding in all things, and which had not taſted of the harmes of the warre, they aſſured themſelues to find victuals ſufficient, and to meete with no impediment, euen to the riuer of Adda; for as much as leauing Cremona on the left hand, and drawing neare to the riuer of Oglio, there were no places to make reſiſtance, and they were perſwaded that the Senate of Venice would not (for the intereſts of others) expoſe their ſouldiers to the fortune of a battell. They beleeued alſo, that the French had not the courage to oppoſe againſt them, vnleſſe it were at the paſſage of the riuer Adda: and, which more is, the vniuerſall hope was, that the armie approching the Venetian frontiers, the Senate (for the ſuretie of their owne Eſtates) would call home the moſt part of the ſouldiers they had ſent to the ſeruice of the French King. And beſides all theſe things, to paſſe beyond Po, fell out very aptly for the armie to ioyne with the Swiſſers; a matter not of leaſt importance. But whileſt many neceſſarie prouiſions were in preparing for this deliberation, as artilleries, munitions, pioners, bridges and victuals: and whileſt bands of Italian footmen were leuied in Tuſcane and Romagna, Count Guido Rangon, by the Popes commandement, marched towards the mountaine of Modena, with part of the footmen that were already leuied, and with thoſe bands that were vnder his gouernment: which mountaine did neuer acknowledge other Lord then the Duke of Ferrara, either when Modena was vnder the iuriſdiction of Ceſar, or afterwards when it was vnder the dominion of the Church. But when the people of the countrey heard of this ſtirre, and that at the ſame time many footmen aſſembled in Tuſcane approched, they declared themſelues for the Church, not tarrying till they were aſſailed. At the ſame time Boniface Biſhop of Alexandria, and ſonne to the late Francis Bernardin Viſconte, fled from Millan, for that certaine conſpiracies which he had practiſed againſt § French, came to light; a conſpiracy being alſo diſcloſed which was managed within Cremona by Nicholas Varola, one of the chiefe of the baniſhed men of that Citie, by reaſon whereof certaine inhabitants of Cremona, who were conſenting thereunto, were executed: and I know not which was greater in thoſe ſeaſons, either the ill fortune, or the raſhneſſe and folly of the exiles of the Duchie of Millan, of whom a great number followed the armie: for that not onely whatſoeuer they tooke in hand ſucceeded ill, but alſo giuing

uing themſelues to ſpoile all the countrey, they were the cauſe that there came not to the armie ſuch ſtore of victuals as was neceſſarie, without recompencing theſe euils (Moron onely excepted) by any diligence or intelligence of eſpials: but, which more is, Proſper hauing ſent them a long time before towards Plaiſance, when they had done great domages both vpon their friends and enemies, they fell at laſt into ſuch contention among themſelues by reaſon of the booties, that Peter Scot of Plaiſance a chiefe man among them, was ſlaine by Hector Viſconte and ſome others. In this meane while Proſper attempted to burne the barks of the bridge, which the French men had retired neare to Cremona with a very ſlender guard, to the end to winne ſo much the more time to enter into the countrey, whileſt Monſieur Lautrech ſhould reaſſemble barkes neceſſary to reedifie the bridge: but the longneſſe of the way was the cauſe that Iohn de Medicis, who was ſent to that effect with two hundred light horſmen and three hundred Spaniſh footmen, could not arriue vntill the night was paſſed: in ſo much as the mariners perceiuing the bruite that was made by the paiſants, retired the barkes into the midſt of Po, by meanes whereof the enemies who ſhewed themſelues vpon the ſhore, could not offend them. At laſt, when all things neceſſary to paſſe Po were prepared, the armie marched to Breſſelle, where was erected a bridge of barkes: but afore they paſſed ouer, for that vnto their purpoſe to offend another, was ioyned a neceſſitie to looke to their owne defence, there was ſent to the guard of the townes of the Church which ſhould remaine behind, Vitello Vitelli with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like number of light horſmen, and two thouſand footmen of the appointment of the Florentines; and likewiſe the Biſhop of Piſtoya went thither with the regiment of two thouſand Swiſſers, for that he thought it not ſafe to leade them againſt the French, in whoſe armie was ſo ſtrong a power of the ſame nation, deliuered to them by decree, and with their publike Enſignes: and ſo much the more for that they were not aſſured what the new companies of Swiſſers would reſolue, from whom, being aſſembled at Coire, there was dayly expectation of aſſured aduertiſements that they had taken the field. There was giuen in charge to the Biſhop and Vitelli, not onely to defend Modena and the other townes of the Church if any inuaſion were made, but alſo to aſſaile the Duke of Ferrara, who attributing to himſelf the glorie to haue deliuered Parma, and occupied Finale and S. Felix, paſſed no further, for that the Pope (whoſe hatred was increaſed for that ſurpriſe) proceeded againſt him with cenſures and excommunications of the Church, to depriue him of the Duchie of Ferrara. Thus the armie paſſed the riuer of Po the firſt day of October, and went to incampe at Caſalmaior, hauing conſumed in paſſing not onely all the day, but a great part of the night, by reaſon of the exceſſiue multitudes of ſuch as followed the campe, and becauſe of the baggage: and herein the Captaines found themſelues much deceiued, who perſwaded themſelues that all ſhould be paſſed before noone, in ſo much as what by the wearineſſe of the hindermoſt, and the darkneſſe of the night, a part of the artilleries, many munitions, with multitudes of ſouldiers remained behind in the night, diſperſed betweene Po and Caſalmaior, in danger to be made a prey to euery ſmall troupe of enemies that would haue ſet vpon them: yea it was not to be doubted, that if Monſieur Lautrech (who after he had aſſembled all his Swiſſers, came to incampe at Colornio the ſame day that the enemies incamped at Breſſelle) had paſſed ouer his bridge at Caſalmaior, which is but three miles from Colornio, at the inſtant that they made their paſſage, or at leaſt at midday had charged that part of the armie which was not yet paſſed, (for betweene Breſſelle and Colornio is not aboue ſixe miles) he had had a good oportunitie to bring his buſineſſe well to paſſe: but in warres many occaſions are loſt, for that the Captaines haue not alwayes knowledge of the diſorders and difficulties that happen amongſt their enemies.

The armie of the League paſſeth the riuer of Po.

The ſame night arriued at Caſalmaior the Cardinall de Medicis, whom the Pope had ſent as Legate into the armie. For although the Pope had already begun very ſecretly to giue eare to the Embaſſadour of the French King, yet for the feare he had leſt theſe contrary ſucceſſes, together with the burden of the warre which was almoſt wholly reduced vpon him, ſhould giue occaſion to the Emperour and his Agents to doubt, that to ſhake off ſo many difficulties and dangers, he would turne his thoughts to new deuices, he iudged that nothing could more aſſure them, and ſo by conſequence induce them to proceed more reſolutely in the warre, then to ſend vnto them the Cardinall de Medicis, who was his kinſman, and without whoſe priuitie and counſell (notwithſtanding he remained for the moſt part at Florence) he did no matter of importance, ſo that he carried the ſame authoritie with him as the Pope himſelfe had: and beſides, it was a matter much helping to ſupport the reputation of the enterpriſe which was ſomewhat declined: and laſtly, it was very likely that for the preſence of ſo great a perſonage the Captaines would deliberate vpon the affaires with more vnitie; a matter of no leſſe neceſſitie to be looked into, for that the diſcord betweene Proſper Colonno and the Marquis of Peſquiero appeared dayly more manifeſtly, which beſides other cauſes, was much augmented, becauſe the Marquis ſince the Campe was leuied from before Parma, ſeeking to lay vpon others the infamie of that deliberation, had ſignified to Rome, that the matter had bene ſo reſolued without his counſell or priuitie. The armie reſted one day at Caſalmaior, and then marched along the territories of Cremona to the riuer of Oglia, whither they approched in foure remoues of the camp: nothing of conſequence being done in the meane while, ſauing that as the armie was lodged in a Farme houſe called la Corte de Frati, there aroſe a great fray and mutinie between the footbands of the Spaniards and Italians, in the which the Spaniards, rather knowing how to vſe the occaſion, then by plaine force, ſlue many Italians: neuertheleſſe, by the authoritie and diligence of the Captaines, the matter was ſpeedily reappeaſed: and the day before, Iohn de Medicis who purſued the enemies (which the ſame day that the armie ſtayed at Caſalmaior, were paſſed the riuer of Po ſomewhat higher towards Cremona) brake a band of Venetian eſtradiots led by Mercurio, with whom were certaine French horſemen, who tooke priſoner Don Lewis Gaetano ſonne to the Duke of Traietto, whoſe Eſtate neuertheleſſe was holden by Proſper Colonno. But when they came to incampe vpon the riuer of Oglia, Fortune beholding with a good eye the affaires of the Pope and the Emperour, interrupted the diſaſtrous counſels of the Captaines, who had determined that from the Farme of the Monkes the armie ſhould go to lodge in the towne of Bordelano, which is about eight miles from thence, vpon the ſame riuer of Oglia: for it being a matter vnpoſſible to draw the artilleries thither by reaſon of the ill wayes, it was neceſſarie to ſtay in the towne of Rebecca, being in the mid way, and ſeparate onely by the riuer of Oglia from Pontuiquo a towne of the Venetians: in which place, as ſoone as they were lodged, they had aduertiſement, that Monſieur Lautrech, being followed by the Venetian regiments, hauing left at Cremona all his baggage, was come the ſame day to S. Martin, within fiue miles of that place, with full reſolution to meete the enemies in the field the day after, if they offered to paſſe any further. This troubled not a litle the minds of the Cardinall de Medicis and the Captaines, for that the Senate of Venice, at ſuch time as they ſent their people into Monſieur Lautrech his armie, had ſignified that deliberation to the Pope, with ſuch words, as they ſeemed not to be moued with any deſire of the French Kings victorie, but for that they had no iuſt cauſe not to obſerue the confederation. They were perſwaded afore, and the coming of the Cardinall did well confirme that opinion, that Andrew Gritti had ſecret commandement not to ſuffer his bands to fight: which coniecture being foũd to be falſe, it was neceſſary to leaue off all their former counſels, ſince it was confeſſed of all men, that the armie of the enemie was farre ſuperiour in forces; wherein, beſides the horſemen which were very ſtrong, and ſeuen thouſand footmen French and Italians, there were ten thouſand Swiſſers. But in the armie of the Pope and the Emperour, the numbers of Lanceknights were ſo much diminiſhed, and in ſome part the bands of the Spaniards abated, that they hardly amounted to the number of ſeuen thouſand; and of ſixe thouſand Italians (for that the moſt of them were newly leuied) their number came more into conſideration then their vertue. Then Proſper with the others determined to expect there the coming of the Swiſſers, who becauſe they were already vpon the way, and for that the Cardinall of Sion that led them, had ſent word that they ſhould not ſtay in any place, it was thought they could not tarry aboue three or foure dayes: and therefore the morning following, after the Captaines had diligently conſidered the ſituation of the place, they reduced into a better forme the lodging, which the night before had bene tumultuouſly made; not conſidering that they might be much offended by the artilleries of the towne of Pontuiquo, which was oppoſite vnto them; for that the Cardinall de Medicis, retaining ſtill his firſt impreſſions, held it for certaine that the Venetians who ſtood bound to the French King in no other conditions then to aide him with men for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, would neuer conſent that from their Townes any offence ſhould be done to the armie of the Church and the Emperour. There was one thing that ſeemed contrary to the reſolution to tarry for the Swiſſers at Rebecca, to wit, the difficultie of victuals; thoſe that were brought with the armie being not ſufficient to feed them but for a very few dayes; and for feare of the harmes done chiefly by the exiles of Millan, euery one vniuerſally flying, there came but very ſmall quantitie, and yet that diminiſhed dayly. Therefore Guicciardin the Agent admoniſhed them, that ſeeing there was no abiding there for want of victuals, and that the coming of the Swiſſers might be ſtayed by many occaſions, it would haply be better not to ſtay there, but to retire backe againe fiue or ſixe miles vpon the ſame riuer to the confines of Mantua, where hauing at their backes the countries of their friends, they ſhould haue no want of victuals: and that which then might ſafely be done, when the enemies were approched, it might fall out they could not do without great danger. This counſell had not bene diſpleaſing to the Captains; but the late infamie of the retiring from before Parma kept them reſtrained from ſpeaking freely: being moued likewiſe with an hope that the Swiſſers could make no long tarrying, for that within ſixe dayes they might eaſily deſcend from Coire to the territorie of Bergama, from whence they had but a ſhort paſſage to ioyne with the armie. Thus then determining to awaite their coming at Rebecca, the prouiſions of meale carried with the armie were diſtributed by meaſure to all the bands; and becauſe there were in the campe no ouens portatiue, and the houſes wherein there were any, were taken vp by the ſouldiers, euery one baked for himſelfe vpon hote coles the part that was deliuered him: which incommoditie, ioyned to the ſmall diſtributions that were made of meale, was the cauſe that the bands of Italian footme, notwithſtanding they had plentie of wine and fleſh, fled ſecretly from the campe. But the third day Monſieur Lautrech who ſtayed at Bordellano, cauſed about noone-tide part of the artilleries to paſſe ouer Oglia, and ſent them to Pontuiquo, by the conſent of the Venetian Agent, notwithſtanding he made ſemblance of the contrary: and from thence, albeit it was almoſt night, they began the ſame day to diſcharge vpon the lodgings of the enemies; whoſe Captaines ſeeing into the manifeſt danger, notwithſtanding they might haue conueyed themſelues into a place where they might haue found defence in the couert of certaine litle hils, yet aſtoniſhed with the want of victuals, and their feare increaſing that the Swiſſers would make long tarrying, they cauſed the armie to depart the morning following by the breake of day, without noiſe, and without ſound of trumpet or drumme, their baggage drawne afore their companies, who marched in good order; and well appointed to fight: and they went to incampe at Gabbioneta, about fiue miles from thence vpon the confines of Mantua, confeſſing with one voice that they were deliuered from a great danger, partly by the benefite of fortune, and partly by the indiſcretion of the enemies: for as much as it is certaine, that if they had not ſtayed at Rebecca the very ſame day that they were appointed to go to Bordellano, there had not remained to them any, or very ſmall hope of ſafetie, for that the ſame or elſe greater neceſſities had conſtrained them to retire; and the retrait being more long, and the enemies more neare, the perill was moſt manifeſt. In like ſort it is moſt certaine, that the victorie had vndoubtedly fallen vpon Monſieur Lautrech, if he had marched to incampe neare the enemies the ſame day he ſent the artilleries to Pontuiquo, as many aduiſed him, and amongſt others the Captaines of the Swiſſers: for by reaſon of his neareneſſe, they had had no meanes to retire in ſafetie, chiefly ſeeing they could not range themſelues into battell ray for the impediments they ſhould haue receiued from the artilleries of Pontuiquo, nor remaine there aboue three or foure dayes by reaſon of famine. But whileſt (according to his nature) he deſpiſed the counſels of all others, laying open to the enemies the knowledge of the perill that was towards them, he gaue them cauſe to preuent his threatnings by their ſodaine departure. It was not then without reaſon that the Swiſſer Captaines told him after they had viewed the ſituation of the place (for Monſieur Lautrech who was remoued to accoaſt the enemies, finding that they were gone, went and lodged at Rebecca) that they had well deſerued the payes accuſtomed to be giuen to ſouldiers that had wonne the battell, ſeeing it was not long of them that they had not gotten the victorie. At Gabbioneta the armie of the League fortified their campe with great induſtrie, and remained there many dayes. But for that the coming of the Swiſſers ſeemed to be continually deferred, and for feare of the neareneſſe of the French, who were much the mightier, and made demonſtrations to ſet vpon them, they paſſed the riuer of Oglia, and went to incampe in the borough of Oſtiano, appertaining to Lodowike de Boſſolo, with intention not to depart from thence vntill the Swiſſers were come: which reſolution being made with wiſedome, was alſo accompanied with good fortune, for that at Gabbioneta, by reaſon of the low and ſhallow ſituation, the armie would haue receiued great domages by the abundance of raines and waters which fell as ſoone as they were gone.

A fault of M. Lautrech.

But whileſt thus idlely one of the armies pawſed at Oſtiano and the other at Rebecca, the Biſhop

ſhop of Piſtoya and Vitelli with the Swiſſers and bands of Italian footmen ioyned together, aſſailed the companies of the Duke of Ferrara that lay at Finalo: and although they were in a place both ſtrong by nature and well fortified by art, yet the Swiſſers preſenting themſelues very reſolutely to the danger, ouerthrew them and put them to flight, killing many of them, amongſt whom the Knight Cauriano was ſlaine in fight, with ſuch feare to the Duke of Ferrara who was at Bondena, that preſently abandoning that towne, he fled to Ferrara; and to the end the enemies ſhould not follow him, he retired with as great diligence the barkes whereupon he had caſt a bridge in the ſame place. In this meane while the regiments of Swiſſers were deſcended vpon the territories of Bergama, and yet being full of diſcord and difficulties, they ſtayed from paſſing any further, hauing expreſly refuſed to turne thēſelues to inuade the Duchie of Millan, as the Cardinall of Sion and the Agents of the Pope and the Emperour had inſtantly required them: and likewiſe made difficultie to ioyne with the armie that expected them at Oſtiano, as prepared to march againſt the French King, offering to go to any place that the Pope ſhould thinke good, in the eſtate of the Church, for the defence whereof they were entred into pay: and yet (according to their barbarous interpretation of things) they conſented to march to aſſaile Parma and Plaiſance, as Cities manifeſtly appertaining to the Church, or at leaſt to the which the French King had no certaine right. They required alſo, that afore they ſhould march, there might be ſent to them from the armie three hundred light horſemen, to the end that with their aide they might be able to get victuals in the countries through which they ſhould paſſe. In the end the light horſmen being come, who paſſed at vnawares with great diligence through the territories of the Venetians, they marched to come into ſome place neare the armie, that they might the more commodiouſly conſult and reſolue what was to be done: and in their way they gaue the chaſe to certaine bands of French men and Venetians, which were beſtowed at Pontoglio or rather vpon the lake of Eupilo to ſtop their paſſage. When they were drawne neare to the armie, there was continuall diligence vſed to diſpoſe them to ioyne againſt the French, in which ſolicitation many meſſengers and Embaſſadours paſſed betweene, and chiefly the Archbiſhop of Capua went to them in the name of the Cardinall de Medicis. At laſt, thoſe of the Canton of Zurich, who as they haue greater authoritie, ſo they make profeſſion to gouerne themſelues with greater grauitie, refuſed it conſtantly: and the others after many doubts and obiections, neither expreſly denied, nor accepted the demand that was made vnto them; for they refuſed not to follow the armie, but without declaration whether they would enter with them into the Duchie of Millan or no. So that by the counſell of the Cardinall of Sion, and their Captains, whoſe minds had bin won by many promiſes, the armie determined to march on, vnder this hope, that ſince they refuſed not to follow, they might eaſily be drawne into any place whither the armie ſhould go. Thus the bands of Zurich containing foure thouſand in number, turning towards Reggia, the armie after it had remained about a moneth betweene Gabionetta and Oſtiano, ioyned with the other Swiſſers at Gambaro, the two Legats of Sion and Medicis marching in the midſt of them with their Croſſes of ſiluer, enuironed with infinite weapons, artilleries, mankillers, and robbers: ſo much do men in theſe dayes abuſe the reuerence of Religion. They went in three remouings of camp through the lands of the Venetians to Orciuecchi a towne of their obedience, making this excuſe to the Senate, that it was a paſſage neceſſarie, and that they did it not for any deſire to offend them: in the ſame ſort as they excuſed themſelues when Andrew Gritti their Agent was conſtrained to giue way to Monſieur Lautrech to ſend artilleries to Pontuiquo. At Orciuecchi arriued certain Poſts ſent by the Lords of the Cantons to command the Swiſſers to depart from the armie; ſending alſo the like commandement by other Poſts to the bands that were in the French campe, ſaying, it was a thing vnworthy of their name, that their footmen ſhould ſerue vnder publike Enſignes in the armies of two enemies. But the effects of theſe commandements were diuerſe; for, the Poſts that were diſpatched to the campe of the League, were by cunning ſtayed in the way, ſo that they came not ſo farre as to thoſe bands that were with the Cardinall of Sion: but the Swiſſers that were in the French camp, departed almoſt all without bidding farewell; and that which moued them, was not ſo much the commandements that were ſent (as was beleeued,) nor the length of the warre, whereof they are wont to be impatient aboue all other nations, as the ſmall meanes which Monſieur Lautrech had to pay them, who receiued no money out of France, neither could the extreme exactions which he leuied vpon the Duchie of Millan ſuffice to ſatisfie them. Here may be fitly conſidered what the malignitie and indiſcretion of officers may do in the houſes of Princes, who through negligence haue no care of things, or by their incapacitie are not able of themſelues to diſcerne good counſels from euill. For, three hundred thouſand crownes being prepared to be ſent to Monſieur Lautrech according to the Kings promiſe, the Ladie Regent the Kings mother, who bare ſo great emulation to his greatneſſe that ſhe forgot the profit of her ſonne, procured the Treaſurers and Receiuers, without the Kings priuitie, to turne that ſumme to another vſe: which was the cauſe that Monſieur Lautrech confuſed in himſelfe, and full of griefe, ſince that by the departing of the Swiſſers, the ſucceſſe of affaires which afore he eſteemed to be good and happie, was become very doubtfull, leauing garriſons in Cremona and Piſqueton, he reduced himſelfe with the reſidue of the armie to Caſſan, hoping to giue impediment to the enemies to paſſe Adda, as well in reſpect of other difficulties which follow armies that are to paſſe riuers when there ſtands reſiſtance vpon the ſhore oppoſite, as for that in that place the banke towards Millan is ſo high, that greater domage is done to the enemies with the artilleries, then can be receiued from them. On the other ſide, the Popes Legates and the Captaines being departed from Orciueche, when they had paſſed againe the riuer of Oglio, came in three remouings to Riuolto, not feeling any more the incommoditie of victuals, for that they were plentifully relieued by the townes of Guiaradadda, which the French men had left abandoned.

At this place both the armies were vpon termes, the one to winne, and the other to ſtop the paſſage of the riuer, Proſper and the other Captaines made preparation to build a bridge betweene Riuolto and Caſſan; which was a matter very doubtfull and hard for the impediment of the enemies: and there, hauing conſumed two or three dayes in ſundrie controuerſies and counſels, at laſt Proſper (who would not communicate his thoughts with the Marquis of Peſquiero, to the end he ſhould haue no intereſt in the glorie of that action, nor make any vſe of the Spaniards leſt they ſhould diſcloſe his deuice) cauſed ſecretly to be taken from the riuer of Brembo two ſmall barks, and ſent by night with great ſilence certaine bands of Italian footmen to paſſe the riuer right ouer againſt the towne of Vaury. Vaury is a towne open, diſcouered, and without wals, and hath his ſituation vpon the bankes of Adda fiue miles from Caſſan, where the riuer may conueniently be paſſed, and in the midſt of the towne there is a ſmall circuite of wals raiſed in forme of a litle Caſtle. Huguo de Pepoly Lieutenant to the men at armes which the French King had giuen to Octauian Fregoſa, had the guard of this place with a few horſemen, who hearing the noiſe that was made, preſented himſelfe vpon the ſhore, from whence he was preſently repulſed with force of ſhot, but it was thought he might eaſily haue made reſiſtance, if ſome number of harquebuziers had ioyned with thoſe horſemen he had with him; which he ſaid, he had demanded of Monſieur Lautrech. Euer as the footmen paſſed, they aſſembled together in a place within the towne, raiſed and ſomewhat ſtrong, expecting there the ſuccours which Proſper had appointed; who as ſoone as he was aduertiſed of that happie beginning, cauſed to be turned that way almoſt all the footbands of the army beſtowed in diuers boroughs of Guiaradadda, to whom he gaue this order, that thoſe that arriued firſt ſhould preſently paſſe, and the others afterwards vpon the ſame barkes and vpon two others that were appointed to follow the armie to ſerue for bridges ouer riuers, which by night were carried ouer land to the ſame ſhore: and as well himſelfe as the other Captaines with the Cardinall de Medicis, tooke forthwith the ſame way, leauing this commandement to ſuch as tarried at Riuolto, that if the French men retired from that quarter, they ſhould immediatly ſet vp the bridge. But at Vaury the ſucceſſe of the enterpriſe was vncertaine for certaine houres. For, if Monſieur Lautrech vpon his firſt aduertiſement of the paſſing of his enemies, had preſently turned thither one part of the armie, he had no doubt giuen them the ouerthrow: but after he had ſpent many houres in doubting what to do, he diſpatched thither Monſieur d'Eſcut with foure hundred Lances and the bands of French footmen, cauſing certaine peeces of artilleries to be drawne afterwards. Monſieur d'Eſcut and his regiments marched thither with great diligence, and began very reſolutely to charge the place where the enemies were retired, euen at the ſame time that the ſuccours which were expected appeared vpon the other ſhore, in hope of whom the enemies made a valiant defence, although Monſieur d'Eſcut deſcending on foot with all his men at armes, fought valiantly in the ſtraights of the ſtreetes; and it is not to be doubted (if the artilleries had come in time) but he had giuen them the ouerthrow. But now Tegane Captaine of the Griſons, and

and two Enſignes of Spaniſh footmen, ſupported by the Cardinall de Medicis and the Captains, made haſte to paſſe continually from the other ſide of the riuer, as faſt as the barks could carry them: and Iohn de Medicis more prouoked by his naturall magnanimitie and great deſire of glorie, then by any mans incitation, ſwam ouer the deepneſſe of the water vpon a Turkiſh horſe to the other ſide, giuing at the ſame time both feare to his enemies, and courage to his friends. At laſt Monſieur d'Eſcut, deſpairing of the victorie, notwithſtanding the artilleries arriued at the ſame inſtant, retired to Caſſan with the loſſe of an Enſigne; & afterwards Monſieur Lautrech departed from Caſſan, and retired to Millan with the whole armie: and there, not to loſe the occaſion to ſatisfie his hate conceiued afore, or elſe to make himſelfe feared and redoubted by ſuch a ſpectacle, he cauſed Chriſtopher Paluoiſin to be publikely executed, which was a thing pitifull to be ſeene, as well for the nobleneſſe of his houſe, the greatneſſe of his perſon, and his age, as for that he was committed to priſon many moneths afore the warre. By this paſſing ouer Adda, the name of Proſper was exalted to the heauens, which as well for his breaking vp from before Parma, as for his protracting, was infamous and diſpraiſed at Rome and in the whole armie: and, as it often happeneth that the memory of things formerly done, is put out by ſuch as follow afterwards, euery one commended him, and ſpake very well of him, for that without bloud and danger, yea altogether with counſell and induſtrie, worthy of a moſt expert Captaine, he had ſtolen from the enemies the paſſage of that riuer, which Monſieur Lautrech had ſo much promiſed himſelfe to impeach, that beſides that which he ſpake publikely, he had written to the King that he would abſolutely hinder it. And yet there wanted not ſuch, who with reaſons either true or apparent, laboured to diminiſh the glorie of this action, who alledged that there was not any vertue or rare induſtrie either in the inuention or in the execution: for that nature of her ſelfe teacheth all men who find the impediments of riuers and ſtrait paſſages, to ſeeke to paſſe either higher or lower, where there is nothing to ſtop them: That the paſſage of Vaury was neare at hand, very conuenient, and ordinarily frequented; and that Monſieur Lautrech had bene ſo careleſſe to guard it, that his negligence had left no place for induſtrie: for in what other thing could the prouidence of Proſper be recommended, then that with ſecrecie he had made prouiſion of the barkes, and managed the whole enterpriſe with neceſſary ſilence? Others, being perhaps too diligent cenſurers of things, and more ready to reprehend faults that be doubtfull, then to commend actions that be certaine, not content to diminiſh the renowme of his induſtrie, ſaid, there was in him neither prouidence nor order conuenient: for that ſending no commandement to thoſe bands to ſtirre that were appointed for ſuccours, who were lodged within Treuy, Caruuage and many other places, vntill he knew the footmen whom he had ſent before were poſſeſſed of Vaury, it came to paſſe that the firſt companies could not arriue vpon the ſhore of the riuer vntill noone, more then fourteene houres after the firſt bands of footmen were paſt: ſo that if Monſieur Lautrech as ſoone as he receiued the aduertiſement, had done that which he did many houres after, there is no doubt but he had recouered Vaury, and ouerthrowne thoſe footbands that were paſſed, for that the ſuccours would haue come too late. But ſuch interpretations did nothing obſcure the glorie of Proſper, for that commonly men do conſider things by the euent, in regard whereof, ſometimes with praiſe, and ſometimes with reproofe, (according as the ſucceſſe is happie or contrary) they alwayes attribute that to prouidence, which for the moſt part proceeds of fortune. Monſieur Lautrech being departed from the ſhores of Adda, it was not to be doubted that the enemies who the day following builded a bridge betweene Riuolta and Caſſan, would draw neare to Millan as faſt as they could: yet Proſper, whoſe counſell, vſually blamed by the vulgar ſort, was approued by ſuch as are skilfull in the art of warre, was of mind, that in taking a longer circuite, they ſhould march the firſt day to incampe at Marignan, a towne of equall diſtance from Millan and Pauie. For it being vnpoſſible becauſe of the hardneſſe of the time, now very cold and rainie, to keepe the field, he iudged it beſt to draw neare to Millan on that ſide, by the which (if, as was ſuppoſed, he found it hard to enter) he might immediatly turne to Pauie, where Monſieur Lautrech had left no garriſon, for that he ſought to reduce all his forces to Millan: of which Citie being plentifull of victuals, and very commodious, he would make the ſeate of the warre. On the other ſide, Monſieur Lautrech whoſe footmen were reduced to a very ſmall number, had purpoſed from the beginning to guard onely the Citie of Millan: but conſidering afterwards that if he abandoned the ſuburbes, he ſhould giue way to the enemie to lodge there, and thereby oportunitie to attend at their eaſe how they may compaſſe the taking of the towne, he determined as yet to defend the ſuburbes: which was indeed a reſolute and wiſe counſell, if it had bene accompanied with ſuch vigilancie as appertained, and by meanes whereof (conſidering the vnlooked for accidents that fell a few dayes after) things had come to another iſſue then they did. But the armie of the League, the greateſt part whereof was lodged at Marignan, and the Swiſſers more forward in the Abbey of Clernault, when they had remained there three dayes to expect the artilleries which could not follow becauſe of the bad wayes, preſented themſelues the nine and twentieth day of Nouember before Millan, with this intention, that if they could not enter the ſame day, to depart the day after to Pauie, whither was already diſpatched part of the light horſemen to take poſſeſſion of the towne. And it happened that morning (which was a matter worthy of note) that the Legates and Chieftaines of the armie ſtaying in a medow neare to Clernault, to giue way to the Swiſſers to paſſe, there came an old man of vulgar aſpect and habit, came and preſented himſelfe vnto them, who telling them that he was ſent by thoſe of the Pariſh of S. Siro in Millan, ſolicited and preſſed them with great exclamations to paſſe further, for that there was order taken, that not onely the Pariſh of S. Siro, but all the people of Millan, vpon the approching of the armie, would riſe and take armes againſt the French men at the ringing of the bels of euery Pariſh: and this matter ſeemed afterwards more admirable, for that notwithſtanding any diligence that was vſed to find him againe, they could neuer either learne what he was, or by whom he was ſent.

The taking of Millan by the League.

The armie then marched in order towards Rome gate, and the great artilleries ſtayed at the entrie of a way which turneth to Pauie. The Marquis of Peſquiero who was in the forefront of the battell with his bands of Spaniſh footmen, as the night came on, drew neare the trench that is betweene Rome gate and the port Theſin, and preſenting his harquebuziers againſt a baſtillion made in a place called Vicentino, neare the gate named Lodowikes gate, more to make triall, then in hope to carry it, the Venetian footbands that guarded the place, after they had with much ado endured the preſence of the enemies, turned their backes with incredible cowardize, and betooke themſelues to flight, and the Swiſſers in like ſort that lay neare them: ſo that the Spaniſh footbands paſſing the trench and the rampier without any impediment, entred the ſuburbes, and in their entrance tooke and hurt lightly Theodore Triuulce, who being all diſarmed, haſted to the bruite vpon a litle nagge, who payed afterward to the Marquis of Peſquiero for his libertie twentie thouſand duckats. Andrew Gritti ſaued himſelfe with great difficultie, and when by flying he had vnited himſelfe with the French, they retired all together into the towne, by fetching a very long compaſſe: but for that they had made no prouiſion for their defence, and that they had but a few footmen, and therewithall the people being ready to rebell, they made a ſtand about the Caſtle. On the other ſide, the Marquis of Peſquiero who followed diligently his good fortune, being approched neare to Rome gate (the gates of the Citie and thoſe of the ſuburbes beare all one name) was receiued into the towne by the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, who had ſeized vpon the gate: and not long after the Cardinall de Medicis, the Marquis of Mantua, Proſper, and part of the armie, made their entrie in the ſame ſort by the port Theſin, the victors being almoſt ignorant in what maner or by what diſorder they had ſo eaſily wonne ſuch a victorie. But the principall cauſe proceeded of the negligence of the French men, for as much as Monſieur Lautrech, as was diſcerned afterwards, had no aduertiſement that the enemies were remoued that day; yea it was beleeued, that for the diſaduantage of the wayes, being very foule with the great raines that fell, he aſſured himſelfe the enemies would not make their artilleries march that day, without the which he neuer thought they would go about to aſſault the rampiers: ſo that at the ſame time when they made their entrance, he was walking vnarmed in the Citie of Millan with other Captaines, without thinking of any ſuch thing; and Monſieur d'Eſcut being wearie with watching the night before, was layd downe to ſleep in his owne lodging: and yet it was beleeued that if afterwards in flying he had reaſſembled his people vpon the Caſtle greene, he had had no litle occaſion to offend his enemies, one part of them being lodged very diſorderly within Millan, another part ſtaying in the ſuburbes with the ſame diſorder, and the reſidue being diſperſed and lodged without in great confuſion. But being hindred by feare and the error of the darkneſſe, to diſcerne in ſo ſhort a time the eſtate of the enemies, he departed the ſame night with the armie to Coma, where leauing fiftie men at armes and ſixe hundred footmen, he tooke his way by the Pariſh of Inzina,

and ſo after he was paſſed Adda to Lecquo, he drew to the countrey of Bergama, the Caſtle of Millan remaining well guarded and furniſhed. Lode and Pauie followed the example of Millan: and at the ſame time the Biſhop of Piſtoya and Vitelli, who leauing Parma behind them, had taken the way to Plaiſance, were willingly receiued into that Citie, as they were alſo afterwards into Cremona, whither the newes being come, not onely of the taking of Millan, but alſo that the French were ouerthrowne, the people ranne to armes, and began to call vpon the name of the Empire and Duke of Millan: which being vnderſtood by Monſieur Lautrech, who was now arriued vpon the territories of Bergama, he diſpatched thither Monſieur d'Eſtut with part of the armie to recouer it: who being repulſed by the people, Monſieur Lautrech, notwithſtanding he had very ſmall hope of good ſucceſſe by reaſon of the ſuccours they might eaſily receiue from ſo many Swiſſers as were within Plaiſance, went thither with the whole armie, hauing firſt giuen order that Federike de Boſſolo ſhould abandon Parma, for that he thought himſelfe vnable to furniſh ſo many places; which enterpriſe ſucceeded well. For, although the Cardinall de Medicis as ſoone as he vnderſtood of the rebellion of Cremona, had ſent word to ỹ Biſhop of Piſtoya, that to aſſure himſelfe of ſuch a conqueſt, he ſhould diſpatch thither part of the Swiſſers: yet he, who would neither deuide them, nor intangle himſelfe with other affaires, for a deſire he had to go with them to the enterpriſe which was determined againſt Genes, lingred ſo long, that Monſieur Lautrech holding as yet the Caſtle, & finding there no other reſiſtance then of the people, who preſently ſent Embaſſadours to him to demand pardon for their fault, recouered it eaſily. By which euent Monſieur Lautrech reſumed courage, who ſent forthwith to Federike de Boſſolo not to abandon Parma: but he being departed afore the ſummons came, had paſſed Po with his regiments, and Vitelli who went to Plaiſance with his companies, and was not farre from Parma when Federike departed, being called in by an vniuerſall conſent of the people, was now entred. The Captaines of the League deuiſing how to recouer the reſidue of the Eſtate, with a reſolution to be no more at ſo great expences, diſpatched from Millan at the ſame time the Marquis of Peſquiero with the bands of Spaniards, the Lanceknights and the Griſons, to lay ſiege to Coma; and when they had begun to batter it with the artilleries, the defendants deſpairing of reſcue, agreed to render it vp, vnder condition of ſafetie of life and goods, as wel to the French bands as to the inhabitants of the towne: and yet as the French men were vpon their departure, the Spaniards made their entrie, and ſacked it, to the great infamie of the Marquis, who being afterwards accuſed of faith-breaking by Iohn de Chabannes chiefe of the French bands within Coma, was by him defied and challenged to the combat.

Thoſe of the League ſent at the ſame inſtant the Biſhop of Verula to the Swiſſers, to aſſure them of their wils: but they, as ſoone as he was come to Belinzone, committed him to ward, for that being diſcontented that their footmen had marched againſt the French King, they did not onely complaine of the Cardinall of Sion and the Pope, but alſo of all their officers, and among others of this Biſhop of Verula, for that being the Popes Nuncio with them at ſuch time as they leuied their footmen, he laboured to induce them to ſwarue from the exception wherewith they had bene accorded. The affaires of the warre were reduced into theſe termes, with a great hope of the Pope and the Emperour to confirme the victorie, for as much as the French King could not ſo ſuddenly ſend new companies into Italy; and the power of thoſe who had wonne Millan from him, with the moſt part of the Duchie, ſeemed ſufficient not onely to preſerue it, but alſo to get that which remained yet in the hands of the enemie. Yea the Senate of Venice amazed at this ſucceſſe, and fearing leſt the warre begun againſt others ſhould fall vpon them, gaue hope to the Pope to cauſe the French bands to depart out of their lands. But ſudden thoughts began quickly to ſpring of an accident vnlooked for. For, newes came that Pope Leo was dead ſuddenly the firſt day of December: who as he lay at the village of Magliana, whither he went oftentimes for his recreation, hearing the newes of the taking of Millan, entred into ſuch an extreme paſſion of ioy, that the ſame night he fell into a ſmall feauer; by reaſon whereof he was remoued the next day to Rome, where he died within very few dayes after, notwithſtanding the Phyſitions in the beginning made no great reckning of his diſeaſe; not without great ſuſpition that he was poiſoned (as was reported) by Barnaby Maleſpina his Chamberlaine, who was appointed to giue him drinke: who although he was impriſoned for the ſuſpition that was had of him, yet the matter went no further, for that the Cardinall de Medicis as ſoone as he came to Rome ſet him at libertie, fearing to fall further into the diſgrace of the French king, by

by whoſe practiſe it was ſecretly whiſpered, but by authors and coniectures vncertaine, that Barnaby had giuen him the poiſon. He died, if we conſider the common opinion of men, in very great glorie and felicitie, not onely for that by the taking of Millan he ſaw himſelfe deliuered of dangers and ineſtimable expences, by reaſon whereof being much drained of money, he was conſtrained to make prouiſion of more by all kind of meanes; but alſo for that a few dayes afore his death he receiued aduertiſement of the taking of Plaiſance; and the very day he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma; a matter ſo greatly deſired by him, that at ſuch time as he determined to make warre againſt the French men, it is very well remembred that he ſaid to the Cardinall de Medicis who laboured to diſſwade him, that nothing moued him more then a deſire to recouer to the Church thoſe two Cities, and that whenſoeuer God ſhould giue him ſuch a bleſſing, it would not grieue him to die. He was a Prince in whom were many things worthy both to be commended and blamed, and who greatly deceiued the hopes that were had of him when he was created Pope, for as much as he gouerned himſelfe with greater diſcretion, but with farre leſſe bountie then was expected. By the death of the Pope the affaires of the Emperour began much to decline in Italy, and it was very likely (ſuch an enemie being taken away, with whoſe money the whole warre was both begun and continued) that the French King would enter into new courage, and diſpatch a new armie into Italy, and that the Venetians for the ſame cauſes would recontinue the confederation they had with him: ſo that the deuices to aſſaile Cremona and Genes were at an end: and the officers of the Emperour, who till then had with difficultie payed the Spaniſh bands, were conſtrained to diſmiſſe a part of them, and not without danger, ſince there were yet holden for the King Cremona, Genes, Alexandria, the Caſtle of Millan, the Caſtles of Nouaro and Treſſa, Piſqueton, Domuſſola, Arona, and all the Lake maior: beſides, the Rocke of Pontremo was eftſoones returned to his deuotion, which being loſt before, was recouered by Sinibaldo de Fieſque and the Count Noceto. Neither had the affaires of the French King any good ſucceſſe beyond the Mounts, for that the Emperour raiſing warre vpon the coaſt of Flanders, had taken from him the Citie of Tournay, and not long after the Caſtle, wherein was a great quantitie of artilleries and munitions. Thus then by reaſon of the Popes death, new gouernments, new counſels, and new eſtate of affaires were introduced into the Duchie of Millan. The Cardinals of Sion and Medicis went preſently to Rome, to be preſent at the election of a new Pope. The Imperials retained with them fifteene hundred Swiſſers, and diſmiſſed all the reſidue, together with the Lanceknights, who went their way. The bands of the Florentines tooke their way to returne into Tuſcane. Touching the regiments of the Church, Guido Rangon led one part of them into Modena, and the other remained in the Eſtate of Millan with the Marquis of Mantua, and that more of his owne reſolution then by the conſent of the Colledge of Cardinals, who ſtanding deuided among themſelues, could determine nothing: in ſo much as Monſieur Lautrech making his complaints vnto them, that the ſouldiers of the Church remained in the Duchie of Millan, to the preiudice of the French King, who for the laudable deportments of his predeceſſors towards the Church, had obtained the title of Protector and eldeſt ſonne of the ſame; they could not agree to returne any other anſwer or reſolution, then that they referred him to the determination of the Pope to come. Of thoſe Swiſſers that were within Plaiſance, a part of them went with the Biſhop of Piſtoya to Modena, for the defence of that Citie and Reggia againſt the Duke of Ferrara, who after the death of Pope Leo had taken the field with an hundred men at armes, two thouſand footmen, and three hundred light horſemen, and after he had recouered by the will of the inhabitants Bondino, Finalo, the mountaine of Modena, and Garfagnana, and with the ſame facilitie had taken Lugo, Bagnacaual, with other townes of Romagna, was gone to incampe at Cento. The Swiſſers of the Canton of Zurich continued at Plaiſance, who for that they would not ſuffer themſelues to be ſeparated, could not be intreated that a thouſand of them might go to the guard of Parma; which Citie remaining almoſt diſfurniſhed, gaue courage to Monſieur Lautrech being then within Cremona with ſixe hundred Lances, and fifteene hundred footmen, to aſſay to take it, being ſpecially induced thereunto by Federike de Boſſolo, who for the peculiar knowledge he had in ſuch enterpriſes, carried great credite in that action.

The French men before Parma.

It was then determined that Monſieur de Bonneual with three hundred Lances, and Federike, and Marke Anthonie Colonno, the one with the French footmen, and the other with the Venetian bands, containing in all the number of fiue thouſand bodies, ſhould endeuour to ſurpriſe Parma, wherein wherein were ſeuen hundred Italian footmen, and fiftie men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and the people affected to the Church, but ill armed, and much diſcouraged by the memorie of the French, and the violences of Federike: whereunto was added, that of that part of the towne which had bene battered by the campe of the Church, the walls lay yet on the ground without any repairing. Furthermore, the Sea of Rome was in vacation, by reaſon whereof the minds of men are alwaies wont to be variable, and the Gouernors to looke rather to their owne ſafetie, then to the defence of townes, becauſe they know not for whom they ſhould put themſelues into danger. With theſe foundations then the French footmen were ſent downeward by the riuer of Po, euen vnto Torricella, where the bands of men at armes that were come from Cremona by land, ioyned with them: and many barkes being ſent thither from Cremona, they paſſed ouer Po by night to Torricella, which is within twelue miles of Parma, and it was ordered that Marke Anthonie Colonno ſhould follow them with the Venetian footbands that were lodged vpon Oglio: which Francis Guicciardin (who according to the commiſſion of the Cardinall de Medicis, was gone from Millan to Parma, to guard it) hauing diſcouered the ſame night, he aſſembled the people in the night, and hauing encouraged them to defend themſelues, he cauſed to be beſtowed among them a thouſand pikes, which two dayes before he had ſent for from Reggia, doubting what might happen. He was alwayes buſie about the prouiſions neceſſarie for defence, perceiuing many difficulties, as well for that the ſmall number of ſouldiers within the towne were not ſufficient to defend it, without the aide of the people, vpon whom in thoſe ſudden and dangerous caſes could be laid no firme foundation, conſidering the nature of the common people; as for that it was impoſſible to let the enemies from entring the Codipont, for which cauſe he retired the ſouldiers & all the townesmen into the other part of the Citie, but not without great difficultie. For many of the people perſwading themſelues vainely, that it might be defended; and ſeeming to the inhabitants of that quarter, a hard matter to abandon their owne houſes, they could not be diſpoſed to it neither with reaſons nor with authoritie, vntill they ſaw the enemies approach: who, becauſe the inhabitants were ſo long afore they would be perſwaded to retire, lacked not much to haue entred with them pelmel into the other part of the towne, where there were many difficulties, and chiefly want of money, and that in an euill time, being the ſelfe ſame day wherein they were to pay the footbands, who proteſted to go out of the towne if they were not ſatisfied of their payes within foure and twentie houres. The firſt day Federike de Boſſolo with three thouſand footmen and certaine light horſemen, entred the Codipont which was left abandoned. The day after Monſieur de Bonneual arriued there with the French Lances, and Marke Anthonie Colonno with two thouſand Venetian footmen, with no other artilleries then two Sakers, for that the ill wayes all along Po being low grounds, and in that ſeaſon full of water, made the cariage of great artilleries impoſſible, or at leaſt very difficult: and that not without loſſe of time, contrary to their hopes, grounded altogether vpon celeritie and diligence, for that lingring much they feared leſt Parma ſhould receiue ſome reſcue either from Modena or from Plaiſance. Neuertheleſſe the inhabitants becauſe of the aduertiſements which they had from certaine countreymen that were fled, ſtood poſſeſſed with an opinion that the great artilleries were coming: ſo that they were entred into a wonderfull feare in that reſpect, and much more for that Federike hauing taken in the countrey certaine citizens, and cunningly made them beleeue by certaine rebels of Parma which he had with him, that Marke Anthonie and the French men came after with a great armie and with artilleries: and after he had let them go to Parma, they brought newes touching the forces of the enemies and other things, much more then was true, and ſo repleniſhed the people with terror, that not onely the Commons through all the quarters of the towne, but euen their councell and Magiſtrates, who had the charge of publike affaires, began openly to intreate the Gouernour, that for the ſafetie both of himſelfe and his ſouldiers, and to deliuer the Citie from the danger of ſacking, he would ſuffer them to compound with the enemies: whereunto the Gouernour reſiſting both with reaſons and requeſts, and the time conſuming in debating, there happened this new difficultie, that the pay day being come, the ſouldiers that were drawne into inſurrection, publiſhed in maner of tumult, that if they were not payed they would depart the towne. The Commiſſarie neuertheleſſe obtained with many perſwaſions of the inhabitants, to furniſh part of the money, the which though they had promiſed before, yet they were become ſlow to performe: and he declared vnto them that in all euents and changes, that action would

ſtand them in no ſtead for iuſtification with the Pope to come. With this money he reappeaſed the tumult as well as he could, for which cauſe the feare of the people was augmented: and the ſouldiers, who by reaſon of their ſmall number ſaw themſelues at the diſcretion of the people, and knew that all wauered, entred into ſuſpition leſt the forces both within and without ſhould ſet vpon them at one time: in ſo much as they rather wiſhed that the Citie would render by accord, vnder capitulations of their ſafetie, then to continue in that danger. In this eſtate of affaires reduced to ſuch extremities, it was neceſſary for the Gouernour to ſhew himſelfe conſtant, who ſometimes aſſuring the ſouldiers that the perill was as well common to him as to them, and ſometimes comforting the principals of the towne aſſembled in councell, and diſputing with them, he told them there was no cauſe of feare, for that he was aſſured the enemies cauſed not their great artilleries to march, without the which it was ridiculous to feare that they would offer to enter the towne by force with ſcaling ladders, the yong men and the ſouldiers that are within being ſufficient to make reſiſtance againſt a farre greater violence: That he had ſent to require ſuccours at Modena, where were the Swiſſers, Vitelli, and Guido Rangon, with their companies, not doubting, but that the day following at the furtheſt, he ſhould be ſo ſupplied, as the enemie would be enforced to depart: That Vitelli and Rangon as well in regard of their owne honour, as for feare leſt by loſing of Parma there happened not a greater diſorder, would make haſte to come, ſpecially ſeeing they had ſo many men with them: That he had ſent to Plaiſance to the ſame effect, and that for the ſame reaſons he had great hope to be relieued from thence: That touching themſelues they ſhould conſider that the Pope being dead, who had exalted and honored him with the place wherein he was, there remained to him no intereſt or bond (if things ſtood vpon ſuch terms as they imagined) why he ſhould willingly ſubmit himſelfe to a perill ſo apparent; for that (as experience hath alwayes made manifeſt) the officers of the Pope deceaſſed are not to expect of the Pope to come any degree of recompence, ſince it may eaſily happen that the new Pope may be an enemie to Florence his naturall countrey: and therefore that neither for publike reſpects nor priuate ends he had any cauſe to deſire the greatneſſe of the Church, but that on the contrary many accidents might happen, by reaſon whereof the diminution of the ſame might be more acceptable to him: That touching himſelfe, he had not within Parma either wife, children, or any goods, for the which he might feare that Parma returning vnder the gouernment of the French, they ſhould be expoſed to their luſt, inſolencie and rapines. And thus ſince he had no cauſe to hope for any profite by the defence of Parma, nor if they rendred it, to feare the aduerſities they had found vnder the hard yoke of the French, and hauing expoſed his perſon (if it were taken by force) to the ſame dangers that they did, they might be aſſured that no other thing moued him to remaine conſtant, then the manifeſt knowledge he had that the enemies without their great artilleries, had no abilitie to force the towne, of which he was certaine they had none at all: whereof if he had any doubt, he would not ſtand againſt the accord, hauing no leſſe care of his owne ſafetie, then all others had of theirs; ſeeing withall, that the Sea being vacant, and he being in Parma with ſo ſmall a companie as was vnable to oppoſe againſt the will of the people, he could not be within danger of imputation, and much leſſe ſtand charged with their reuolt. With theſe reaſons, ſometimes ſpeaking apart to many particulars, ſometimes diſputing with them all together, and ſometimes in leading them along the walls, and making other prouiſions, and by that meanes ſpending the time, he entertained them all the night: and he was not ignorant, that notwithſtanding they had a vehement deſire to compound with the enemie, for no other cauſe then for the extreme feare they had to be forced and ſacked, yet they were retained by this conſideration, that in according without his conſent, they could not auoide the note of rebels. But as ſoone as the day appeared, which was the day dedicated to Saint Thomas the Apoſtle, they began to know by the bullets that were ſhot from the two Sakers planted there the ſame night, that the enemies had no peeces for battery: which made the Gouernour to hope, that returning to counſel he ſhould find them changed and aſſured, but he found a diſpoſition quite contrary, and that their feare was ſo much the more augmented, by how much (it being now day light) they eſteemed themſelues nearer the perill: in ſo much as without hearkening to any reaſon, they began not onely with manifeſt inſtance, but alſo with proteſtations, and almoſt threatnings to compell him to conſent to the compoſition. To whom he anſwered roundly, that ſince it was not in his power to hinder them frō ſuch ſpeeches and ſuch thoughts, as he might do, if he had in Parma a greater

ſtrength, there remained to him no other ſatisfaction of the iniurie which they determined to do to the Sea Apoſtolike, and to him who was officer to the ſame, then that he ſaw if they tooke ſuch a reſolution to accord, they could not auoid the infamie of rebellion and diſloyaltie to their Lord: and he layed to their charge with vehement words, the oath of homage and fidelitie, which a few dayes before they had ſolemnely made betweene his hands to the Sea Apoſtolike in the great Church, and told them, that though he ſaw afore his eyes their manifeſt death and deſtruction, that they might aſſure themſelues they ſhould draw from him no other concluſion, then that he would continue to make good his faith in that ſeruice, vntill either by ſupplies of new bands, or by the coming of great artilleries to the campe of the enemies, or ſome other accident happening, he were ſatisfied that the danger was greater to loſe the towne, then the hope to defend it. After which words going out of the councell, partly that they might remaine in their eares and minds with the more authoritie, and partly to giue order to manie neceſſarie things, if (as was ſuppoſed) the enemies ſhould offer to giue the aſſault that day, they remained in ſuſpence and almoſt confuſed for a long time. In the end feare preuailing aboue all other reſpects, and hauing reſolued to ſend out at aduenture to ſolicite an accord, they diſpatched ſome among them to the Gouernour, to proteſt vnto him, if he cõtinued obſtinate not to conſent that they might ſaue themſelues, they were determined to do it by their owne meanes, to auoide the euident perill they were in to be ſacked. But at the very inſtant that they were determined to vtter their embaſſage, there began to be heard the cries of ſuch as guarded the gates and the walls, together with the alarme ſounded by the bell of the higheſt tower of the Citie, which gaue the ſigne that the enemies being iſſued out of the Codipont in order of battell, made their approches to the wals to giue the aſſault: by which occaſion the Gouernour turning himſelfe to thoſe that had not as yet ſpoken, ſaid vnto them, Although » we were all willing, it is now no time to come to accord: we muſt now either defend our ſelues » honorably, or ſee our Citie put to ſhamefull ſacke, or remaine priſoners, vnleſſe you wil follow » the example of Rauenna and Capua, who were ſacked euen as they were ſoliciting an accord with » the enemies that ſtood at the wals. I haue hitherto done as much as may be done by a mã alone, » & haue brought you for your good to this paſſe, either to ouercome or die. If now I alone could » defend this Citie, I would employ my ſelfe to the vttermoſt: but this cannot be done without » your aid: Be not then leſſe reſolute to defend your liues, your goods, & the honor of your wiues » and children (as you eaſily may,) then you haue bene importunate to deſire without any neceſ- » ſitie to run into the ſeruitude of the French, who (as you know) are your capitall enemies. After » theſe ſpeeches, he turned hs horſe away, and left them all confuſed with feare: and for that they thought it now no fit time to proue other remedies, they left all parleys of accord for the preſent neceſſitie they had to defend themſelues: for that one part of the enemies, who the day before had gotten together in the country great ſtore of ſcaling ladders, being approched to the Baſtillion which Federike had builded on that ſide towards Po, inuaded it valiantly, and at the ſame time was a furious aſſault giuen to the gate that leades to Reggia, as alſo the fight was begun in two other places, with ſo much the more difficultie of defence to them within, by how much the enemies were more freſh, and encouraged by the words of the Captaines, and chiefly of Federike; and that the men of the towne filled with terror went not to the wals (except a very few) but the moſt part of them, ſhutting themſelues within their houſes, as though euery moment they had expected the vtter ruine of the Citie. Theſe aſſaults being many times renewed, continued the ſpace of foure houres, the danger of the townesmen diminiſhing continually, not onely for the wearineſſe of the enemies, who by the wounds and harmes they receiued in many places, began to loſe heart, but alſo for that the townesmen, who ſeeing the defence ſucceed well, tooke courage, and ran of all hands readily to the the wall, the Gouernour not forgetting carefully to make all neceſſary prouiſions: in ſo much as afore the aſſault ceaſſed, not onely all the people was run thither, and the Churchmen alſo to defend the wall, but an infinite number of women, who were ready to carry wine and other refreſhings to their husbands: in ſo much as the enemies without deſpairing of the victory, retired with the loſſe of ſome, and many wounded, to the Codipont, from whence they diſlodged the morning following, and ſo returned beyond Po, after they had remained a day or two about the borders of Parma: Federike confeſſing that in this expedition, whereof he was the author, nothing had more beguiled him, then that he could neuer haue beleeued, that a Gouernour who was no man of warre, and was but newly come into that Citie, would rather throw himselfe into danger without any hope of profite, (the Pope being dead) then seeke for his safetie, which he might do without any dishonour or infamie.

This defending of Parma was very hurtfull to the affaires of the French, for that it gaue to the people of Millan and other subiects of that State, greater courage to defend themselues then they had before: and specially when they knew how few soldiers were therein, and that they had receiued no succours, for that none came from Plaisance, neither did the Swissers that were within Modena, nor Guido Rangon, nor Vitelli, once send out any men to the succours of Parma: Guido alledging for his excuse, that notwithstanding the Duke of Ferrara because he could not take Cento defended by the Bolognois, was retired to Finale at such time as the Swissers arriued, yet there was danger lest he would come and assaile Modena being made naked of the garrison: and the Bishop of Pistoya wauering and standing troubled and vnresolued for the instant requests which Guicciardin made to him, and the perswasions of Vitelli, who for their owne interests stirred him vp to passe into Romagna with the Swissers, to the end to stop the passage of the Duke of Vrbin, stayed so long to resolue, that he did neither the one nor the other of these matters, for that Parma defended her selfe, and in Romagna no impediment was giuen to the Duke, because in the end the Swissers would not march for want of their payes: which Duke, and with him Malatesta and Horace of the family of the Baillons, passed, the one to recouer his Estates lost, and the other to returne to Perousa, hauing assembled at Ferrara two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footmen; who willingly followed them, partly for friendship, and partly for hope of spoile: for neither of the French men nor Venetians they could obtaine anie other fauour then to suffer whomsoeuer had taken their pay, to follow them, and that the Venetians were contented that Malatesta and Horace should depart out of their pay. Thus they went from Ferrara to Lugo all along Po, and finding nō impediments in the Estate of the Church, when they drew neare the Duchie of Vrbin, the Duke being called in by his people, recouered presently his whole Estate, except that which was holden by the Florentines, and so turning towards Pesera, he tooke the towne with the same facilitie, and within few dayes after the Castle: and following his good fortune, when he had chased out of Camerin, Iohn Maria de Varano the ancient Lord, who to make himself the more honorable had obtained of Pope Leo the title of Duke; he placed there Sigismond a yong man of the same family, who pretended to haue a better right in the same Estate; and yet the said Duke, who was withdrawne into Aquila, kept still the Castle. These things being dispatched, he turned with Malatesta and Horace Baillon to Perousa, of which place the Florentines had taken the defence, not so much of their owne accord, as following the will of the Cardinall de Medicis, pushed on either by the hatred and enmitie that he bare against the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons, or for that he thought their neighbourhood might put in danger the authoritie he had in Florence, or else for that aspiring to the Popedome, he sought to get the reputation that he alone was the defender of the Church during the vacancie of the Sea, the Colledge of Cardinals hauing no care to defend any part of the Ecclesiastike dominion, either in Lombardie, in Tuscane, or elsewhere: the same proceeding partly by the diuision of the Cardinals into many factions, euery one of them being plunged into thoughts of deepe ambition to climbe to the Popedome, and partly for that there could not be found either in the treasurie Pontificall, or in the Castle Saint Angelo, any summe of money that Pope Leo had left, who by his prodigalitie had not onely consumed the moneys which Iulio his predecessor had left him, with an incredible quantitie of treasure, which he had gotten by the creation of new offices, with diminution of fortie thousand duckats by the yeare of the reuenues of the Church, but also had left great debts, & laid to pawn all the iewels & other precious things of the Pontificall treasurie: so that it was wittily said by some, that other Pontificacies ended with the death of the Popes, but that of Leo was to continue many yeares after. Onely the Archbishop Vrsin was sent by the Colledge to Perousa, to the end to reconcile the Baillons; but he being suspected to Gentil, for the alliance he had with the sonnes of Iohn Paul, and in that he proposed conditions vnsure for him, medled with that matter in vaine: in so much as the last day sauing one of the yeare, the Duke of Vrbin, Malatesta and Horace Baillon, with Camilla Vrsin, who being followed by certaine voluntaries was newly vnited with them, went to incamp at S. Iohns bridge, and frō thence running vp to the Bastillion and other places thereabouts, they did did great domages as well by night as by day to the Citie of Perouſa, whither beſides the fiue hundred footmen which Gentil had leuied, the Florentines (who when the Duke turned to Peſera, had leiſure to prouide them) had ſent two thouſand footmen and an hundred light horſemen vnder Guido Vaine, and an hundred and twentie men at armes, with an hundred light horſemen vnder Vitelli. At which time the Duchie of Millan was in good quiet, no other thing being done by either of the parties then certaine roades and pillages: and the better to execute thoſe domages vpon places holden by the Church, thoſe bands of French men which were remaining in Cremona being two thouſand footmen, had dreſſed a bridge vpon Po, by the oportunitie whereof paſſing oftentimes vpon the territories of Plaiſance and Parma, they endomaged the whole countrey. And notwithſtanding Proſper by the incitation of the other Captains publiſhed that he would go take Trezzo, and had already ſent thither artilleries, yet he performed it not, alledging that it was not conuenient that the army ſhould be intangled in any place, to the end that if the French men ſhould enter into any action againſt the State of the Church, he might be able to ſuccour it. And it ſeemed herein that his thoughts were different from his words, for that when he was told that the French campe was planted before Parma, making no ſigne that he meant to ſuccour it, he ſaid it was expedient to expect the iſſue; and at ſuch time as Plaiſance remained diſfurniſhed of garriſon, for that the Swiſſers of the Cantons of Zurich, were ſuddenly gone away according to the ſummons of their Lords, Proſper did what he could to let the Marquis of Mantua for going from Millan with his bands, who notwithſtanding hauing put himſelfe into Plaiſance, ſuſtained that Citie, to his great praiſe, with the foot-bands of his eſtates, and ſometimes lending money. Neither was there any prouiſion made againſt ſo many dangers by the election of a new Pope, which was deferred to ſo great preiudice of the State Eccleſiaſtike, to giue time to the Cardinals that were abſent to reſort to Rome; and laſtly for that the Cardinall of Iurea going from Thurin to Rome, was detained in the Eſtate of Millan by the commandement of Proſper Colonno, to the end he ſhould not be preſent in the Conclaue for that he fauoured the French, the Colledge ſet downe a decree, that they would deferre ſo many dayes to enter the Conclaue, as the Cardinall of Iurea either had bene or ſhould be ſtopped from paſſing further. As ſoone then as he was deliuered, the Conclaue aſſembled the ſeuen and twentieth day of December, wherein were preſent nine and thirty Cardinals: ſo much was the number increaſed by the immoderate promotions of Leo, at whoſe creation were not preſent aboue foure and twentie Cardinals.

The firſt act of the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and two, was the mutation of the Eſtate of Perouſa, which according to the iudgement of men, happened no leſſe through the cowardiſe of the defendants, then by the valour of the aſſailants: who being increaſed by the meanes of voluntarie ſouldiers to the number of two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, and incamping themſelues in the ſuburbes of Saint Peter, which they within had abandoned, the fourth day of the new yeare they gaue an aſſault with a great number of ladders, at Saint Peters gate, at the gate Sogli, and at the gate Brogni, and in many other places, hauing firſt beaten downe the defences of all theſe places with ſeuen field peeces which the Duke of Ferrara had lent them. The aſſault began about the breake of day, and being many times relieued, continued almoſt all the whole day; and albeit entrie was made in two or three places of the towne, which was defended onely by the ſouldiers, without the aide of the people, who ſtirred not, yet the aſſailants were alwayes repulſed, with the ſlaughter of many of them, ſo that Gentil and the Florentine Agent increaſing in courage, hoped to defend it ſtill with no leſſe felicitie: but the timorouſneſſe of Vitelli was the cauſe that the matter fell otherwiſe. For he fearing leſt the people, bearing more inclination to the ſons of Iohn Paul then to Gentil, would riſe in their fauor, and withall iudging it a matter of no litle importance that they were incamped in the ſuburbes betweene the two gates of Saint Peter; but principally incited by a feare he had to loſe his life if things ſucceeded ill, for the hatred which he knew the Duke of Vrbin and the ſonnes of Iohn Paul bare to him; he gaue notice in the night to the other Captains, that he would depart, alledging that although he ſhould remaine, his preſence would be to litle purpoſe, for that the day before he was hurt at the aſſault with the ſhot of an harquebuze in the litle toe of his right foote, which was ſo painfull to him, that he was conſtrained to keepe his bed. And though Gentil and the other Captaines laboured with many requeſts to alter him from that intention, declaring vnto him how much the ſouldiers and the people of 1522.

the towne would be discouraged by his departure, yet finding him constant in his opinion, they resolued to follow him. So the same night they departed to Citta de Castello, and Perousa receiued the Baillons, not without the incredible wonder of all those, who being aduertised by letters written the same night what good successe they within had the day before, heard within a few houres after, how Vitelli and the residue had cowardly left it abandoned. The election of the new Pope was not yet accomplished, which had bene deferred by reason of the great discord that was among the Cardinals, caused principally for that the Cardinall de Medicis, who aspired to that place, and could do much by the reputation of his greatnesse, and because of his reuenues, and the glorie gotten in the late conquest of Millan, had obtained the voices of fifteene Cardinals, pushed on either by their proper interests, or for the affection they bare to him, or by the memory of the benefites they had receiued of Pope Leo; and some with this hope, that when he should despaire to obtaine the Popedome for himselfe, he would fauour those that had bene readie to stand for him. But many things impugned his desire. For to many it seemed preiudiciall, that one of the same family should succeed the dead Pope, and that it would be a president to begin to dispose of the Popedome by succession. All the ancient Cardinals were opposite hereunto, who callenged that dignitie for themselues, and could not endure the election of any one that was vnder fiftie yeares of age. All those that were of the French part were against him, with whom did ioyne also some of the Imperiall faction: for notwithstanding in the beginning the Cardinall Colonno gaue out that he would be for him, yet afterwards he opposed himselfe openly against him: as also those Cardinals that had bene discontented with Pope Leo, declared themselues his great enemies. Neuertheless amid these difficulties he was sustained by an effectuall hope, that such as were of his side making more then a third part of the Colledge, so long as they stood vnited, the election could not be accomplished without their consent, whereupon he hoped that in progresse of time his aduersaries would either be wearie or deuided, there being many among them who for their age were not able to endure long paine and discommoditie: and withall, though they stood firme not to create him at all, yet they would not agree of the creation of another, euery one striuing to cause either himselfe or his friend to be elected, and many of them retaining a setled obstinacie not to giue place one to another. But the change of the estate of Perousa did somewhat qualifie the obstinacy of the Cardinall de Medicis, by the instance of Cardinall Petrucci, one of the Cardinals of his faction, who being chiefe of the Estate of Sienna, and fearing lest by his absence there might happen some mutation in the Citie, whereunto he vnderstood the Duke of Vrbin wold addresse his armie, did vehemently labor to aduance the election of the new Pope: at whose instance and also in consideration of the danger wherein Florence would be, if Sienna should happen to change, the Cardinall de Medicis began somewhat to incline to the same, although he had not yet determined to whō to giue his voice. But as they made the scrutinie in the Conclaue, according to the custome, Cardinall Adrian Bishop of Derthuso, a Flemming by nation, who had bene Schoolemaister to the Emperour, and by his meanes made Cardinall vnder Pope Leo, and at that time gouerned Spaine in the absence of the Emperour, was proposed, no man hauing any affection to chuse him, but to passe away that morning. Yet some one beginning to discouer himselfe for him, the Cardinall of S. Xisto began to recount and amplifie his vertues & knowledge in a long cōtinued speech, wherupon some Cardinals beginning to yeeld, the residue followed from hand to hand, though more by compulsion then by counsell: so that by the voices of all the Cardinals he was created Pope the very same morning, the parties thēselues that had created him being not able to render any reason, why amid so many troubles and dangers of the Ecclesiasticke estate, they had chosen for Pope a stranger, absent so long a distance of countrey, and to whom, neither his former merites, nor his conuersation had with the other Cardinals (of whom his name was hardly knowne,) and who had neuer seene Italy, and was without hope euer to haue seene it, did procure him any fauour. Of which extrauagant kind of election, being not able to excuse themselues by any shew of reason, they attributed the cause to the holy Ghost, who is wont (as they alledged) to inspire the hearts of the Cardinals in the electing of Popes. He receiued the newes of his election in the towne of Victoria which is in Biscay; vpon receit whereof, taking vpon him no other name then his owne, he caused himselfe to be called Adrian the sixt. Vpon the mutation of Perousa, after the bands of souldiers had lingred certaine dayes to march, not without some litle preiudice to their other buſineſſe, they departed (to the end to leuie money of their friends) from Perouſa and Todie, where Camilla Vrſin had reſtored the exiles: and the Duke of Vrbin with the reſidue leauing Malateſta in Perouſa, marched with great diligence towards Sienna, hauing with them Lactantius Petrucci, whom Pope Leo had depriued of the Biſhopricke of Soana, for that the Emperours officers had hindred Borgueſo and Fabio the ſonnes of Pandolfe Petrucci in their departure from Naples. Thoſe that gouerned in Sienna had no other hopes then in the ſuccours of the Florentines; for they had intelligence with the Cardinall de Medicis, at whoſe requeſt, his faction ruling for him in his abſence the Eſtate of Florence, vnderſtanding that the Duke of Vrbin was gone from Perouſa, diſpatched preſently to Sienna, Guido Vaine with an hundred light horſemen and prouiſion of money, to ioyne with them certaine bands of footmen which they of Sienna had leuied. But the principall foundation was vpon the forces appointed many dayes before. For when they had bene aduertiſed of the firſt mouing of the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons, ſtanding in feare of Tuſcane, they had ſolicited to wage the Swiſſers of the Canton of Berne, who being in number ſomewhat more then a thouſand, were remaining within Bolognia with the Biſhop of Piſtoya, making no reckoning of the commandement ſent to them by their Lords to returne into Swiſſerland: the which practiſe albeit it drew a longer time then was needfull by reaſon of many difficulties obiected by the Biſhop of Piſtoya, who deſired to offer this companie to him that ſhould become Pope, yet at laſt it was accompliſhed, not without great expences, beſides the leuying of foure hundred Almaine footmen, who were ioyned in Bolognia with the Swiſſers. They had alſo called out of Lombardie Iohn de Medicis, and with thoſe forces arriuing in time, they made no doubt to aſſure the affaires of Sienna, which were now reduced to very ill termes, both for that the greateſt part of the people enuied the preſent gouernment, and generally all the inhabitants for an ancient hatred againſt the Florentines, could hardly endure that their bands of ſouldiers ſhould enter into Sienna. But the matter that increaſed the danger, was the abſence of Cardinall Petrucci, in whoſe place notwithſtanding his nephew Francis did what he poſſibly could to ſuſtaine things, yet his authoritie was not equall to the Cardinals. For this cauſe, being carefull either to auoide or to prolong the danger preſent, (whereunto the chiefe citizens were not oppoſite) they had diſpatched Embaſſadours to the Duke of Vrbin as ſoone as he was entred vpon the territories of Sienna, who notwithſtanding from the beginning he had required an alteration of the gouernment, and thirtie thouſand duckats, yet afterwards he moderated his demands, in ſo much as it was greatly to be feared, that there would grow betweene the Duke and the Siennois ſome compoſition, either by the conſent of the Gouernours, or, by the motion of the people, againſt their wils. Neuertheleſſe the bands of the Florentines entring continually into Sienna, and the bruite running, that Iohn de Medicis approched with the Swiſſers, ſuch as would not heare ſpeake of the accord, tooke ſo much the more courage to hinder it from concluſion: in ſo much as the Duke being drawne neare to the wals of Sienna with his armie, which contained not aboue ſeuen thouſand footmen, the moſt part leuied at randon, when he had ſtayed there one day, the hopes of the accord diminiſhing, and the Swiſſers being come within a dayes iourney, he raiſed his campe from before the walls of Sienna to retire into his owne Eſtate. Sienna being ſuccoured, the ſame companies turned towards Perouſa, the Florentines taking occaſion to execute ſpeedily the thing which they deſired, being thereunto alſo ſolicited by the Colledge of Cardinals, vnder whoſe name and authoritie the ſtate of the Church was gouerned in the abſence of the Pope, and for which reaſon the Cardinall of Cortona, who ſince the time of Pope Leo was Legate of the Citie of Perouſa, was perſonally preſent in the armie. But ſince the creation of the Pope, there was in the Colledge no greater vnitie or reſolution then had bene before in the Conclaue, but the variations were more apparent, for that they had ſet downe an order, that euery moneth the affaires ſhould be gouerned by three Cardinals, who ſhould haue the title of Priors, whoſe office was to aſſemble the reſidue, and to diſpatch the matters determined. Then the firſt three that were newly entred, oppoſing againſt the Cardinall de Medicis, who was immediatly returned to Florence after the election of the Pope, began to crie out, that the bands of the Florentines ſhould do no harme to the lands of the Church; who hauing already ſacked the towne of Paſignan, which had refuſed to lodge them, and afterwards being beſtowed within Olma three miles from Perouſa, vnder a hope almoſt certaine to carry that Citie, had made ſmall reckoning of thoſe commandements, if they had not ſoone perceiued the vanitie of their hopes. For the family of the Baillons had cauſed many bands of ſouldiers to enter into Perouſa, and had greater authoritie with the people then Gentil who followed the armie. Therefore deſpairing of the victorie, and hauing in vaine aſſayed to carry it by compoſition, they retired ſomewhat aboue the borders of Perouſa, as though they would not oppoſe againſt the will of the Colledge, and entred into the countrey of Montfeltro, which except Saint Leo and the Rocke of Matuola, was wholly returned vnder the obedience of the Duke of Vrbin: and after they had eaſily recouered it, armes were layd downe on that ſide, as it were by a peaceable conuention, both for that the Duke was not mightie enough to continue the warre againſt the Florentines, neither had they any cauſe, either for their owne profite or to content others, to moleſt him. For the Colledge, wherein the aduerſaries of the Cardinall de Medicis could do moſt, had at the ſame inſtant couenanted with him, that he might retaine the Eſtate which he had recouered vntill the Popes coming into Italy, and longer if it ſo pleaſed the Pope, and that he ſhould not moleſt the Florentines nor the Siennois, nor enter into the pay or aide of any Prince.

Hitherto the matters of Lombardie had proceeded quietly, the one part hauing want of money, and the other of men: and therefore the Imperiall ſouldiers who were not payed, refuſing to ſtirre out of their lodgings, there was diſpatched into Alexandria onely Iohn Saſſetella with his regiment and other ſouldiers and ſubiects of the Duchie of Millan. This Captaine in the beginning of the warre changing a benefite certaine for hopes vncertaine, left the pay of the Venetians to take the wages of the Duke of Millan, baniſhed as yet from his Eſtate: and when he was approched neare Alexandria, the raſhneſſe of the Guelfes of Alexandria who defended the Citie more then the French ſouldiers, made that eaſie to him which all men eſteemed hard: for that not being able to withſtand the enemies, with whom they were gone out to skirmiſh, they gaue them occaſion to enter pelmell with them into the Citie, which became the prey of the victors, and not many dayes after certaine bands of the French that were brought into Aſt by meanes of certain Guelfes of that towne, were expulſed thence with the ſame facilitie. But of this ſhort and vncertaine quietneſſe, there were already diſcerned the beginnings of verie great troubles to approach. For although in the Diots of the Swiſſers there was great contention about the demands of the French King, the Cantons of Zurich and Suitz remaining obſtinate againſt him, the Canton of Lucerna wholly for him, and the reſidue deuided among themſelues, the publike affaires alſo being troubled by the couetouſneſſe of priuate perſons, many of whom demanded of the King, ſome penſions, others the old debts: yet they accorded to him at laſt thoſe proportions of footmen, which he required for the recouerie of the Duchie of Millan, who to the number of more then ten thouſand, deſcended into Lombardie by the mountaines of S. Bernard and S. Goddard, and were conducted by the Baſtard of Sauoy great Maiſter of France, and by Galeas de S. Seuerin Maiſter of the horſe. The Emperour (to whom the King of England, being eſtranged from the amitie of the French, had lent a great quantitie of money) to the end to make prouiſion againſt ſo great an emotion, had ſent Ierome Adorno to Trent, to leuie ſixe thouſand Lanceknights, and to leade them to Millan, together with the perſon of Francis Sforce: whoſe coming was then eſteemed of great importance, to keepe more firme and conſtant Millan and the other places of that Eſtate, which greatly deſired his preſence; and by his authoritie and fauour the more eaſily to exact money, whereof there was extreame want. At the ſame time the people of Millan not knowing of the prouiſions made by the Emperour, had ſent money to Trent to wage foure thouſand footmen, who being prepared by that time that Adorno came thither, he finding them ready, whileſt the other ſixe thouſand could be entertained, drew preſently with theſe towards Millan, to defend Coma by the Vale of Voltolina: but the Griſons denying to giue him paſſage, he paſſed at vnawares, and with ſo great diligence vpon the territories of Bergama, and from thence to Guiaradadda, that the Venetian Gouernours who were within Bergama, could not be ready in time to ſtop them. And after he had led theſe firſt companies of Lanceknights to Millan, he returned with the ſame diligence to Trent, to guide Francis Sforce and the other footmen to Millan: in which Citie, beſides all other prouiſions, there was great care had to augment the hatred of the people, which was great, againſt the French, to the end they might be the more ready to defend themſelues, and to relieue the common neceſſities with money. And hereunto was much helping many counterfet letters and falſe meſſages, together with other cunning ſtratagemes proceeding from the diligence and art of Moron. But the thing that moſt of all aduanced ſo great an inclination, was the preachings and Sermons of Andrew Barbato a religious man of the Order of Saint Auguſtine, who drawing to him a wonderfull concourſe and affluence of people, ſtirred them vp and encouraged them maruellouſly to ſtand vpon their owne defence, and to keepe their countrey from the yoke of ſtrangers, capitall enemies to that Citie. He ſet before them the example of Parma, a weake and ſmall Citie in compariſon of Millan, and put them in mind of the actions of their Elders, whoſe name had bene of great reputation through all Italy: declaring vnto them how much men were bound to defend their countrey, for the which if the Gentiles, who expected no other recompence then glorie, offered themſelues willingly euen to death, what ought Chriſtians to do, for whom, dying in ſo holy an enterpriſe, beſides the glorie of this world, euerlaſting life in the kingdome of heauen, was prepared for recompence? That they had to conſider, what ruine the victorie of the French men would bring vpon that Citie, who hauing bene ſo auſtere and grieuous vnto them before without any cauſe, what will they now be, when they eſteeme themſelues ſo much offended and wronged? That no puniſhment of the people of Millan would ſatisfie their crueltie and hatred: That all the goods of the Citie could not ſatisfie their couetouſneſſe: and that nothing could content them but the vtter defacing of the name and memorie of the inhabitants of Millan; and that by an horrible example they ſurpaſſe the inhumane crueltie of Federike Barbaroſſa. Theſe ſpeeches ſo augmented the hatred of the inhabitants, and the feare of the victorie of the French, that it was now more neceſſarie to pacifie and retaine them, then to prouoke them. In this meane while Proſper Colonno vſed great diligence to raiſe, repaire, and relieue the baſtillions and rampiers of the trences, with intention to ſtay at Millan, which he hoped to be able to defend for certaine moneths, though the ſixe thouſand Swiſſers came not at all. And being mindfull alſo of the defence of the other townes, he diſpatched to Nouaro, Philip Torniel, and to Alexandria Monſignorin Viſconte, the one with two thouſand, and the other with fifteen hundred Italian footmen, who liued vpon the people, for that they were not payed. He had likewiſe ſent to Pauie, Anthonie de Leua with two thouſand Lanceknights and a thouſand Italians; and beſides theſe, he kept with himſelf within Millan ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſmen, and twelue thouſand footmen. The apparent danger that remained was, leſt the French men ſhould enter into Millan by the Caſtle; for remedie whereof, and by the ſame meanes to ſtop them for putting victuals or other prouiſions into the Caſtle, Proſper with an inuention highly eſteemed, and in the iudgement of men ſuppoſed wonderfull, cauſed to be made without the Caſtle, betweene the gates that leade to Verceil and to Coma, two trenches, with a banke to either of them of the earth that was throwne vp, and the length of the trenches (which were diſtant one from another about twentie paces) contained almoſt a mile, euen as long as is the trauerſe of the garden which is behind the Caſtle betweene the two wayes aforeſaid: and at the head of each of theſe two trenches, he erected a fort both high and well manned, the better to annoy the enemies with ſhot if they made their approches on that ſide. Theſe trenches being well defended with footmen that were placed betweene them, letted that no ſuccours could enter into the Caſtle, and that none of the beſieged could get out: and Fortune at the beginning ſhewed by a luckie ſigne, that ſuch an inuention could be no leſſe happie then it was ingenious, in that ſhe permitted that it might be put in execution without any domage at all, for that Proſper vſing the benefite of the weather, cauſed to be caſt before day two bankes of ſnow (by the patterne whereof he would haue thoſe of the trenches made) which ſhadowed and couered from the ſhot of the Caſtle the labourers that wrought: and that which helped much to bring this worke to perfection, was the impediment which the Swiſſers receiued in paſſing the mountaines, by the ſnow which was wonderfull deepe there.

At which time Monſieur Lautrech readdreſſed his companies, of whom he had ſent certaine bands beyond Po, and they entring Florenzola, ſtripped the guidon of light horſemen of Lewis Gonzaga, whom they found ſleeping, without ſtanding any whit vpon their guard. The companies alſo of the Venetians were muſtered about the confines of Cremona, vnder Andrew Gritti & Theodore Triuulce, who at laſt being ioyned with the Swiſſers, paſſed the riuer of Adda the firſt day of March. Monſieur Lautrech was Generall of the armie, whoſe authoritie was nothing diminiſhed by the coming of the great Maiſter of France nor the Maiſter of the horſe. At the ſame time came to the armie John de Medicis, who albeit he had ſolicited and almoſt reſolued to enter into the pay of Francis Sforce, and was already vpon the way to go to Millan, where he was

was greatly desired, for the good opinion that was had of his valour and conduct; yet being allured by greater and more certaine compositions with the French King, and excusing himselfe vpon this, that the money that was promised, was not sent to him from Millan: he passed from the territories of Parma, where he had sacked the towne of Busſetto, for that they had denied him lodging, to the campe of the French men, which lay within two miles of the Castle betweene the said wayes of Verceil and Coma. The third day after the French men were incamped, they marched in order, making as though they would assaile the rampier, which notwithstanding they executed not, either for that such had bene the intention of Monsieur Lautrech from the beginning, or else for that considering the number of souldiers that were within, the disposition of the people, and the readinesse that appeared in the defendants, the manifest difficultie of the enterprise drew him from it: and the same day the stones of a house that was battered from within, slue Marke Anthonie Colonno, a Captaine of very great expectation, and Camilla Triuulce bastard sonne to Iohn Iaques, as they walked together neare that house, deuising to raise a mount to shoote with the artilleries betweene the two trenches of the enemies. But Monsieur Lautrech hauing no confidence to take Millan by assault, thought he might be able to carrie it with the longnesse of time, for that with the multitude of his horsemen, and great number of banished men that followed him, with whom he ouerranne almost all the countrey, he gaue great impediments to the entrie of victuals; and withall had broken downe all the mils, and turned the course of such waters as any way gaue reliefe or commoditie to them of Millan: and he was not without hope, that the payes would faile to the souldiers within, who were principally entertained and payed with the money of the Millanois, for that the Emperour sent but a small quantitie from the kingdome of Naples and other places. But the hatred of the people of Millan against the French, was wonderfull, and maruellous the desire of their new Duke; by reason whereof enduring patiently all discommodities, not onely they changed not their mind for so many vexations, but the youth of the Citie put themselues in armes, and made them Captaines in euery Parish, in so much as they running day and night with great diligence to guard the places farre distant from the armie, eased the souldiers of great labour: At which time meale growing scarce, because the mils were ruined, they forthwith prouided for this incommoditie by the helpe of hand-mils. Thus the warre being reduced from all hope suddenly to take Millan, into the labours and cares of a long siege, the Duke of Millan (whose departure had bene many dayes foreslowed for want of money, and had bene yet longer if the Cardinall de Medicis had not succoured him with nine thousand duckats) departed at last from Trent with sixe thousand Lanceknights, and taking the Rocke of Croara belonging to the Venetians, the better to open his passage, he marched without any impediment through the territories of Verona and Mantua: and when he had passed the riuer of Po at Casalmaior, he ariued at Plaisance, whither the Marquis of Mantua came to him with three hundred men at armes, and accompanied him from thence to Pauie, where he stayed waiting for an occasion to passe to Millan, where his coming was extremely desired, for that the meanes to leuie money to entertaine the souldiers diminishing dayly more and more, it was thought necessarie to ioyne as soone as might be with the Lanceknights, to take the field, and to seeke to bring the warre to an end. But the difficultie to passe was great, for that as soone as Monsieur Lautrech vnderstood of their arriuall in Plaisance, he went to lodge at Cassina fiue miles from Millan, vpon the way that leades to Pauie; and had bestowed the Venetians within Binasquo, which is vpon the same way, both the one and the other being in lodgings well rampiered and fortified: where after they had remained certaine dayes, and in that space had taken S. Ange and S. Colombano, Monsieur Lautrech vnderstanding that Monsieur d'Escut his brother whom he had sent into France to relate to the King the estate of the affaires, was returned with money, and arriued in the estate of Millan with bands of footmen, which he had entertained at Genes, he sent Federike de Bossolo accompanied with foure hundred Lances and seuen thousand Swissers and Italians to ioyne with him: by reason of whose coming the Marquis of Mantua issued out of Pauie, and went to Gambala to make head against them. Neuertheless he returned suddenly to Pauie, being perswaded that his abode within Gambala would be to no purpose, or (as he said) for that they made as though they would retire towards Thesin being doubtfull of him, or else (which was more credible) for the feare he had of them, finding them to be more in number then had bene reported vnto him. But they being come to Gambala and ioyned with Monsieur d'Escut, went to Nouaro, and when they had taken the artilleries of the Caſtle which held for them, and battered it, they entred by force at the firſt aſſault, with the ſlaughter of the greateſt part of the footmen that were within; Philip Torniello remaining priſoner. For which accident, the Marquis of Mantua, who being moued by the letters and redoubled meſſages of Torniello, demanding ſuccours of him, was yet once againe iſſued out of Pauie, as ſoone as he had knowledge how things went, retired his companies from Vigeuena, and leauing onely garriſon within the Caſtle, returned to Pauie. The ioyning of forces with Monſieur d'Eſcut, and the taking of Nouaro, was preiudiciall to the French men in a matter of greater importance; for that it was ſo much the more eaſie for Francis Sforce to go with his armie of Lanceknights to Millan: who, according to an agreement betweene Proſper and him, departing one night ſecretly from Pauie, (for the guard whereof were left two thouſand footmen and three hundred horſemen with the Marquis of Mantua, who refuſing to be ſo far remoued from the Eſtate of the Church, would paſſe no further) tooke a ſtrange and vnuſuall way, and was receiued at Seſto by Proſper, who went to meete him with part of his companies, and conducted him to Millan, where it cannot be told with what ioy he was receiued by the people of Millan, the memory of the felicitie wherein they had liued in that Eſtate vnder his father and other Dukes of that name, preſenting it ſelfe before the eyes of all men, together with their deſire to haue a peculiar Prince, more louing to his owne people, and who would be conſtrained to reſpect and eſteeme them more, and not to deſpiſe them by reaſon of his owne vnmeaſurable greatneſſe. Francis Sforce at Millan.

After the Duke was gone from Pauie, Monſieur Lautrech entred into hope to be able to take that Citie, ſo that he went to incampe there as ſoone as he had reaſſembled his armie: and on the other ſide, Proſper, not ignorant in what danger it was, diſpatched thither in great diligence a thouſand footmen Corſicans, with certaine bands of Spaniards, who charging vpon a ſudden the lodging of the French armie, paſſed through, partly marching, and partly fighting, and hauing ſlaine many of the French men, they made way, and arriued in ſafetie at Pauie, where beſide many other incommodities, was great want of gun-powder. Immediatly after Monſieur Lautrech began to batter the walls of Pauie in two places, to wit, in the ſuburbs of Saint Marie in Pertico towards Theſin, and at Borgaratto; and after he had brought to the earth thirtie fadoms of the wall, he cauſed the aſſault to be giuen, but in vaine: and perceiuing that thoſe within ſtood well vpon their guard, and were reſolued to defend themſelues, he began to deſpaire of the enterpriſe, many difficulties happening dayly: for the money which his brother had brought out of France began already to faile, and there was neceſſitie of victuals through the armie, cauſed by the great raines, by reaſon whereof it was hard to bring them to the armie by land, and no leſſe difficult to come by the riuer of Theſin, for that the boates being driuen backe by the waues of the water, could not aduance much againſt the ſtreame of the riuer. Mſſ. Lautrech before Pauie.

About this time Proſper being iſſued out of Millan with his whole armie, to draw neare to Pauie, was conſtrained by the raines that fell to ſtay at Binaſqua, which is in the mid way between Millan and Pauie, from whence aduancing afterwards as farre as the Charterhouſe, which is within the Parke about fiue miles from Pauie, and haply the faireſt Monaſterie in Italy, Monſieur Lautrech deſpaired to be able to take Pauie, and therefore retired his campe to Landriano, without reciuing any other impediment of the enemies then certaine light skirmiſhes in the breaking vp. From Landriano he went to Monce, to receiue with more facilitie the moneys that were ſent to him out of France, which ſtayed at Arona, for that Anchiſe Viſconte ſent for that purpoſe from Millan to Buſto which is neare Arona, kept it from paſſing any further. This impediment reduced the affaires of the French vnto extreme confuſion, for that the Swiſſers whoſe pay had bene already deferred for many dayes, being impatient, according to their cuſtome, ſent their Captaines to Monſieur Lautrech, to complaine, that their nation hauing bene at all times prodigall of their owne bloud for the aduancement of the Crowne of France, they were not payed that which was due to them, contrary to all equitie and reaſon: and that by this ingratitude and auarice, it was manifeſt to all the world what ſlender eſtimation was made of their vertue and fidelitie: That they were determined after a vaine expectation of ſo many daies, to expect no other terme, nor to truſt any more in promiſes, which hauing ſo many times bene made vnto them, were alwayes falſified and therefore they would now returne to their houſes, but firſt hauing made knowne to all the world, that the thing that induced them thereunto, was not any feare they had of their enemies who had now taken the field, and much leſſe The Swiſſers would leaue the French army for that they are not payed.

any deſire to eſchue ſuch dangers as men of warre are ſubiect vnto, and which alwayes had bene contemned by the Swiſſers, as had bene manifeſted by ſo many experiences: That they gaue him to vnderſtand, that they were ready to fight the day following, with intention to depart the day after: That therefore he ſhould leade them to the field, and make vſe of their forwardneſſe, beſtowing them in the forefront of the whole armie; for that they hoped, as with farre leſſer forces they had vanquiſhed the French armie in their owne tents about the borders of Nouaro, they ſhould likewiſe ſubdue the Spaniards in their lodgings, who albeit they ſurmounted the French men in deceits, ſubtilties and ambuſhes, yet they eſteemed themſelues nothing inferiour, ſo long as they were to fight with ſtoutneſſe of courage and force of armes. But Monſieur Lautrech conſidering with what perill he ſhould aſſaile the enemies in their tents, laboured to moderate that furie, and told them that though the money was long in coming, it was not the Kings fault, but by reaſon of the danger of the wayes, and that notwithſtanding it would come within a very few dayes. But when he could not winne nor retaine them, either with his authoritie, or with petitions, promiſes, or reaſons, he determined ſince they ſhould be the first that ſhould feele the danger, rather to trie the fortune of a battell with great diſaduantage, then vtterly to loſe the war, as it was manifeſt it wold be loſt, for that if he conſented not to fight, the Swiſſers were reſolued to depart. The armie of the enemie lay incamped at Bicocca, which is a Farme houſe within three miles of Millan, where is a camping place very ſpacious, enuironed with great gardens, which are incloſed with deepe ditches, and the fields thereabout are full of fountaines and brookes, deriued and conueyed according to the maner of Lombardie, to water the medows. Monſieur Lautrech iſſuing out of Monce, drew towards that place with his army, and ſuppoſing that the enemies lying in a place of ſuch aduantage would ſtand firme for the defence thereof, he ordered his bands in this ſort: That the Swiſſers with the artilleries ſhould go charge the front of the campe and the artilleries of the enemie, which quarter was guarded by the Lanceknights, commanded by George Fronſperg: That on the left hand Monſieur d'Eſcut with three hundred Lances and a ſquadron of footmen French and Italians, ſhould place themſelues vpon the way that goeth to Millan, and ſhould draw towards the bridge by the which might be made an entrie into the lodgings of the enemies: That for his part he would labour to enter vpon their lodgings with a ſquadron of horſemen, which enterpriſe he hoped to accompliſh rather by art then by open force, for that to beguile them, he commanded that all his ſouldiers ſhould put vpon their caſſacks the red croſſe, which was the marke of the armie Imperiall, in ſtead of the white croſſe, which was the ſigne of the French armie. On the other ſide Proſper Colonno, who becauſe of the ſtrength of the place held the victorie very certaine, and therefore determined (as he ſaid) to abide the enemies vpon the ditch; as ſoone as he heard of their comming, cauſed all his companies to arme themſelues, and hauing appointed to euery one his place, he ſent forthwith to Francis Sforce to come quickly to the campe with the multitude of people that was armed, who, as ſoone as he had aſſembled foure hundred horſemen and ſixe thouſand footmen by the ringing of a bel, whē he was come, was appointed by Proſper to guard the bridge. But when the Swiſſers were approched neare the tents of the enemies, although for the height of the ditches, more eminent then they ſuppoſed, they could not aſſaile the artilleries according to their firſt hopes, yet thoſe difficulties nothing diminiſhing their valour, they gaue a charge vpon the ditch, ſtriuing with wonderfull courage to ſurmount and leape it. And at the ſame time Monſieur d'Eſcut who was drawne towards the bridge, finding there ſo great a guard, contrary to his opinion, was conſtrained to retire. Proſper alſo diſcouered immediatly the wiles of Monſieur Lautrech, and to meete therewith, commanding his people to put vpon their heads bundels of yong corne and graſſe, he made thoſe ſubtilties vnprofitable: ſo that all the burden of the warre lay vpon the neckes of the Swiſſers; who, as well for the diſaduantage of the place, as for the valour of the defendants, were much trauelled without any profite, and receiued many harmes, not onely by ſuch as fought in front, but alſo by many Spaniſh harquebuziers, who lying hid among the corne now almoſt ripe, ſhot certainly at them, and beat them ſo fiercely in flanke, that in the end after they were well payed for their raſhneſſe, by the ſlaughter of many of them, they were conſtrained to retire: and ioyning themſelues with the French, they returned all together in good order with their artilleries to Monce, without receiuing any domage in their retiring. The Marquis of Peſquiero with the other Captaines, importuned Proſper to giue the ſigne to purſue the enemie, ſeeing they had already turned their backs:

Mſſ. Lautrech determined to ſet vpon his enemies.

but he beleeuing, as it was indeed, that they retired in good order and not in maner of flying, and withall being the better assured thereof by the report of such as by his direction were mounted vpon certaine high trees, made alwayes this answer, that he would not put into the power of fortune the victorie which was assuredly gotten, nor deface by his owne rashnesse the memorie of other mens temeritie: To morrow (said he) will make manifest to you what hath bene done to day, for that the enemies feeling better their wounds when they are cold, losing courage, will returne ouer the Mounts, and so shall we obtaine without danger that which this day we should aduenture to get with perill. There were found dead neare the ditch about three thousand Swissers, of such as being more valiant and forward, were most resolute to thrust themselues into the danger, among whom were two and twentie Captaines. Of the enemies there died very few, and not one person of qualitie, except Iohn de Cordona Count of Culisano, who was stricken through his helmet with a small shot. The ouerthrow of the Swissers.

The day following Monsieur Lautrech being out of all hope of the victorie, went from Monce to passe the riuer of Adda neare Tresso: and from thence the Swissers taking their way through the territories of Bergamo, returned into their mountaines, diminished in numbers, but much more in valour; for that it is certaine, that the harmes they receiued at Bicocca so much afflicted them, that in many yeares after they expressed not their accustomed valour. The great Master and the Master of the horse departed at the same time with them, and many of the French Captaines. Monsieur Lautrech with his companies of men at armes went to Cremona, to giue order for the defence of that Citie, wherein he left his brother, and not many dayes after passed the mounts, carrying to the French King not reports of victories or triumphs, but a iustification of himselfe, with complaints against others for the losse of such an Estate, hapning partly by his owne errors, partly by the negligence and indiscretion of such as were about the King, and partly (if it be lawfull to speake the truth) by the malice of fortune. Monsieur Lautrech tooke order also afore his departure from Cremona, that Monsieur de Bonneual and Federike de Bossolo with sixe companies of men at armes, and a sufficient garrison of footmen, should enter the towne of Loda, which had bin holden for the King all the time of the war. He did this for that the Imperiall Captains had bin hindred that they could not presently turne their forces thither, by reason of a tumult which hapned among those Lanceknights which Francis Sforce had brought from Trent with him, who demanded that for reward of the victorie there should be giuen to them a moneths pay; a demand which the Captaines said was no lesse vnreasonable then vniust, for that there was great difference between the defending of themselues from such as assaulted them, & the vanquishing of those that charged them; and for as much as it could not be said that the enemies were vanquished, who were retired, not in flying but in good order, carrying with them their artilleries and baggage. But the insolencie of the Lanceknights being of more force then reason or the authoritie of the Captaines, they were in the end constrained to consent, promising to pay them within a certaine time. So it happened after many dayes were past in these affaires, that the same day that the French Lances entred into the Citie of Loda, after whom followed the footbands, that on the other side the Imperiall armie came, and afore them all the Marquis of Pesquiero with the Spanish footmen, the French men hauing not yet deuided among themselues the quarters of the towne, nor bestowed their guards, but being full of confusion and tumult, as it often happeneth when men of warre enter a towne to lodge in it. Of which occasion the Marquis purposing to make vse, assaulted with great diligence one of the suburbes of the towne which was enuironed with a wall, where he found no great resistance: and when he was entred, all the French men within the towne, terrified with the suddennesse of the accident, and also for that their footmen were not yet come, betooke themselues in tumult to flie towards the bridge which they had built vpon Adda: and the Spaniards at the same instant entring the Citie, some by the walls and some by the rampiers, followed them euen to the riuer, and in the chase tooke many souldiers, and almost all the Captaines, except Federike and Bonneual: and with the same furie they sacked that vnfortunate Citie. From Loda the Marquis went to Pisqueton, which he tooke by composition: and not many dayes after Prosper with the whole armie passed the riuer of Adda, to go and incampe afore Cremona, which he had no sooner approched, then Monsieur d'Escut began to hearken to accord, for that hauing no other hope to be able to hold out, then vpon the coming of the Admirall, whom the King (desiring to preserue that which yet held good for him in the Estate of Millan) sent into Italy with foure hun- *Mons. hundred Lances and ten thouſand footmen, he thought he did good ſeruice to the preſent affaires, if without putting himſelfe in danger he could at his eaſe expect what would be the iſſue of his coming. And on the other ſide, Proſper deſired to rid himſelfe ſpeedily of the affaires of Cremona, that he might endeuour to reeſtabliſh within Genes the brethren of the Adorneis afore the ſuccours of the enemies arriued in Italy. They agreed therefore that Monſieur d'Eſcut ſhould depart out of Cremona within fortie dayes with all his ſouldiers, and that he ſhould be permitted to come forth with Enſignes diſplayed, and with his artilleries, if within that time (which determined the ſixe and twentieth day of Iune) there came not to him ſuch a reſcue as either might make him able by force to paſſe the riuer of Po, or elſe to take one of thoſe Cities in the State of Millan which was poſſeſſed with garriſon: That likewiſe he ſhould procure that all that was holden for the King within the Duchie of Millan ſhould be abandoned, except the Caſtles of Millan, Cremona, and Nouaro: for the obſeruation of which couenants he ſhould deliuer foure hoſtages: That in the caſe aforeſaid the priſoners on both parts ſhould be reſtored, and the French men ſhould be ſuffered to paſſe ſafely into France with their artilleries and baggage.

The accord being finiſhed and the hoſtages receiued, the Emperours armie marched forthwith to Genes, which they approched on two ſides: the Marquis of Peſquiero with his regiments of Spaniſh footmen and Italians were incamped on the ſide of Codifa, and Proſper with the men at armes and Lanceknights vpon the oppoſite ſide of Biſagnia. The Citie of Genes was gouerned by the Duke Octauian Fregoſa, a Prince certainly of excellent vertue, and who as well for his iuſtice as for his other good parts was as much loued in that Citie as any Prince could be loued in a Citie full of factions, and where the memorie of their ancient libertie was not yet extinguiſhed in mens minds. He had waged two thouſand Italian footmen, with whom he hoped to defend himſelfe, for that the peoples of the towne being deuided among themſelues by factions, although he was compaſſed about by ſo mightie an armie, compounded of ſo great diuerſitie of languages and nations, he forbare to take armes, but ſtood to behold things in the ſame maner, and with the ſame eyes wherewith in other times he was wont to behold his other troubles, wherin without ꝙ danger or domage of ſuch as tooke no armes, the publike authoritie being tranſported from one family to another, there was ſeene no other mutation, then that in the Pallace of the Duke were beſtowed other inhabitants, other Captaines, and other bands of ſouldiers for the guard of the place. As ſoone as the armie was approched the towne, the Duke began to ſolicite cõpoſition by the meanes of Benedict Vinaldi a Genoway, whom he ſent to the Captaines: but this ſolicitation began to grow ſomewhat cold by the coming of Peter of Nauarre, who being ſent by the French King with two light galleys for the ſuretie of Genes, entred the hauen at the ſame inſtant. Neuertheleſſe the Marquis of Peſquiero hauing begun to batter the walls with the artillerie, they returned to parley of accord more then before; and all difficulties being reſolued, were vpon the point of concluſion, at what time the Spaniſh footmen, who the ſame day had battered a tower neare to the gate, perceiuing that thoſe within ſtood not vpon their guard, which was cauſed haply through their hope of compoſition, they ſeized vpon it, and began ſuddenly to enter the Citie, as well by that tower, as by the wall that was ruined: by reaſon whereof all that part of the armie running thither, the Marquis when he had ſet his bands in order, and ſent to Proſper to ſignifie vnto him what had happened, cauſing the trumpets to be ſounded, they entred into the Citie, wherein all the ſouldiers and citizens betaking themſelues ſome to flight, and ſome to ſhut themſelues in their houſes, there was no reſiſtance made. The Archbiſhop of Salerne and the Captaine of the guard, with many other Captaines and ſouldiers ſaued themſelues by ſea. The Duke, who for his diſeaſe was not able to ſtirre, cauſed the Pallace to be ſhut, and ſent word to the Marquis of Peſquiero that he would yeeld vnto him, in whoſe houſe he died within a few dayes after. Peter of Nauarre was taken, and all the goods of the Citie became a prey to the victors; many rich families binding themſelues, ſome to one band of ſouldiers and ſome to another, to pay a great ſumme of money, which they aſſured either with pawnes and gages, or with Merchants bils, to redeeme and ſaue their houſes from ſacking. In the ſame maner alſo was preſerued that famous diſh, which is kept with ſo great reuerence in the Cathedrall Church. It cannot be named what quantities of ſiluer veſſels, iewels, money, and moſt rich moueables were made pillage, that Citie by the great traffike of merchandize being repleniſhed with infinite wealth. And this ſo great

a calamitie was ſo much the more eaſie to be ſuffered, by how much at the prayers of the brethren of the Adornis, and for that the inhabitants had ſhewed no token of hatred, and becauſe they were almoſt vpon the point of accord, the Captaines gaue order that not one Genoway ſhould be made priſoner, nor any one woman forced. After this Anthonie Adorney was elected Duke, who after the armie was gone, incamped before the Caſtellet with ſuch artilleries as the Florentines had lent him, tooke the Citadell the third day, and the Church of Saint Francis, and the day after the Caſtellet, which was rendred to him by the Captaine vnder articles of compoſition. The mutation of Genes tooke from the French King all hope to be able to ſuccour the affaires of Lombardie: ſo that the armie that he had newly ſent, which was now arriued vpon the territories of Aſt, returned backe againe; and Monſieur d'Eſcut although he had ſtayed in Cremona certaine dayes beyond the time appointed for certaine difficulties which happened touching the Caſtles of Treſſo, Lecquo and Domuſſola, when they were reſolued, he paſſed into France with his companies, and in his departure had not onely kept faith with him, but alſo was honorably receiued and entertained whereſoeuer he paſſed.

But at the ſame time when theſe things ſucceeded in Lombardie, Bologna ſtood not altogether in quiet, as well by reaſon of that warre, as for the abſence of the Pope: and Tuſcane alſo was much leſſe peaceable. For touching Bologna, Hannibal Bentiuole, and with him Hannibal Rangon, when they had ſecretly gotten together an armie of foure thouſand footmen, approched one morning by the breake of day with three peeces of artilleries on that ſide towards the mountaines; and for that they in the towne made no bruite, ſome of them paſſed the ditch, and faſtened their ladders to the wall: but the inhabitants within, who had knowledge of their comming the day before, beginning to make a noiſe when they ſaw it was time, and to giue fire to the artilleries, and many iſſuing out at the ſame inſtant to aſſaile them, they put them preſently to flight, leauing their artilleries behind, and in the chaſe Hannibal Rangon was hurt in the back. It was beleeued almoſt for certaine, that this enterpriſe was attempted by the knowledge and conſent of the Cardinall de Medicis, who fearing leſt the Pope at his coming into Italy, either of his owne counſell, or by the incitation of others, would ſeeke to diminiſh his greatneſſe, deſired that being troubled for ſo great a loſſe of the Eccleſiaſtike Eſtate, he might not onely haue need to thinke vpon other matters then to perſecute him, but alſo be conſtrained to haue recourſe to his aide and counſell. But far more tedious and great were the trauels and dangers of Tuſcane, for that the Eſtate of Sienna was ſcarcely aſſured of the Duke of Vrbin, and the affaires of Perouſa and Montfeltro pacified, when the French King by the ſuggeſtion of the Cardinal of Volterra, gaue order again that Ranſe de Cere who lay at Rome without any employment, ſhould aſſay to charge the Eſtate of Florence, reeſtabliſhing in that Citie the brethren and nephewes of the Cardinall of Volterra, who had declared himſelfe with all his, friend and confederate of the King: for which enterpriſe, becauſe the King at that time was in great neceſſitie, the Cardinall was to aduance all neceſſarie ſummes of money, receiuing the Kings promiſe to repay them within a certaine time. Whileſt Ranſe was making his preparations, theſe matters coming to the knowledge of the Cardinall de Medicis, conſtrained him for feare leſt the Duke of Vrbin ſhould likewiſe ſtirre, to agree, that without preiudice to the rights which the Florentines and the Duke pretended to the townes in Montfeltro, the Duke ſhould be Captaine generall of that Commonweale for one whole yeare, and for another yeare at pleaſure, and that the time of his pay ſhould begin the firſt day of the next moneth of September. For the ſame cauſe he retained in the pay of the Florentines Horace Baillon, but with this condition, that the time of his pay ſhould not begin vntill the moneth of Iune, for that he was entertained and bound to the Venetians vntil that time: which contract although it was likewiſe made in the name of Malateſta his brother, yet he would not ratifie it, for that hauing afore receiued money to ioyne himſelfe with Ranſe de Cere with a charge of two thouſand footmen and an hundred light horſemen, he would not openly blemiſh his owne honour, nor on the other ſide prouoke the hatred of the Cardinall and the Florentines by giuing them new occaſions: and therefore fayning himſelfe to be ſicke, he ſent to Ranſe, being then come to the borough of Pieua, two thouſand footmen, an hundred light horſemen, and foure Falconets, making excuſe, that becauſe of his ſickneſſe he could not go thither in perſon: and to the Cardinall he gaue hope that he would take no more payes of the enemie; and that as ſoone as the terme was finiſhed for the which he had bene payed, he would ratifie the contract made in his name, and that in the meane time he would proceed with as great moderation as he could in ſuch actions as he could not refuſe by reaſon of the payes he had receiued. After this, Ranſe entred into the territorie of Sienna with fiue hundred horſe and ſeuen thouſand footmen, to attempt the mutation of that gouernment, with a traine of the ſelfe ſame exiles which had followed the Duke of Vrbin: and if the enterpriſe had ſorted to good iſſue, it was not to be doubted, he hauing power by that meanes to enter on that ſide into the bowels of the Florentine dominion, but the like ſucceſſe would haue followed him touching the affaires of Florence. But on the other ſide, the Florentines foreſeeing that danger, and deſiring that the enemies ſhould not approch to Sienna, had ſent to that State all their regiments vnder the conduct of Guido Rangon, elected for that emotion Generall of the armie: whoſe intention was to conſtraine the enemies to loſe time; for that he was not ignorant that without ſome happie ſucceſſe they would quickly fall into want of money; and alſo to cut off and ſtop their victuals as much as he could: gouerning himſelfe therefore according to the proceedings of the enemies, he laboured to put ſeuerall garriſons, ſometime into theſe townes, and ſometime into others that were neareſt to the Eſtates of the Siennois and the Florentines. In which remouing of ſouldiers from one place to another, it happened that the companie of horſemen of Vitelli going from Torrita to Aſinalunga, encountred on the way with three hundred horſemen of the enemies, and were ouerthrowne, Ieronimo de Peppoli Lieutenant to Vitelli being taken priſoner with fiftie men at armes and two enſignes. Ranſe addreſſed himſelfe firſt to the Citie of Chiuſa, a Citie more noble for the memorie of her antiquitie and the renowmed acts of Porſenna her King, then for her preſent condition; which being not won, for that bringing with him no nother artilleries then foure falconets, it was very difficult to take townes that were defended with ſouldiers, he paſſed further betweene Torrita and Aſinalunga, to draw neare to Sienna; but hauing no commoditie of victuals amid ſo many townes of the enemies, and ſeeking to get ſome by force, he aſſailed the Caſtle of Torrita, where was in garriſon an hundred men at armes of Count Guido Rangons, & fifteen hundred footmen; and when he had leuied his campe from thence without doing any thing, keeping his way, he went to Montelifre, and from thence to Bagno de Rapolano, which is within twelue miles of Sienna, in which Citie the Florentines in the beginning had beſtowed the Count Petillano. But the Count Guido preuenting by his diligence and celeritie all theſe deuices, entred the ſame day into Sienna with two hundred light horſemen, leauing his armie behind, which followed after: ſo that the ſuccours that approched, and the reputation of Ranſe which diminiſhed greatly in this expedition, as well with his owne companies as amongſt the enemies, together with the knowledge that he was reduced into great neceſſitie of victuals, brought no litle diſcourage to them of Sienna, who were very deſirous of alteration: and yet he preſented himſelfe within halfe a mile of the walls, and ſeeing no inſurrection made in his fauour, retired, hauing remained there foure and twentie houres; and the ſame day that he retired (but after he was gone) the bands of the Florentines entred into Sienna; who albeit they were put in readineſſe to purſue him, yet they ſtayed when they ſaw they could not ouertake him, and ſuffered certaine light horſemen to follow him, and certaine bands of footmen which were before at Sienna, by whom he receiued no great domage: but his retraite being in haſte, and haply no leſſe by reaſon of famine, then for feare, he left his artilleries by the wayes, which to his great diſhonour fell into the power of the enemies. He ſtayed at Acquapendente to redreſſe his companies which were much diminiſhed; a place ſo much the more aſſured to him, by how much he knew well that the Florentine bands would abſtaine from entring vpon the lands of the Church: but falling into want of money and other prouiſions, and the Cardinals of Volterra, Monte, and Coma, with whom by the French Kings direction he communicated touching his affaires, beginning now to deſpiſe him, he ouerranne and ſpoiled with thoſe few bands of ſouldiers that remained with him, the ſea-coaſts of Sienna, where in vaine he gaue an aſſault to Orbatello: for which cauſe the Florentines hauing made their armie to march towards the bridge of Centina, which is the confine betweene the eſtate of Sienna and the dominion of the Church, perceiuing that Ranſe did not wholly diſſolue his bands, threatned to inuade the lands of the Church; ſo that the Colledge of Cardinals, to whom it was diſpleaſing that this fire ſhould take hold of the Eſtate of the Church, interpoſed to accord them; a matter indifferently pleaſing to them both: It was acceptable to the Florentines, for that by it they were drawne out of a burthen of expences which they made without any fruite: and to Ranſe it was no leſſe welcome, for that both he was ill furniſhed for the preſent, and alſo had no hope to increaſe his forces, ſpecially the affaires of the French declining in Lombardie. The accord contained no other matter then a bare promiſe not to offend one another; which promiſe was made betweene the Florentines and Siennois on the one part, and Ranſe de Cere on the other, putting in pledge at Rome of fiftie thouſand duckats for aſſurance of the obſeruation: and touching the pillage that had bene made, they referred themſelues to the arbitration of the Pope when he ſhould come into Italy. This Winter there happened in the towne of Lutques a dangerous accident: for one Vincent Poggio of a noble family, and Laurence Totti, vnder colour of particular diſcords, but haply puſhed on rather by ambition and pouertie, tooke armes, and in the publike Pallace ſlue the chiefe Magiſtrate of that Citie: and after running through the Citie, did the like to many other citizens their aduerſaries, with ſuch an vniuerſall feare, that not one durſt oppoſe againſt them. Neuertheleſſe the firſt violence being ceaſſed, thoſe which had amazed others beginning to be fearfull of themſelues, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the offence they had committed, and many citizens interpoſing therein, they iſſued out of the Citie vnder certaine conditions, and when they were gone, they were euery where ſharply perſecuted by the Lucquois. The matters of Lombardie and Tuſcane being appeaſed, as we haue ſaid, but the Colledge of Cardinals taking no care of the Eſtates of the Church, partly for the Popes abſence, but more for the ambition and diſagreements that were among themſelues; Sigiſmund the ſonne of Pandolfe Malateſta an ancient Lord of Rimini, tooke the gouernment of that Citie almoſt wholly into his hands, hauing therein but a very ſmall intelligence. And albeit the Cardinall de Medicis at the inſtance of the Colledge, went to Bologna as Legate of that Citie, both to recouer Rimini, and to reorder the other affaires of Romagna which were much troubled, and that the Colledge had promiſed to ſend to his ſuccours the Marquis of Mantua Captaine generall of the Church: yet nothing ſorted to effect, as well for want of money, as for that the Cardinals that were his aduerſaries, hindered all deliberations whereby his reputation might be any whit increaſed.

THE ARGVMENT.

Pope Adrian comes to Rome. The Venetians make league with the Emperour. The Frenchmen beſiege Millan, and are conſtrained afterwards to returne from it. The Cardinall de Medicis is created Pope. King Francis deſcendeth into Italy: he taketh Millan and beſiegeth Pauie. The Emperour Charles ſendeth out an armie to the ſuccours of Pauie, where a battell is fought, and the French king taken priſoner.

ALbeit the late victorie againſt the French had pacified the affaires of Lombardie, yet for all that it had not diminiſhed the ſuſpition, that the French King, his kingdome being peaceable and entire, and his Captaines and men at armes whom he had ſent into Italy returned in ſafetie, would within a ſhort time come againe to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan, ſpecially ſeeing the Swiſſers were ready to take his pay, as before, and the Senate of Venice ſtood firme with him in the ancient confederation. By the conſideration of which danger, the Imperiall Captaines were conſtrained to nouriſh and pay the armie; which was a matter of great difficultie, for that they receiued not any money, either from the Emperour, or from the kingdome of Naples, and the Eſtate of Millan was ſo drained thereof, that it was not able alone to ſuſtaine either ſo many ſouldiers, or ſo great expences: and therefore (the people and the Colledge of Cardinals oppoſing againſt it in vaine) they had ſent the greateſt part of their companies to lodge vpon the ſtate of the Church: and Don Charles de Lanoy, lately made Viceroy of Naples by the death of Don Raimond de Cardona, paſſing by Rome, reſolued with Don Iohn Manuel, that for the ſpace of three moneths the Eſtate of Millan ſhould pay twentie thouſand duckats a moneth, the Florentines fifteene thouſand, the Genowayes eight thouſand, Sienna fiue thouſand, and Lucques foure thouſand. And albeit euery one murmured againſt this taxation, yet for the feare that was had of that armie, it behoued them all to agree to it: and touching them, they ſaid it was neceſſarie, ſeeing that the defence of all Italy depended vpon the maintaining of the armie: and after the three moneths were ended, the impoſition was renewed, but the taxe was much leſſe. In this eſtate of affaires, Italy being oppreſſed with continuall aduerſities, and terrified with the feare of greater euils that threatned it, deſired the comming of the Pope, as an apt and conuenient inſtrument, by reaſon of the Pontificall authoritie, to appeaſe many diſcords, and prouide for many diſorders. And albeit the Emperour, who at the ſame time was gone into Spaine by ſea, and in his way had communicated with the King of England, intreated the Pope to tarrie for him at Barcelona, whither he would come in perſon to acknowledge him for Pope and to honour him, yet he would not abide his coming, either fearing leſt for the great diſtance of the Emperour, who as yet was in the extreme confines of Spaine, he ſhould loſe ſo much time, that afterward his nauigation might become more rough and dangerous, or for doubt leſt the Emperour would ſolicite him to deferre his voyage, or elſe (as many iudged) for feare too much to increaſe the opinion conceiued of him from the beginning, that he would be ſo much at the Emperours command, that he would hinder him in procuring an vniuerſall peace among Chriſtians, which he was determined to do. He paſſed therefore by ſea to Rome, where he made his entrie the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt, with a very great concourſe of people, and of all the whole Court: of whom albeit his coming was exceſſiuely deſired (for Rome without the preſence of the Pope, is rather like a deſart then a Citie,) yet that ſpectacle troubled the mindes of all men, when they conſidered that they had a Pope for nation a ſtranger, altogether vnexperienced in the affaires of Italy and the Court, and not ſo much as of thoſe nations who by long conuerſation were familiar with

The Prouinces of Italy are taxed for the conſeruation of the Duchie of Millan.

Pope Adrian the ſixt cometh to Rome.

Italy:

Italy: and the griefe that ſtirred vp in men this conſideration was augmented, for that the plague which began at his arriuall in Rome, afflicted the Citie during the whole ſeaſon of Autumne; a matter which was conſtrued for an euill prognoſtication of his Pontificacie. The firſt deliberation of this Pope, was to take care for the recouering of Rimini, and to put end to the controuerſies which the Duke of Ferrara had continued with two of his lateſt predeceſſors: and for this cauſe he ſent into Romagna fifteene hundred Spaniſh footmen, which he had brought with him for the more ſuretie of his paſſage by ſea. Whileſt the Pope buſied himſelfe in theſe actions, it ſeemed to the Emperor that it would be a matter of great importance, and which would much aſſure the affaires of Italy, if he could ſeparate the Venetians from the French King; and he was of opinion that the Senate (hauing but ſmall hope that the French could ſtand them in any great ſtead) would be inclined to peace; and would not for the intereſts of others, put themſelues in danger to bring the warre vpon their owne Eſtates: and herein he communicated with the King of England, who afore had ſecretly lent him money againſt the French King, and afterwards laying aſide diſſimulations, began openly to take part againſt him. They ſent Embaſſadours to Venice, to require the Venetians to confederate with the Emperour for the defence of Italy; and the Embaſſadours were, Ierome Adorna for the Emperour, and Richard Paſe for the King of England: and there was expectation of an Embaſſadour from Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria the Emperors brother, the interpoſition and conſent of whom, by reaſon of many quarrels that were betweene the Venetians and him, was neceſſarie in all accords. Beſides, the King of England ſent an Herald to denounce warre againſt the French King, in caſe he would not come to a generall truce with the Emperour for three yeares in all parts of the world, wherein ſhould be comprehended, the Church, the Duke of Millan, and the Florentines: complaining alſo that he had ceaſſed to pay him the fiftie thouſand crownes which he was bound to anſwer him yearely. But the French King refuſed to make truce; and touching the fiftie thouſand crownes, he anſwered plainly, that it was not conuenient for him to pay money to him that aided his enemies with money: an anſwer which ſo aggrauated the diſdaines betweene them, that the Embaſſadours on both ſides were reuoked.

The King of England for the Emperour: and ſendeth Embaſſadours to the Venetians to draw them from the alliance of the French.

This yeare departed out of Italy Don Iohn Manuel, who had bene the Emperors Embaſſador at Rome with very great authoritie; and at his departure made to the Florentines a ſcedule ſubſigned with his hand, declaring that the Emperour by a ſcedule written in September in the yeare 1520, had promiſed to Pope Leo to reconfirme and grant againe to the Florentines the priuiledges of eſtate, of authoritie, and of the townes which they held, within the ſixe moneths after the firſt Diot that was holden after his coronation at Aix, which he had promiſed them afore within foure moneths after his election, and then had told them he could not at this time do it for many iuſt cauſes: which things Don Iohn promiſed againe in the name of the Emperour, who ratified the ſcedule in March in the yeare 1523, and deliuered the expedition of it in writing, in a moſt ample forme.

The Emperour (as hath bene ſayd before) paſſed this yeare into Spaine, where after he was arriued he proceeded ſeuerely againſt many that had bene authors of the ſedition, and pardoned all others, remitting all the puniſhment: and to ioyne with iuſtice and clemencie, exãples of remuneratiõ, he called to the Court with great honor, Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, who refuſing to be Captaine of the Commons that rebelled, would not come out of the Caſtle of Sciatiua, and ſhortly after gaue him in mariage Madame Germana, ſometimes wife to the King Catholike, who was rich but barren; to the end that houſe ſhould determine in him, who was the laſt of the deſcendants of old Alphonſo King of Aragon, two of his yonger brethren being dead before, the one in France, and the other in Italy. But that which made this ſame yeare vnhappie, to the great infamie of all Chriſtian Princes, was, that in the end thereof Soliman Ottoman tooke the Ile of Rhodes, kept by the Knights of Rhodes, who were formerly called the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, who abiding in that place euer ſince they were driuen out of Ieruſalem, notwithſtanding they were betweene two ſo mightie Princes, as the Turke and the Soldan, had a long time preſerued themſelues, to the great glorie of their Order, and bene as a rampier of Chriſtian Religion in thoſe ſeas: although they were not without ſome note of infamie, for that hauing a continuall cuſtome, for the better defending of thoſe ſhores, to ſpoile the veſſels of the Infidels, they ſometimes forgot themſelues ſo much, as to make pillage of the ſhips of Chriſtians. A wonderfull great armie remained many moneths about the Iland, and the Turke himſelfe was there in perſon, who loſt not one minute of time, but moleſted them continually, ſometimes giuing moſt furious aſſaults, ſometimes caſting mines and trenches, and ſometimes he raiſed maruellous platformes of earth and wood, whoſe height ouertopped the walls of the towne; by reaſon of which workes, which were not performed without a wonderful butcherie and ſlaughter of his ſouldiers, the number of thoſe within was ſo much diminiſhed, that wearied with continuall trauels, wanting powder, and being no longer able to reſiſt ſo many vexations, when the artilleries had caſt downe to ꝧ ground a great quantitie of the wals, and the mines had paſſed into many parts of the towne, where being conſtrained to abandon their firſt places, they found themſelues continually more ſtraighted, at laſt being brought to the laſt neceſſities, they capitulated with the Turke: That the great Maſter ſhould leaue the towne to him: That as well he as the Knights of the Order ſhould depart in ſafetie, with libertie to carrie with them as much of their goods as they could: and for their better ſuretie, that the Turke ſhould cauſe his fleet to retire out of thoſe quarters, & withdraw his army by land fiue miles frō Rhodes.

Rhodes rēdred vp to the Turk.

By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the Chriſtians, promiſe being kept vnto them, paſſed into Sicily, and afterwards into Italy. They found in Sicily an armie by ſea compounded of a certaine number of veſſels, which was appointed (but too late, by the Popes fault) to put into Rhodes reliefe of victuals and munitions, as ſoone as they could get a conuenient wind. After they were departed from Rhodes, Soliman for a greater contempt to Chriſtian Religion, made his entrie into that Citie vpon the birth day of the Sonne of God: on which day, which is celebrated with infinite ſongs and muſicke in the Churches of Chriſtians, he conuerted all the Churches of Rhodes, dedicated to the ſeruice of Ieſus Chriſt, into Moſqueis, the which, according to their cuſtome, all the ceremonies of the Chriſtians being aboliſhed, were dedicated to Mahomet. The yeare one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and two had an end thus infamous for the Chriſtian name, and ſuch fruite had the diſcords of our Princes, ſomewhat tollerable, if at leaſt the examples of harmes paſt had made them wiſe for the time to come.

1523. But diſcords continuing among the Princes, the troubles of the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred twentie and three were nothing leſſe; in the beginning whereof the family of the Malateſtes knowing how vnable they were to reſiſt the Popes forces, were content (by the mediation of the Duke of Vrbin) to leaue Rimini and the Caſtle, vnder this vncertaine hope, that there ſhould be reſerued for Pandolfe ſome reaſonable eſtate and meanes to liue, wherein nothing was done. Afterwards the Duke of Vrbin went to the Pope, with whom and with the moſt part of the Court, the glorious memorie of Pope Iulio furthering him much, he obtained abſolution of the Church cenſures, and was inueſted againe in the Duchie of Vrbin, but with this clauſe, Without preiudice of the rights, nor to hinder the application that had bin made to the Florentines of the countrey of Montfeltro, who ſaid they had lent to Pope Leo three hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats for the defence of that Duchie, and had expended ſince his death in diuers places for the preſeruation of the Eſtate of the Church, more then threeſcore and ten thouſand. The Pope receiued alſo into grace the Duke of Ferrara, inueſting him againe not onely of Ferrara, and of all that he poſſeſſed appertaining to the Church afore the warre of Pope Leo againſt the French men, but alſo he left to him (with note of infamie to himſelfe or the officers that abuſed his ignorance) the iuriſdiction of the boroughs of Saint Felix and Finale: which townes being conquered at ſuch time as he began the warre againſt Pope Leo, and loſt again before the death of Pope Leo, he had ſeized on them again by the occaſion of the vacancie of the Sea. The Duke of Ferrara bound himſelfe to aide and ſuccour the Church in times of need with certaine numbers of men, and if he ſhould hereafter any more happen to offend the Sea Apoſtolike, he ſubmitted himſelfe in that caſe to verie great penalties, conſenting alſo to the nullitie of this inueſtiture, and to the priuation of all his rights. Moreouer the Pope gaue him great hope that he would reſtore to him Modena and Reggio, although when it was told him afterwards of what importance ſuch an indowment was, as alſo the infamie that would fall vpon him thereby conſidering the examples of his predeceſſors, his mind was dayly more eſtranged therefrom. About this time thoſe within the Caſtle of Millan ſuffering wants of all things except bread, and being almoſt all ſicke, they agreed to yeeld it vp, their liues and goods ſaued, if they were not ſuccoured before the fourteenth day of Aprill: and the ſame day the compoſition being kept, the moſt part of them were found dead. The Emperour conſented, with with no litle applauſe of the Italians, that it ſhould be put into the poſſeſſion of Duke Francis Sforce: and albeit there was no other peece in Italy that held for the French, except the Caſtle of Cremona, which had as yet a plentifull prouiſion of all things neceſſarie, yet theſe ſucceſſes did nothing qualifie the infelicities and aduerſities of the peoples of that Duchie, who were wonderfully oppreſſed with the armie of the Emperour, for that it was not payed, and which being gone to lodge within Aſt and the confines about it, and falling into tumult for the ſame cauſe, made pillage of the whole countrey, euen as farre as Vigeuena: ſo that the inhabitants of Millan, to auoide the harmes and domages of the countrey, were conſtrained to promiſe them their payes for a certaine time, amounting almoſt to an hundred thouſand duckats: and yet for all theſe aduerſities and rigours, the hatreds of that people againſt the French was nothing abated; and that which made them ſtand firme, was partly a feare, for the memorie of the iniuries they had done them; and partly a hope, that if that danger were once at an end, the French King would no more aſſaile that State, and ſo they ſhould be deliuered of thoſe great burthens; for that it ſhould be no more neceſſarie for the Emperour to entertaine ſouldiers in that Duchie. At this time the negociation of peace betweene the Emperour and the Venetians was continually ſolicited, which for many difficulties that happened, and diuers delayes interpoſed by the Venetians, held the minds of al men in ſuſpence what would be the euent of it. That which cauſed this matter to be more dilatorie, and haply increaſed the difficulties, was the death of Ierome Adorno, who although he were yong, was a man of great courage and experience, and debated the matter with great authoritie and ſingular dexteritie: in whoſe place was ſent thither in the name of the Emperour from Millan, Martin Carocciolo Pronotarie Apoſtolike, who many yeares after was created Cardinall by Pope Paul the third. Many moneths were ſpent in this negociation at Venice, for that on the other ſide the French King by his Embaſſadours vſed continually great diligence to the contrary, promiſing ſometimes by letters, and ſometimes by eſpeciall meſſengers, that he would deſcend ſpeedily into Italy with a puiſſant armie: by reaſon whereof there was great diuerſitie of opinions among the Senators, and continuall diſputations. For many gaue counſell not to abandon the alliance of the French King; perſwading themſelues that he would preſently ſend an armie into Italy: which hope the French King labouring with wonderfull diligence to maintaine, had, beſides many others, ſent Raphe de Cere to Venice againe, to promiſe as much, and to publiſh that things were alreadie prepared. Others conſidering by the experience of things paſt, the negligent execution of that King, could not beleeue that he would paſſe into Italy: and this opinion was increaſed by the letters of Iohn Baduero their Embaſſadour in France, who giuing credite to that which had bene reported to him frō the Duke of Bourbon, who being already very ſecretly conioyned againſt the King, wiſhed the Venetians to vnite themſelues with the Emperour, affirming that for that yeare the King would neither paſſe in perſon, nor ſend an armie into Italy. Others ſtood amazed no leſſe for the ill ſucceſſe of the King, then for the good fortunes of the Emperour, and for the conſideration, that in Italy the Duke of Millan, the Genowayes and the Florentines, together with all Tuſcane followed the faction of the Emperor; beleeuing that the Pope would do the like: and out of Italy his brother the Archduke, confining vpon the Venetian Eſtates, and the King of England who made continuall warre in Picardie, were conioyned with him. In which diuerſitie of opinions, no leſſe among the principals of the Senate, then among others, the deliberation could be no longer delayed, as well for the forwardneſſe of things, as for the great importunitie of the Emperours Embaſſadours; by whoſe continuall ſolicitation the Councell of the Pregati was called together to ſet downe a reſolution; and in this aſſembly Andrew Gritti, a man for the great offices he had adminiſtred, and for many excellent exploits of verie great authoritie in that Commonweale, and of eſpeciall reputation through all Italy and with forreine Princes, ſpake (as the report goeth) in this ſort:

Although I am not ignorant (moſt excellent Senators) that in giuing counſell at this preſent not to depart from the confederation with the French King, ſome will interpret it, that the reſpect of the long converſation which I haue had with the French, doth preuaile more in me, then the care of the good and profite of the Commonweale; yet for all that I will not abſtaine from vttering freely mine opinion, which is the dutie of euery good Citizen, yea in ſuch ſort, as he who for any cauſe whatſoeuer forbeareth to perſwade others to that which in himſelfe he knoweth to be good for the Commonweale, is both an vnprofitable Citizen and Senator. And yet I am perſwaded, that among men of diſcretion this interpretation will find no place, both

« both for that they will not onely consider what haue bene my customes and actions in all times « past, but also that I neuer negociated any matter with the French King nor his Councell, o- « therwise but as your Agent, and according to your commission and commandement: and fur- « ther (if I deceiue not my selfe) the great reasons that moue me to be of this opinion, shall iu- « stifie me herein. We dispute whether we ought to make a new confederation with the Empe- « rour, contrary to the faith we haue giuen, and against the couenants of the League which we « haue with the French King; which in my iudgement is no other thing, then to go about so to « assure and confirme the power of the Emperour already vniuersally redoubted, that when we « shall be altogether vnable to moderate and embase it, it will continually increase, to our right « great and apparent preiudice. We haue no occasion that can iustifie that deliberation, for that « the King hath alwayes obserued the alliance made with vs; and if the effects haue not bene so « prompt to renew the warre in Italy, it is manifest, seeing his proper interests incite him thereto, « that this hath proceeded of no other matter then of the impediments he hath had, and still hath « in the kingdome of France, which haue for a time hindered his designes, but cannot dissolue « and annihilate them: for that he hath so great a desire to recouer the Duchie of Millan, and his « power is so great, that when he hath sustained the first furie of his enemies, which he will easily « do, nothing will let him to renew his armie and recontinue the warre in Italy. King Lewis may « serue for example more then once of both these matters, who when France was assailed with « armies more mightie then those that now vexe it, and that almost all the world had conspired a- « gainst him, he defended himself easily by the greatnes of his forces, the strength of his frontiers « and places confining, and the fidelitie of his people; and when all men thought that necessitie « would driue him to retire himselfe for a time, by reason of the length and troublesomnesse of « the warre, he sent suddenly into Italy very puissant armies. The King now reigning, did he not « the like in the first yeares of his reigne, when all men beleeued, that because he was newly ascen- « ded to the Crowne, and finding his treasures consumed by the infinite expences of his prede- « cessor, he would put off the war till another yeare? This deferring therefore ought not to asto- « nish vs, neither can it be any sufficient excuse for our variations; for as much as the confederate « that is slow, not of will, but by impediments that happen, giues to his companion no iust cause « to complaine, nor any honest colour to depart from his confederation. The consideration of « the honestie and dignitie of the Venetian Senate doth chalenge at our hands this deliberation, « and no lesse are we prouoked by the regard of our profite and proper safetie. For who knowes « not how profitable it shall be for vs, and from how many dangers we shall be deliuered, if the « French King recouer the Estate of Millan, and how great repose will turne thereby to our af- « faires for many yeares? Hereof the example of matters lately hapned doth admonish vs: for at « such time as the King that now is had recouered it, we, who afore defended Padua and Treuisa « with many dangers and very great expences, came to recouer Bressia and Verona; and whilest « he peaceably enioyed that Duchie, we possessed with very great peace and suretie all our domi- « nions: which are examples that much more ought to moue vs then the ancient memorie of the « League of Cambray, for that the Kings of France haue learned by experience that which they « could neuer comprehend by reason, how preiudiciall it hath bene to them to depart from our « alliance; a matter which without all comparison they may best discerne at this present time, « wherein this King hath for his aduersarie an Emperour, a Prince of so many kingdomes, and of « such greatnesse, whose power will keepe him in necessitie to desire and hold most deare our al- « liance. But on the contrary, who seeth not, and who knoweth not in what danger our affaires « will remaine, when the French King shall find himselfe meerely excluded from the enterprises of « Italy? For who can let the Emperour to appropriate to himselfe or to his brother the Duchie of « Millan, of the which he would neuer to this day transferre the inuestiture to Francis Sforce? And « if he haue power to do do, (as it is most apparent) what is he that can be assured of his will? « who is he that can promise, the Duchie of Millan being a ladder to climbe to the Empire of all « Italy, that iustice and conscience will beare more sway in the Emperour then ambition and « couetousnesse, proper and naturall to all great Princes? Haply the moderation and temperance « of the officers which he hath in Italy, may assure vs, which are almost all Spaniards, a nation vn- « faithfull, greedie, and insatiable aboue all others. If therefore the Emperour or his brother Fer- « dinand do appropriate Millan to themselues, in what degree shall our Estate remaine, being « enuironed by them both, on the confines of Italy and Germanie? what remedies can we expect

in our dangers? the kingdome of Naples being in his poſſeſſion, the Pope and all the other Potentates of Italy depending vpon him, and all our friends ſo exhauſted, and conſumed in forces, that we can hope for no aide from them? But if the French King ſhall poſſeſſe the Duchie of Millan, matters ſtanding ballanced betweene two ſo great Kings, he that ſhould haue cauſe to feare the power of the one, ſhould find peace and ſuretie by the might of the other; yea rather, the only feare of his coming aſſureth all the reſidue, for that the Imperials are reſtrained therby from entring into armes, or to intangle themſelues with any enterpriſe. By reaſon whereof the vanitie of their threatnings to turne the armie againſt vs, if we confederate not with the Emperour, ſeemes to me more ridiculous then terrible, as though it were an eaſie enterpriſe to moue warre againſt the Senate of Venice, and wherof there were preſent ſuretie of the victorie, and as though that were the meanes and remedie to keepe the French King from paſſing, and not rather the cauſe of the contrarie. For who doubteth, that being prouoked by them, being drawne by neceſſitie, we would propound to the King ſuch conditions, that though he had no inclination thereto, we ſhould induce him to paſſe? Happened it not euen ſo in the time of King Lewis, when the iniuries and treaſons that were done vnto vs by them, enforced vs ſo to ſtirre vp that King, when of his priſoner I became your Embaſſadour, that at a time when he ſtood in greateſt feare to be mightily inuaded in his kingdome of France, he ſent (although with very ill ſucceſſe) his armie into Italy. Let vs not beleeue, if the Imperials thought the way to draw vs to their amitie or to aſſure themſelues of the French King, were to ſet vpon vs, that they would haue deferred till this day to put it in execution. Perhaps their Captaines haue no deſire to enrich themſelues with the profits and ſpoyles of warre, haply they haue had no neceſſitie to disburden the countries of their friends, and in disburdening them to haue the meanes to draw mony from them to nouriſh the armie in the countreys of others. But they haue found, that by reaſon of our power, it is too hard a matter to force vs, and that it is not for their profit, hauing continuall feare of the deſcending of the French King, to entangle themſelues with another warre, nor to giue occaſion to a State ſo mightie in men and money, by great offers to allure the French to march. So long as they are in theſe ſuſpitions and in theſe doubts, they will not occupie for themſelues the Duchie of Millan, neither will they ſeeke to offend vs but with vaine threatenings: whereas if we free them of that feare, it will be in their power to do both the one and the other: and if they do it, as it is likely they will, of whom may we complaine more then of our ſelues, and of our great feare and vnmeaſurable deſire of peace? which is then moſt holy, and moſt to be embraced, when it puts men out of ſuſpition, when it increaſeth not the danger, and when it brings a meanes to ſit downe in tranquillitie, and to cut off great expences. But when it produceth contrary effects, it is vnder the abuſiue name of peace, a moſt pernicious warre, and vnder the name of a wholeſome medicine, a mortall poyſon. If then by confederating our ſelues with the Emperor we diuert the French king frō his enterpriſe of Italy, we ſhall giue occaſion to ỹ Emperor to ſeize vpon the Duchie of Millan at his pleaſure, and that being taken, he hath meanes to bethink himſelfe how to embaſe vs; whereof it wil follow, that we ſhall buy, with great infamie to our name, and by defacing the faith of this Commonweale, the greatneſſe of a Prince, who hath no leſſe extended his ambition then his power, and who (ioyning with him his brother) hath ſet downe this pretence, that all that we poſſeſſe in the firme land appertaineth vnto them; and reiect and exclude out of Italy, a King, who by his greatneſſe aſſureth the libertie of all the reſidue, and who will be conſtrained to remaine ſtraitly conioyned with vs. He therefore that propoundeth theſe reaſons ſo euident and ſenſible, cannot be ſaid to be puſhed on more by affection then by truth, and not by any particular intereſt, then with the loue he beares to the Commonweale; of the ſafetie and preſeruation of which we need not doubt, if God giue ſo much happineſſe to your counſels, as he hath giuen wiſdome to this moſt excellent Senate.

But on the contrary, George Cornaro, a Gentleman of equall authoritie, and who had the fame to be as wiſe as any other in that Councell, ſpake as followeth: Aſſuredly the matter we haue in hand (moſt worthy Senators) is great, and very difficult; yet when I conſider the infidelitie and ambition of the Princes of theſe times, and how much they differ from the nature of Commonweales, who gouerning not by the appetite of one alone, but with the conſent of many, do proceed with more moderation and regard, and neuer depart ſhamefully (as Princes vſe to do) from that which hath any ſhew of iuſtice or honeſtie: I cannot but conclude, that it is moſt

" moſt hurtfull for vs to haue the Duchie of Millan poſſeſſed by a Prince more mightie then our
" ſelues, ſeeing that neceſſarily ſuch a neighbourhood will hold vs in continuall doubts and ve" xations; and though we enioy peace, yet we ſhall alwayes liue in continuall thoughts of warre, " notwithſtanding all Leagues of alliance or confederations whatſoeuer. Hereof are found infi" nite examples in ancient ſtories, and ſome in our owne, but none more great and notable then " that which with a bitter remembrance is imprinted in the hearts of vs all. This Senate brought
" Lewis the twelfth King of France into the Duchie of Millan, at which vnhappie deliberation
" many of vs were preſent: we always kept our faith iuſtly with him in all Capitulations, notwith-
" ſtanding by great offers and diuers occaſions we were ſolicited by the Spaniards and Lance-
" knights to leaue his alliance, and although we were well aſſured that he often practiſed many " things againſt vs. But neither the benefites receiued, nor faith giuen, nor ſo many perpetuall
" offices, could euer withdraw his mind from the great deſire he had to vexe vs: and in the end
" for the ſame cauſe reconciling himſelfe with his ancient and greateſt enemies, he contracted a-" gainſt vs that moſt pernicious confederation of Cambray. Therefore to eſcape thoſe dangers " that will alwayes hang ouer vs by the cautelous and ill aſſured neighbourhood of great Princes,
" we are conſtrained (if I be not deceiued) to direct all our counſels to this end, that neither the " French King nor the Emperour haue any footing in the Duchie of Millan, but that it may re-
" maine to Francis Sforce, or any other who hath no kingdomes nor other large dominions:
" whereof depends our ſuretie for the preſent, and (if the condition of times do change) a great
" increaſing and exaltation of our State may depend. We conſult now, whether we ſhould con" tinue amitie with the French King, or confederate our ſelues with the Emperour. By the one of " theſe two deliberations Francis Sforce is excluded abſolutely from the Duchie of Millan, and " an entrie left open to the French King, who is a Prince farre mightier then we: the other tendeth
" to aſſure and confirme in the ſame Duchie Francis Sforce, whom the Emperor offereth to com" prehend as principall in our confederation, and hath promiſed the King of England to protect
" him: ſo that though he would ſeeke to depriue him of that Eſtate, he ſhould not offend vs onely
" and the other Potentates of Italy (to whom he ſhould giue cauſe to turne againe to the part of " the French,) but ſhould likewiſe diſpleaſe the King of England, whom (as men know) it behoueth
" him greatly to reſpect, and alſo he ſhall prouoke againſt him all the inhabitants of the Duchie
" of Millan, who beare an vniuerſall inclination to Francis Sforce: and ſo ſubmitting himſelfe to " many difficulties and dangers, and to great infamie, he ſhould alſo go againſt his faith, which
" till this day we haue not found by any token that he hath defiled; a matter which we cannot ſay
" for the French: and in that he hath ſince the death of Pope Leo repoſſeſſed Francis Sforce of " that Eſtate, and deliuered vp the ſtrong holds to him ſucceſſiuely as they were conquered, and " laſtly the Caſtle of Millan, contrary to the opinion of many, it cannot be ſaid that he hath ſhe-
" wed ſignes contrary to his faith. Wherefore then ſhould we not rather embrace that counſell,
" wherein is diſcerned an apparent hope to come to the end of our intentions, then that which
" manifeſtly tendeth to an end contrary to our affaires? It may be obiected againſt this, that it
" were more dangerous for this Commonweale, if the Duchie of Millan were in the power of " the Emperour, then if it ſhould diuolue into the hands of the French King; for that it would be " in a maner neceſſarie for that King, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the Emperour, and for the e" mulation that is borne him, to perſeuere in our alliance: but in the Emperour the matter is al" together otherwiſe, as well for his power and might, as for the rights which he and his brother
" pretend againſt our Eſtate. I beleeue that he who hath ſuch an opinion of the Emperour, is not
" beguiled, conſidering the nature and cuſtome of ſuch great Princes: but God grant that he be " not deceiued, that holdeth not the ſame opinion of the French King. Many of the ſame reaſons
" made for his predeceſſor, and yet ambition & couetouſnes had more power in him, then either
" honeſtie or his owne profite: and beſides, the cauſes that might keepe him in league with vs
" are not perpetuall, but ſubiect to change from one time to another, according to the nature of " humane things. For the Emperour is mortall as well as other men, and according to the exam" ple of many Princes who haue bin mightier then he, is ſubiect to infinite accidents of fortune: &
" it is not long ſince, that all Spaine conſpiring againſt him, he ſeemed more worthy of pitie then
" of ſpite. And at leaſtwiſe there is not ſo great difference betweene the one danger and the other,
" as there is oddes betweene a counſel that wholly excludes vs from our purpoſe, and a reſolution
" which in more ſhew of truth leades vs to the accompliſhment of the ſame. Beſides, theſe reaſons

reſpect the time to come and farre off: but if we conſider the preſent eſtate of things, it is without all doubt that reiecting the alliance of the Emperour, we ſhall preſently put our ſelues into greater perplexities and dangers. For, if we ſeparate our ſelues from the French King, it is credible that he will deferre the warre vntill better times and fitter occaſions; but if we remaine conioyned with him, it may be that the Emperour will preſently make warre againſt vs; a matter which neceſſarily will heape vpon vs many troubles and expences: but let vs ſee in which caſe the iſſue of the warre will be more dangerous to vs. If we ioyne with the Emperour, it is almoſt not to be doubted but the victorie will fall on that ſide, which we cannot ſo aſſuredly promiſe to our ſelues if we ſtand conioyned with the French King. And in confedering with the Emperour, the victorie of the French cannot be ſo dangerous to vs, as it would be on the contrarie, for as much as in that caſe, all the forces of the victor would be turned againſt vs, and the Emperour would not onely haue a leſſe bridle and weaker impediments, but alſo he would ſtand almoſt in an abſolute neceſſitie to occupie the Duchie of Millan. Touching the obiection made againſt the bond of confederation, the anſwer is eaſie, for that our promiſe to the French King ſtretcheth onely to aide him to defend his Eſtates that he poſſeſſed in Italy, but not to recouer them when he ſhall haue loſt them; the articles of our capitulation expreſſe not that, neither do the ſame reaſons bind vs. We performed our dutie, when, after the loſſe of Millan happning through the default of their prouiſions, our ſouldiers receiued more harmes then the French men. We were acquitted of our promiſe, when Monſieur Lautrech returning to the warre with the Swiſſers, we ſent him our ſuccours: yea we haue done more then reaſonably might be required of vs, when, expecting ſo many moneths the coming of his armie, we receiued nothing from him but vaine hopes and diſſembled promiſes. If he were ſtayed by his owne will, why ſeek we to ſupport the imputation of his faults? If by neceſſitie, is not the ſame a ſufficient reaſon to iuſtifie vs, although we were bound? I know not why we ſhould be any more bound to the French King, ſeeing he hath firſt abandoned vs: I know not wherein one confederate can be more bound to another, or what our perils may profite him. I affirme not that the Emperours Captaines intend to moue warre at this time againſt vs, neither will I warrant the contrarie, conſidering with what neceſſitie they are preſſed to entertaine their armie in the Eſtates of others, and the hope they may conceiue to draw vs by that meanes to their alliance, ſpecially if the French King do not come: whereof whoſoeuer doubteth, doubteth not, in my opinion, without reaſon, for the negligence of the French; for that the King is in great want of money, and for the wars which he hath out of Italy with two ſo mightie Princes; and he that beleeueth our Embaſſadour herein is not to be blamed, for as much as Embaſſadours are the eyes and eares of Eſtates. But to make an end of ſpeaking, I will repeate the very ſame thing wherein is contained the ſumme of my ſpeech, to wit, that we ought to endeuour by all meanes that the Duchie of Millan be transferred to Francis Sforce, and conſequently I maintaine, that the counſell that guides vs to that effect, is more profitable, then that whereby we are altogether excluded therefrom.

The authoritie of two ſuch perſonages, and the force of their reaſons, did rather fill the minds of the Senators with doubts and perplexities, then any way aſſure them; ſo that the Senate deferred as much as they could to determine, being induced thereunto by their nature, the greatneſſe of the cauſe, and their deſire to ſee further into the preparations of the French King: as alſo there was cauſe, for the many difficulties that by neceſſitie happened in the accord with the Archduke. But that which held their minds moſt in ſuſpence, was, that the French King who with great induſtrie prepared himſelfe to the warre, had ſent the Biſhop of Bayeux to deſire them to deferre all the next moneth to reſolue, aſſuring them that before the end of that terme, he would march with a greater armie then had bene ſeene in Italy in that age. Now as they ſtood in this doubt, Anthonie Grimani Duke of that Citie died, and Andrew Gritti was choſen in his place; which was rather preiudiciall to the affaires of the French then otherwiſe: for when he was raiſed to that dignitie, he referred the deliberation wholly to the Senate, and would neuer afterwards either in word or deed ſhew himſelf inclined to either part. At laſt, becauſe the King ſent continually new meſſengers to the Senate, with very great offers, and that there was aduertiſement, that for the ſame cauſe Anne Montmorencie who was afterwards Great Conſtable of France, and Federike de Boſſolo, were comming; the Embaſſadours of the Emperour and the King of England (to whom this deferring was much ſuſpected) began to proteſt to the Senate, that they would depart within three dayes, and leaue all things imperfect: by reaſon whereof the Senate being conſtrained to determine, and the truſt that might be giuen to the French kings promiſes diminiſhed, for that they had bene entertained many moneths with vaine hopes, but chiefly for that their Embaſſador reſident in France aſſured them of the contrarie, they reſolued to embrace the amitie of the Emperor, with whom they entred into contract vnder theſe conditions: That betweene the Emperour, Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, and Francis Sforce Duke of Millan on the one part, and the Senate of Venice on the other part, there ſhould be a perpetuall peace and confederation: That the Senate in times of need, ſhould ſend for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, ſixe hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen: That they ſhould adminiſter the like proportion for the defence of the kingdome of Naples, but in caſe it ſhould be inuaded by the Chriſtians: for the Venetians refuſed to be bound generally, becauſe they would not ſtirre vp the Turke againſt them: That the Emperour ſhould be bound to defend againſt all men, all that the Venetians poſſeſſed in Italy, and that with the like number and proportion of men: That the Venetians ſhould pay in eight yeares to the Archduke for appeaſement of their ancient controuerſies, and for the accord made at Wormes, two hundred thouſand duckats. Which things being agreed vpon, the Senate hauing diſmiſſed Theodore Triuulce, choſe Franciſco Maria Duke of Vrbin for Generall of their men of warre, with the ſame conditions.

Confederation betweene the Emperour and the Venetians.

It was the common iudgement almoſt of all men in Italy, that the French King finding thoſe aides to be turned againſt him, which afore had bene on his ſide, would put off the enterpriſe of Millan for that yeare: neuertheleſſe, when they heard that the preparations did not onely continue, but that the armie began to march, ſuch as ſtood in feare of his victorie, fell (the better to reſiſt him) to make a new confederation, and perſwaded the Pope to be chiefe and principall. The Pope at his coming into Italy deſired an vniuerſall peace, and beſought the Emperour, the French King, and the King of England, that perceiuing the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Turkes, they would lay downe their armes ſo hurtfull for the commonweale of Chriſtendome, and euery one of them ſeuerally to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome, with fulneſſe of power to conſult of theſe affaires; which in apparence was readily performed by them all, but beginning afterwards to debate the matter more particularly, it was preſently diſcerned that thoſe labours were vaine, for the infinite difficulties that fell out when they came to the point of peace-making. For a truce for a ſhort time was nothing plauſible to the Emperour, beſides that it ſeemed altogether vnprofitable; and the French King refuſed to make it for a long time: in ſo much as the Pope (either for the ancient affection which eftſoones began to reuiue in him towards the Emperor, or for that he diſcerned the thoughts of the French King to be eſtranged frõ peace) began more then he was wont, to hearken to thoſe that encouraged him not to ſuffer the French to poſſeſſe againe the Duchie of Millan. By reaſon whereof the Cardinall de Medicis, (who remained before at Florence for feare of the perſecutions of his enemies, but chiefly of the Cardinall of Volterra, who was very gracious with the Pope) reſuming courage, came to Rome, where he was receiued of almoſt all the Court with very great honour: and there, ioyning himſelfe with the Duke of Seſſa the Emperours Embaſſadour, and with the Embaſſadours of the King of England, he fauoured the ſame cauſe with the Pope. At which time the ill hap of the Cardinall of Volterra, which almoſt alwayes troubled his wit, his policie, and all his drifts, brought vpon him great domage and danger, and gaue to the Cardinall de Medicis the meanes to enter into greater grace and authoritie with the Pope, who afore had ſhewed himſelfe much inclined to the Cardinall of Volterra, for that by his induſtrie, and words no leſſe pithie then elegant, he had made him beleeue that he was very deſirous of the vniuerſal peace of Chriſtendome. For when by the deuice of the Duke of Seſſa, Francis Imperiale a baniſhed man of Sicile, was taken at Caſtelnoua neare Rome as he was going into France, there was found about him a packet of letters written by the Cardinall of Volterra to his Nephew the Biſhop of Santes, by the which he aduiſed the French King to inuade the Ile of Sicile with an armie by ſea, for that the armie of the Emperour being turned thither to the defence thereof, and by that meanes it would be the more eaſie for him to recouer the Duchie of Millan: at which matter the Pope being marueilouſly aſtoniſhed, and eſteeming himſelfe beguiled and abuſed with his faire ſhewes, and alſo being vehemently incited by the Duke of Seſſa and the Cardinall de Medicis, he committed ted him, and cauſed him to be kept in the Caſtle Saint Angelo, and afterwards appointed Iudges to examine him, as guiltie of violating the Pontificall Maieſtie, for that he had incenſed the French King in hoſtile maner to inuade the Iland of Sicile, a freehold of the ſea Apoſtolike: and albeit they proceeded but ſlowly to the triall, and that after the interrogatories were ended, he had libertie to pleade by Proctors and Aduocates, yet they proceeded not with that moderation touching his goods, ſince the ſame day the Cardinall was apprehended, the Pope ſent to make ſeiſure of all that was in his houſe. Furthermore, by the impriſonment of the ſaid Imperiale, there was diſcouered a conſpiracie for the French King in Sicile, for the which were executed the Count Camerata, the Maiſter of the ports, and the Treaſurer of the Iſle. For which cauſes the Pope being ſo much the more moued againſt the French king, & beginning daily to conſult with the Cardinal de Medicis; at laſt the rumor of the deſcending of the French armies increaſing dayly more and more, the Pope determining to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the King, declared to the Colledge of Cardinals (hauing firſt made his accuſtomed preface of the imminent dangers of the great Turke) that the French King onely was the cauſe why ſo great perils were not remoued from Chriſtendome, for that he refuſed with great obſtinacie to conſent to the peace that was negociated: and that he, to whom it appertained as the Vicar of Ieſus Chriſt, and ſucceſſor to the Prince of the Apoſtles, to prouide as well as he could for the preſeruation of peace, was compelled in zeale of the publike good, to confederate himſelfe with ſuch Princes as did what they could to defend Italy from troubles, for that of the quiet or trouble thereof, depended the tranquillitie or vexation of all the world. According to which beginning, the Viceroy of Naples being come to Rome for that purpoſe, a league and confederation was concluded for the defence of Italy the third day of Auguſt, betweene the Pope, the Emperour, the King of England, the Archduke of Auſtria, the Duke of Millan, the Cardinall de Medicis together with the Eſtate of Florence, and the Genowayes: and it was decreed, that it ſhould continue all the time of the Confederates liues, and a yeare after the death of euery of them, reſeruing place for any other to come in, ſo that they were admitted by the Pope, the Emperour, and the King of England, and gaue caution, that in matters of quarell and controuerſie, they ſhould vſe the courſe of iuſtice and not of armes: That they ſhould leuie an armie to oppoſe againſt whomſoeuer would inuade any of the Confederates, to which armie the Pope ſhould ſend two hundred men at armes, the Emperour eight hundred, the Florentines two hundred, the Duke of Millan two hundred and two hundred light horſemen: That the Pope, the Emperour, and the Duke of Millan ſhould make all the prouiſions of artilleries and munitions, with all the expences and charges appertaining thereunto: That to leuie the bands of footmen neceſſarie for the armie, and to furniſh all other expences requiſite for the warre, the Pope ſhould pay euery moneth twentie thouſand duckats, the Duke of Millan as much, and the Florentines the like ſumme: that the Emperour ſhould pay thirtie thouſand, the Genowayes, Lucquoys, and Siennois together, ten thouſand, and the Genowayes notwithſtanding to remaine bound to the armie by ſea and other defraiments neceſſary for their defence: to which contribution they ſhould be all bound for three moneths, and for ſo much time ouer and aboue the three moneths, as ſhould be ſet downe by the Pope, the Emperour, and the King of England: That it ſhould be in the power of the Pope and the Emperour to name the Captaine Generall of the whole warre, which it was ſaid ſhould be the Viceroy of Naples, for whom the Cardinall de Medicis (whoſe authoritie was great with the Imperials) laboured what he could, chiefly becauſe of the hatred he bare to Proſper Colonno. The Marquis of Mantua was indirectly ioyned to this confederation, for that the Pope and the Florentines entertained him for their Captaine generall, at their common charge. But neither the league made by the Venetians with the Emperour, nor the vnion of ſo many great Princes, contracted with ſo great prouiſions, did qualifie the heate of the French King, who being come to Lions, prepared to paſſe in perſon with a ſtrong armie into Italy: where the bruite of his coming was no ſooner ſpread, then new tumults began to appeare. For Lionel the brother of Albert Pio, recouered by ſurpriſe the towne of Carpy, being negligently guarded by Iohn Coſcia, who was placed Gouernour there by Proſper Colonno, to whom the Emperour had giuen that towne after he had depoſed Albert as rebell to the Empire. But in the Duchie of Millan there was like to haue chanced a greater accident; for that Francis Sforce riding from Monce to Millan vpon a litle Mulet, and the horſemen of his guard being a good diſtance from him, as they vſed ordinarily to be, to the end the Prince might be the leſſe troubled with the duſt, which in Sommer time the traine of horſes do cauſe to riſe in great abundance in the plaines of Lombardie; Boniface Viſconte a yong Gentleman, better knowne by the nobleneſſe of his houſe, then for his wealth, eſtates, or other conditions, puſhed on by a diſdaine conceiued for that not many moneths before Monſignorin Viſconte had bene ſlaine in Millan, not without the conſent of the Duke, as many thought; and riding ſomewhat neare him vpon a Turkiſh horſe, when they came to a croſſe way, he ſpurred his horſe, and ranne a maine pace, with his dagger drawne to ſtrike the Duke vpon the head: but the Mulet ſhrinking for feare, and Boniface being not able to ſtay his horſe who was briske, the ſaid horſe being tall, and he a bigger man then the Duke, with the blow that he made at his head, he hurt him in the ſhoulder, and then he drew his ſword to giue him another blow, which hurt him not much, being a downeright blow; when many making in to the Dukes reſcue, he fled, and was purſued by the horſemen of the Dukes guard; but winning way of them by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, he ſaued himſelfe in Piemont: and if fortune had anſwered the valour and induſtrie of the man, it might haue bene ſaid to be a very rare matter, and haply ſuch as had neuer bene heard of, that one man alone, at noone day, in a plaine way, had killed ſo great a Prince, in the midſt of his eſtate, enuironed with ſo many ſouldiers and armed men, and yet to flie away in ſafetie. The Duke being thus hurt withdrew himſelfe to Monce, and could not be perſwaded but that there were ſome of the conſpiracie within Millan, where Proſper and Moron for the ſame doubt apprehended the Biſhop of Alexandria brother to Monſignorin, who putting himſelfe willingly into the hands of Proſper, vpon his faith, after he was examined, was ſent priſoner to the Caſtle of Cremona, ſome holding him guiltie of the matter, and others were of a contrary opinion, as the iudgements of men were diuers. It happened almoſt in the ſame ſeaſons, that Galeas Birago, accompanied with the exiles of Millan, and with the aide of the French ſouldiers which were alreadie in the countrey of Piemont, was receiued into the towne of Valence by the Captaine of the Caſtle who was a Sauoy man: but Anthonie de Leua lying within Aſte with part of the light horſemen and Spaniſh footmen, being aduertiſed thereof, went immediatly to incampe before it; and becauſe the towne was but weake which the enemies had no time to fortifie, hauing planted his artilleries, he tooke it the ſecond day, and afterwards battered the Caſtle with the ſame ſucceſſe: and there died of thoſe within, as well in the taking of the towne as of the Caſtle, about foure hundred bodies, beſides many made priſoners, amongſt whom was Galeas the principall man of that enterpriſe.

Now the French armie paſſed ouer the Mounts continually, and the King was reſolued to follow them, but he was hindered by the conſpiracie of the Duke of Bourbon, which was now diſcouered: who for his nobleneſſe of bloud, for his great riches, for the dignitie of his office being great Conſtable, and for the wonderfull fame of his valour, was the greateſt and moſt reſpected Prince in all the Realme of France: but he had not bene of long time in the Kings fauour, and therefore not admitted into the ſecret affaires of the Realme, nor reſpected according to the merite of his greatneſſe: whereunto was added, that the Kings mother ſtirring vp certaine ancient rights, made open claime to the greateſt part of his lands and dominions in open Parliament at Paris: ſo that when he found that the King put no remedie to that griefe, being full of indignation, he had a few moneths before entred confederation with the Emperour and the King of England, by the ſolicitation of Monſieur de Beaurain, in whom the Emperour repoſed much, and was his great Chamberlaine: betweene whom it was agreed (to aſſure things with a more faithfull band) that the Emperour ſhould giue him in mariage his ſiſter Elenor, widow of Emmanuel the late King of Portugal. The execution of their counſels was grounded vpon the French Kings determination to go in perſon to the war: and to cauſe him to perſiſt in this reſolution, the King of England had cunningly giuen him hope that he would not moleſt the Realme of France for ý yeare: The Duke of Bourbon alſo, as ſoone as the King had paſſed the Mounts, was to enter into Burgundie with an armie of twentie thouſand footmen, which were ſecretly leuied with the moneys of the Emperour and the King of England: and he doubted not to bring his buſineſſe to good paſſe, as well for the abſence of the King, as for that he was in the generall fauour of all men through the Realme of France: And of that that ſhould be conquered, the Earledome of Prouence ſhould remaine to him; in ſtead of Earle, taking vpon him the name of King of Prouence; for he ſaid the Earledome of Prouence belonged to him by the rights of the houſe of Aniow: but all the reſidue ſhould appertaine to the King of England. Therfore the Duke of Bourbon, the better to excuſe himſelfe from following the King into Italy,

Confederacie betweene the Emperour, the king of Engld and the Duke of Bourbon.

ſtayed at Moulins a principall towne of the Duchie of Bourbon, and feigned himſelfe to be ſicke: and the King taking his iourney that way to Lions, to whom were come ſome ſmall preſumptions of this conſpiracie, he diſſembled not the matter, that many went about to bring him into diſtruſt and ſuſpition of him; but that the opinion of his vertue & faith, whereof he had ſo often had experience, preuailed more with him then any other thing: whereupon the Duke gaue him great thankes for ſpeaking to him ſo roundly and plainly, adding that he was much bound to be thankfull to God, in that he had giuen him ſuch a King, whoſe grauitie could not be moued with falſe accuſations and ſlanders; and promiſed him, that as ſoone as he was deliuered of his ſickneſſe (which he hoped would not continue long, for that it was no dangerous diſeaſe) he would come to Lions to accompanie the King whither ſoeuer he ſhould go. But when the King was at Lions, vnderſtanding that many bands of Lanceknights aſſembled together vpon the frontiers of Burgundie, adding this doubt to the preſumptions which he had before, together with certaine letters which had bene ſurpriſed, which made the matter more euident, he committed to priſon Monſieur de Sainct Valier, Monſieur de Buſſy brother to Monſieur de Paliſſa the Poſt-maſter, and the Biſhop of Autun, who were guiltie of the conſpiracie; and he ſent preſently the Great Maiſter to Moulins with fiue hundred horſe and foure thouſand footmen to take the Duke: but it was too late, for he being in doubt, and fearing leſt the paſſages would be garded, was ſecretly gone into Franche Comté in diſguiſed attire. Therfore by reaſon of an accident of ſuch importance, the King determined not to proceed on his iourney: and yet keeping about him part of the ſouldiers prepared for the new warre, he ſent Monſieur Boniuet Admirall of France into Italy with eighteene hundred Lances, ſixe thouſand Swiſſers, two thouſand Gaſcons, two thouſand Valeſians, ſixe thouſand Lanceknights, twelue thouſand French men, and three thouſand Italians: with which armie the Admirall hauing paſſed the Mounts, and drawing neare the confines of the Eſtate of Millan, he made ſhew that he would addreſſe himſelfe for Nouaro, by reaſon whereof that Citie being not ſufficiently furniſhed either with ſouldiers or rampiers, yeelded it ſelfe by the conſent of the Duke of Millan, who retained the Caſtle, and Vigeuena did the like for the ſame reaſon; ſo that all the countrey that is beyond the riuer Theſin, fell into the power of the French men. Proſper Colonno who was kept in by a long ſickneſſe, would neuer beleeue that the French King would perſeuere in his reſolution to inuade the Duchie of Millan for that yeare, both for the confederation that the Venetians had made againſt him, and for the detection of the conſpiracie of the Duke of Bourbon: and therefore he had not with ſuch diligence and ſpeed as was neceſſarie, aſſembled the ſouldiers that lay diſperſed in diuers places, nor made competent prouiſions for ſo great a reſiſtance: but now when the enemies approched, he ſent to muſter his companies in all the haſte, for a deſire he had aboue all other things to hinder the enemies from paſſing the riuer Theſin, whereof (without remembring what had hapned him at the riuer of Adda againſt Monſieur Lautrech) he aſſured himſelfe ſo confidently, that he tooke no care to build and repaire the baſtillions and rampiers of the ſuburbes of Millan, whereof the greateſt was alreadie in a maner on the ground, by reaſon of the ſmall care that was had thereof. He aſſembled his armie vpon the riuer, betweene Biagraſſa, Bufaloro, and Turbico, a place very fit for that purpoſe, and no leſſe conuenient for Pauie and Millan. But the French men who were now come to Vigeuena, finding the water of the riuer lower then Proſper ſuppoſed, began to paſſe ouer foure miles from the Imperiall campe, ſome by the foord, and others in boates and barkes, and built a bridge for their artilleries in a place where they found neither guard nor any other impediment: ſo that Proſper being driuen by this vnexpected accident to change all the counſels of the warre, ſent Anthonie de Leua preſently with an hundred men at armes and three thouſand footmen to the guard of Pauie, and himſelfe with the reſidue of the armie drew to Millan, where after he had called the Captaines to counſell, they were all of this mind, that if they made their approch forthwith, there was no poſſibilitie to defend Millan, for that the baſtillions and rampiers of the ſuburbes, whereof there had no reckoning bene made ſince the laſt warres, were for the moſt part fallen to the ground; and the too great confidence that Proſper had to defend the paſſage of Theſin, had bene the cauſe that men went not about to repaire them; neither was it poſſible to make them defenſible in leſſe time then the ſpace of three dayes: and that they were to make a reſolution as well for the one as for the other of theſe two accidents; both to labour with verie great diligence at the rampiers, and alſo to ſtand readie and prepared to depart, if the French men came either the firſt, the ſecond, or the third day; and to retire to Coma if they came by the way of Pauie, or elſe to go to Pauie if they came by the way of Coma. But the aduerſe deſtinie of the French obſcuring their vnderſtanding, as it had done at other times, ſuffered them not to make vſe of ſo faire an occaſion. For, either through negligence, or to get the whole armie together, whereof a great part was remaining behind, they ſoiourned three dayes along the riuer of Theſin, and being vnited all together betweene Millan, Pauie and Binaſco, they marched afterwards to Saint Chriſtophers, which is within a mile of Millan betweene the gate of Theſin and Rome gate; and after they had leuelled the ground, and paſſed their artilleries into the vantguard, they made as though they would aſſault the towne, and yet without aſſaying any other thing, they incamped themſelues in that place, from whence departing within a few dayes after, they went to lodge in the Abbey of Claraualle, and ſpoyled the mils, and cut off the water from Millan, purpoſing rather to beſiege Millan then to aſſault it, for that there were at that time within the towne eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, foure thouſand Spaniſh footmen, ſixe thouſand and fiue hundred Lanceknights, and three thouſand Italians, beſides the common people, who were very well furniſhed with weapons, and continued in their ancient diſpoſition againſt the French.

In this eſtate of affaires died Pope Adrian the fourteenth day of September, not without great diſcommoditie and domage to the Confederates, to whom by his death there was wanting vnto them not onely the Pontificall authoritie, but alſo the contribution of money whereunto he was bound by the capitulations of the confederation. He died, leauing behind him a verie ſmall opinion and eſtimation, either for the litle time he reigned, or for his want of experience in affaires; but with incredible ioy of all the Court, who deſired to ſee in that ſeate an Italian, or at leaſt ſuch a one as had bene trained vp in Italy. By the death of the Pope there began many troubles in the townes of the Church, wherein before his ſickneſſe there appeared ſome ſmall ſparkles of future flames, which in his life time had eaſily bene increaſed, if partly by chance and partly by the diligence of others they had not bene preuented. For the Colledge of Cardinals hauing giuen the guard of Reggia and Rubiera to Albert Pio before the Popes coming into Italy, the ſaid Albert kept ſtill the Caſtles, hauing with many colours and ſundrie excuſes, by reaſon of the ſmall experience of Adrian, made very ſmall reckoning for many moneths together of the inſtance that was made to him to render them. Beſides this he had ſolicited that as ſoone as the war ſhould be apparently begun, Ranſe de Cere with certaine horſemen and a good number of footmen ſhould enter into Rubiera, to infeſt vnder the oportunitie of that place, the way of Rome that paſſeth betweene Modena and Reggia, to the end to giue impediments to the money and other diſpatches that ſhould be ſent from Rome, Naples and Florence to Millan, and to proceed to greater enterpriſes as occaſion ſerued. But Francis Guicciardin Gouernour of the ſame Cities, hauing in good time diſcouered this plot, and aduertiſed the Pope to what ends tended the ſweete words and requeſts of Albert, together with the dangers that would fall vpon all the Eſtate Eccleſiaſtike on that ſide, preuailed ſo much, that the Pope was much offended, and with threats and demonſtrations that he would vſe force, conſtrained Albert to reſtore to him the Caſtles, who had not the courage to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Popes will, for that the French were not as yet very ſtrong in Italy. But afterwards the Pios hauing gotten the towne of Carpi, Proſper who deſired to recouer it againe, was the cauſe that Guido Rangon with an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horſemen, and a thouſand footmen, was retained in the name of the Confederates, and that it was ordained, that a thouſand Spaniſh footmen whom the Duke of Seſſa had leuied at Rome to ioyne with the reſidue at Millan, ſhould remaine for the ſame cauſe at Modena: and whileſt theſe things were in preparing, Ranſe de Cere (to whom as well for his authoritie, as for the hope of pillage, reſorted dayly many horſemen and footmen) began to infeſt the wayes, and trouble the whole countrey: and alſo, the Pope being now dead, he aſſailed one night vpon the ſudden the towne of Rubiera, with two thouſand footmen; but thoſe within defending themſelues valiantly, and the place being very difficult to be taken by aſſault, he could not get it, where Triſtrami Corſo one of the Captaines of his footmen was taken priſoner. The aforeſaid forces aſſembled in theſe places for diuers cauſes, were the occaſion of greater things. For after the death of the Pope, the Duke of Ferrara wearie of the hopes that were giuen him touching the reſtitution of Reggia and Modena, conſidering that in reſpect of the abſolution which he had obtained of Adrian, it would be leſſe hard for him to get pardon for things taken, then reſtitution of things loſt; and perſwading himſelfe of that which was generally beleeued of all men, that by reaſon of the diſcords of the Cardinals, which were continually increaſed euer ſince the death of Pope Leo, it would be long afore they choſe a new Pope, he determined to looke to the recouerie of Modena and Reggia, whereunto, beſides other oportunities, he was inuited by the commoditie he had to knit with him Ranſe de Cere, who had alreadie aſſembled two hundred horſemen, and more then two thouſand footmen. So then after the Duke had waged three thouſand footmen, and ſent to Ranſe three thouſand duckats, he marched towards Modena, in which Citie was no other ſtrength of men of warre, then the regiment of Count Guido Rangon, who had bene retained by the League. And albeit the people bare no affection to the iuriſdiction of thoſe of the houſe of Eſte, yet the walls being weake, and without any flanke, after the ancient maner, and the ditches filled vp, and no reparation being made thereof a long time, there ſeemed to be need of a greater garriſon: and therefore the Gouernour and the Count (when they had layd aſide their priuate quarrels that had bene between them, began to proceed herein with good accord) vſed extreme diligence to aduance the former reſolution to let into Modena the Spaniſh footmen, who being arriued alreadie in Tuſcane, marched ſlowly, and gaue diuers and doubtfull anſwers when they were asked whether they would remaine at Modena or paſſe further: neuertheleſſe after many intreatings, they were at laſt content to enter thereinto. This being knowne to the Duke of Ferrara, who was come to Finale with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, it ſtayed him almoſt for paſſing further: and yet becauſe the matter was not entire, and hoping, at leaſt being vnited with Ranſe de Cere, that he might take Reggia: and not deſpairing withall, that by the difficultie of payments ſome diſorder might fall amongſt the footmen of the enemies, he determined to paſſe on: and his hopes were not lightly conceiued, for that the Colledge of Cardinals, to whom the Gouernour had ſignified with great diligence the perils that were toward, making no prouiſion, yea not ſo much as anſwering the meſſengers and letters that were ſent, there was no meanes to pay the ſouldiers of the publike purſe: and haply the day was come wherein the Spaniſh ſouldiers ſhould receiue the pay of the ſecond moneth; which though it had bene all payed, yet there was no hope to entertaine a greater number: and beſtowing part of them within Modena and the reſidue in Reggia, neither of thoſe Cities would be in ſafetie, neither were there any ſouldiers in Reggia, and the diſpoſition of the people different from them of Modena. Amid which difficulties, the Gouernour and the Count Guido determining chiefly to preſerue Modena, as a towne of greateſt importance, both for the neighbourhood of Bolognia, and neareſt affinitie with the Eſtate of the Church, and whither might more eaſily be brought ſuccours and other prouiſions; they ſent to Reggia fiue hundred footmen vnder the leading of Vincent Maiatto of Bolognia, one of Count Guidos ſouldiers, charging him, that if he were not able to defend the towne, to retire into the Citadell, the which, for that they hoped it would hold out at leaſt for certaine dayes, they ſent money to Iohn Baptiſta Smeraldo of Parma, who was Captaine thereof, to leuie three hundred footmen, and made requeſt (though in vaine) to them of Reggia to contribute ſome proportion of money for waging of the like number, ſeeing there was no leſſe queſtion of their ſuretie, then of the ſafetie of the Church Eſtate. And touching the danger of Modena, the Gouernour hauing no meanes to defend it for want of money, called afore him many of the Citizens, declaring to them that things were brought into ſuch a ſtraite, that if the Spaniſh bands were not payed, and that there were not money raiſed to furniſh other expences, the towne would of neceſſitie fall into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, which might be defended if there were prouiſion of money, and that there was no other meanes to leuie it, but by taxing and rating themſelues for the preſent, aſſuring them that either the new Pope or the Colledge of Cardinals, would make prouiſion for that that ſhould happen afterwards: That there was not one in that aſſembly who had not proued the gouernment of the Duke of Ferrara and that of the Church, and therefore it were a matter ſuperfluous to ſhew them by arguments which of the two was moſt heauie or light, and to go about to perſwade any thing by diſcourſe of reaſon to thoſe that haue the matter freſh in memorie: That he deſired them onely not to ſtand much vpon that trifling ſumme of money that was demanded by way of loane; for as much as the ſame, as well in reſpect of publike good, as of priuate profite, was a matter of ſmall conſideration, in regard of the intereſt to haue a Lord to their more liking and contentment. Which words being willingly receiued into the minds of thoſe that had the ſame inclination, they furniſhed the ſame day, by taxing themſelues, the ſumme of fiue thouſand duckats, wherewith the ſouldiers being payed, and other prouiſions made, they had no feare of the armes of the Duke of Ferrara: who preſuming no further of his forces then was conuenient, left Modena on the left hand, and Ranſe de Cere ioyning with him on the way, he drew neare to Reggia, which Citie receiued him preſently, and the day following the Captaine put into his hands the Citadell, hauing taried the ſhooting but of a few bullets, alledging for his iuſtification, that Vincent Maiatto being called by him, had refuſed to enter, and that the money ſent to him by the Gouernour, was taken away neare Parma, whither he had ſent to leuie bands of footmen. As ſoone as the Duke had taken Reggia, Ranſe de Cere being ſent for by the Admirall of France, went to him; & the Duke being followed with a very ſlender ſtrength of footmen, when he had ſtayed certaine dayes along the riuer of Secchia, went to incampe before the towne of Rubiera, for the keeping whereof the Count Guido had deputed Vecchio Couiano with two hundred footmen. The Duke had no great hope to take it, for that the Caſtle is but ſmall, and very well fortified, as well for the largeneſſe and depth of the ditches, as for the great rampiers all along the walls that enuiron it: and yet beginning the day following to batter the wall adioyning to the gate, the Captaine of the footmen, either by ſecret intelligence, or for feare of the townesmen who began to riſe, leapt ouer the walls, and preſented himſelfe before the Duke, offering to his diſcretion both himſelfe and the towne; and when the Duke was entred into the towne, he planted his artilleries before the Caſtle, which ſo terrified the Captaine named Titus Tagliaferro of Parma, that notwithſtanding the Caſtle was ſtrong, and ſufficiently furniſhed of men, munition, and all other prouiſions neceſſarie, he yeelded it vp before night, not abiding one bullet of the artilleries: and when the Duke was poſſeſſed of it, he abode there with his armie, hoping that for the long vacation of the Sea Apoſtolike, the regiment of footmen within Modena would diſſolue, and feeding himſelfe alſo at the ſame time with hope of other things, as in their place ſhall hereafter be declared.

In the meane time Monſieur Bonniuet, who lay incamped at Saint Chriſtophers betweene the gate Theſin and Romé gate, a place enuironed with waters and ditches, deſpairing to be able to take Millan by force, when he had taken Monce, he ſent Captaine Bayard and Federike de Boſſolo with three hundred Lances and eight thouſand footmen to take Loda, whither the Marquis of Mantua was come with fiue hundred horſe and fiue hundred footmen, with whom the Church and the Florentines had entertained him into their pay: but being in feare of his owne perſon, he retired to Pontuiquo, by which occaſion the Citie being abandoned, receiued the French men. After the taking of Loda, Federike builded a bridge vpon the riuer of Adda, and paſſed with his companies vpon the lands of Cremona to ſuccour the Caſtle of Cremona, which being oppreſſed with hunger, and the defendants not knowing that the French armie was paſſed into Italy, compounded the ſame day that the Admirall approched to Millan, to render, if they were not reſcued before the ſixe and twentieth day of September. Federike drew neare to the Caſtle without any difficultie, and after he had refreſhed it with victuals and other things, he determined to aſſault the towne, vpon this confidence, that Proſper Colonno had left there a verie ſlender garriſon; notwithſtanding the Marquis of Mantua for that feare had ſent thither an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horſemen, and foure hundred footmen: but ſuppoſing he could not enter the Citie by the Caſtle, by reaſon of the great trenches which the defendants had caſt betweene the Citie and the Caſtle, he turned on the right hand, determining to batter the wall in thoſe places where it was moſt weake. When Federike had battered the wals with the artilleries, he gaue the aſſault, but without any effect, and afterwards hauing made a greater breach with the artilleries, he gaue another aſſault with the ſame ſucceſſe, in ſo much as he retired to Saint Martins, there to tarrie for Ranſe de Cere, who was to come from Reggia with two hundred horſemen and two thouſand footmen: and when he was come, they returned againe to the walles, battering them many houres with great furie, neuertheleſſe being hindered by the great raines that fell, and knowing they ſhould hardly preuaile, they proceeded no further. And the ſame day Mercurio with the light horſemen of the Venetians (whoſe bands aſſembled at Pontuiquo) paſſed ouer the riuer of Oglio, and made incurſions euen to their tents. After the vaine triall of theſe things, Federike and Ranſe raiſed their ſiege from before Cremona, as well for lacke

of victuals, as for the departing away of the footmen which Ranſe brought thither, becauſe they had receiued no other money then that which the Duke of Ferrara had giuen him. From Cremona they went and incamped afore Sonzin, where they found no better ſucceſſe in their affaires: and afterwards they ſacked the towne of Caranagio, where they abode certaine dayes: of which lingring was bred an excuſe or impediment to the Senate of Venice, not to ſend to Millan thoſe proportions of men which they were bound vnto; for that excuſing themſelues for being ſo long in aſſembling their companies, vpon the common opinion of the Imperiall Captaines, that becauſe of their ſeparation from the French King the French armie would not march for that yeare, they affirmed they would ſend them as ſoone as the companies that lay vpon the territories of Cremona ſhould be repaſſed the riuer of Adda.

In this eſtate of affaires, both the parties diſtruſting to be able to put a ſpeedie end to the warre, neither of them would put any thing to hazard. The Admirall who looked not to take Millan by force, expected either that the enemies would diſſolue for want of money, or at leaſt that neceſſitie of victuals would compell them to abandon Millan; where notwithſtanding there was great plentie of corne, yet in a Citie ſo populous the multitude of thoſe that were to be fed was almoſt innumerable; and hauing cut the water from them and broken their mils, they had great difficultie of grinding. For this cauſe the Admirall called home thoſe bands that lay along the riuer of Adda, and beſtowed them betweene Monce and Millan, to the end that the people of Millan from whom was ſtopped the traffike of victuals that came by the wayes of Loda and Pauie, ſhould be alſo depriued of all ſuch reliefe as was wont to paſſe from the hill of Brianza: but theſe things were not ſufficient to accompliſh the effect of the Admirals deſire. On the other ſide, albeit Proſper Colonno (as touching his bodie) was vehemently oppreſſed with a great ſickneſſe, and no leſſe troubled in his mind, as not brooking the coming of the Viceroy of Naples, for a deſire he had to be the principall man: yet, by his counſell was done what could be done, to ſtop the paſſage of victuals that came to the enemies from the parts beyond the riuer of Theſin, for that the ſtrength of the place where they were incamped left no hope to be able to driue them away by force. Therefore Proſper gaue order, that the Marquis of Mantua ſhould enter into Pauie, by whoſe coming the French men ſtanding in feare of their bridge, built another at Torligo, which is fiue and twentie miles from Pauie. Beſides this he ſolicited Vitelli (who with the companies of men at armes with whom the Florentines had ſent him to Genes in the beginning of the warre, and with three thouſand footmen payed by the Genowayes, had occupied all the countrey beyond Po except Alexandria) to paſſe the riuer, to giue impediment to the victuals which came to the French men from the countrey of Lomellina: but the Duke of Genes, fearing his owne eſtate, would not conſent thereunto, for the nearenes of the Archbiſhop Fregoſa, who was in Alexandria. And becauſe the Venetians, whoſe bands were paſſed Oglia, refuſed for the perill of Bergama, to paſſe Adda ſo long as that part of the French men which was gone from Caranagio remained neare Monce, Proſper won them to ſend foure hundred horſemen, and fiue hundred footmen to Treſſo, to ſtop the courſe of victuals wherewith they ſuſtained themſelues. Whileſt both the parties were about theſe matters, there was performed no exploit of warre, other then light skirmiſhes, incurſions and pillages, wherein the French men had in a maner alwayes the worſe, and ſometimes returned with great loſſe and domage: and one day amongſt others it happened that John de Medicis being iſſued out with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and a thouſand footmen to guard the victuals that came from Treſſo to Millan, he met with foure ſcore French lances, moſt of them being of the companies of Barnaby Viſconte, & ſet himſelfe to follow them, but in ſuch ſort, that afterwards cunningly retiring, he drew them into an ambuſh of fiue hundred harquebuziers which he had layed, and ouerthrew them eaſily, killing and taking priſoners the moſt part of them: and likewiſe in another encounter, Sucere a Burgonian brake a troupe of threeſcore men at armes of the companie of the Maſter of the Horſe. Likewiſe the bands of Spaniſh footmen had many conflicts with the French footmen that warded at thoſe trenches which were made to go in couert euen to the rampiers, and ſlue many of them: and at the ſame time Paul Luſaſco who remained at Piſqueton with an hundred and fiftie light horſemen, ouerran all the countrey, and diſtreſſed not a litle thoſe that were in Cremona. Neither did the ambuſhes ſucceed more happily to the Admirall then his other exploits: for hauing conſpired ſecretly with one Morgant of Parma, a Corporall vnder John de Medicis (Iani- quot de Lanzi one of his light horſemen and foure others onely conſenting thereto) that when it ſhould fall to his turne to ward at the Baſtillion of a gate, which was extended without all the rampiers, he ſhould receiue in his ſouldiers: it happened when the night appointed came, Morgant thinking it neceſſarie to haue more companie to execute ſuch a buſineſſe, brake the matter to another ſouldier of his band, who making ſhew as though he conſented to this treaſon, gaue him counſell to go and command the Sentinels in the name of Proſper Colonno, that if they heard any noiſe, they ſhould not ſtirre, to the end not to let him whom he ſhould ſend to call the ſouldiers of the campe to come to the Baſtillion, for that the Admirall had that night drawne neare to that ſide fiue thouſand footmen to be readie to ſtirre when the ſigne ſhould be giuen, and had ſet in order the whole armie. But whileſt Morgant went to take order for this deuice, the other ranne preſently and reuealed the matter to Iohn de Medicis, who making ſpeed to the Baſtillion, tooke the offenders, and when they were examined, made them paſſe the pikes, according to the iuſtice of warre. It ſeemed now that the affaires of the French began to decline on all ſides, ſeeing that by reaſon of the fertilitie of the countrey about Millan, and for that the townesmen had prouided hand-mils to ſupply the vſe of grinding, the Admirals hope that the inhabitants of Millan would fall into want of victuals, decreaſed dayly: and it was beleeued, that they had loſt more then fifteene hundred horſes, as well of ſeruice as others, which brought them into ſuch aſtoniſhment, that they came not out of their tents, but when it was needfull to guard the victuallers and forragers, and that alwayes in great troupes. The infamie of which cowardize, the Admirall conuerting to his honour, he would often ſay, that he ordered not the warre according to the furie of other French Captaines, but with the moderation and temperance of the Italians: and yet whenſoeuer either their footmen or horſemen encountred with the enemie, they ſhewed themſelues more readie to flie then to fight.

Therfore the Captains of the Emperour being ſecured from the feare of armes and famine, yea hoping to giue impediments to the victuals of the enemie, there was nothing now to trouble them but the want of money, without the which it was hard to nouriſh the ſouldiers within Millan, but almoſt impoſſible to leade them out, whenſoeuer the affaires and occurrents of the warre ſo required: but to remedie theſe difficulties, many meanes were ſought; and amongſt others, Proſper Colonno, by the ſecret conſent of the Viceroy of Naples and the Duke of Seſſa, had immediatly vpon the Popes death, begun to treate with the Duke of Ferrara, who after he had refuſed many offers made to him by the Admirall ſince the taking of Reggia, to go afore Cremona, couenanted at laſt with Proſper, that if he recouered Modena by his meanes, he would pay him immediatly thirtie thouſand duckats, and twentie thouſand more within two moneths. That enterpriſe ſeemed a matter of eaſie execution, foraſmuch as Proſper commanding Count Guido Rangon a ſouldier of the League, and the regiment of Spaniſh footmen, to depart from Modena, there remained no remedie for that Citie ſo abandoned, but that they muſt yeeld themſelues to the Duke. And that which beſide the benefite of the armie much animated Proſper to this practiſe, was his priuate couetouſneſſe, the loue which he bore to Alphonſo d'Eſte, the common deſire of all the Barons of Rome to debaſe the greatneſſe of the Popes, and a hope that Modena and Reggia remaining no more to the Church, Parma and Plaiſance would with the more facilitie diuolue to the Duke of Millan. This matter (whileſt it was laboured with great ſecrecie) being come to the eares of Count Guido, and by him made knowne to Guicciardin, he ſaw there was no other way to hinder it, but to perſwade the Spaniſh Captaines, who were well vſed and largely payed, and were willing to continue in that Citie, that alledging they were not ſubiect to the authoritie of Proſper Colonno, vntill they came to the armie, they ſhould refuſe to go from Modena, except it were by the appointment of the Duke of Seſſa, by whoſe commandement they came thither. And although the Gouernour did verily beleeue, that this practiſe was wrought by the conſent of the Duke of Seſſa, yet he perſwaded himſelfe that the Duke being the Emperours Embaſſadour at Rome, and the Colledge making inſtance to him to the contrary, he would not onely be aſhamed to giue ſuch a commiſſion, but alſo could not refuſe, at the requeſt of the Cardinals, openly to command the contrary: and the matter ſucceeded euen as he had deemed: for when Proſper ſent to command Count Guido and the Spaniards to go to Millan for the neceſſities of the warre, the Count excuſed himſelfe with many reaſons, alledging that he was ſubiect to the Church and to them of Modena: and the Spaniſh

Cap-

Captaines perſwaded by him and the Gouernour, made anſwer, that in that caſe they were to obey none but the Duke of Seſſa. Which matters being ſignified by the Gouernour to the Colledge of Cardinals, they preſently called the Duke of Seſſa into the Conclaue; who for that he would not make himſelfe ſuſpected, and by conſequence the Emperour, could not refuſe their demand, to write to the Captaines that they ſhould not ſtirre. And moreouer (as oftentimes things fall out otherwiſe then men would haue thought) it happened thereupon, that certaine letters of Proſper which had bene intercepted by the Gouernour, being read in the Colledge, by the which was diſcloſed how all things had paſſed; the Cardinals which adhered to the French King, by whoſe impeachment the prouiſions of money which by the working of the Cardinall de Medicis began to be ſent from Modena, had bene delayed, knowing that it would be dangerous for the King that ſuch a matter ſhould come to effect, began openly to helpe forward the ſending of money to Modena, wherein the Cardinall Colonno ioyned with them, to ſhew to the reſidue, that he preferred the profite of the Sea Apoſtolike before all other regards. But although this diligence was ſufficient to deferre the execution of the couenants made with Alphonſo d'Eſte, yet the foundation of theſe deſignes being not remoued, they had a purpoſe that the Viceroy of Naples, who (though he marched ſlowly) was come to Millan with foure hundred lances and two thouſand footmen, ſhould leade away with him the regiment of Spaniſh footmen as he paſſed by Modena. But at this time the ſtore of victuals was well increaſed at Millan, for that the Admirall fearing leſt the ſouldiers within Parma ſhould winne the bridge which he had made vpon Theſin, by the which neceſſary prouiſions were conueyed to the armie, he drew from Monce the armie that was there being the leſſer part, of whom he ſent three thouſand men to the guard of the bridge, tooke ſome to himſelfe, and diſtributed the reſidue, part within Marignan, and part within Biagraſſa, places not farre from the bridge: by meanes whereof the Imperials that recouered Monce had the greater commoditie of victuals. There was at that time in the French armie (whoſe well fortified campe ſtretched from the Abbey of Claraualle to the way of Pauie, and was on that ſide towards the way within gunſhot of Millan) eight hundred light horſemen, ſixe thouſand Swiſſers, two thouſand Italian footmen, and ten thouſand as wel French men as Gaſcons. They had at the bridge of Theſin a thouſand Lanceknights and a thouſand Italians: the like number at Biagraſſa, where was Ranſe de Cere: two hundred Lances within Nouaro, and two thouſand footmen as well in Alexandria as in Loda. Within Millan were eight hundred Lances, eight hundred light horſemen, fiue thouſand Spaniſh footmen, ſixe thouſand Lanceknights, and foure thouſand Italians, beſides the multitude of the people, who were moſt vehement againſt the French, both in ſtomacke and action: and the Marquis of Mantua was within Pauie with fiue hundred Lances, ſixe hundred light horſemen, two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and three thouſand Italians: there was within Newcaſtle in the countrey of Tortona three thouſand footmen with Vitelli, although ſhortly after, certaine French companies being paſſed towards Alexandria, he retired to Stranalle, for feare leſt the way of Genes ſhould be ſhut vp from him: the Venetians alſo had ſixe hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, of whom they ſent a thouſand to Millan at the requeſt of Proſper, who deſired to make vſe of the fame of their ſiecours, and ſhortly after they ſent another part to Cremona, for doubt of ſome conſpiracie. At laſt the Admirall conſtrained by the difficultie of victuals, the coldneſſe of the time, and great ſnowes, and by the inſtances and proteſtations made vnto him by the Swiſſers, that they would not endure ſo many diſcommodities, determined to remoue further from Millan: notwithſtanding before he publiſhed his reſolution, he procured Galeas Viſconte to obtaine leaue to go ſee Madame Clara, famous for her ſingular beautie, but much more for the great loue that Proſper Colonno bare to her. And being entred into Millan, he began to moue a parley of truce: whereupon there aſſembled vpon the rampiers Captaine Alarcon, Paul Vettori the Florentine Commiſſioner, and Ierome Moron; and for the Admirall, Galeas Viſconte and the Generall of Normandie, who communed of a ſurceaſſing of armes vntill the end of May, and both the parties to be bound to diſtribute their armies in the townes, and had in the end conſented to reduce all their forces beyond Theſin. But the Captaines of the Emperour diſliking that with a truce they went about to interrupt the hope they had of the victorie, made anſwer, that they could determine nothing without the conſent of the Viceroy: ſo that the Admirall within two dayes after cauſed his artilleries to march before day towards Theſin, himſelfe following with the whole whole armie as ſoone as it was day; and he marched in ſuch order, that it ſeemed he would not refuſe battell: which being perceiued by thoſe of the towne, not onely the ſouldiers and the people demanded with a loud voice, that they might be led to the field to aſſaile the French, but alſo the Captaines and perſonages of greateſt authoritie made inſtance to Proſper Colonno to the ſame end; laying before him the facilitie of the victorie, for that they eſteemed themſelues nothing inferiour to them in forces, and in courage were farre their ſuperiours, it being impoſſible that their retraite ſhould not bring great feare vpon the moſt part of the armie; the ſame being confirmed by certaine Italians who at that inſtant were ſtraggled from them. They propounded vnto him the infinite glorie, and perpetuall memorie of his name, if by this laſt glorie and triumph he would confirme ſo many victories by him obtained. But Proſper had alwayes fixed in his mind, to forbeare as much as he could to put himſelfe to the arbitration of fortune; and therefore ſtanding firme and vnmoueable in his opinion, like a ſtrong tower againſt the guſts of wind, he anſwered, That it was not the office of a wiſe Captaine to be carried with popular voices, nor to leade his ſouldiers to aſſaile the enemie, though there remained to them no other hope then to ſtand vpon their defence: That they had ſufficiently vanquiſhed, and wonne glorie enough, hauing without danger and without bloud compelled the enemie to go his way; and that the deſire of men ought not to be infinite, ſeeing all men may eaſily know, that if matters ſucceeded ill, the loſſe would be without compariſon greater then the benefite would be if they ſucceeded well: That he had alwayes by thoſe meanes brought his enterpriſes to an honorable end, and alwayes knowne by experience, that the infamie and diſhonour that fell vpon Captaines by raſhneſſe, was more hurtfull to them, then the glorie of the victorie was profitable; foraſmuch as no man wold challenge any part of the infamie, but all would be wholy caſt vpon the Generall: but the praiſe of the happie ſucceſſe of the warre (at leaſt in the opinion of men) will be communicated to many: That now when he was in his lateſt yeares, he would not follow new counſels, and abandon thoſe which being followed by him all the courſe of his life, had bene the cauſe of his glorie, reputation and greatneſſe. The French men deuided themſelues into two parts, the Admirall with the greateſt entred into Biagraſſa within foureteene miles of the towne of Millan, and ſent the reſidue to Roſa, which is within ſeuen miles.

Almoſt as ſoone as the Admirall was gone from before Millan, the Cardinals who had now bene in the Conclaue the ſpace of fifteene dayes, created a new Pope. At the beginning there was in the Conclaue but ſixe and thirtie Cardinals, and being afterwards increaſed with three more, they ſpent much time in ſundrie contentions: for they were deuided among themſelues, not onely for the different wils of the Emperor and the French King, but alſo for the greatneſſe of the Cardinal de Medicis; who (being oppugned by all ſuch as followed the Kings authoritie, and ſome others alſo that depended of the Emperour) had at his deuotion the ioynt voices of ſixteene Cardinals, abſolutely reſolued to chuſe him, or at leaſt to chuſe no other without his conſent; and had likewiſe the ſecret promiſes of fiue others to giue him their voices when they went to the election, together with the fauor of the Emperors Embaſſadour, with all the reſidue that followed his authoritie: which furtherances and foundations albeit he had had them almoſt all at the death of Pope Leo, yet he now entred into the Conclaue with a more conſtant reſolution not to abandon his hopes, either for the length of time, or for any accident whatſoeuer, making this his chiefeſt pillar and ground, that in the election of a Pope, it was neceſſary that two third parts of the voices of the Cardinals that were preſent ſhould be concurrant. Neither did they giue ouer their diuiſions, either for the common danger of Italy, or for the particular Eſtate of the Church, but accommodating themſelues to the fortune of the warre, both the parts ſought to deferre the election, for the ſupport they hoped by the victorie of thoſe that were their fauourites: and it had bene yet longer deferred, if there had bene among the Cardinals that were aduerſaries to the Cardinall de Medicis (who were almoſt all the oldeſt of the Colledge) the ſame agreement to chuſe another, as there was not to chuſe him; and that ſhaking off their particular couetouſneſſe, they had ſtood vpon this point, not to ſuffer the Cardinall de Medicis to riſe to the Popedome. But it is very hard for men by a concord that is mixed with diſcord and ambition, to attaine to the deſired end. The Cardinall Colonno, a very great enemie of the Cardinall de Medicis, and of an imperious and proud nature, being moued againſt the other Cardinals that were ioyned with him, becauſe they refuſed to elect for Pope

Car-

Cardinall Iacouaccio a Romane, a man of the ſame faction, and much depending of him, went and made a willing offer to the Cardinall de Medicis to helpe him to the Popedome, who by a writing vnder his hand, made him a very ſecret promiſe of the office of Vicechancellor which he held, and of his Pallace which was very ſumptuous, built by the Cardinall of Saint George, and giuen to him by Pope Leo; wherby the Cardinal Colonno being ſo much the more inflamed, induced the Cardinal Cornaro & two others to agree with him to chuſe the Cardinal de Medicis: and as ſoone as their inclination was knowne, many others (as it often happeneth in the Conclaues) either for feare, or by ambition, began to preſſe forward, not to be the laſt that ſhould ſpeake in his fauour; in ſo much as the ſame night, he was honoured as Pope by the vniuerſall agreement of them all, and the next morning being the nineteenth day of Nouember, the election was made perfect according to the cuſtome, by ſolemne ſcrutinie: and it was on the ſame day whereon two yeares afore he entred victoriouſly into Millan. It was thought that among other things, the great reuenue of his benefices and Eccleſiaſtike offices preuailed much in this buſineſſe: for that the Cardinals, when they entred the Conclaue, ſet downe this conſtitution, that the reuenues of him that ſhould be elected Pope, ſhould be ſhared by equall diſtribution among the others. He would haue retained ſtill his name of Iulio, but being admoniſhed by ſome of the Cardinals, that it had bene obſerued that ſuch as after their election refuſed to change their name, had all died within the yeare, he tooke vpon him the name of Clement the ſeuenth, either for the approch of the feſtiual day of that Saint, or elſe by alluſion, that immediatly after his election he had pardoned the Cardinall of Volterra, and receiued into grace all his faction: which Cardinall, albeit Pope Adrian had in his later dayes declared him vnable to be preſent in the Conclaue, yet he had his place there by permiſſion of the Colledge, and was alwayes, euen to the laſt houre, altogether againſt the election of Iulio. Aſſuredly the opinion of this new Pope was very great throughout all the world; and ſuch, as the ſlowneſſe that had bene vſed in the election (which was more then had happened of a long time before) ſeemed to be well recompenced in that they had placed in that ſeate, a perſon of ſo great authoritie and valour; for that he had the power of the Eſtate of Florence conioyned at his pleaſure with the iuriſdiction of the Church, which was very great: for that he had in the time of Pope Leo gouerned many yeares almoſt all the whole Pontificacie: for that he was iudged a man graue, and conſtant in his deliberations; and for that many things being attributed to him that proceeded from Leo, all men affirmed that he was a man full of ambition, of a haughtie mind, troubleſome, and very deſirous of innouation: to which parts adioyning his abſtinence from pleaſures, and his continuall care to attend affaires, all men expected of him verie great and extraordinarie matters. His election quickly put the Eſtate of the Church into great ſuretie. For the Duke of Ferrara, not a litle aſtoniſhed that ſuch a Pope was mounted into that Seate, and hauing no more hope to get Modena by the coming of the Viceroy of Naples, and leſſe expectation in the French, who afore by the ſolicitation of Theodore Triuulce, newly come to their campe, made him great offers, ſo that he would ioyne with them; after he had left ſufficient garriſon within Reggia and Rubiera, he returned to Ferrara. In like ſort all matters were reappeaſed in Romagna, where John de Saſſatello who had bene expulſed by the power of the Gibelins during the reigne of Adrian, was eſtſoones reentred with a traine of Guelfes, vnder colour to oppreſſe the contrary faction, but in truth, at the incenſing of the French. But when the French armie was diſtributed into Biagraſſa and Roſa, the Admirall, with whom were remaining but foure thouſand Swiſſers, diſmiſſed as vnprofitable all the footmen of Daulphiney and Languedock, and ſent his great artilleries beyond Theſin, with intention to tarrie there for the ſupplies which the King prepared for his ſuccours, not fearing that the enemie would make any inuaſion vpon him in a place ſo ſtrong, and where was ſuch plentie of victuals: and yet not vtterly to loſe time, he ſent Ranſe de Cere with ſeuen thouſand Italian footmen to take Arona, a towne of great ſtrength, and hath his ſituation in the confines of the Lake Maior. This towne was poſſeſſed by Anchiſes Viſconte, and to the reſcue thereof Proſper Colonno ſent from Millan a regiment of twelue hundred footmen: but becauſe the Caſtle of Arona doth ſo much command the towne, that he who holdeth not the Caſtle doth vnprofitably poſſeſſe the towne, Ranſe layd his exploit to winne the Caſtle; but after he had giuen ſundrie aſſaults, wherein he loſt many men, conſuming almoſt a moneth in that enterpriſe, at laſt he leuied his ſiege and went away, confirming the vniuerſall opinion that had bene conceiued of him for many yeares through

through all Italy, that his actions were nothing answerable to the reputation he got in the defence of Crema. About this time Prosper Colonno hauing lyen sicke eight moneths, began to draw to his latest houre, not without suspition of poyson, or of some amorous potion; and therefore whereas afore he could not brooke the coming of the Viceroy, he now solicited it continually, as knowing he could no longer manage the affaires of the war. Therfore the Viceroy came, who as soone as he was come neare to Millan, stayed without for certaine dayes and would not enter, to shew that he reuerenced the vertue and reputation of such a Captaine: and yet when he vnderstood that he was at the last gaspe, and had lost all sense and knowledge, he entred the towne, for a desire he had to see him, but it was at such a time as he liued but few houres after, notwithstanding some hold that he would not enter till he was dead, which was the last day saue one of that yeare. Certainly he was a Captaine of great renowne during the whole course of his life, but in his latest yeares had obtained great reputation and authoritie: he was very skilfull and well experienced in matters of warre, but not apt suddenly to embrace all the occasions that either the errors or weakenesse of the enemies might offer him; and also for his owne part he was so well aduised, that he would not easily giue any aduantage to the enemie to oppresse him: he was by nature easie and slow in his actions, and might very well be called a Lingerer: but herein he was to be praised, that he had managed the warres more with counsels then with the sword, and taught others to defend Estates without exposing themselues to the euent of battels, but in cases of great necessitie. For, in our time there hath bene great difference in the gouernment of warres, seeing that afore Charles the eight passed into Italy, the brunt of the warre being more borne out with horsemen armed at all parts, then with footmen, and the engines wherewith they were wont to take townes being very inconuenient and troublesome to guide and manage, although the armies came oftentimes to the shocke of battel, yet the slaughter was litle, and very rare the bloud that was spilt; and townes that were besieged defended themselues with such facilitie (not for that men had more knowledge to defend them, but by reason of ỹ ignorance to take them,) that there was not so litle or weak a town, which was not able for many dayes to resist great armies of enemies: so that the Estates of others could not be seized vpon without very great difficulties. But when King Charles descended into Italy, the feare of strange nations, the valour of the footmen whose fight was in another maner, but most of all, the furie of the artilleries, filled all Italy with such astonishment, that there remained no hope for any to be able to defend himselfe, that was not strong enough to make head in the open field: for, men that had no knowledge how to defend townes, yeelded at the first approach of the enemies; and haply if there were any towne that stood vpon her defence, it was taken within few dayes. Thus the Realme of Naples and the Duchie of Millan were assailed and conquered as it were in one day. Thus the Venetians being vanquished in one battell onely, left abandoned immediatly all their iurisdiction in the firme land. Thus the French men hauing scarcely seene their enemies, left the Duchie of Millan. Since which time the minds of men being danted with the fury of batteries, they began to whet their wits so, ỹ they found out meanes to defend themselues, by fortifying of townes, with mounts, trenches, flankes, rampiers, and bastillions, which they furnished with good store of artilleries, which being planted in a place which men seeke to defend, do farre more hurt then that that is braked without: so that at this day it is very hard to take a towne where any resistance is made: and haply those inuentions began in Italy in the dayes of our fathers, when the towne of Ottranto was recouered from the Turkes; wherein when Alphonso Duke of Calabria entred afterwards, he found that the Turkes had made there many rampiers and fortifications vnknowne to the Italians, the which neuertheless remained rather in the minds of men, then serued them for example. But Prosper was either the onely man, or the chiefe of all other, that with greatest reputation had twise by these meanes defended the Duchie of Millan; and who as well in offending as in defending, and cutting off victuals from the enemies, as also in prolonging the warre in such sort, as discontent, pouertie, disorders, and other extremities consumed them, hath ouercome them and borne out the warre without once aduenturing the battell, yea without drawing of a sword or breaking so much as once Lance: so that he hauing opened the way to others that haue come after, many warres continuing for many moneths, haue bene ouercome more with industrie, with stratagemes, and by knowing how to take an aduantage, then with the force of armes. These things were done in Italy in the yeare a thousand fiue hundred twentie and three. And the same yeare

were made beyond the Mounts preparations of right great expectation, which brought forth no effects worthy of ſo mightie Princes. For the Emperour and the King of England had contracted together, and promiſed the Duke of Bourbon to enter with a ſtrong armie, the one into Picardie, and the other into Guyen: but the mouing of the King of England in Picardie was to ſmall purpoſe, and the enterpriſe which the Duke of Bourbon had made to inuade Burgondie came quickly to nothing, for that he wanting money to pay his Lanceknights, and ſome of the Captaines who had agreed with the French King, leading with them ſome of his ſouldiers, he deſpaired to do any thing in France, and went to Millan, where the Emperour (hauing no mind that he ſhould paſſe into Spaine, perhaps becauſe he would not haue the mariage of his ſiſter go forward, which the Duke of Bourbon deſired) ſent to him Monſieur de Beaurain to perſwade him to ſtay there, and gaue him the authoritie and title of his Lieutenant Generall in Italy, to induce him with better will to abide there. And likewiſe things ſucceeded not happily to the Emperour on the coaſt of Spaine, for that albeit in a feruent deſire to the warres he was come to Pampeluna to paſſe in perſon into France, and had alreadie ſent his armie beyond the Pyrene hils, who had taken Salusterra, which is not farre from S. Iohn de Pie de Porto, yet his readineſſe being greater then his power, he was not able for want of money to entertaine ſo great forces as were neceſſarie for ſuch an enterpriſe; and for the ſame cauſe he could not aſſemble his armie vntill the latter end of the yeare, ſo that in cold places the ſeaſon of the yeare multiplied his difficulties, and he was letted by want of victuals, troubleſome to be brought ſo long a way; which compelled him to diſſolue his armie, raiſed againſt the counſell of almoſt all his Captains, ſo that the Duke of Alba, who was an old Prince, and of great authoritie, ſayd in the heate of the warre, that the Emperour who in many things reſembled King Ferdinand his grandfather by the mothers ſide, did in this deliberation more repreſent Maximilian his grandfather by the fathers ſide.

The Duke of Bourbon not able to do any thing in Burgondie, cometh to Millan.

Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and foure, in the beginning whereof the difficulties of the French men ſtirring vp the Emperours Captaines to ſeeke to put an end to the war, they called to Millan the Duke of Vrbin and Peter Peſero Treaſurer of Venice, to conſult of the maner of proceeding in the warre: in which counſell they were all of opinion, that as ſoone as the ſixe thouſand Lanceknights which the Viceroy had ſent to leuie were arriued at Millan, the armie of the Emperour and that of the Venetians ioyned together, ſhould accoaſt the enemies, to the end to chaſe them out of the Duchie of Millan, either by force or by famine. And for as much as they eſteemed themſelues ſtrong enough to performe this, there was nothing that hindered their deliberation but the want of money, of which a great ſumme being due to the men of warre for their payes paſt, they thought they ſhould not be able to get them to iſſue out of Millan and other townes, vnleſſe they were firſt payed: and likewiſe for that the armie was to continue in the field, it was no leſſe neceſſarie to take order that for the time to come money might not be wanting when the ſouldiers ſhould be payed, but that it might arriue orderly from one certaine time to another. But the inhabitants of Millan, who deſired to free themſelues of the vexations of the warre, remoued in part theſe difficulties, in lending to the Duke foureſcore and ten thouſand duckats; whereunto they were the more eaſily induced, for that the money which they had lent at ſuch time as Monſieur Lautrech lay afore Millan, was readily repayed vnto them vpon the Dukes reuenues. In like ſort the Pope, who for the remembrance of things paſt, was verie iealous of the victorie of the French, gaue his helping hand hereunto, although with great cunning he made ſhew of the contrarie to ſuch as the King had ſent vnto him: and he cauſed twentie thouſand duckats to be deliuered to the Emperours Embaſſadour with great ſecrecie, ſoliciting alſo the Florentines (of whom the Viceroy required a new contribution by vertue of the league made in the time of Pope Adrian) to pay as their laſt reſt, thirtie thouſand duckats. And yet the Pope had no meaning hereafter to ſhew any more fauor to the one partie then to ỹ other: but (notwithſtanding the Emperor & the King had ſent vnto him as ſoone as he was choſen Pope, the one Monſieur de Beaurain, and the other Monſieur de Saint Maixan, each of them ſeeking to draw him to his owne ſide) his intention was, as ſoone as the preſent dangers ſhould ceaſſe, to vſe ſuch moderation and temperance, as was fit for Popes to vſe when Chriſtian Princes are at diſcord, and without ſhewing himſelfe more inclined to one then to another, to be a worker of peace: which deliberation was plauſible to the French King, who feared leſt the Pope would haue the ſame diſpoſition againſt him, that he had when he was Cardinall; but on the contrarie it displeased the Emperour, who held it not reasonable that he should separate himselfe from him, both for the last alliance that was past, and also for that he had bene fauourable to him since the death of Pope Leo, and had bene helping to him to get the Popedome: and therefore he was much vexed, when he was aduertised from the Pope, that notwithstanding he wished him as much good as before, yet for that he was no more a priuate person, but a common father to all, he was constrained for the time to come, to do nothing which should not turne to the publike good. But whilest the Viceroy prepared himselfe to go meet the enemies, he sent Iohn de Medicis before to Marignan, which towne yeelded to him together with the Castle: and not many dayes after, the Marquis of Pesquiero (who being resolued not to follow the warre vnder Prosper Colonno, would not come to the campe vntill he was aduertised that he drew to his end) hearing that Captaine Bayard lay in Rebecco with three hundred horse & many bands of footmen, hauing called vnto him Iohn de Medicis, they went and assailed him on the sudden, tooke the most part of the footmen and horsemen, and giuing the chase to the residue, returned immediatly to Millan, to giue no leisure to the enemies who were within Biagrassa to pursue them. In this enterprise he was praised for his industrie and valour, but much more for his celeritie, for that Rebecco, which is not past two miles from Biagrassa, is seuenteene miles distant from Millan, frō whence they went. The affaires of the warre being reduced to this degree, that the hope of the French men consisted in this, that want of money would fall vpon their enemies; and of the Imperials, that the French men would suffer scarcitie of victuals, because they had no hope to be able to chase them by force out of their strong lodging of Biagrassa: and yet each partie expecting succours, the one of Lanceknights, the other of Swissers and other footmen, the Admirall set fire vpon Rossa, and afterwards retired those bands that were within it to Biagrassa; and then set himselfe (to distresse the enemies) to ouerrunne and burne all the countrey. But the Lanceknights being at last arriued, the Emperours campe (which contained sixteene hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, seuen thousand Spanish footemen, twelue thousand Lanceknights, and fifteene hundred Italians, vnder the leading of the Duke of Millan, the Duke of Bourbon, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Marquis of Pesquiero) leauing foure thousand footmen for the guard of Millan, went to incampe at Binasco, where not many dayes after the Duke of Vrbin ioyned with them, with sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horsemen, and seuen thousand footmen of the Venetians. At what time the Castle of Cremona being no more able to endure the rage of hunger, Federike de Bossolo that was within Loda, hauing in vaine aduentured to succour it, yeelded vp to the Imperials. Afterwards the armie marched to Casera, a towne within fiue miles of Biagrassa, where the Admirall, who had distributed within Loda, Nouaro and Alexandria, two hundred Lances and fiue thousand footmen, kept himselfe incamped with eight hundred Lances, and eight thousand Swissers, to whom were ioyned within a few dayes after a regiment of three thousand others, together with foure thousand Italians and two thousand Lanceknights, there being found no want of victuals, for that they had as yet prouision for two moneths, as well in the armie, as in the places thereabouts, it being vnpossible to assaile them in a place of such strength without manifest daunger. Therefore the Imperials who many times had assayed to passe the riuer of Thesin, to stop victuals from the French on that side, to get into those townes which they held beyond Thesin, and to take such a course that the succours that were to come out of Erance might not ioyne with them, but were alwayes retained for feare lest Millan should remaine in danger, determined at last to passe, iudging by the confidence they had in the people of Millan, that it was not needfull to keepe there any great garrison: so that the Duke, accompanied with Iohn de Medicis, returned to Millan, where was remaining a strength of sixe thousand footmen. Thus the second day of May they passed the riuer of Thesin, vpon three bridges beneath Pauie, the battell lodging at Gambalo, and the residue of the armie in the villages thereabouts. And when they were passed Thesin, the Admirall sent Ranse de Cere speedily to guard Vigeuena, and fearing to lose that towne, with other peeces in the countrey of Lomellina, which being taken from him he should stand as it were besieged, he drew thither within fiue dayes with the whole armie, leauing within Biagrassa an hundred horsemen and a thousand footmen, and bestowed his vantguard about Vigeuena, and the battell at Mortara, a towne within two miles of Gambalo, where the Viceroy was: in which lodging which is very safe, he had victuals at command, both for the suretie of

the wayes of Monferrat, Verceil and Nouaro, and alſo for that victuals came continually from one towne to another, as it had bene a ſtreame of water. The Admirall preſented battell two dayes together to the enemies, who refuſed to accept it, although they knew themſelues to be ſuperiour in number, and nothing inferiour in reſolution of ſouldiers, becauſe they would not put in danger the hope of the victorie which was almoſt certaine, hauing intelligence by the ſurpriſing of certaine letters, that the enemie began to want money. After the Emperours armie was paſſed Theſin, the Duke of Vrbin leading the Venetian regiments, went to incampe before Garlaſco, a towne ſtrong by ſituation, ditches and rampiers, wherein there were foure hundred footmen Italians; which ſtanding betweene Pauie and Trumello beyond Theſin, where he had an intention to beſtow himſelfe, did hinder the courſe of victuals, not onely from him, but alſo from all the reſidue of the armie: and when he had made a breach, he gaue the aſſault the ſame day, wherein being almoſt repulſed, many of his ſouldiers went into the water vp to the neckes, and ſo paſſed ouer the ditches; and with them were certaine bands of footmen of Iohn de Medicis, who alſo began to aſſaile it with ſuch furie, that they entred by force, making great ſlaughter of ſuch as they found within. Afterwards the armie approched Saint Georges, drawing towards the Pariſh of Carro, to go to Satirano, a towne of good ſtrength, ſituate vpon the hither ſhores of Po, in a place very apt to hinder their victuals, for the keeping whereof, were Hugo de Peppoly and Iohn Birago with certaine horſemen and ſixe hundred footmen. Iohn of Vrbin who was ſent thither with the artilleries, and a regiment of two thouſand footmen Spaniards, tooke firſt the towne, and then the litle Rocke, the moſt part of the men that were within being ſlaine, and the Captaines made priſoners. The French men remoued their campe to ſuccour Satirano, but being preuented by the diligence of their enemies, when they were aduertiſed by the way what was happened, they ſtayed all their armie at Monce. Neither did the affaires of the French men ſucceed any better in other places of the Duchie of Millan: for the ſouldiers that were left within Millan compelled the towne of S. George which ſtands aboue Monce, to render, from whence victuals were brought to Biagraſſa. Vitelli recouered the Citie of Stradella, the inhabitants whereof being conſtrained by the iniquitie of the ſouldiers, had called bands of footmen from Loda. Paul Luſaſco encountring with many light horſemen of the French, put them to flight: and Federike de Boſſolo being departed from Loda to ſet vpon Piſqueton, in ſtead of the victorie, brought home wounds and hurts, beſides the loſſe of many of his men: onely there were certaine light horſemen of the French, who running vp betweene Plaiſance and Tortona, ſurpriſed foureteeene thouſand duckats, which had bene ſent to the Emperours armie.

Amid theſe difficulties, the Admirall had two hopes, the one to haue the warre diuerted, and the other to be ſuccoured: becauſe the King ſent foure hundred Lances by the Mount Geneura, to whom were to be ioyned ten thouſand Swiſſers; and Ranſe de Cere led to the territorie of Bergamo by the way of Valdeſaſina, fiue thouſand Griſons, who were to paſſe from thence to Loda to ioyne with Federike de Boſſolo, with whom there were alreadie many bands of Italian footmen: and the Admirall perſwaded himſelfe that the armie of the Emperour would be conſtrained for the ſuretie of Millan to repaſſe the riuer of Theſin. Againſt theſe companies the Duke of Millan ſent Iohn de Medicis with fiftie men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, who being vnited to three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſmen, and foure thouſand footmen of the Venetians, he drew neare to the enemies, who were come to the village of Crauina, betweene the riuers of Adda and Brembo, eight miles from Bergamo: and he ranne with part of his ſouldiers euen to the place where the Griſons were incamped, who the third day after, complaining that they had found at Crauina neither money, nor horſemen, nor other bands of footmen, as they ſaid Ranſe de Cere had promiſed them, they returned to their countrey. The ſtirring of the Griſons being thus diſſolued, Iohn de Medicis tooke Caranage, and afterwards paſſing Adda, he beat downe with his artilleries the bridge which the French had made at Buſaloro vpon Theſin: and of thoſe townes that are betweene Millan and Theſin there remained none but Biagraſſa in the power of the French: wherein there was ſtore of victuals, and a thouſand footmen in garriſon, vnder Ierome Caracciolo of Naples: but becauſe it hath his ſituation vpon the great channell, and by that meanes ſtoppeth the courſe of victuals which that channell is wont to bring in great plentie to Millan, Francis Sforce who ſent for Iohn de Medicis to come vnto him, and was followed by all the youth of Millan, beſides his ordinarie bands of ſouldiers, and went to beſiege it, and hauing battered it from the Sunne riſing vntill noone, he ſent the ſouldiers to the aſſault, who tooke it the ſame day, to the great commendation of Iohn de Medicis, in whom that day was not onely diſcerned a vertue excelling all the other ſouldiers, but alſo a wiſedome and perfection worthy of a right noble Captaine. Captaine Caracciolo was taken, and many of the footmen committed to the ſword, beſides thoſe which Iohn de Medicis cauſed to be hanged, for that they had runne from him a litle before: and the towne being taken, the Caſtle yeelded, with reſeruation of the liues of them that were therein. The people of Millan reioyced maruellouſly for this ſucceſſe, but the aduerſitie that happened vnto them thereby, was farre greater without compariſon, then the ioy; for that by the ſpoiles and booties that were tranſported to Millan from Biagraſſa where the plague was, the ſeeds of that peſtilent contagion were ſowed in that Citie, and in few moneths increaſed ſo much, that there died thereof onely in Millan, more then fiftie thouſand bodies. But on the other ſide Theſin, where was the force and ſtrength of the warre, the Admirall after the loſſe of Satirano, the enemies being againe approched neare him, abandoned Mortara, and retired in two remoues to Nouaro, his forces being much diminiſhed, for that not onely many of his footmen, but alſo certaine of his men at armes were gone from the campe one after another, and returned into France: ſo that the Admirall had no other intention but to temporize vntill ſuch time as the ſupplies of the Swiſſers were come, who were alreadie neare to Iurea, in number about eight thouſand. On the other ſide, the Captaines of the Emperour going about to ſtop their coming, and to reduce the enemies into difficultie of victuals, ſeized vpon the townes neare to Nouaro, making ſlaughter of thoſe French men which they found there in garriſon: and when they had beſtowed within Verceil certaine bands of ſouldiers, to keepe the Swiſſers from entring there, they went to incampe at Biandra betweene Verceil and Nouaro, in a place enuironed on all parts with ditches, trees and waters. At laſt the Admirall vnderſtanding that the Swiſſers who had paſſed Iurea, were ſtayed along the riuer of Sleſia, which they could not paſſe ouer for the great abundance of waters that were there at that time, and deſiring to ioyne himſelfe with them, more (as was ſuppoſed) to go away in ſuretie, then to fight with the enemie, he went from Nouaro to lodge at Romagnana vpon the ſhore of the ſame riuer: where hauing want of victuals, and the number of his men decreaſing continually, he built a bridge betweene Romagnana and Gattinara: and on the other ſide, the enemies being come from Biandra to Briona, went to incampe within two miles of Romagnana. The French men perceiuing they were in ſo great a ſtreight, paſſed the riuer the day following; and it was beleeued, that if the enemies had bene carefull to watch their diſcamping, they had gained that day an abſolute victorie: but the opinions of the Captaines were diuerſe, of whom ſome had a great deſire to fight, and others to let them go without troubling them at all: and it ſeemed that the armie was not gouerned as appertained, for as much as the Marquis of Peſquiero onely proceeding in all his actions with his accuſtomed valour, ſeemed worthy to haue the whole direction of affaires referred to him; and others that bare enuie to his vertue and glorie, ſought rather to obſcure it, by detracting from him, and contradicting him, then in ioyning their hands together to the buſineſſe. The Captaines of the Imperial armie were very late aduertiſed of the diſcamping of the French men, but as ſoone as it was knowne, many light horſemen and bands of footmen paſſed the foord of the riuer without order and without enſignes, and followed them with ſuch diligence, that hauing ouertaken the reareguard, they began to skirmiſh with it: and albeit the French men fighting and marching, ſuſtained them for a long ſpace of time, yet in the end they left on the place ſeuen peeces of artilleries, a great quantitie of munitions and victuals, beſides many enſignes of horſemen and footmen, not a few alſo being ſlaine in the fight. The French made ſhew as though they would incampe at Gattinara which is within a mile of Romagnana, and in the meane while they ſecretly cauſed their artilleries and baggage to paſſe. But as the enemies, who beleeued they would incampe there, began to retire themſelues, they went and lodged at Rauſſingo towards Iurea, which is ſixe miles further. The Imperials without any impediment incamped the ſame night vpon the riuer, which they paſſed as ſoone as the Moone began to ſhine: but they were not followed by the Venetians, who for that they were entred vpon the lands of the Duke of Sauoy, thought they had exceeded the bonds of the confederation, by the which they were bound to no further matter then to the defence of the Duchie of Millan. The French men marched with a ſlow pace in battell array, and had beſtowed in the areareguard the bands

of Swiſſers, by whom were repulſed the firſt horſemen and footmen that came in diſorder to charge them, and the French by this time were gone from Rauiſingo about two miles. But the Marquis of Peſquiero coming on a ſudden with his light horſemen, they were eftſoones recharged, and yet they forbare not to march, of whom Captaine Chabanes was ſlaine in this laſt charge, and Captaine Bayard made priſoner, being firſt hurt with the ſhot of an harquebuze, whereof he died within a few dayes after. But the Marquis, notwithſtanding many bands of ſouldiers were come to him, thought not good to purſue the enemies further, both for that he was vnfurniſhed of artilleries, and had with him no more but one part of the armie: and thus the French who from that time forward were freed from any further troubles, returned together with the Swiſſers to their houſes, hauing left at Vaury beyond Iurea fifteene peeces of artilleries, in the guard of three hundred Swiſſers and one of the Lords of the countrey: but thoſe were no better preſerued then the others, for that the Emperours Captaines hauing aduertiſement thereof, ſent to take them. After this the Victors deuided themſelues into diuers parts: the Duke of Vrbin was ſent to Loda, and the Marquis of Peſquiero to Alexandria, which two Cities onely were holden for the King, for that Nouaro (the Duke of Millan and Iohn de Medicis approching neare vnto it) was rendred. The Viceroy was appointed to go againſt the Marquis of Rothelin, who was come ouer the Mounts with foure hundred Lances; neuertheleſſe as ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Admirall was gone, he returned ſpeedily into France, and Monſieur de Buſſy and Iulio de S. Seuerin to whom was committed the guard of Alexandria, made no reſiſtance. In like ſort Federike, after he had demanded a few dayes reſpite, to know if the Admirall were indeed paſſed the Mounts, compounded to yeeld vp Loda, vpon condition that it might be lawfull for him (as likewiſe it had bene accorded to them of Alexandria) to leade into France the bands of Italian footmen, who being in number about fiue thouſand, (for there were ſo many in both the Cities) did good ſeruice to the King afterwards. This was the end of the warre that was managed againſt the Duchie of Millan vnder the gouernment of the Admirall: whereby the French Kings power being nothing weakened, nor the rootes of euils remoued, the multitude of calamities was not take away, but only deferred to another ſeaſon, Italy remaining in the meane while freed from preſent troubles, but not of the feare of further aduerſities to come: and yet the Emperour by the incitation of the Duke of Bourbon, and allured by the hope that the authoritie of that Duke might ſerue him to ſpeciall purpoſe, was of mind to transferre the warre into France, whereunto the King of England alſo made ſhew to be readie and diſpoſed.

In the beginning of this yeare the Emperor had ſent his campe to Fontaraby, a towne of very ſmall circuite, ſtanding vpon the frontiers of France and Spaine: the which towne albeit it was very well manned, and furniſhed with artilleries and victuals, and that thoſe within had leiſure ſufficient to fortifie it, yet through the ignorance of the French men the fortifications were ſo ill made, that the towne lying open to the batterie of the enemies, neceſſitie conſtrained them to giue it vp with the ſafetie of their liues. When he had recouered Fontarabie, his thoughts reached yet further, making no reckoning of the perſwaſions and authoritie of the Pope, who hauing ſent in the beginning of the yeare, to the Emperour, the French King, and the King of England, to ſolicite a peace or a truce, had found their minds very ill diſpoſed thereunto. For, the French King conſenting to a truce for two yeares, refuſed the peace, for the ſmall hope he had to obtaine thereby ſuch conditions as he deſired: and the Emperour reiecting the truce, by the which was giuen good time to the French King to prepare himſelfe to make a new warre, deſired to haue peace: and any ſort of compoſition that could be made by the Popes meanes, was diſpleaſing to the King of England, for a deſire he had that the treatie of the accord might in the end be wholly referred to him; whereunto he was induced by the ambitious counſels of the Cardinall of Yorke, who ſeruing as a true example in our dayes of immoderate pride, notwithſtanding he was of very baſe condition, and deſcended of very poore and abiect parents, was riſen to ſuch authoritie with the King, that it was manifeſt to all men, that the will of the King was nothing without the approbation of the Cardinall of Yorke: as of the contrary, whatſoeuer the Cardinall of Yorke determined, was of very great force. But the King and the Cardinall kept this matter diſſembled with the Emperour, and ſeemed very forward to moue warre againſt the Realme of France, which the King of England pretended lawfully to appertaine to him. The ground of his reaſons was, that King Edward the third, King of England, after the death of the French King Charles the fourth called the faire, who died without iſſue male in the yeare of our ſaluation 1328, and of whoſe ſiſter the ſaid King Edward the third was borne, made inſtance to be declared King of France, as the next heire male to the French King deceaſſed: whereof neuertheleſſe he was refuſed by the States of the Realme, who determined, that by vertue of the law Salike, an ancient law of that kingdome, not onely the women were diſabled for the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, but alſo all ſuch as deſcended of them: which was the cauſe that ſhortly after taking vpon him the title of King of France, he inuaded the Realme with a mightie armie, where obtaining many victories, both againſt Philip de Valois, who by common conſent had bene declared ſucceſſour to Charles the Faire, and alſo againſt King Iohn his ſonne, who being ouerthrowne in battell, was led priſoner into England, at laſt he made peace with him, whereby many Prouinces and Eſtates of the kingdome remaining vnto him, he renounced the title of King. But this peace being of no long continuance, there were ſometimes long wars, and ſometimes tedious truces: vntill at laſt Henrie the fift King of England entring confederacie with Philip Duke of Burgundie, who bare a mind eſtranged from the Crowne of France, for the murder done vpon Duke Iohn his father, had ſo good ſucceſſe againſt Charles the ſixt who was diſtracted of his wits, that he occupied almoſt the whole kingdome, together with the towne of Paris: and finding in that Citie the French King accompanied with his wife, and the Ladie Katherine his daughter, he tooke to wife the ſaid Ladie, cauſing the mad King to conſent, that notwithſtanding his ſonne Charles did ſuruiue him, the kingdome ſhould be transferred to her and her children after his death. By vertue of which title, although vaine and of no force, when King Henry was dead, his ſon Henrie the ſixt was ſolemnly crowned at Paris, and proclaimed King of England and France: and albeit, after the death of Charles the ſixt, his ſonne Charles the ſeuenth, by reaſon of great warres happening in England betweene the Lords of the bloud royall, had chaſed the Engliſh out of all they held in France, except the towne and territories of Calice, yet the Kings of England did not leaue for all that to vſe the title of King of France. Theſe cauſes might haply moue King Henrie the eight to the warre, the rather alſo for that he ſtood more aſſured in his Realme then any of his predeceſſors had done: for that the Kings of the houſe of Yorke (that was the name of one faction) hauing ſuppreſſed the Kings of the houſe of Lancaſter (which was the other faction,) and the partakers with the houſe of Lancaſter ſeeing there was no more remaining of that houſe, raiſed to the kingdome Henrie of Richmond, for his proximitie and neareneſſe vnto them: who after he had ſubdued his aduerſaries, to the end he might reigne with more ſuretie and greater authoritie, tooke to wife one of the daughters of Edward the laſt King but one of the houſe of Yorke: ſo that it ſeemed that all the rights of both the one and the other houſe, were tranſported and fallen vpon the perſon of King Henrie the eight, who was borne of that mariage. Theſe houſes for the cognizances which they bare, were commonly called the Red Roſe and the White. Neuertheles the king of England was not principally ſo much carried by an hope to win the Realme of France by armes, for that he was not ignorant of innumerable difficulties therein, as by the ambitious deſire of the Cardinall of Yorke, that the long and tedious trauels and infinite neceſſities of the warre, might in the end bring his King to be the onely arbitrator of the peace; which the Cardinall knowing well that it would depend much of his authoritie, he thought at one time both to make his name great through all the world, and alſo to keepe himſelfe in grace with the French King, whom he fauoured ſecretly: and therefore the King of England purpoſed not to bind himſelfe to ſuch conditions, whereunto it was neceſſarie he ſhould be bound if he had had a forward mind to ſo great a warre. Thus the Emperour being incited to the warre by ſuch an occaſion, but much more by an hope that the fauour, authoritie and popular opinion which the Duke of Bourbon was wont to haue in that kingdome, would cauſe the Commons of that Realme to draw into commotion: and therefore notwithſtanding he was aduiſed by many about him, that being deſtitute of money, and hauing confederates whoſe fidelitie was vncertaine, he ſhould giue ouer the thoughts to begin ſo intricate a warre, and conſent that the Pope might treate vpon the ſurceaſſing of armes, he couenanted with the King of England and the Duke of Bourbon in this ſort: That the Duke ſhould enter into the Realme of France with part of the armie that was in Italy; to whom as ſoon as he ſhould be ouer the Mounts, the King of England ſhould pay an hundred thouſand duckats for the defrayments of the firſt moneth of the warre: and that it ſhould be in the election of the ſaid King either to continue this contribution from moneth to moneth, or elſe to paſſe into France with a ſtrong armie, to make warre from the firſt day of Iuly vntill the end of December: and in that caſe the countries of Flanders ſhould furniſh him of three thouſand horſe, and a thouſand footmen, with ſufficient artilleries and munitions: That if the victorie fell to them, there ſhould be rendred to the Duke of Bourbon all thoſe lands which the French king had taken from him, and that Prouence ſhould be gotten for him, whereunto he pretended right by reaſon of the reſignation that was made after the death of Charles the eight by the Duke of Lorraine, to Anne Ducheſſe of Bourbon; and that he ſhould hold it by the title of King: That firſt he ſhould make an oath to the King of England as King of France, and do him homage; which if he did not performe, this capitulation ſhould be voide: and alſo that the Duke of Bourbon ſhould treate of nothing with the French King without the conſent of them both: That the Emperour at the ſame time ſhould make warre on the coaſt of Spaine: and that the Embaſſadours of the Emperour and the King of England ſhould procure the Potentates of Italy, to the end to be for euer aſſured of the warre of the French, to be concurrant with their money in this enterpriſe; a matter which ſorted to no effect, for that the Pope did not onely refuſe to contribute, but expreſly blamed that enterpriſe, preſaging that it would not onely haue an ill ſucceſſe in France, but alſo would be the cauſe to returne the warre againe vpon Italy, and that with a greater puiſſance and peril then before. Which confederation being made, although the Duke of Bourbon (who refuſed conſtantly to acknowledge the King of England for King of France) counſelled rather to march with the armie towards Lions, to the end to draw neare his owne lands and countreys: yet it was reſolutely determined, that he ſhould paſſe into Prouence, both for that it would be more eaſie for the Emperour to ſend him ſuccours out of Spaine, and alſo to make vſe of the armie by ſea, which was in preparing at Genes by the commandement and with the money of the Emperour.

The proceedings of this expedition were, that the Duke of Bourbon and with him the Marquis of Peſquiero (declared in this warre Lieutenant of the Emperour, for that he was not content to obey the Duke of Bourbon) ſhould paſſe to Nice, but with forces farre leſſe then ſuch as were appointed, for that to fiue hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, foure thouſand footmen Spaniards, three thouſand Italians, and fiue thouſand Lanceknights, which they had with them, there ſhould haue bene ioyned three hundred men at armes of the armie in Italy, and fiue thouſand other Lanceknights: but theſe came not for want of money; and the Viceroy hauing no meanes to wage new companies of footmen according to the reſolution ſet downe in the firſt counſels, retained the men at armes for the guard of the countrey, to the end to make head againſt Michael Angeo Marquis of Saluſſo, who being departed from his Eſtate, kept vpon the Mountaines with a thouſand footmen. Hereunto was added, that the Emperours armie at ſea (one of their principall hopes) being guided by Don Hugo de Moncado, a creature of the Duke Valentinois, and who was a man malicious and of a wicked life, appeared inferiour to the Nauie of the French King, which being parted from Marſeilles, was ſtayed in the port of Villefranche. Neuertheleſſe the Emperours armie entred into Prouence, where were Monſieur de la Paliſſa, Captaine Fayetta, Ranſe de Cere, and Federike de Boſſolo, Captaines of the French King, who withdrew themſelues into townes, for that they were not ſtrong enough to make head in the field: and a part of the armie marching along the ſea ſide, tooke the Tower that commandeth the port of Tolon, from whence were taken two Cannons that were drawne to the armie: and the Citie of Aix yeelded, which for her authoritie, and for that the Parliament is kept there, is the chiefeſt Towne of Prouence; many other townes of the countrey doing the like. The Duke of Bourbon deſired that from Aix the armie might march further, leauing the ſea ſide, and that they ſhould ſeeke to paſſe the riuer of Rhoſne, to get further into the bodie of the Realme of France, whileſt the Kings prouiſions were yet but weake: for that the men at armes of France, who had ſuffered much, and were very ill payed by the King, who being drained of money, and expected not that his enemies would paſſe out of Lombardie into France, were in ſuch diſorder, that they could not with ſpeed be marſhalled againe: and withall the King hauing no confidence in the valour of the footmen of his owne kingdome, was conſtrained before he could march into the field, to tarrie for the coming of certaine footbands of the Swiſſers and Lanceknights: in which time the Duke of Bourbon thought he might do ſome matter of importance in paſſing ouer Rhoſne. But the Marquis of Peſquiero with the other Spaniſh Captaines were of another aduice, who for the oportunitie of the ſea, deſired (knowing that to be the will of Ceſar) that Marſeilles might be conquered; which is a hauen very conuenient to moleſt the Realme of France with ſea armies, and to paſſe out of Spaine into Italy; whoſe wils the Duke of Bourbon being not able to reſiſt, they pitched their campe before Marſeilles, wherein was newly entred Ranſe de Cere with thoſe bands of footmen which had bene led into France from Alexandria and Loda. They lay fortie dayes before Marſeilles without being able to do any thing. For although they battered the walls in many places with their artilleries, and laboured to work their entrie by mining, yet they found many difficulties; as, the wals that were very ſtrong and of ancient building; the valour of the defendants: the diſpoſition of the people moſt affectionate to the French King, and very hatefull to the name of the Spaniards, for the memorie that old Alphonſo of Aragon as he returned frō Naples into Spaine with an armie by ſea, had ſurprized and ſacked that towne; and for the hope of ſuccours as well by ſea as land, for that the French King was come to Auignon, (a Citie belonging to the Pope, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Rhoſne) where he aſſembled a mightie armie with great diligence. Moreouer, the Emperours Captaines began to fall into want of money, and their hopes began to faile, that the French King being inuaded in other places, would be letted to conuert all his forces to one part onely: becauſe the King of England, notwithſtanding he had ſent to the Duke of Bourbon Maſter Richard Pace, did both refuſe to pay the three hundred thouſand duckats for the ſecond moneth, and alſo made ſlender ſhewes to moue warre in Picardie: yea, hauing receiued into England Iohn Ioachin de Paſſano whom the French King had ſent to him; and the Cardinal of Yorke making ſtrange anſwers to the Emperours Embaſſadours; he gaue great occaſion both to doubt and diſtruſt him. And touching Spaine, the power was not anſwerable to the will: for the Courts of Caſtile (ſo they call the congregation of the Deputies aſſembled in the name of the whole kingdome) hauing refuſed to aide the Emperour with foure hundred thouſand duckats, which they are wont to do when it is for a matter of importance, and that the King ſtands in great need, could ſend no money to the armie that was in Prouence, nor raiſe againſt the French king in the frontiers of Spaine any other then very weake forces, and ſuch whereof there was ſmall reckoning made: ſo that the Imperiall Captaines deſpairing to be able to take Marſeilles, and fearing to runne into ſome great danger when the King ſhould approach, raiſed their campe the ſame day that the King departed from Auignon with his whole armie, hauing gathered a regiment of ſixe thouſand Swiſſers. When the Imperiall Captaines had raiſed their ſiege from before Marſeilles, they preſently turned their faces towards Italy, whither they retired with great diligence, for that they perceiued into what perill they ſhould fall, if either all, or part of the French Kings armie ſhould accoaſt them in the countrey of the enemie. And on the other ſide, the King iudging that a faire occaſion was offered to recouer the Duchie of Millan, for that he had a puiſſant army, for the knowledge he had that the enemies were weake, & in a hope that taking the neareſt way, he ſhould be in Italy afore thoſe that went from Marſeilles; he determined to follow the benefite that fortune preſented vnto him: which he imparted to his Captains with theſe words: I haue concluded and reſolued with my ſelfe to paſſe in perſon into Italy, and whoſoeuer would counſell me the contrary, ſhall not onely not be heard of me, but alſo ſhall much diſpleaſe me. Let euery one therefore looke carefully to performe that which ſhall be giuen him in charge, or that any way belongeth to his office: for God who is a louer of iuſtice, and the inſolencie and raſhneſſe of the enemies haue at laſt layed open a meanes for vs to recouer that which hath bene violently taken from vs againſt all right and reaſon. To theſe words was correſpondent both his conſtancie in determining, and his celeritie in execution. For he cauſed his armie to march immediatly, wherein were two thouſand lances and twentie thouſand footmen, ſhunning to meete with the Ladie Regent his mother, who was come from Auignon to perſwade him not to paſſe the Mounts in perſon, but to manage the warre by his Captaines. He gaue order to Ranſe de Cere to furniſh his galleys with thoſe bands of footmen which he had at Marſeilles; and to the end not to giue eare to any negociations of peace, or elſe for that he ſomewhat diſtruſted the Pope, he forbad the Archbiſhop of Capua that was ſent vnto him to go afterwards to the Emperour, to paſſe any further, and told him he would negociate with him by letters ſtaying at Auignon with his mother, or elſe that he ſhould returne againe to the Pope: and in the meane while he followed the enemies with the greateſt diligence he could. But they making ſmall reckoning of the harmes which the payſants did to them, and marching in very good order along the ſea ſide, at laſt they got to Monaco, and from thence

when they had broken their artilleries in peeces,which for more facilitie of carriage, they laded their Mulets withall, they went to Finale; where vnderſtanding that the King approched, they doubled their pace,to the end to be able in good ſeaſon to defend the Duchie of Millan,wherin were not remaining forces ſufficient to make reſiſtance. Thus both the armies drawing towards Italy, they arriued in one and the ſame day, the French King at Verceil, the Marquis of Peſquiero with the horſemen and Spaniſh footmen at Alba, being followed one dayes iourney behind by the Duke of Bourbon and the Lanceknights. The Marquis not giuing himſelf leiſure to pauſe, or ſcarcely to breathe, went the day following from Alba to Voguiera, being fortie miles diſtant, to the end he might the next day get into Pauie: and there he ioyned his forces with the Viceroy who was come thither from Alexandria,for the guard of which towne he had left a ſtrength of two thouſand footmen,and it was at the time when the French armie began to draw faſt vpon the ſhores of the riuer of Theſin; and in this place they conſulted among themſelues with Ierome Moron of the common affaires, wherein their firſt deuice was, that leauing ſufficient garriſon within Pauie, they ſhould diſpoſe all their forces to the defence of Millan, as they had done at other times: and therefore they appointed that Moron ſhould go thither forthwith to make prouiſion of things neceſſarie, and that the Duke of Millan whom they had ſent for, ſhould follow him: and touching themſelues,when they had left within Pauie, Anthonie de Leua with three hundred men at armes, fiue thouſand footmen, all Lanceknights (except certaine Spaniards) they tooke their way to Millan.

But the Citie of Millan,afflicted with the great plague that had tormented it all the Sommer, appeared no more like it ſelf; for ỹ a great number of people were dead, many to auoid ſo great an inconuenience had abſented themſelues,and it contained not ſuch prouiſions of victuals as it was wont; the meanes to recouer money was very difficult, and touching the fortifications, there had bene no care had of them, ſo that all the bulwarkes and rampiers lay reuerſed on the ground; and yet notwithſtanding all theſe things, the inhabitants ſhewed themſelues readie to endure all labour,and vndergo any danger: but Moron, who ſaw that to put the armie into the towne, would rather cauſe the ruine then the defence of the Citie, tooke another courſe; for which cauſe putting himſelfe in the midſt of a great preaſſe of the people of Millan, he ſpake in this ſort: I know well that there remaineth in you the ſame affection which you haue alwayes had to defend Francis Sforce your Lord; and for his part the calamities and dangers of his dearely beloued people do pierce him to the very heart,as they haue always done,and he is likewiſe readie to lay downe his owne life for your ſafetie, as you do now expoſe your ſelues with no leſſe readineſſe then you haue often done heretofore: but your forces are in no ſort anſwerable to your wils, for that your towne being made almoſt emptie of inhabitants, naked of money and victuals, and withall your fortifications extremely ruined, there is no meanes to keepe the French men from entring. The Duke is maruellouſly grieued,that he is conſtrained to leaue you abandoned, but it would be more grieuous to him then death it ſelfe,if in ſeeking to defend you, he ſhould be the cauſe of your vtter ruine and deſtruction, as doubtleſſe he ſhould. Among ſo many and great euils, he is holden wiſe that chuſeth the leaſt, and that deſpaireth not ſo much,as to abandon all his hopes with one deliberation onely: and therefore the Duke aduiſeth you to yeeld to neceſſitie, and obey the French King, to preſerue your ſelues for a better time, which we haue great cauſe to hope will ſoone returne. The Duke will not abandon himſelfe for the preſent, nor you for the time to come. The power of the Emperour is very great, his fortune incredible, the cauſe very iuſt, and our enemies the very ſame whom we haue ſo often vanquiſhed. God wil behold your pietie towards the Duke,and the Dukes zeale to his countrey: and we ought to hold for certaine, that ſuffering for a good end, that whereunto preſent neceſſitie conſtraineth vs, he will quickly giue vs ſuch a victorie ouer the enemie, who is moſt proud, that happily enioying a very long peace, we ſhall be freed and reſtored in good time from ſo many diſcommodities and afflictions which we haue ſuffered. After which words, when he had put victuals into the Caſtle, he iſſued out of the towne. The Duke went alſo to Millan, not knowing any thing of that which Moron had done: but he was ſcarcely come out of Pauie,when he met with Ferdinand Caſtriot who conducted the artillerie,who aduertiſing him that part of the enemies were paſſed Theſin, and that they had ouerthrowne Captaine Sucere a Bourgonian with his light horſemen vpon the ſhores of the riuer, he returned to Pauie, fearing to find ambuſhes and impediments in the way. And albeit the Duke and Moron had proceeded ded with ſinceritie in theſe matters, yet the Emperours Captaines who were with the armie at Binaſco, being entred into a iealouſie leſt they had ſecretly contracted with the French King, ſent to Millan Captaine Alarcon with two hundred Lances, either to follow him, or to lie ſtill, according to the aduertiſements that ſhould be giuen them: and when he was arriued there, the people who were alreadie compounded with certaine exiles that negociated in the Kings name, began to take heart, and to publiſh the name of the Emperour and Francis Sforce. But Captaine Alarcon, knowing there was no hope of defence, and vnderſtanding that the vantguard of the French was alreadie at hand, he iſſued out of the gate called Rome gate, and tooke the way to Loda, whither the whole armie alſo marched, at the ſame time that the enemies began to enter by the gates of Theſin and Verceil; who, if they had not turned towards Millan, but had ſet themſelues to follow the armie of the Emperour, being wearied with the long way they had marched, wherein they had loſt many of their weapons and horſes, it was beleeued for certaine, that they had very eaſily broken and diſperſed them: and alſo, if after they were approched to Millan, they had preſently drawne towards Loda, the Emperours Captaines would not haue had the courage to ſtay there; and haply by paſſing with diligence the riuer of Adda, they might with ỹ ſame facilitie haue put the reſidue of the enemies into great diſorder. But the King haply either ſuppoſing it a matter of great importance to aſſure himſelfe of Millan, which Citie had alwayes made the greateſt reſiſtance againſt him, or not knowing the occaſion, or being moued by ſome other cauſe, he not onely approched the Citie of Millan, whereinto he neither entred, nor ſuffered the armie to enter, but ſtayed a while to beſtow in it a ſufficient garriſon, and to giue direction for beſieging the Caſtle, wherein were ſeuen hundred Spaniſh footmen; and he forbad, to the great praiſe of his modeſtie and clemencie, that no diſpleaſures ſhould be done to the inhabitants: and after he had taken order for Millan, he turned towards Pauie, not holding it conuenient for the eſtate of his affaires, to leaue behind his backe a Citie wherein were ſo many ſouldiers. The King had in his armie (as the bruite went) reckoning thoſe that remained at Millan, two thouſand Lances, eight thouſand Lanceknights, ſixe thouſand Swiſſers, ſixe thouſand aduenturers, and foure thouſand Italians: which number increaſed much afterwards. At this time the Marquis of Peſquiero was gotten into Loda with two thouſand footmen: and the Viceroy hauing reuictualled the townes of Alexandria, Coma, and Treſſa, was entred into Sonzin, together with Francis Sforce and Charles Bourbon; who amid ſo many difficulties and diſtreſſes were ſomewhat encouraged by the Kings going to Pauie: and purpoſing to readdreſſe their companies if the defence of that Citie would giue them libertie (for otherwiſe they ſaw no remedie,) they ſent into Germanie to leuie ſixe thouſand footmen, for the payes of whom, and other expences neceſſarie, there was prouiſion made with the fiftie thouſand duckats which the Emperour had ſent to Genes to be employed in the warres of Prouence. But that which aboue all other things gaue impediment to their counſels, was their want of money: for they had no meanes to draw any out of the Duchie of Millan, nor any hope to obtaine from the Emperour, by reaſon of his diſabilitie, any other matter then a commiſſion, to ſell at Naples as much as they could of the reuenues of that kingdome; and touching their ancient Confederates, they expected of them very litle, or haply no reliefe, either of money or men: for that as the Pope and the Florentines being ſued vnto by them for ſome contribution of money, gaue them nothing but generall words. Alſo the Pope, who after the Admirall was gone out of Italy had abſolutely reſolued not to meddle any more in the wars between the Emperour and the French King, would neuer renew the confederation made with his predeceſſor, nor contract new league with any Prince: and which more is, although he declared himſelfe inclined to the Emperour and the King of England, yet he had afore ſecretly promiſed the French King, not to hinder him in the recouerie of the Duchie of Millan. And the Venetians being required by the Viceroy to furniſh thoſe bands of ſouldiers which they were bound vnto by the capitulations of the league; albeit they refuſed thē not, yet they made cold anſwers, as men who purpoſed to accōmodate their counſels according to the proceeding of things; either for that in many of them was renewed the memorie of their ancient alliance with the French king, or for an opinion they had that he would remain victorious, in regard of the forces he had in Italy againſt enemies ill prepared, and worſe prouided; or elſe for that the Emperours ambition was more ſuſpected to them then before, ſeeing that to the great maruel of all men, and complaint almoſt of all Italy, he had not inueſted Francis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan; and alſo they were much

carried by the authoritie of the Pope, to whoſe counſels and example they bare no ſmall reſpect at that time. But the French King being approched Pauie on the vpper ſide betweene the riuer of Theſin and the way that leadeth to Millan, when he had incamped his vantguard within the ſuburbes of Saint Anthonie beyond Theſin vpon the way that goeth to Genes, and beſtowed himſelfe in the Abbey of Saint Lanfranke, which is within a mile of the wals, he battered the wals in two places with his artilleries for two dayes together, and then ranging his armie into battell array, he began to giue the aſſault: but finding the towne well rampiered within, and the defendants ſhewing themſelues valiant and aſſured in the defence, and on the contrary diſcerning in his owne ſouldiers manifeſt ſignes of feare, and many to be ſlaine in the charge, he cauſed the retrait to be ſounded; and knowing well that it would be hard to take by aſſault a towne that was defended by ſo many men of warre, he determined to caſt trenches and platformes by the labour of a great number of pioners, deuiſing to cut off the flanks, to giue more ſuretie to his ſouldiers when they ſhould approch: and beſides, (which was a labour long and difficult) he cauſed mines to be made in diuers places, hoping to preuaile by that meanes, if otherwiſe he could not: and at laſt, becauſe the valour and number of the defendants cauſed him to diſtruſt much, when he had asked counſell of many enginers and men that knew the courſe of the riuer, which about two miles aboue Pauie ſeparates it ſelfe into two armes, and paſſing a mile lower meeteth & ioyneth together againe before it falleth into Po, he determined to diuert the arme that paſſeth on that ſide to Pauie, and to make it fall into the leſſer arme, which they call the Granalone, in hope to take it the more eaſily on that ſide, where the wall by reaſon of the ſuretie which the depth of the water did giue, was not rampiered. And in this worke, which was performed with very great expences, and with an infinite number of men, not without feare of thoſe within, he conſumed many dayes: but the violence of the water (being much riſen by reaſon of the great raines that fell) breaking downe the bankes and ſluces which were made in the channell where the riuer was deuided to force the courſe of the water to enter into the leſſer arme, and the King hoping at this time with multitude of men and money to ſurmount the violence of the ſtreame, in the end experience made him know (which almoſt alwayes happeneth) that the force of water can do more then either the trauell of men, or induſtrie of enginiſts: ſo that the King being depriued of the hope to take Pauie by force, or by ſuch workings, he determined to continue the ſiege; with the long tract and continuance whereof, he hoped to reduce the defendants into a neceſſitie of rendring. Now whileſt theſe things were in doing, when the Pope heard that the King had taken Millan, being moued with ſo happie beginnings, he ſtudied to aſſure his owne affaires, and to this end he ſent to the French King, Iohn Mathew Giberto Biſhop of Verona his Datario, whom he truſted much, and who withall was verie acceptable to the French King. He gaue him in charge, to go firſt to Sonzin, to exhort the Viceroy and the other Captaines to peace, and to giue them to vnderſtand that he went to the King for the ſame cauſe: but their hopes being increaſed by the reſiſtance of Pauie, they made him this braue anſwer, That they would giue no eare to any compoſition whereby the King ſhould retaine any foote of land in the Duchie of Millan. The like, or haply a more hard diſpoſition he found in the French king, who was puffed vp by the greatnes of his armie, & for the good means he had, not onely to continue it, but alſo to increaſe it; vpon which foundation principally he affirmed he had paſſed into Italy, and not vpon a ſimple hope onely to preuent his enemies, although that in good part had ſucceeded to him. The King ſaid he had an aſſured hope to carrie Pauie, which he continued to batter verie furiouſly; and that by the meanes of the workes which he cauſed to be made about the walls, which he aſſured himſelfe the enemies could not hinder, for the want they had of munitions, which was eaſie to be diſcerned by the litle number of ſhots which they made, and for the ſcarcitie of bread that was within the towne: beſides that he was not without hope alſo to be able to turne the ſtreame of Theſin: and that he eſteemed § recouery of the Duchie of Millan & Genes, a recompence far vnworthy of ſo great labors & expences, but that he purpoſed alſo to inuade § kingdom of Naples. After this, the principall cauſe of the Biſhops legation was debated betweene them, and ſorted to effect with very ſmall difficultie, for as much as the Pope bound himſelfe not to giue againſt the King any ſuccours, manifeſt or ſecret; and the Florentines did the like: and the King receiued the Pope and the Florentines into his protection, comprehending eſpecially the authoritie which the family of Medicis had within Florence: and it was agreed that this accord ſhould not be publiſhed, but when when the Pope ſhould thinke good. And yet, although it came not preſently to the knowledge of the Emperours Captaines, they entred dayly more and more into iealouſie of the Pope: and therefore to be fully aſſured of his intention, they ſent vnto him Martin Abbot of Nagera Commiſſarie of the campe, to propound vnto him both hope and feare. For on the one part they made him offer of very great things, and on the other they gaue him to vnderſtand, that if the Emperour and the King came to the extremitie of contention, the Emperour would hold ſuch as ſtood neuters for no other then enemies. But the Pope anſwered, that nothing could be more vndecent for him, then to giue ouer neutralitie, in warres that are made between Chriſtian Princes, for that the office of a Paſtor did ſo require, and for that he might with the greater authority interpoſe to ſolicite peace, whereof he treated at the ſame time with the Emperor, at whoſe Court ſince the taking of Millan was arriued the Archbiſhop of Capua, whom the Lady Regent had permitted to paſſe frõ Lions into Spaine: where, after he had with the ſame reaſons excuſed the Pope for that he would not renew the league, as the Emperour had inſtantly required him, when he vnderſtood that the King drew towards Italy, he earneſtly perſwaded him in his name, to lay aſide armes, by making peace or truce. But that which inclined the Emperour to accord, was the difficulties whereinto he ſaw his armie reduced, the ſlender meanes he had to leuie money in Spaine to relieue the affaires of Italy, the proſperitie which followed the French King, and the ſuſpition leſt the King of England had ſecretly contracted with his enemie: foraſmuch as that King not onely refuſed that the fiftie thouſand duckats, which at laſt he had prouided at Rome, for the warre of Prouence, ſhould be ſent to the armie that was in Lombardie; but alſo, which cauſed greater doubt, he demanded of the Emperour (ſuffering ſo great neceſſitie) reſtitution of the money he had lent him, and that he ſhould pay him all ſuch ſummes as he was bound vnto. For, the Emperour when he paſſed into Spaine, being very deſirous to be conioyned with him, (to remoue all difficulties that might hold him in ſuſpence) bound himſelfe to pay him that penſion which he had yearely of the French King, and twentie thouſand duckats for the penſions which the ſame King payed to the Cardinall of Yorke and others, together with thirtie thouſand duckats payable to Queene Blanch the widow of King Lewis: of all which ſummes he had made no payment till that day. And yet the Emperor, although to ỹ affliction of mind, was added an ill diſpoſition of his bodie, being fallen into a Feuer quartaine, either for the diſpleaſure he had conceiued when the difficulties to take Marſeilles began to appeare, or for that his mind, ill diſpoſed to giue place to the enemie, was not naturally made tractable by any difficulties, or for that he had a firme confidence in the vertue of his armie, if once they came to battell with the enemie; or for that he promiſed himſelfe, that hereafter Fortune would be as fauourable to him as ſhe had bene in former times; he anſwered, That it was not a matter agreeing with his dignity, to make any conuention ſo long as the French King vexed with armes the Duchie of Millan.

The Frẽch king ſendeth the Duke of Albanie into the realme of Naples.

In the meane time the French King had determined to inuade the Realme of Naples, in hope that the Viceroy moued with the danger, for that there was no garriſon at all there, would either abandon the Duchie of Millan, and go to the defence thereof, or at leaſt would agree to lay downe armes vpon ill conditions; a thing which the King began in a maner to deſire, for the difficulties he ſaw to obtaine Pauie. It was ſet downe, that Iohn Steward Duke of Albanie, of the bloud royall of the Kings of Scotland, ſhould march to the Realme of Naples with two hundred lances, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, which ſhould be drawne out of the armie, whereof the one halfe ſhould be Italians, foure hundred Swiſſers, and the reſidue Lanceknights: and that Ranſe de Cere to ioyne with them, ſhould deſcend to Liuerne with the bands of footmen appointed for the armie at ſea, which for the difficultie of neceſſary prouiſions remained yet in the hauen of Villefranche: and that the ſame Ranſe and the other Vrſins ſhould wage foure thouſand footmen in the countrey of Rome: which deliberation the French King ſignified vnto the Pope by his Embaſſadour Albert Earle of Carpy, and required leaue of him to leuie bands of footmen at Rome, and that he would conſent that his armie might paſſe through the Church dominion. This demand was grieuous to the Pope, to whom it was intollerable, that together with the Duchie of Millan, the Realme of Naples ſhould diuolue to the French King: but not hauing the courage to refuſe his demand openly, he aduiſed the King, not to vndertake as yet that enterpriſe, nor to bring him into a neceſſitie to denie him that, which for many iuſt regards he could not conſent vnto; declaring vnto him with a wiſe diſ-

courſe, ſ̃ ſuch a thought was againſt his proper good and profite. For if the deſire to recouer the Duchie of Millan had heretofore ſtirred him vp ſo many enemies, what could be looked for now, when the world diſcerned that he aſpired to the kingdome of Naples alſo? What maruell can it be, if this moue the Venetians to take armes for the Emperour, breaking the bonds of their confederation? That he ſhould conſider, if by miſaduenture his affaires found any difficultie in Lombardie, with what reputation they could proceed in the Realme of Naples; and that if they ſhould happen to decline in either of theſe places, it would be the cauſe that they will decay in the other. Laſtly, that he ſhould remember that he had praiſed and commended him, for that he had contained himſelfe within the limites of the dutie of a Pope: and therefore it was not conuenient that now he ſhould compell him to do quite contrary. But this diſcourſe was in vaine, for that the Duke of Albanie without attending his anſwer, had (as aſſured of the Popes conſent) paſſed the riuer of Po at the bridge of Stellato, which is in the Duchie of Millan: and yet the fift day after he turned backe again, becauſe the King, vnderſtanding that the Lance-knights began alreadie to arriue in the enemies campe, and that the Duke of Bourbon was gone into Germanie to wage more, he would keepe the armie entire, vntill there came a new ſupply of Swiſſers and Griſons, which he had ſent to leuie: in which time both the armies remained in a maner idle: the King continued the ſiege of Pauie, not intermitting the labour in the trenches, and to vexe them within with his artilleries: and the Imperials expecting the returne of the Duke of Bourbon, remained quiet; onely the Marquis of Peſquiero, vpon whoſe prouidence and valour the moſt part of the counſels, and all the executions depended, iſſuing one night out of Loda with two hundred horſemen and two thouſand footmen, ſurpriſed the towne of Melzi, being negligently guarded by Ierome and Iohn-Fermo Triuulce, with two hundred horſemen, and tooke priſoners all the Captaines with the moſt part of all their ſouldiers, of whom Ierome died not many dayes after of a blow which he receiued in fight. Afterwards the Swiſſers and Griſons arriued in the Kings campe, by reaſon of whoſe coming the Duke of Albanie repaſſed againe the riuer of Po at Stradella into the countrey of Plaiſance. From which inclination the Pope being not able to turne the King, and making no great inſtance vnto him, leſt haply he ſhould bring him into ſome doubt, he thought it now time both to manifeſt to the Imperials the couenants he had made with him before, and alſo to renew the mention of the accord, being in hope that the difficultie to obtaine Pauie, and the danger of the kingdome of Naples, would make either partie leſſe obſtinate and leſſe hard to embrace the accord. To theſe ends he ſent to the Viceroy Paul Vettorio Captaine of his galleys, to ſignifie vnto him, that notwithſtanding he had vſed great diligence, he could neuer diuert the French King from his purpoſe to inuade the Realme of Naples: and that vnleſſe he would pull vpon himſelfe the warre which he could not reſiſt, he might not giue impediment to his paſſage, yea rather he was conſtrained to aſſure himſelfe of him by new contracts, but that he neuer accorded to any condition which might be preiudiciall to the Emperour; for whom, amid ſo many difficulties, he ſaw nothing more profitable then peace: and to the end the negociation thereof might be aduanced afore the difficulties grew greater, he perſwaded the Viceroy to conſent to a ſurceaſſing of armes, putting into the hands of a perſon not ſuſpected all thoſe peeces which he held yet in the Duchie of Millan in the name of the Emperour and the Duke, for that otherwiſe the King would not condeſcend thereunto: That he hoped, this being done, there would be found ſome honeſt meanes of peace, for the which he propounded, that the Duchie of Millan being wholly ſeparate from the Crowne of France, the Kings ſecond ſonne ſhould be inueſted therein by the Emperour, who in recompence ſhould receiue a competent ſumme of money: That there ſhould be ordained ſome reaſonable prouiſion for the Dukes of Millan and Bourbon: and that the Pope, the Venetians and the Florentines ſhould be bound to ioyne with the Emperour againſt the French King, in caſe he would not obſerue things promiſed. The Emperours Captaines diſcerned well the greatneſſe of the difficulties and dangers, hauing at one and the ſame time, in ſo great a want of money, to ſupport the warre in Lombardie, and to haue a care of the Realme of Naples, without the aide of the Pope and the Florentines, and being now certaine that the Venetians would abandon them; who, albeit they waged new bands of footmen, and ſtudied to entertain the Imperial Captains in an hope they would obſerue the league, yet deferred the execution with diuers excuſes: in ſo much as the Viceroy being nothing eſtranged from the accord, inclined to draw with the armie to the kingdome of Naples for the ſuretie thereof: but the

The Pope counſelleth the French king & the Emperour to peace.

Councell being thereupon aſſembled, the aduice of the Marquis of Peſquiero preuailed, who vſing both wiſedome and courage, ſhewed that it was neceſſarie to make ſmall account of all other dangers, and to reſolue vpon the warre of Lombardie, vpon the victorie whereof all other things were dependant: That it was not the Kings intention to inuade the Realme of Naples with thoſe forces which could not ſo ſpeedily be led into the kingdome, where there were many ſtrong townes, and where reſiſtance ſhould be made by thoſe whoſe ſafetie conſiſts in the defence thereof: ſo that it might be ſuſtained for certaine moneths, in which time it was verie likely that the warre of Millan would come to an end, of which if they obtained the victorie, there was no doubt but the Realme of Naples would quickly be freed, though the Emperour ſhould hold no other thing therein then one onely Tower: That if they abode in Lombardie, it might fall out that they ſhould be victorious both ouer Millan and Naples; but in marching to Naples, Millan would certainly be loſt, and the kingdome not deliuered from danger, for that the whole bodie of the warre would preſently be tranſported thither: and what hopes can there remaine to men that returne vanquiſhed? where on the contrary, the enemies would enter with ſuch a reputation and inclination of the people, who naturally either for feare or hatred, run before the fortune of the victor, that in the kingdome of Naples would be found no more defence then in the Duchie of Millan: That no other thing moued the French King, who as yet ſtood in doubt of the ſucceſſe of Lombardie, to deuide his armie, to begin a new warre whileſt the firſt did yet continue, then an hope that for the ouermuch care of the kingdome of Naples, they would at laſt leaue vnto him as a prey the eſtate of Millan: according to whoſe counſels and appetites, if the armie ſhould moue that ſo often had bene victorious, what elſe were this, then with eternall infamie to yeeld to the threats of the vanquiſhed, that glorie, which ſo many times we haue wonne vpon them by our armes? This aduice was in the end followed by the Viceroy, who diſpatched to Naples the Duke of Traietto, with direction that making as great leuies of money as poſſibly he could, Aſcanio Colonno and the other Barons of the Realme ſhould looke to the defence thereof: and albeit he had modeſtly anſwered the Embaſſage that was ſent him from the Pope, he wrote to Rome very harſh and diſpleaſant letters, whereby he gaue to vnderſtand that he would not heare ſpeake of the accord. By reaſon whereof, the Pope declaring that he was puſhed on by neceſſitie, for that the Duke of Albanie aduanced dayly, publiſhed (not as a thing done before) that he had contracted with the French King vnder a ſimple promiſe not to offend one another: which he ſignified by writing letters to the Emperors Agents, alledging the cauſes, and ſpecially the neceſſitie that induced him thereunto: and when the ſaid writing was preſented by Iohn Corſi Embaſſadour of Florence with words conuenient in ſuch a caſe, the Emperour (who afore could not be perſwaded that the Pope would abandon him in ſo great danger) being much moued in his mind, anſwered, that neither hatred, nor ambition, nor any other particular deſire, had moued him to begin warre with the French King, but onely the perſwaſions and authoritie of Pope Leo; who (as he ſaid) had bene incited thereunto by the preſent Pope, who at that time was Cardinall de Medicis, and who perſwaded him that it was a matter of great importance for the publike good, not to ſuffer that King to poſſeſſe any thing in Italy: That the ſame Cardinall had bene the author of the confederation made for that cauſe before the death of Pope Adrian. And therefore that he was verie angrie, that he, who aboue all others ought not to ſeparate himſelfe from him in thoſe dangers whereinto by his meanes he was entred, had made a change ſo hurtfull to him, and that without any neceſſitie: for whereunto might that be attributed, but to a great feare that was fallen vpon him, ſince thoſe within Pauie held out? He put him in mind of that which he had alwayes done to increaſe his greatneſſe ſince the death of Pope Leo, and ſpecially in two Conclaues, together with the deſire he had that he might be choſen Pope, for the opinion that by that meanes the libertie and common good of Italy might be reeſtabliſhed: and that he could not perſwade himſelfe that the Pope had forgotten how litle he might aſſure himſelfe of the French King, and that which he might either feare or hope of his victorie. And his concluſion was, that neither for the Popes reſolution, which was againſt all dutie and expectation, nor for any other accident would he forget or abandon himſelfe: and that no man ſhould thinke that for want of money he would alter his purpoſe, but that he would rather expoſe all his kingdomes and his proper life to all dangers; and that he had ſo well reſolued himſelfe in this matter, that he prayed God it might not be the cauſe of the damnation of his ſoule. To which complaints the Florentine Embaſſadour replied:

That

That the Pope, ſince he was raiſed to the ſoueraigne dignitie, was bound to proceed no more as Cardinall de Medicis, but as Pope of Rome, whoſe office was to be carefull ouer the peace of Chriſtendome: and for this reaſon he had neuer preached vnto him any other thing then the neceſſitie and needfulneſſe thereof, hauing ſo often written vnto him thereof, and ſent to him two ſeuerall times the Archbiſhop of Capua, by whom he proteſted vnto him, that he ought not to be partaker with any one: That he had admoniſhed him of the ſame at ſuch time as the Admirall Bonniuet departed out of Italy, for that he could not treate of peace at any time more for his honour, and yet he made him no other anſwer, then that he could conclude no peace without the conſent of the King of England: That the Emperour ſhould remember how often the Pope had diſſwaded the paſſage into Prouence, for as much as that would altogether trouble the hope of peace; and alſo (wherein he ſeemed to diuine of things to come) y the neceſſitie wherein it would put the French King to enter into armes, might be the occaſion to ſtirre vp a more dangerous fire in Italy: That the Pope by the Biſhop of Verona, had declared to the French King then poſſeſſor of Millan, and alſo to the Viceroy, how farre it concerned them to hearken to peace, but neither of them bare any inclination thereunto: That ſince that time he had with many and forcible reaſons refuſed to giue paſſage through the Eſtate of the Church, to the companies that marched againſt the Realme of Naples; and yet neuertheleſſe the King not onely became deafe at his reaſons, but cauſed the ſaid companies to march along the countrey of Plaiſance without tarrying for his anſwer: That for this cauſe he had (laſtly) ſent Paul Vittorio to induce the Viceroy to a ſurceaſſing of armes, propoſing vnto him conditions conformable to the time, and to certifie him how needfull it was for him to aſſure himſelfe of the danger imminent, chiefly ſeeing the Venetians ſtood in ſuſpence, and that the King of England would not be concurrant in the defence of the Duchie of Millan, if at the ſame time the warre were not moued beyond the Mounts by the Emperour and himſelfe: but ſeeing the Viceroy made no reckoning of any thing that he propounded, and the Kings men of warre aduanced dayly, he was conſtrained to take faith and ſuretie of the King, without being bound to any other thing then not to offend him. The Emperour complained of the hardneſſe of the condition offered to the Viceroy, for that hee muſt leaue that which he held, without expreſſing any mention that the French King ſhould do the like: and laſtly, although the Marquis of Peſquiero counſelling him to agreement, had ſignified vnto him, that in the campe were many diſorders, & no leſſe danger to his affairs, yet his mind could not be framed to peace, for the hope he had, that through the valour of his men he ſhould cary the victorie, if the armies came once to fight one againſt another.

All this while the ſiege of Pauie continued, although for want of munitions they had ſomewhat ceaſſed to moleſt it with their artilleries: to remedie which difficultie, the King hauing newly receiued into his protection the Duke of Ferrara, with obligation to pay him threeſcore and ten thouſand duckats in readie mony, was content to accept twentie thouſand in munitions at a price, which he cauſed to be conueyed through the countrey of Parma and Plaiſance, vſing the ſeruice of the horſes and carriages of the countrymen: wherein the King was readily holpen by the commiſſion and direction of the Pope, not without the complaining of the Viceroy, as though in that action he had manifeſtly miniſtred aide and ſuccours to the King: who, to the end the munitions might arriue in ſuretie, had ſent afore Iohn de Medicis with two hundred horſe and fifteene hundred footmen. The ſaid Medicis complaining in the beginning of the warre, that the Viceroy looked on him with an euill eye, and alſo for that money was not giuen him ſufficient to make the ſouldiers march, was paſſed out of the Emperours pay, to the entertainment of the French King: and it ſeemed that theſe forces were ſufficient to aſſure the munitions, the rather for that the Duke of Albanie was at hand, hauing paſſed at the ſame time the riuer of Po. But the Viceroy and the Marquis of Peſquiero who ſought to ſtop their paſſage, caſt a bridge neare to Cremona, and paſſed ouer Po with ſixe hundred men at armes and eight thouſand footmen, lodging the firſt day at Monticello; yet they returned againe ſodainely ouer the riuer, being aduertiſed by credible eſpiall, that the King had ſent Thomas de Foix with one part of the armie to make head againſt them. As ſoone as they were retired, the Duke of Albanie paſſed the Appenine, along the territories of Reggia and Garfagnana, but he marched ſo ſlowly, that he confirmed the opnion that was conceiued, that the King aſſayed that enterpriſe, more to induce the Emperours Captaines by that feare either to accord, or at leaſt to abandon the affaires of Lombardy, then in hope of any great aduancement. Ranſe de Cere ioyned with him neare to Lucques with a regiment of three thouſand footmen who were come with the armie at ſea, to whom as they paſſed, Sauona and Varagine were rendred, which Nauie being returned to the Weſt riuer of Genes, kept that Citie in feare.

1525. Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and fiue, in the beginning whereof Don Hugo de Moncada departing from Genes with the Nauie, tooke land with three thouſand footmen at Varagine, where were certaine French footmen in garriſon: but the French Nauie that was then at ſea, being commanded by the Marquis of Saluſſa, making to the ſuccors of that place, the other fleete being naked of footmen, retired: wherfore the French regiments of footmen taking land charged their enemies, and killing many, ouerthrew them, and tooke Don Hugo priſoner. In the beginning of the ſame yeare, the Duke of Albanie compelled the people of Lucques to contribute to him twelue thouſand duckats, and to lend him certaine peeces of artilleries: and then paſſing further through the lands of the Florentines, by whom he was receiued as a friend, he ſtayed with his armie neare to Sienna at the Popes requeſt, who for that neither by his authoritie, nor with armes, he could meete with ſuch things as were offenſiue to him, he endeuoured to manage his purpoſes with art and induſtrie. It nothing diſpleaſed the Pope that the French ſhould get the Duchie of Millan, for that he was of this opinion, that whileſt the Emperour and the French King abode in Italy, the Sea Apoſtolike and his Pontificacie ſhould ſtand aſſured from the greatneſſe of either of them, becauſe they would keepe iealous eyes the one ouer the other: and yet for the ſame reaſon it was grieuous to him that the French King ſhould conquer the Realme of Naples, for feare leſt at one and the ſame time that kingdome and the Duchie of Millan ſhould be in the hand of one ſo puiſſant a Prince: and to hinder it, ſeeking occaſion to ſtay the Duke of Albanie, he made inſtance to the King, that as he paſſed he would reeſtabliſh the gouernment of Sienna, which the Pope (that Citie ſtanding in the midway betweene Rome and Florence) deſired greatly might fall into the hands of ſome of his friends, as not many moneths before by his meanes it had bene. For the Cardinall Petrucci dying during the Pontificacie of Adrian, and Francis his nephew pretending to ſucceed him in the gouernment, the principall men of Montenouo, although they were of the ſame faction, oppoſed againſt him becauſe of his inſolencie, and made ſolicitation to the Duke of Seſſa the Emperours Embaſſadour, and to the Cardinall de Medicis, to giue them another forme of gouernment, either reducing it into libertie, or elſe to referre that authoritie into the hands of Fabio the ſon of Pandolfe Petrucci, notwithſtanding a litle before he was ſecretly ſtolen away to Naples. Which matter being long debated, at laſt when Clement was elected Pope, by the common conſent of him and the Emperour, Fabio was reeſtabliſhed in the place of his father: but for that he had not ſo much authoritie as his father had, the Citie almoſt vniuerſally inclining to libertie, and thoſe of the family of Montenouo being not firmly knit with him, nor at any good agreement among themſelues, the weakneſſe that was diſcerned to be in the power of one alone, whē it is not founded vpon the good wils of the Citizens, or when it is not gouerned abſolutely, and without any reſpect, according to the maner of tyrants, was the cauſe that there happened one day by the incenſing of his aduerſaries, a popular tumult, by the which without the aide of any forreiners (notwithſtanding he had in the place a guard depending vpon him) he was eaſily driuen out of the Citie: by reaſon whereof the Pope who had no confidence in the commons, nor in any other faction, determined to put the authoritie into their hands, to the end afterwards to create chiefe Ruler either Fabio, or any other of them that ſhould be beſt agreeable to him: which was a matter (as ſuſpitious men are wont to take all things in the worſt part) that increaſed an opinion in the Imperiall Captaines, that the capitulation made betweene the Pope and the French King, contained on both parts more, and a greater bond then of neutralitie. It happened by the ſtaying of the Duke of Albanie vpon the confines of Sienna, that the inhabitants there, to free themſelues from the troubles of the armie, gaue moſt ample authoritie touching the gouernment to thoſe Citizens in whom the Pope had moſt confidence: and that being done, the Siennois ſent certaine artilleries and a ſumme of money to the Duke of Albanie, who paſſed on, marching notwithſtanding as ſlowly as he was wont. He went from Monteflaſcone to Rome to ſpeake with the Pope, and afterwards paſſing Tiber to Fiano, he abode vpon the lands of the Vrſins, where the bands of footmen aſſembled that were leuied at Rome by the permiſſion of the Pope, who likewiſe ſuffered the Colonnois who muſtered at Marino for for the defence of the Realme of Naples, to entertaine regiments of footmen at Rome. But both for that they aduanced not much, and that vniuerſally they were ill prouided of money, there was no great account made of thoſe muſterings, the eyes, the eares, and the minds of men being wholly ſet vpon the affaires of Lombardie, which drew towards an end, and by diuers accidents increaſed in both parties indifferently the humor of hope and feare.

Thoſe that were within Pauie ſuffered no ſmall want of money and munitions, the ſtore of wine beginning alſo to faile them, and all other ſorts of victuals except bread: by reaſon whereof the Lanceknights aſſembled, and almoſt in maner of tumult demanded their payes, whereunto, beſides their owne diſpoſitions, they were puſhed on by the incitation of their Captaine, who was ſuſpected to haue ſome ſecret contract with the French king. On ỹ other ſide, the Duke of Bourbon approching, who brought out of Germanie fiue hundred men at armes Bourgonians, and ſixe thouſand Lanceknights payed with the money of the Emperour, the Viceroy was gone to Loda, where they meant to aſſemble the whole armie, pretending that it ſhould be nothing inferiour to that of the enemies: but there was no money to make the ſouldiers march, nor any meanes to recouer any to entertaine them: and there was no hope to be aided by the Pope or by the Florentines, and much leſſe by the Venetians, who after many excuſes and delayes, had at laſt anſwered Caracciolo the Pronotarie, and the Emperours Embaſſadour at Venice, that they would proceed according to the example of the Pope, by whoſe meanes and working it was ſuppoſed that they had ſecretly made a contract of neutralitie with the French King: and which more is, they priuily ſolicited the Pope, to procure an armie of ten thouſand Swiſſers to deſcend into Italy at their common charges, to the end they might not ſtand in feare of the victorie of either of the armies: which was well approued by the Pope, but both for want of money, and by the propertie of his nature, ſo ſlowly executed, that he ſent too late into Swiſſerland the Biſhop of Verula to diſpoſe the minds of the Swiſſers thereunto. The difficulties of Pauie were ſomewhat relieued by the induſtrie of the Viceroy and other Captaines: for certaine men being ſent into the French campe to ſell wine, Anthonie de Leua hauing a ſigne made, ſent out certain troupes to skirmiſh on that ſide where they were, by which occaſion the bruit being raiſed, the victuallers breaking their greateſt veſſell, ran into Pauie with a litle veſſell which they had incloſed in the greater, wherein were three thouſand duckats; and the Lanceknights ſeeing by that litle ſumme the difficultie to ſend them money, were from that time forward more patient: and likewiſe by the death of their Captaine, which happened very conueniently at the ſame time, (whom it was beleeued Anthonie de Leua had cauſed to be poyſoned) the matter and occaſion of tumults was taken away. In this time the Marquis of Peſquiero went to incampe before Caſciano, where were in garriſon fiftie horſemen and foure hundred Italian footmen, whom he compelled to render to diſcretion.

But whē the Duke of Bourbon was ariued with the Lanceknights, there was nothing that more retained the Captains, who were careful of the danger of Pauy, thē the want of mony, which was ſuch, that not onely they had not wherewith to pay the ſouldiers, but alſo they had not money ſufficient to conduct the munitions and artilleries: in which neceſſitie they propounded to the footmen the glorie and riches which they ſhould atchieue by meanes of the victorie, and reduced to their memorie the conqueſts paſt, inflaming their minds with the ſpurres of hatred againſt the French men; ſo that they induced the Spaniſh footmen to promiſe that they would follow the armie one whole moneth without receiuing any mony, and the Lanceknights to be contented with that which would ſuffice for their neceſſarie food. But they found greater difficultie to winne the men at armes and light horſemen, being lodged in the townes of Cremona and Guiaradadda, for that hauing receiued no money of a long time, they alledged, that it was vnpoſſible in following the armie, to nouriſh and entertaine themſelues and their horſes, ſeeing they muſt buy all their victuals, and complained that their paines was leſſe acceptable and leſſe eſteemed then that of the Infantery, to whom at times had bene made ſome diſtributions of mony, and to them not one penie of a long time: neuertheles that they were not inferior, neither in valour nor fidelitie, but much ſuperiour in nobilitie and merites paſt. The Marquis of Peſquiero went to their lodgings, & appeaſed the minds of theſe; ſomtimes making excuſes, now cōforting them, & then again reprouing them, & declaring vnto them; that by how much their vertue was more renowned, and their valour more manifeſt, by ſo much the more ſhould they ſtriue not to be ſurmounted by footmen, either in loyaltie or affection to ỹ Emperor, of whoſe honour there was not onely queſtion, but alſo of all the Eſtates he held in Italy: and that they ſhould neuer haue a better occaſion to ſhew how much they loued his greatnes and deſired to do him ſeruice: & ſeeing they had ſo many times offered their liues to hazard for the Emperour, what ſhame would it be for them, and how ſtrange would it appeare, if now they ſhould refuſe to ſerue him for the deſire of a ſmall ſumme of mony? Theſe perſwaſions, & the authoritie of the Marquis, cauſed them to conſent to reciue for one moneth a very ſmal allowance of mony: in ſo much as the whole armie being aſſembled, which was ſuppoſed to containe ſeuen hundred men at armes, as many light horſemen, a thouſand Italian footmen, and more then ſixteene thouſand as well Spaniards as Lanceknights, they departed from Loda the fiue and twentieth day of Ianuarie, and marched the ſame day to Marignan, making as though they would draw towards Millan, either to cauſe the King, being touched with the danger of that Citie, to raiſe his ſiege from before Pauie, or elſe to giue cauſe to the ſouldiers to go from Millan that were there in garriſon: neuertheleſſe hauing afterwards paſſed the riuer of Lambro neare to Vidigolfo, they tooke the way directly to Pauie. The King payed in his armie thirteene hundred Lances, ten thouſand Swiſſers, foure thouſand Lanceknights, fiue thouſand French men, and ſeuen thouſand Italians; and yet through the abuſes and deceitfulneſſe of his Captaines, and by the negligence of his officers, the numbers of the footmen were farre leſſe. Theodore Triuulce lay in garriſon within Millan with three hundred Lances, ſixe thouſand footmen Griſons and Valeſians, and three thouſand French men: but as ſoone as the King diſcerned that the Imperials turned towards Pauie, he reuoked to the armie all the footmen except two thouſand. As ſoone as the armie of the Imperials had taken the field, the French King began to deuiſe what was beſt to be done: and calling his Captaines to counſell, Trimouille, Paliſſa, and Thomas de Foix, with many others, aduiſed him to retire his armie from before Pauie, and to go incampe either at the Monaſterie of the Charterhouſe, or at Binaſco, which are places of good ſtrength, (as there are many found in that countrey, for the oportunitie of the chanels deriued to water the medowes.) They told him, that in taking this courſe, he ſhould ſpeedily obtaine the victorie, without bloud or danger, for that the armie of the enemie which was without money, could not hold out many dayes, but would be conſtrained either to diſſolue, or diſperſe their companies into ſeuerall townes: That the Lanceknights that were within Pauie, who to the end that it might not be imputed vnto them that they ſought to couer their timorouſneſſe with this excuſe that they were not payed, were content to beare with patience the prolonging of their payes for many moneths, as ſoon as the ſiege was raiſed, would demand their payes, the which the Captains hauing no meanes to prouide, nor any apparent hopes wherewith to entertaine them, they would draw into ſome dangerous tumult: That the enemies kept themſelues ſo orderly together, by no other meanes then an hope to giue the battell ſpeedily; but when they ſhall ſee the warre drawne out into longneſſe, and that the occaſion to fight will not be offered, they will become full of difficulties and confuſion: They declared vnto him how dangerous it would be to remaine betweene a towne wherein were fiue thouſand footmen of a moſt warlike nation, and an armie that came to reſcue it, which was no leſſe mightie in numbers of men, valour, and experience of Captaines and ſouldiers, then braue and reſolute by reaſon of their victories formerly obtained, and who now had repoſed all their hopes in the battell: That there was no infamie in a retrait that was made by diſcretion and not by timiditie, when it is done with a purpoſe not to put into doubt things that be certaine, and when by the iſſue and ſucceſſe of the warre the maturitie of the counſell is made manifeſt to all the world: and that there is no victorie more profitable, more honourable, nor more glorious, then that which is obtained without the domage and bloud of the ſouldiers: and that the chiefeſt commendation of militarie diſcipline conſiſteth in not oppoſing himſelfe to dangers without neceſſitie, and with induſtrie, patience and art to reuerſe and make vaine the enterpriſes of the aduerſaries, rather then in fighting courageouſly. The Pope gaue the King the ſame counſell, to whom the Marquis of Peſquiero being not without his feare in ſo great a neceſſitie, had aduertiſed aforehand the difficulties of the Emperours armie to be ſuch, that they almoſt cut from him all hopes of happie ſucceſſe. Neuertheleſſe the King who in his deliberations followed onely the counſels of the Admirall, ſetting before his eyes rather vaine bruites, varying for euery light accident, then the firme ſubſtance of the effects, eſteemed it to be a great infamie for him, that the armie wherein he was preſent in perſon, ſeeming to be fearefull, ſhould baſely giue place at the coming of the enemies: wherein wherein he was alſo puſhed on, for that he was in a maner bound to follow with deeds, the words that he had vainly ſpoken; a reſolution then which there could be nothing more vndiſcreet in a Captaine: for he had affirmed before all the world, and many times ſignified by meſſengers into France and all the parts of Italy, that he would ſooner chuſe to die, then to retire from before Pauie without the victorie. He hoped, that in the place where he incamped, he might eaſily fortifie himſelfe to auoide all inconueniences by ſurpriſe: He hoped that through want of money, the leaſt neceſſitie that might driue the enemies to temporize, would put them into diſorder; and that hauing no meanes to buy victuals, but being conſtrained to take them by force here and there in the countrey, they could not remaine long in one lodging: He hoped likewiſe to giue impediment to the victuals that ſhould be brought to their campe, whereof he knew the greateſt part would come from Cremona, for he had newly taken into his pay Iohn Lodowike Paluoiſin, to the end either to ſeize vpon Cremona, where was a very ſlender garriſon, or at leaſt to cut off the ſuretie of paſſing victuals from that Citie to their campe.

For theſe reaſons the King remaining reſolute, would not leaue off the ſiege of Pauie, and to keepe the enemies from entrance, he reduced the incamping of his armie into another forme. For before the King was lodged towards Borgarato, in the Abbey of Saint Lanfranke, ſituated about a mile and a halfe beyond Pauie, beyond the way that leadeth from Pauie to Millan, and vpon the riuer of Theſin, neare to that place where they had aſſayed to diuert the waters: Monſieur de Paliſſa with the vantguard and the Swiſſers, within the ſuburbes neare Saint Iuſtines gate, hauing fortified himſelfe in the Churches of S. Peter, S. Apollonia, and S. Ierome: and Iohn de Medicis with his horſemen and regiments of footmen, was beſtowed in the Church of S. Sauiour. But when the King vnderſtood that the enemies were departed from Loda, he went and incamped within the Park, in the ſtately Pallace of Mirabello, ſituate on this ſide Pauie, & left the Griſon footmen at S. Lanfranke, without changing the lodging of the vantguard. At laſt the King went and lodged in the Monaſteries of S. Paul and S. Iames, places commodious and eminent, which are very neare to Pauie, and command the champion, but are ſomewhat without the compaſſe of the Parke: and Monſieur d'Alanſon with the areareguard went to incampe at Mirabello: and to the end they might giue ſuccours one to another, they brake downe the wall of the Parke on that ſide, and ſo they occupied all that ſpace or circuite that ſtretcheth towards Theſin on the lower ſide, and vntill the way that leadeth to Millan on the vpper ſide: ſo that holding Pauie enuironed on all ſides, and hauing at their deuotion the riuers of Graualone, Theſin, and Torretta, which is right againſt Darſina, the Imperials could not enter Pauie vnleſſe they paſſed the riuer of Theſin, or made their entrie by the Parke. The King put the Admirall in truſt for the managing of the armie, and conſumed the moſt part of his time in idleneſſe or vaine pleaſures, without troubling himſelfe with affaires, or thinking vpon matters of importance: and making no account of the aduice of the other Captaines, he communicated all his counſels with the Admirall, and likewiſe gaue eare to Anne Montmorencie and Philip Chabot Lord of Brion, perſonages much in his fauour, but of ſlender experience in matters of warre. Moreouer, the numbers of his armie were not ſuch as the bruite went, and as the King himſelfe beleeued. For, one part of the horſemen being gone with the Duke of Albanie, and another part left for the guard of Millan with Theodore Triuulce, and many alſo being diſperſed and lodged in ſeuerall villages and boroughs thereabouts, there was not commonly found in the campe aboue eight hundred Lances; and touching the footmen, the numbers were farre leſſe then was ſuppoſed, as well by the negligence of the officers, as through the fraud of the Captaines, of whom thoſe that vſed the greateſt deceit were the Italian Captaines, who notwithſtanding they receiued payes for the greateſt numbers of footmen, yet they entertained but few, many of the French Captaines being guiltie of the ſame fault: and two thouſand Valeſians that were beſtowed at S. Sauiours betweene S. Lanfranke and Pauie, being ſuddenly aſſaulted by thoſe within, were diſperſed. In this eſtate of affaires, the Imperiall Captaines hauing paſſed Lambro, made their approach to the Caſtle S. Angelo, which hauing his ſituation betweene Loda and Pauie, would haue giuen great impediments to the victuals that were brought from Loda to their campe, if it had not bene at their deuotion. Pyrrhus the brother of Federike de Boſſolo, lay there in garriſon with two hundred horſe, and eight hundred footmen; and the King not many daies before, to the end not raſhly to commit his people to danger, had ſent the ſame Federike and Iames Chabanes to viſite and conſider the place, who brought report that that garriſon was ſufficient to defend it:

but experience made knowne immediatly after, how farre they were deceiued in their reckoning, for as ſoone as Ferdinand d'Aualo made his approches with the Spaniſh footmen, and had cut off with his artilleries certaine defences, thoſe within being fearefull, retired the ſame day into the Caſtle: and not many houres after, they compounded that Pyrrhus, Emilio Caueriana, and the three ſonnes of Phebus Gonzaga remaining priſoners, all the reſidue might depart, without armour and horſe, when they had ſworne not to beare armes for one moneth againſt the Emperour. At this time the King ſent for two thouſand Italian footmen, parcell of thoſe companies that had bin at the ſiege of Marſeilles, who were within Sauona; but when they were come vpon the territories of Alexandria neare the riuer of Vrbe, Gaſpar Maino who lay there in garriſon with ſeuen hundred footmen, iſſuing out of Alexandria with a very ſlender ſtrength, ſet vpon them, and finding them very wearie with trauelling on the way, and without guard, for that they doubted no danger, he brake them eaſily, and being fled into Caſtellaccio, they rendred themſelues ſoone after with ſeuenteene Enſignes. And there happened no better ſucceſſe to the enterpriſe that was committed to the charge of Iohn Lodowike Paluoiſin, who after he was entred with foure hundred horſe and two thouſand footmen within Caſalmaior, where was no wall, but ramparts which he had made, and hauing afterwards wonne S. Iohn in Croce, he began from that place to make incurſions into the countrey, labouring with all the meanes he could to cut off the victuals. By reaſon whereof Francis Sforce who was within Cremona, when he had with great difficultie leuied foureteene hundred footmen, and ſent them to Caſalmaior with certaine troupes of horſemen of the band of Rodolfo Camerino and the horſemen of his guard, vnder the leading of Alexander Bentiuole: as they were drawne neare the place, Paluoiſin preſuming in the aduantage of his numbers, without tarrying for Francis Rangon who was to come thither with other horſemen & footmen, iſſued out the 18. day of Februarie, and ſet vpon them, and labouring to ſuſtaine his troupes that began to retire, was beaten from his horſe & made priſoner, and all his ſouldiers broken and diſperſed. There was alſo added to the affaires of the French King another difficultie of great conſequence: for Iohn Iaques de Medicis of Millan Captaine of the Caſtle of Mus, whither the Duke of Millan had ſent him for the murder he had done of the perſon of Monſignor in Viſconte, hauing placed by night an ambuſh on the ſide of the Caſtle of Chiauenna ſtanding vpon a hill ſide at the head of the lake, and ſomewhat diſtant from the houſes of the borough, tooke the Captaine priſoner as he was gone out to walke, and led him preſently before the gate of the Rocke, and threatning to kill him if he put not the Caſtle into his hands, he cauſed his wife to deliuer it vp: that being done, he iſſued out of another ambuſh with three hundred footmen, with whom he tooke the towne, making his entrie by the Caſtle. Whereupon it happened that the Leagues of the Griſons, taking ſuſpition vpon this accident, reuoked a litle before the battell the regiment of ſixe thouſand Griſons that were in the Kings armie. About this time arriued in the Imperiall armie the Knight Caſalo, whom the King of England ſent thither with great promiſes: for that King beginning to enuie the proſperitie of the French King, and alſo moued for that in the ſeas towards Scotland the French had taken certaine veſſels of the Engliſh, threatned to make warre vpon France, and deſired that the Imperiall armie ſhould hold out: therefore he ſent commandement to his Embaſſadour Pace remaining at Trent, to go to Venice, and proteſt in his name the obſeruation of the League, to the which he hoped they would be the more eaſily induced, for that the Emperour had ſent to the Viceroy the inueſtiture of Francis Sforce, to diſpoſe of it according to the occurrence of affaires. The King of England alſo ſolicited the Pope by his Embaſſadour, to miniſter aide to the Emperour in his affaires: whereof the Pope excuſed himſelfe vpon the capitulation made with the French King for his owne ſuretie, and without offending the Emperour, whereunto he added this complaint, that ſince the armie was returned from Prouence, he could not vnderſtand their purpoſes in twentie dayes, nor whether they pretended to defend or abandon the Eſtate of Millan.

The Imperials draw neare to Pauie.

But now the treaties and practiſes of Princes, and the diligence and ſtudies of Embaſſadours anailed litle, for as much as the armies approching together, the whole eſtate of the warre, together with the difficulties and dangers ſuſtained for many moneths, were reduced to the fortune and hazard of a very few houres: for the armie Imperiall paſſing further ſince the taking of S. Angelo, went and lodged the firſt day of Februarie at Viſtarino, and the ſecond day at Lardirago and S. Alexis beyond the litle riuer of Lolona, which place was diſtant frō Pauie 4 miles, & frō the

French

French campe three miles: and the third of Februarie they went and lodged at Prati towards the gate of S. Iuſtine, extending their campe betweene Prati, Treleuero, la Motta, and a wood on the ſide of S. Lazarus, places within two miles and a halfe of Pauie, within a mile of the French vantguard, and not halfe a mile from the rampiers and trenches of their campe: ſo that by reaſon of their neareneſſe, they endomaged them much with their artilleries. The Imperials commanded Belioioſo, with all the villages and countrey that lay vpon their backes, except S. Colombana, where lay a garriſon of the French, but ſo ſtraitly beſieged as no perſon could iſſue out. They found within S. Angelo and Belioioſa a great quantitie of victuals; and to haue more plentie and abundance, they laboured to command Theſin, as they did Po, by the commoditie of which they gaue impediment to the victuals of the French men. They held Saint Croſſe, and albeit the King at that time when he went to incampe at Mirabello had abandoned the Charterhouſe, yet they forbare to go thither, for feare leſt their victuals ſhould be cut off. The French men kept S. Lazarus, but they durſt not abide there, becauſe of the artillerie of the enemies. There was betweene the two campes a litle brooke of running water, called Vernacula, whoſe head or ſpring is within the Parke, and from thence paſſing in the midſt betweene S. Lazarus and S. Peter in Verge, falls afterwards into the riuer of Theſin: this brooke the Imperials, to the end they might come on with leſſe difficultie, labored to paſſe, as a matter of great importance: but they found a valiant defence made by the French men, to whom was much helping the deepneſſe of the channell, and the height of the bankes, by which impediments there was no paſſage without great difficultie; and each of them was carefull to fortifie their lodging. The Kings lodging had in front, in backe, and in the left flanke great rampiers, which were enuironed with ditches and fortified with baſtillions: and on the right flanke was the wall of the Parke of Pauie, ſo that it was ſuppoſed to be very ſtrong. The lodging of the Imperials was fortified in the ſame maner, and they kept all the countrey from S. Lazarus drawing towards Belioioſo, euen to the riuer of Po, ſo that they had plentie of victuals. Betweene the rampiers of the one and the other lodging, was no more diſtance then fortie paces, and the baſtillions ſo neare together, that they ſhot with their harquebuſes. Theſe two armies were thus incamped the eight day of Februarie, and skirmiſhed continually, but euery one keeping within his fort, not purpoſing to come to battell with diſaduantage. The Imperiall Captains made their reckning, that they had preuailed much till that day, approched ſo neare Pauie, that in that they were coming to battel, they might be aided with the garriſons that were within the towne. Thoſe within Pauie ſuffered want of munitions, and therefore the Imperials ſent them fiftie horſemen, euery one carrying behind him a litle bag full of powder; who taking by night the way of Millan, and expecting till by the appointment of thoſe in the campe, the alarme was giuen by the French men, they got ſafely into Pauie, from whence Anthonie de Leua made many ſallies, endomaging the enemies many waies, and one day amongſt others hauing charged thoſe that had the guard of Burgorato and of Saint Lanfranke, he defeated them, and tooke from them three peeces of artilleries, and as many wagons laden with munitions. In this condition of affaires it was wonderfull to behold what was the vigilancie, induſtrie and trauell both of bodie and mind of the Marquis of Peſquiero, who ceaſſed not day and night, by skirmiſhing, giuing the alarme, and commonly doing ſome new thing to endomage the enemies, neuer ceaſſing to vndermine, intrench, and raiſe mounts. They cauſed to erect a cauallier or mount vpon the channell: and the French men endomaging much thoſe that wrought with two peeces of artilleries planted vpon Saint Lazarus, they planted there certaine peeces of artillerie which reuerſed the ſaid place of Saint Lazarus, and compelled the French men to abandon it, ſo that the artilleries of this cauallier annoyed them much, as likewiſe they had great detriment by another which they had made within Pauie: and the Spaniards had ſo fortified themſelues with baſtillions, rampiers, and other preparations, that they greatly offended the French campe, receiuing litle harme themſelues. For which cauſe the French men remoued their artilleries to beate them in flanke, the Spaniards continually vſing all their endeuour to aduance, and to winne now a foote and then another. In this neare affronting of the armies, the skirmiſhes were very rife, wherein the French men for the moſt part carried the worſe, the proceedings of warre being not any whit intermitted for the negociation of truce, which was cõtinually ſolicited by the Popes Nuncios reſident in both the armies: & many who were very familiar with the King, admoniſhed him daily, and the Pope himſelfe counſelled him many times, that to auoide ſo great a perill, it were his beſt to retire his armie from before

Pauie,

Pauie, and that in ſo doing he ſhould vndoubtedly obtaine the victorie, in ſhort time, and without effuſion of bloud, ſeeing the enemies ſuffered great want of money. The ſeuenteenth day of Februarie the ſouldiers of Pauie made a ſally, and charged the regiment of Iohn de Medicis, who gaue them a braue repulſe, and compelled them to retire: but immediatly after, as he returned to ſhew the Admirall the place of the encounter, with relation of things as they paſſed, certaine ſouldiers who had hidden themſelues in a houſe, gaue him a wound with the bullet of an harquebuſe a litle aboue the heele, which brake the bone, (to the great diſpleaſure of the King) ſo that he was conſtrained to be carried to Plaiſance to be cured: by reaſon of whoſe hurt, all the furie of the French campe began preſently to abate in skirmiſhes and aſſaults, and thoſe within Pauie iſſuing forth dayly with greater boldneſſe, and hauing burned the Abbey of S. Lanfranke, beat the French men continually, who ſeemed to be much diſcouraged: and the night betweene the nineteenth and twentieth day, the Marquis of Peſquiero with three thouſand Spaniſh footmen aſſaulted the baſtillions of the French men, and winning the rampiers, he ſlue more then fiue hundred footmen, and cloyed three peeces of artilleries.

In the end, it being vnpoſſible for the Imperiall Captaines to maintaine their armie in that place any longer for want of money, and conſidering that if they ſhould retire, not onely Pauie would be loſt, but alſo they ſhould be without hope to be able to defend the other peeces which they poſſeſſed in the Duchie of Millan, hauing alſo very great confidence to obtaine the victorie by the valour of their ſouldiers, and for that there were infinite diſorders in the French armie, and that beſides that many footmen were gone from them, their numbers came farre ſhort of ſo many as were inrolled in their pay-bookes; the night before the fiue and twentieth day of Februarie, a day dedicated by the Chriſtians to the Apoſtle Saint Matthias, and which was the day of the natiuitie of the Emperour, they determined to march to Mirabello, where lay incamped certaine companies of horſemen and footmen, with this intention, that if the French men moued not, then they had freed Pauie from the ſiege; but if they moued, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore after they had giuen many alarmes in the beginning of the night, to wearie and annoy the French men, making ſemblance as though they would charge them on that ſide towards Po, Theſin and S. Lazarus, about midnight euery ſouldier, by the commandement of the Captaines, put on a white coate ouer his armour, to be knowne from the French men, and were caſt into two ſquadrons of horſemen, and foure of footmen. In the firſt were ſixe thouſand footmen, equally compounded of Lanceknights, Spaniards and Italians, vnder the charge of the Marquis of Guaſt: the ſecond was onely of Spaniſh footmen, vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero; the third and fourth of Lanceknights, led by the Viceroy and the Duke of Bourbon. They arriued at the walls of the Parke certaine houres before day, and with their Maſons and by the helpe of the ſouldiers, they caſt to the ground threeſcore fadomes of the wall: and when they were entred into the Parke, the firſt ſquadron drew towards Mirabello, and the reſidue of the armie tooke the way to the campe of the enemie. But when the King vnderſtood that they were entred into the Parke, thinking they would draw to Mirabello, he iſſued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, deſiring to be in that place rather then in any other, for the aduantage which the horſemen had there; and at the ſame time he commanded to turne the artilleries towards the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought ſome domage to the areareguard. But in the meane while the battell of the Imperials gaue a furious charge vpon the Kings ſquadron, which ordinarily was the battel, but as the Spaniards went it was the auantguard; the King fighting valiantly ſuſtained the violence of his enemies, who with the multitude of their harquebuziers conſtrained his men to giue ground, vntil the Swiſſers coming on, the Spaniards were repulſed, as well by them as by the horſemen that charged them in flanke. But the Viceroy (called by the Marquis of Peſquiero) arriuing with the Lanceknights, they were broken eaſily, and with great ſlaughter of the Swiſſers, who that day did nothing anſwer the valour they had bene accuſtomed to ſhew in battels; and the King being in the midſt of the battel with a great number of men at armes, and endeuouring to containe & confirme his ſouldiers, when he had fought long, and had his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe lightly hurt in the face and in the hand, being fallen to the ground, he was taken priſoner by fiue ſouldiers that knew him not; but the Viceroy chancing to come, he made himſelfe knowne vnto him, who gaue him his hand with great reuerence, and receiued him priſoner in the name of the Emperour. At the ſame time the Marquis of Guaſt with the firſt ſquadron had defeated the horſemen men that were at Mirabello: and Anthonie de Leua, who, as ſome ſaid, had to that end caſt downe ſo great a ſpace of wall, that an hundred and fiftie horſemen might paſſe forth in front, iſſued out of Pauie, and ſo charged the French men behind, that he put them to flight, and they were almoſt all ſtripped, except the areareguard of the horſemen, which being led by Monſieur d'Alenſon, retired whole preſently after the beginning of the battell. It is holden for certaine, that in this battell there died more then eight thouſand men of the French campe, part in the field, and part drowned in the riuer Theſin, as they ſought to ſaue themſelues; of this number were about twentie of the moſt noble Lords of France, as the Admiral, Lord Iames Chabanes, the Lords de Paliſſa and Trimouille, the Maſter of the horſe, Monſieur d'Aubigny, Monſieur de Buſſy, and Monſieur d'Eſcut, who being taken grieuouſly wounded by his enemies, died preſently. The priſoners were the King of Nauarre, the Baſtard of Sauoy, the Lords of Montmorencie, of S. Paul, of Brion, of Aual, of Chandiou, of Imbercourt, Galeas Viſconte, Federike de Boſſolo, Barnaby Viſconte, Guidanes, with many Gentlemen, and almoſt all the Captaines that eſcaped the ſlaughter. There was alſo taken Ierome Leandro Biſhop of Brunduſium, the Popes Nuncio, but by commandement of the Viceroy he was ſet at libertie; of which priſoners, Monſieur S. Paul and Federike de Boſſolo, who were committed to the Caſtle of Pauie, fled away ſhortly after from thence, hauing corrupted the Spaniards that had the charge of them. Of the Imperials there died about ſeuen hundred, but not one Captaine, except Ferdinand Caſtriot Marquis of S. Angelo. The Marquis of Peſquiero was wounded in two places, and in one with the bullet of an harquebuze, and Anthonie de Leua was lightly hurt in the leg. Of ſo great an armie there was preſerued but the areareguard of foure hundred Lanceknights, commanded by Monſieur d'Alenſon, who without fighting, or being aſſailed, while no man followed them, but leauing behind them their baggage, retired with great diligence into Piemont: and as ſoone as the report of the victorie was brought to Millan, Theodore Triuulce who lay there in garriſon with foure hundred Lances, departed, and tooke his way to Muſocco, all the ſouldiers following him by troupes; ſo that in the ſame day that the battell was fought, all the Duchie of Millan was freed from the French. The day after the King was led into the Rocke of Piſqueton, for that the Duke of Millan, for his owne ſafetie, was vnwilling that he ſhould be brought into the Caſtle of Millan; and there, except his libertie (for he was very carefully guarded) he was in all other things vſed and honoured as a King.

THE XVI. BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

THe taking of the French King putteth all the Potentates of Italy in great heauineſſe, and among others the Pope, who is ſolicited by the Venetians to confederate with them. He forſaketh the Venetians, and accordeth with the Emperour. Many practiſes are vſed for the Kings deliuerie. Moron conſpireth againſt the Emperour. The King is deliuered out of priſon, and returneth into France.

NOw when at the battell fought in the Parke of Pauie, the French armie was not onely ouerthrowne by the Imperials, but alſo the Moſt Chriſtian King taken priſoner, and about him the moſt part of the Nobilitie of France, and the Captaines either dead or taken priſoners; the Swiſſers who in times paſt had made warre in Italy with ſo great fame, hauing carried themſelues ſo cowardly, the reſidue of the armie depriued of their tents, neuer ſtayed till they came to the foote of the Mounts. And (which maruellouſly increaſed the reputation of the victors) after the Imperiall Captaines had obtained ſo memorable a victorie, with ſmall loſſe of their men, it is vnſpeakable how much all the Potentates of Italy were aſtoniſhed, who ſeeing themſelues almoſt quite diſarmed, and the forces of the Emperour remaining very puiſſant in the field, without any impediment of enemies, they were in great feare: and in this confuſion they could not be ſo much aſſured by that which many diuulged of the good intention of the Emperour, and of his inclination to peace, and not to vſurpe the Eſtates of others, as they were aſtoniſhed by the conſideration of the great danger, leſt (puſhed on either by ambition, naturall almoſt to all Princes, or by inſolencie, which commonly accompanieth victories, and incited likewiſe by the importunitie and couetouſneſſe of thoſe that gouerned his affaires in Italy, and laſtly at the perſwaſions of his Councell and all his Court,) he would in ſuch an occaſion, ſufficient to ſet an edge vpon the dulleſt ſpirit that was, diſpoſe his thoughts to make himſelfe Lord of all Italy: and knowing how eaſie it is to euery great Prince, but aboue all others to an Emperour of Rome, to iuſtifie his enterpriſes with titles appearing honeſt and reaſonable, not onely the leaſt puiſſant in forces and authoritie were troubled with this feare, but the Pope and the Venetians in a maner more then others. For the Venetians being pricked in conſcience for that they had failed him without iuſt cauſe, and had not followed the capitulations of the confederation; but much more for the memorie of ancient hatreds, and the frequent quarrels which had bene betweene them and the houſe of Auſtria, and the great warres they had had not many yeares before with Maximilian his grandfather, whereby the name and memory of the rights of the Empire, which were almoſt buried and forgotten were maruellouſly renewed and reuiued in the eſtate which they poſſeſſed in the firme land: and for that they knew that whoſoeuer had any purpoſe to make himſelfe great in Italy, muſt ſeeke meanes to pull downe their too great puiſſance. And the Pope, for that beſides the maieſtie of the Papacie, which euen in the times of the ancient reuerence that the world bare to the Sea Apoſtolike, was oftentimes ill aſſured of the greatneſſe of the Emperours, found himſelfe in all other regards verie eaſie to be endomaged, being diſarmed, without money, and the Eſtate of the Church very weake, wherein there were very few ſtrong townes, and the people not vnited nor firme in deuotion to their Prince, but almoſt all the demaine of the Church full of diuiſions, one part being Guelfs, and another Gibelins, and the Gibelins by an ancient and almoſt naturall impreſſion inclined to the name of the Emperours; and the Citie of Rome, aboue all the reſt, weake, and infected with theſe ſeeds of diuiſions. Furthermore the Pope had reſpect alſo to the Eſtate of Florence, which depending of him, and being the proper and ancient greatneſſe of his houſe, was haply no leſſe deare vnto him then the State of the Church, neither was it leſſe eaſie to alter it. For that Citie, ſince they had chaſed out the family of the Medices at the paſſage of King Charles, hauing taſted the popular gouernment vnder the name of libertie, for the ſpace of eighteene yeares, had hardly brooked their returne, ſo that there were found very few to whom indeed their power was pleaſing: and the Pope feared maruellouſly, leſt to ſo mightie occaſions there might be added no ſmall deſire to offend him: and might alſo feare that the will was no leſſe, not ſo much in regard of the ambition of the mightieſt, whereof the leſſe puiſſant is neuer fully aſſured, as for that he feared that for diuers cauſes his name at that time was odious to the Emperour: diſcourſing with himſelfe, that although in the life of Pope Leo, and afterwards ſince he was Cardinall, he had trauelled much for the greatneſſe of the Emperour, yea Pope Leo and he with very great expences & dangers had opened him the way in Italy to ſo great a puiſſance; & that ſince he was choſen Pope, he had giuen money to his Captaines, and made the Florentines to contribute whileſt the Admirall was in Italy, without reuoking from his armie the regiments of the Church and thoſe of the Commonweale of Florence: neuertheleſſe, either in conſideration that it belonged to his office to be a father and paſtor indifferent betweene Chriſtian Princes, and rather the author of peace then a nouriſher of warres; or elſe for that he had begun very late to feare ſuch a greatneſſe, he had preſently retired himſelfe to runne the ſame fortune, ſo that he would neither renew the confederation made by his predeceſſor for the defence of Italy, nor aide him with money when the Duke of Bourbon entred the yeare before with his armie into Prouence. And albeit theſe matters had not giuen to the Emperours Captaines any iuſt cauſe to complaine, ſeeing alſo he was not bound by the League of Adrian to be concurrant againſt the French men in the wars of Italy; yet were they beginnings to cauſe them not to eſteeme him the ſame man with the Emperour, yea rather they diminiſhed much of the faith which til that day they had in him, as men who caried only either by their appetite or neceſſitie, thought themſelues in a maner offended, if, to their particular enterpriſes dreſſed to occupie France, others did not likewiſe lay to their hands, as they had formerly done in the publike wars, vnder colour to aſſure Italy againſt the power of the French. But the complaints and diſpleaſures began to diſcouer themſelues at ſuch times as the French King paſſed the Mounts to recouer the Duchie of Millan. For, albeit the Pope, according to that which he wrote in a Brieſe, wherein he complained afterwards to the Emperour, had ſecretly giuen a certaine ſumme of money to the French men at their returne from Marſeilles, yet afterwards he had no ſuch ſtraite familiaritie or intelligence with them: but as ſoone as the King had made conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan, ſeeing his affaires take good ſucceſſe, he entred into capitulations with him; whereof he excuſed himſelfe to the Emperour, alledging that at that time his Captaines hauing not communicated with him any of their deſignes for the ſpace of twentie dayes, and deſpairing afterwards of the defence of that State, not without feare of the kingdome of Naples, for that the Duke of Albanie drew with his regiments towards Tuſcane, he was conſtrained to looke to his ſuretie; and yet the regard of his proper danger did not ſo much carrie him, but that he did accord with conditions no leſſe fauourable for the Emperours affaires then his owne, refuſing very great offers which the French King tendred, to the end to make him enter into the alliance with him: and yet theſe excuſes had not ſuch operation, but that the Emperour and his Captaines were much troubled, not ſo much for that they ſaw themſelues wholly depriued of hope to haue any more ſuccours of him, as for the doubt they had leſt the capitulation contained not ſome further matter then the obligation of neutralitie; and for that it ſeemed vnto them that in any ſort he had giuen too much reputation to the enterpriſe of the French men, and alſo for that they feared leſt the Pope wold be the meanes that the Venetians ſhould follow his example; which afterwards was diſcerned to be true, by certain letters and Brieſes found in the Kings tent after the victorie: and laſtly the Pope had kindled theſe ſuſpitions and diſcontentments when he conſented that the munitions lent by the Duke of Ferrara to the French King when he lay afore Pauie, ſhould paſſe through his lands, and that help ſhould be giuen to conduct them: but much more when the Duke of Albanie went to the enterpriſe of the Realme of Naples, not onely for that he was receiued and honoured as a friend along all the Eſtates of the Church and the Florentines, but alſo he ſtayed certaine dayes about Sienna to reforme at his inſtance the gouernment of that Citie; which matter although it was a meanes to prolong the Dukes voyage to the Realme of Naples, and that it had bene principally ſolicited by him to that end, as being a matter offenſiue vnto him, that vpon one man ſhould be layed the iuriſdiction of Naples and Millan: yet the Imperials in this reſpect had made an interpretation, that betweene the French King and him, there was a further bond, then a ſimple promiſe not to offend one another. It was then not without good reaſon, that the Pope feared not onely, as all the other Potentates, to be inuaded by the Imperials when time and occaſion ſhould ſerue, but alſo leſt that without expecting a greater oportunitie, they would preſently come and aſſaile the Eſtate of the Church, or that of Florence: and that which more increaſed his feare, was, that the Duke of Albanie as ſoone as he was aduertiſed what fortune had befallen the King, retiring from Mount Rotondo towards Bracciano for his ſafetie, and hauing alſo ſent thither a cornet of an hundred and fiftie horſemen that were within Rome, whom the Pope cauſed to accompanie him thither for his guard, becauſe the Duke of Seſſa and the Imperials prepared themſelues to defeate the regiments of the Duke of Albanie, it happened that about foure hundred horſe and twelue hundred footmen of the bands of the Vrſins coming from Sermonette, being followed by Iulio Colonno with many troupes of horſemen and footmen, he ouerthrew them at the Abbey of three Fountaines, and that as they fled for their ſafetie into the Citie of Rome, where they entred at the gates of S. Paul and S. Sebaſtian, the bands of Iulio entred with them pelmell, and ſlue many of them in the field of Flora and other places of the Citie, which with great tumult aroſe all in armes, firſt to the great feare, and afterwards with no litle indignation of the Pope, for the ſlender regard and reuerence that was giuen to his autoritie. But in ſuch a doubt and great perplexitie of mind, the counſels and offers of the Venetians came to him vnlooked for, who being of themſelues entred into the like feare, laboured to perſwade him with no ſmall inſtance, that ioyning together they might cauſe a regiment of ten thouſand Swiſſers to deſcend preſently into Italy, and calling together a great band of Italians, they might oppoſe againſt ſo great dangers: and they promiſed for their parts (according to their cuſtome) farre greater things then they are wont to obſerue. They alledged, that it was now many moneths ſince the Lanceknights within Pauie had bene payed, and that they ſeeing ſince the victorie the ſame difficulties of payment to continue, were become mutinous, had ſeized vpon the artilleries, and made themſelues ſtrong within Pauie: and that for the ſame cauſe all the reſidue of the armie was drawne into tumult, and would dayly be more tumultuous, becauſe the Captaines had no meanes to pay them: in ſo much as both he and they falling ſpeedily into armes, both their Eſtates would be aſſured, and the occaſion entertained, whereby the Imperials, being engaged in theſe difficulties, and conſtrained to keepe continually great forces for the guard of the King that was priſoner, would of themſelues fall into diſorder. To this they added, that there was no doubt but the Ladie Regent who had in her hands the gouernment of France, being very deſirous of that vnion, at their inſtance would not onely cauſe the Duke of Albanie to march with his regiments, and the foure hundred Lances of the areareguard that were retired from the battell in ſafetie, but alſo with the vniuerſall conſent of the kingdome of France, would be concurrant for the ſafetie of Italy with a great ſumme of money, as knowing that thereupon depended the greateſt part of the hope to recouer the King her ſonne. That without all doubt this deliberation was very good, if it were with ſpeed put in execution; but to deferre and temporize, were to giue meanes to the Imperials to reorder themſelues: and ſo much the rather for that whoſoeuer tooke not a reſolution to enter into armes, ſtood in caſe of conſtraint to compound with them, and to giue them money, which were no other thing, then to become an inſtrument and meanes to deliuer them from all their difficulties, and to ſubmit themſelues wilfully vnder a yoke of perpetuall ſubiection. Moreouer they put him in hope, that the Duke of Ferrara would follow them, who both for his ancient dependence of the French, and for the aide which in that warre he had adminiſtred to the King, was not without his feare: and the coniunction of whom ſeemed of no litle importance, for the great commoditie of his Eſtate in the warres of Lombardie, the towne of Ferrara being verie ſtrong, and he being very well ſtored of munitions and artilleries, and (as the bruite went) very rich in money.

The Venetians ſolicite the Pope to confederate with them.

But neither the hope to ouercome ſo difficult an enterpriſe, nor the conſideration of perils further off, to the which time is wont to bring ſuch remedies as were neuer dreamed of, could incline incline the Pope to open his eares to ſuch ſpeeches, vnleſſe the feare to be preſently inuaded had induced him rather to expoſe himſelfe to the danger leaſt certaine, then to the perill that ſeemed moſt aſſured and moſt preſent: and therefore the practiſes were ſo farre aduanced betweene them, that being come euen to the ſetting downe of capitulations in writing, there was expectation from houre to houre that they would accord: in ſo much as the Pope, who deſired the concluſion, diſpatched in poſt to the King of England, Ieronimo Ghinuccio a Siennois, and Auditor of the Chamber Apoſtolike, to labour dexterouſly to diſpoſe the King to oppoſe himſelfe againſt ſuch a greatneſſe of the Emperour, when very conueniently for this purpoſe arriued the Archbiſhop of Capua, his ancient Secretarie and Counſellour, and who for many yeares had bene of great authoritie with him; who as ſoone as he was aduertiſed of the victorie of the Imperials, departed from Plaiſance, and went to the campe to Don Charles de Lanoy Viceroy of Naples, of whoſe intention being well aſſured, he came preſently in poſt to the Pope, to whom he brought an aſſured hope of accord. For the Viceroy and the other Captaines were occupied at that time with two thoughts: the one, to prouide money to content the armie, with whom, for that they had no money to pay them, they found themſelues in very great confuſion: the other, to bring the perſon of the French King into ſuch a place, as the difficultie to guard him might not keepe them in continuall care and feare: which two things being well accompliſhed, they iudged themſelues to ſtand in ſuch a degree as they might alwayes put their purpoſes to effect, and therefore they deſired accord with the Pope, preſuppoſing thereby to draw from him a great ſumme of money: and to diſpoſe him the more thereunto by putting him in feare, and alſo to diſcharge the Eſtate of Millan, which was much exhauſted, from lodging of ſouldiers, they ſent foure hundred men at armes and eight hundred Lanceknights to lie vpon the countrey of Plaiſance, not as enemies, but alledging ſometimes that the Duchie of Millan was vnable to nouriſh ſo great an armie, and ſometimes threatning to make them march vp to the territories of Rome againſt the Duke of Albanie, vnleſſe the regiments of men of warre that had bene leuied by the Vrſins were diſſolued. But theſe induſtries were ſuperfluous, for that as ſoone as the Pope was aſſured that he might auoide the dangers preſent, he left off all other thoughts, and diſpoſed his mind wholly to the accord: and therefore as ſoone as he had heard the Archbiſhop, he ſent after the Auditor of the Chamber, to countermand him backe againe. And to remoue all occaſions that might hinder the accord, he cauſed the Duke of Albanie to diſperſe his whole armie, except thoſe bands of footmen and horſemen of beyond the Mounts, and lodged him at Cornetto, whē on ẏ other ſide he had receiued promiſe of the Emperors Captains that they alſo would diſmiſſe their ſouldiers that lay about Rome, and cauſe Aſcanius Colonno with the other companies that came from the kingdome, to ſtay: and withall he interpoſed himſelfe to the end that the Colonnois who began to moleſt the lands of the Vrſins, might deſiſt from armes. The Pope both deſired, and did all he could that the Venetians might be comprehended in the accord which he ſolicited with the Viceroy, but the difficultie was, that they refuſed to pay the money which the Viceroy demanded of them. For he required that they ſhould pay ſo much money as they ſhould haue ſpent in the warre which they ought to contribute vnto, and that hereafter they ſhould contribute thereunto, not with men, but with money: and the like demand did he alſo make to all thoſe that were comprehended in the confederation made with Adrian. But it made well for the Pope that the Venetians ſhewed themſelues hard and ſtraite, putting the Viceroy into ſuſpition that they looked for new ſtirres and commotions: and whileſt theſe matters were negociated with a very aſſured hope of concluſion, the Florentines by the Popes ordinance ſent fiue and twentie thouſand duckats to the Marquis of Peſquiero for the entertainment of the armie, hauing firſt receiued promiſe from Iohn Bartlemew de Gattinaro who negociated with the Pope for the Viceroy, that that ſumme ſhould be reckoned in the principall ſumme which was to be payed to him by vertue of the new capitulation. And not many dayes afore the reſolution and concluſion of the ſaid capitulation, the Duke of Albanie, who for his returning into France had tarried for the Nauie at ſea, ẏ ſame being come into the port of Saint Stephen, and the Galleys that were ſent him, he embarked himſelfe in them at Ciuitauecchia, together with the Galleys of the Pope, which were lent him by the conſent of the Viceroy, notwithſtanding there was no ſafeconduct giuen either to the one or the other. Ranſe de Cere was embarked with him, together with the artilleries which he had had from Sienna and Lucques, and foure hundred horſe, a thouſand Lanceknights, with a very ſmall troupe of Italians,

The Imperials determine to accord with the Pope.

the reſidue of the regiments being retired and gone away by troupes; and the reſidue of the horſes were part ſold, and part left there. It was clearely diſcerned by the proceeding of the Duke of Albanie, that he had bene ſent thither, either to the end that the Imperials ſtanding in feare of the kingdome of Naples, ſhould depart from the Duchie of Millan to ſuccour it, or elſe that they might by meanes of that feare be induced to accord; and as well for that cauſe, as for that the forces which the King had giuen him were not ſufficient for ſuch an enterpriſe, he had marched ſlowly. But at laſt leauing out the Venetians, the confederation was concluded within Rome the firſt day of Aprill, betweene the Pope and the Florentines on the one part, and the Emperour on the other, for whom the Viceroy vndertooke, being his Lieutenant generall in Italy; and for the Viceroy, Iohn Bartlemew de Gattinaro, nephew to the Emperours chiefe Chancellor, was at Rome with full and ample commiſſion. The effect of the moſt important capitulations was this: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour ſhould be a perpetuall amitie and confederation, by the which both the one and the other ſhould be bound to defend with a certaine proportion of men the Duchie of Millan, being then poſſeſſed vnder the name of the Emperour by Francis Sforce, who was named as principall in this capitulation: That the Emperour ſhould take into his protection all the Eſtates which the Church held, together with thoſe which the Florentines poſſeſſed, and particularly the houſe of Medicis, with the authoritie and preheminences they held in that Citie: That the Florentines ſhould preſently pay an hundred thouſand duckats in recompence of ẏ which they ſhold haue contributed to the laſt wars, by vertue of the league made by Pope Adrian, which the Emperour pretended not to be diſſolued by his death, for that it was expreſſed in the capitulations, that it ſhould endure one yeare after the death of any of the Confederates: That the Imperiall Captaines ſhould withdraw their forces from off the Eſtates of the Church, and that they ſhould not ſend any to lodge there hereafter without the conſent of the Pope. There was place left for the Venetians to enter into this confederation within the terme of twentie dayes vnder honeſt conditions, which were to be declared by the Pope and the Emperour. Moreouer, it was accorded that the Viceroy ſhould be bound to bring the Emperours ratification to all theſe capitulations within foure moneths: and thoſe that were Deputies for the Viceroy, bound themſelues ſeuerally to a capitulation which was confirmed by oath, that if the Emperour did not ratifie the capitulations within the ſaid time, the Viceroy ſhould repay the ſaid hundred thouſand duckats, and yet vntill the time they were rendred, the league ſhould be fully obſerued; whereunto were added three articles, which were not of the ſame ſubiect with the capitulations, but written apart, and confirmed alſo by oath: That in all matters concerning Benefices in the Realme of Naples, it ſhould be lawfull for the Popes to vſe the ſame authoritie and iuriſdiction as was ordered by the inueſtitures of the kingdome: That hereafter the Duchie of Millan ſhould make all their prouiſion of ſalt from Ceruia for ſuch a price, and according to the ſame order, as had bene heretofore agreed vpon betweene Pope Leo and the French King, and confirmed by the capitulation which the ſaid Pope Leo made with the Emperour in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and one: and that the Viceroy ſhould be bound to bring the matter ſo to paſſe, that the Duke of Ferrara ſhould immediatly render to the Church Reggia, Rubiera, with ſuch other townes as he had take during the vacancie of the Sea of Rome by the death of Adrian: and that in conſideration thereof, the Pope as ſoone as he was poſſeſſed of them, ſhould pay to the Emperour an hundred thouſand duckats; and at the firſt requeſt that ſhould be made vnto him, ſhould abſolue the Duke of Ferrara of the cenſures and priuations which he had incurred, but not of the penaltie of an hundred thouſand duckats, which he had promiſed in caſe of breaking the couenant made with Adrian: and yet when the Pope had recouered poſſeſſion thereof, there ſhould be examination by order of law, whether thoſe townes and Modena appertained to the Church or to the Empire: and if they were found to belong to the Empire, that then they ſhould be holden and acknowledged in fee of the Emperour, otherwiſe to remaine free to the Sea Apoſtolike. This deliberation of the Pope was diuerſly interpreted, according to the diuerſitie of the paſſions and iudgements of men, and chiefly of the common ſort, to whom ſuch counſels as carrie the faireſt ſhewes, are wont to be more pleaſing then thoſe that are mature and well digeſted; and who oftentimes do eſteeme thoſe men generous and noble who meaſure not things by diſcretion: and all thoſe likewiſe that made profeſſion to deſire the libertie of Italy, blamed him, as if for want of courage he had let ſlip the occaſion to vnite it againſt the Emperour, and had aided the Impe-

riall armie with his owne money, to free them from all the difficulties whereinto they were fallen. But the moſt part of men of better vnderſtanding iudged farre otherwiſe: for they conſidered that it had bene no wiſe counſell to oppoſe with new companies againſt a very great and victorious armie; and that the coming of the Swiſſers could not but be long and dilatorie, and that it would be very difficult to cauſe them to paſſe although they ſhould be verie readie to deſcend, whereof conſidering their nature, and the hurt which they had ſo lately receiued, there was not any aſſurance; neither was there any better hope on the behalfe of France, where, by reaſon of ſo great an ouerthrow there remained neither courage nor counſell, and where there was no prouiſion of money, nor any men at armes in a readineſſe, and thoſe few alſo that eſcaped from the battell hauing loſt their baggage, there was need both of time and money to readdreſſe them. So that this vnion had no other apparent foundation, then an hope that the armie of the enemies would not ſtirre for want of money; which although it ſhould ſo come to paſſe, they remained not for all that depriued of the Duchie of Millan, the which ſo long as it was at the deuotion of the Emperour, the Pope ſhould haue alwayes great occaſion of feare: and that this hope likewiſe was very vncertaine, for that it was to be feared, that the Captaines with their authoritie and cunning, and by propounding to the ſouldiers the ſacke of ſome rich towne of the Church, or of Tuſcane, would diſpoſe the armie to march: and that it was alreadie perceiued, that part of the Lanceknights, onely to ſeeke a more plentifull lodging, were paſſed the riuer Po, and come vpon the lands of Parma and Plaiſance: in ſo much as if they had any intention to paſſe further, all remedies would come too late; and that ſo great a deliberation was grounded, with too great danger, vpon a bare hope of the difficulties of the enemies, who had it in their power at length to rid themſelues therefrom. Therefore the counſell of Pope Clement, according to the preſent time, was wiſe and well conſidered, but haply it had bene more commendable, if in all the articles of the captulation, he had vſed the ſame prudence, and diſpoſed his wit rather to cloſe vp and heale all the wounds of Italy, then to open and aggrauate any one of conſequence; imitating the wiſe Phyſition, who when the remedies which he prepareth to cure the indiſpoſition of the other members, do augment the maladie of the head or heart, he layeth aſide all care of the leſſer griefes, which may ſtay their time, and proceedeth diligently and carefully to the cure of that which is moſt important, and moſt neceſſarie for the health of the patient. But that we may the better vnderſtand this matter, it is needfull that we looke backe to ſome of thoſe things which we haue ſet downe here and there, and reduce them into one place.

The rights and pretenſions of the family of Eſte.

Thoſe of the family of Eſte, beſides that they had poſſeſſed of long time the iuriſdiction of Ferrara vnder the title of Vicars of the Church, had bene Lords alſo for many yeares of Reggia and Modena by vertue of inueſtitures from the Emperours, for at that time no man made queſtion of the ſubiection of thoſe two Cities to the Empire; and they were enioyed peaceably vntill Pope Iulio the ſecond (who ſtirring vp the ancient titles and rights of the Church, almoſt buried, and vnder the colour of pietie was the author of many euils) began the warre with Duke Alphonſo, to reduce Ferrara wholly vnder the obedience of the Church: in which warre, occaſion being offered him to take from him Modena, he retained it at the firſt for himſelfe, as a towne which together with all the other townes euen to the riuer of Po, appertained to the Sea Apoſtolike, as being part of the Exarchie of Rauenna: but ſhortly after, for feare of the French, he gaue it to the Emperour Maximilian, and yet for all that the warre ceaſſed not againſt Alphonſo, but afterwards he tooke from him Reggia alſo; and it was beleeued, that if he had liued longer, he would haue taken Ferrara, for that he was a great enemie to Alphonſo, as well for his ambition couered with pietie, whereby he pretended to recouer to the Church all that he could find had bene held by her at any time, as for the diſdaine that Alphonſo had rather followed the amitie of the French then depended of him; and haply alſo by the implacable hatred which he bare to the memorie and relikes of Alexander the ſixt his predeceſſor, whoſe daughter Lucrecia had bene maried to Duke Alphonſo, of which mariage were now procreated many children. Iulio by his death left to his ſucceſſors not onely the heritage of Reggia, but alſo the ſame deſire to get Ferrara, whereunto they were ſpurred forward by the glorious memorie that he ſeemed to haue left of himſelfe to poſteritie: and therefore this ambition was more mightie in Leo his ſucceſſor then the regard of the greatneſſe which the houſe of Medicis had in Florence, for the which it ſeemed more profitable that the puiſſance of the Church

ſhould diminiſh, then that Ferrara being added thereunto, it ſhould become redoubted to all her neighbours: and chiefly after he had bought Modena, he diſpoſed himſelfe wholly to get Ferrara, but more by practiſes and ambuſhes, then by force, for as much as that was become too difficult, by reaſon that Alphonſo when he ſaw himſelfe in ſo great dangers, had fortified himſelfe on all ſides, and made plentifull prouiſion of artilleries and munitions, and as the brute went, was plentifully ſtored with money: and the hatreds of Leo were haply greater, but carried more ſecretly then thoſe of Iulio: and beſides many plots which he often layed to take Ferrara, either by ſurpriſe or by fraud, he bound in ſuch ſort thoſe Princes vnto him with whom he made alliance, that at leaſt they might not hinder him in this enterpriſe: and that not onely during the life of Iulian his brother, and Laurence his nephew, for whoſe greatneſſe and exaltation it was thought he was carried with that ambition, but alſo euen after their death. And this deſire was ſo great and hote in him, that many were perſwaded that the laſt rather raſh then diſcreete deliberation that he made to ioyne with the Emperour againſt the French King, proceeded chiefly of this cauſe: in ſo much as neceſſitie conſtrained Alphonſo (to ſatisfie the French King, his onely founder and hope) to make warre vpon them of Modena, at ſuch time as the armie of Pope Leo and the Emperour held Pauie beſieged; in which warre, hauing had ill ſucceſſe, he had ſoone bene reduced into very great difficulties, if Pope Leo at the ſame time, during the courſe of his victories, had not died of a ſodaine and vnexpected death, which aſſuredly chanced no leſſe conueniently for him then the death of Iulio. And I know not whether in the end Adrian the ſucceſſor of Leo, was not touched with this couetouſneſſe, although being newly created, and vnexperienced in the affaires of Italy, he had in the firſt moneths after his coming to Rome, giuen him abſolution of the cenſures, granted him of new the inueſtiture, and alſo permitted him to retaine all that he had poſſeſſed during the vacation of the Sea; beſides the hope that he gaue him to render him Modena and Reggia, though afterwards vpon better information of the eſtate of things, he well expreſſed how farre his mind was dayly eſtranged therefrom. But by the creatiõ of Pope Clement, Alphonſo entred into a great feare to returne again into the ſame dangers wherein he had bene before, and that with good reaſon; for that if things had happily ſucceeded with him, the ſame diſpoſition would haue bene found in him, which had bene in Iulio and Leo: but the occaſion being not yet offered for Ferrara, he ſet himſelfe wholly to get Reggia and Rubiera, as a matter of more facilitie, and better to be iuſtified, by the late poſſeſſion which the Church had had of them, and as though, in that regard, it were a great diſhonour and infamie for him to leaue them vnrecouered. Hereupon it came to paſſe, that afore in many other ſorts, and laſtly in the capitulation with the Viceroy, he had more care hereof then many deſired, who perceiuing how dangerous the greatneſſe of the Emperour was to all men, and that there was no better remedie for the ſame, then a readie and generall vnion of all the Eſtates of Italy, and that there might dayly ariſe occaſions and neceſſities to take armes, they iudged it a better courſe that the Pope ſhould not trouble the Duke of Ferrara, nor put him into neceſſitie to caſt himſelfe into the armes of the Emperour, chiefly the Duke being a very rich Prince, and of whom, as well for the commoditie of his Eſtate, as for other conditions of his, there ought in ſuch times great account to be made: but that he ought rather to embrace him, and vſe all meanes poſſible to take from him both hatred and feare: if notwithſtanding to do benefites and pleaſures to one that perſwades himſelfe to haue receiued ſo many iniuries, be ſufficient to wipe out of a mind ſo ill diſpoſed and full of iealouſie, the memorie of wrongs and offences, ſpecially when the pleaſure is done at a time, when it ſeemes to proceed more of neceſſitie then good will.

The Pope ſends to viſite the French king being priſoner.

After this capitulation was reſolued, the Pope not to omit any conuenient office to ſo great a Prince as the French King, by permiſſion of the Viceroy, ſent vnto him the Biſhop of Piſtoya to viſite and comfort him in his name: and the King after the generall words that paſſed betweene them in the preſence of Captaine Alarcon, and after he had ſaid that he beſought the Pope to do the office of a good ſoliciter for him with the Emperour, he asked him ſecretly, what was become of the Duke of Albanie, and was anſwered to his great griefe, that one part of his armie being broken and retired, he was returned with the reſidue into France. At this very time the Lucquois accorded with the Viceroy, who receiued them into the protection of the Emperour, to pay him the ſumme of ten thouſand duckats; and likewiſe the Siennois contracted with him for fifteene thouſand duckats, without binding him to maintaine one forme of gouerne-

ment more then another; for that of the one ſide, the family of Montenouo, who at the inſtance of the Pope and by the meanes of the Duke of Albanie, had reſumed the authoritie, which neuertheleſſe was not yet well confirmed, and on the other part, thoſe who by the profeſſion they made to deſire libertie, were commonly called Libertines, hauing taken courage by reaſon of the battell of Pauie, and would not endure the policie and gouernment induced by the forces of the French King, both parts ſent meſſengers to the Viceroy, to incline him to be fauourable to their deſignes; and hauing receiued from him no certaine reſolution touching the forme of gouernment, they ioyned both together and ſolicited readily compoſition; which being done, and the men arriued whom the Viceroy ſent to receiue the money, it happened that whileſt they were telling the money, and in their preſence, Ierome Seuerin a Citizen of Sienna, who had bene ſometime with the Viceroy, ſlue Alexander Pichi chiefe of the new gouernment, to whom the Pope had aſſigned at that time the whole authoritie; by reaſon whereof the reſidue of the Citizens who were of his faction hauing taken armes, and the people who were malcontent that the gouernment ſhould returne to a Tyrannie, being alſo riſen into arms, when they had chaſed out the Chieftaines of the family of Montenouo, they reformed the Citie, and ſet vp againe the popular gouernment, being enemie to the Pope, and adhering to the Emperour; and it was beleeued that theſe things were not done without the priuitie of the Viceroy, or at leaſt not without his great approbation, conſidering how profitable it was for the affaires of the Emperour to haue that Citie on his ſide, which for her forces is very puiſſant, hauing the oportunitie of ports and hauens of the ſea, being in a fertile countrey, and for her neighbourhood to the Realme of Naples, being ſituate betweene Rome and Florence; and yet the Viceroy and the Duke of Seſſa had giuen hope to the Pope that they would not alter the gouernment introduced by his fauour. There were many other townes in Italy who followed the inclination of the Lucquois and Siennois, and the fortune of the victors, with whom the Marquis of Montferrat compounded for fifteene thouſand duckats; and the Duke of Ferrara was content to lend the Viceroy fiftie thouſand duckats, vnder promiſe to haue them repayed if they did not capitulate together; and this he did for that his affaires could not be ſo ſpeedily eſtabliſhed, both for the reſpects they bare to the capitulation made with the Pope, and alſo for that it was neceſſarie to vnderſtand firſt the will of the Emperour: with which money, together with the hundred thouſand duckats promiſed by the Millanois, and the impoſition of the Siennois and Lucquois, and that alſo which was ſent to Genes by the Emperour for the ſupportation of the warre, but came after the victorie, the Captaines tooke order, as the money came in, to pay the ſouldiers for all that was paſt, and to ſend backe from hand to hand the Almaines into Germanie: ſo that no tokens appearing that there was any intention at that time to follow the courſe of the victorie againſt any man, but that the Viceroy hauing ratified the capitulation made with the Pope according to his requeſt, and negociating at the ſame time a new appointment with the Venetians which he greatly deſired, the eyes of euery man were ſet to behold with what propertie of affection the Emperour would receiue this gladſome newes, and to what ends he would diſpoſe his thoughts: who ſo farre as exterior demonſtrations made ſhew of, expreſſed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and very apt eaſily to reſiſt the proſperitie of fortune: yea ſuch as ſeemed incredible in ſo mightie and yong a Prince, who as yet had neuer taſted but of one felicitie. For after he was informed of ſo great a victorie, whereof he had the report the tenth day of March, together with letters of the French Kings owne hand, which were very humbly written, rather in the condition of a priſoner then of a King, he went forthwith to the Church to make his holy oblations to God, with many ſolemnities, and the morning following receiued the Sacrament of the Euchariſt with ſignes of right great deuotion, and ſo went in proceſſion to our Ladies Church out of Madril, where he was at that time with his Court: & would not ſuffer, that according to the cuſtome of others, any ſignes ſhould be made of reioycing, as by ringing of bels, making of bonfires, or any ſuch thing; ſaying, it was fit to reioyce & be glad for victories obtained againſt Infidels, and not for thoſe which were gotten againſt Chriſtians: and ſhewing in his words and countenance no ſignes of any great ioy, or that he was puffed vp, he anſwered the congratulations of the Embaſſadors & great perſonages that were about him, that he took pleaſure, in that God hauing ſo manifeſtly aided him, he acknowledged it as a ſigne, although he had not deſerued it, that he ſtood in his fauour: and for that he hoped he ſhould now haue occaſion to reduce Chriſtendome to peace, and to prepare warre againſt the Infidels;

The moderation and temperance of the Emperor vpon the newes of the victorie.

fidels; and for that he ſhould haue greater meanes to do good to his friends, and to pardon his enemies: he added, that albeit he might iuſtly appropriate to himſelfe the whole victorie, for that the helpe of none of his friends did concurre in the action, yet he was contented that it ſhould be communicated to them all: ſo that when he had heard the Embaſſadour of Venice, who iuſtified afore him the ſeruices done by his Commonweale, he ſaid to thoſe that ſtood about him, that his iuſtifications were not true, but that he would accept them and repute them for true: and after he had continued certaine dayes in theſe ſpeeches and demonſtrations full of great wiſedome and honeſtie, he called his Councell together, to the end that (according to his cuſtome) nothing might be done which was not well and maturely conſidered. His propoſition was, that they ſhould aduiſe him in what ſort he ſhould deale with the French King, and to what ends this victorie was to be addreſſed, commanding that euery of them ſhould deliuer freely in his preſence their ſeuerall opinions: after which commandement the Biſhop of Oſimo who was his Confeſſor, ſpake in this maner:

Although (moſt glorious Prince) all things that happen in this inferiour world, proceed from the prouidence of the great God, and are thereby alwayes gouerned, yet this is ſometimes more manifeſtly ſeene in ſome particulars: but if euer it appeared manifeſtly in any thing, it hath bene ſeene and knowne in the preſent victorie. For both for the greatneſſe thereof, and the facilitie wherewith it was gotten, and to haue vanquiſhed verie puiſſant enemies, and much better furniſhed then your ſelfe of prouiſions neceſſarie for warre, no man can denie, but it was the expreſſe will of God, and almoſt a miracle. Now by how much his goodneſſe hath bene more manifeſt and more great, by ſo much the more is your Maieſtie bound to acknowledge it, and to declare how much you find your ſelfe bound vnto him: which conſiſteth principally in addreſſing the victorie to the exaltation of the ſeruice of God, and to the end for which it may be thought he hath caſt it vpon you. And certainly when I conſider into what termes the eſtate of Chriſtendome is reduced, I ſee nothing that can be more holy, more neceſſarie, or more pleaſing to God, then an vniuerſall peace among Chriſtian Princes; for that without this it is verie ſenſible that religion, pietie, and the manners of men will fall into manifeſt ruine. We haue the Turks on the one ſide, who haue wonne much vpon the Chriſtians by our diſcords, and do now threaten the kingdome of Hungarie which appertaineth to the huſband of your ſiſter, which if they get, as aſſuredly they will, if the Chriſtian Princes ioyne not themſelues together, the way into Germanie and Italy wil be open vnto them. On the other ſide we haue the Lutheran hereſie, ſo much offenſiue to God, ſo ignominious to thoſe that haue power to oppreſſe it, and ſo dangerous for all Princes, which hath now gotten ſuch footing, that if it be not reſtrained, the world will be filled with heretikes: neither can it be met with by any other meanes, then by your authoritie and puiſſance, which, ſo long as you ſhall be engaged in other warres, cannot be applied to the extirpation of this moſt pernicious poyſon. Moreouer, although for the preſent there were no feare either of the Turks or of heretiks, what can be more foule, more impious or pernicious, then for our paſſions to ſpill vnprofitably ſo much Chriſtian bloud, which might be glorioufly employed for the augmentation of the faith of Chriſt, or at leaſt reſerued for times more neceſſarie? chiefly ſeeing the ſame cannot be done without cõmitting of violations and whoredoms, without infinite ſacriledges and other execrable deeds? which are ſuch euils, as whoſoeuer is a voluntarie author of them, can looke for no pardon at Gods hand; and whoſoeuer by neceſſitie is the cauſe thereof, is not worthy to be excuſed, if at leaſt he reſolue not with himſelfe to remedie the ſame as ſoone as he can. Your end therefore, and the thing you ought to aime at, is an vniuerſall peace among Chriſtians, as a matter honorable, holy, and neceſſarie aboue all other things: the which we are now to conſider how it may be obtained. Your Maieſtie may take three deliberations touching the French king: the firſt, to keepe him a perpetuall priſoner: the ſecond, to deliuer him friendly and brotherly, without any other conditions then ſuch as may eſtabliſh a perpetuall peace and amitie between you, and cure the hurts of Chriſtendome: the third, to deliuer him, but to exact as great profit thereby as poſſibly you can: of which, if I be not deceiued, the other two do augment and prolong the warres; but an amiable and brotherly deliuerance is the onely remedie to remoue and extinguiſh them. For who can doubt, but that the French King (when ſo great generoſitie ſhall be vſed towards him, with ſuch ſingular liberalitie) will not for ſo great a benefite remaine more bound to you in his mind, and more at your command, then he is now in his bodie? and that if

betweene your ſelfe and him there be a true vnion and concord, all other Chriſtian Princes wil » follow the way which you two haue ſhewed them? But if you take a reſolution to detaine him » alwayes priſoner, beſides that ſuch a matter cannot be without great note of crueltie, and will » be taken for a ſigne of a man not knowing the power of fortune; will it not multiply one warre » vpon another? for that it wil be preſuppoſed that you haue a deſire to get either all or ſome part » of France, which cannot be done without new and very great warres. And to chuſe the middle » way, which is to deliuer him, but vnder capitulations for your moſt aduantage, I take it to be » the moſt intricate and dangerous way of all others. For, make what alliance, what capitu- » lations, and what obligations you will, yet he will be your enemie ſtill, and will neuer want the » aſſociation of all thoſe who feare your greatneſſe: ſo that new warres, and more bloudie and » dangerous then the former, are to be expected. I am not ignorant how farre this opinion diffe- » reth from the taſte of ordinarie men, neither how new it is, and without examples: but extraor- » dinarie and ſingular deliberations do well beſeeme the Emperour, and it is not to be wondred » at, if his mind be capable of ſuch conceptions as the capacitie of other men cannot reach vnto, » whom by how much he doth exceed in dignitie, by ſo much ought he to ſurmount thē in mag- » nanimitie, and therefore to know more then all others, how much ſo great generoſitie is reple- » niſhed with true glorie, and how much it is the dutie of the Emperour to pardon and vſe libera- » litie, rather then to be couetous in getting: that God hath not giuen him in vaine, yea almoſt » miraculouſly, the power to bring peace into the world: that it appertaineth vnto him, after ſo » many victories, after ſo many graces that God hath beſtowed vpon him, after he hath ſeene all » men proſtrate at his feete, to proceed no more as an enemie to any man, but to prouide as a » common father, for the ſafetie of all men. The magnanimitie which Alexander the Great and » Iulius Cæſar haue ſhewed in pardoning their enemies, and reſtoring kingdomes to thoſe they » had vanquiſhed, hath made their names more glorious then their infinite victories and many tri- » umphs: whoſe example it importeth him to follow, who not propoſing to himſelfe glorie for » the onely end (though it be a right great reward) deſireth principally to do that which is the true » and proper office of euery Chriſtian Prince. But to the end to conuince ſuch as meaſure humane » things onely by humane ends, let vs conſider further, if there remaine yet any other deliberation » more conformable to their end. Certainly I beleeue, that in all the greatneſſe of your » Maieſtie, there is no part more wonderfull nor more worthy, then this glorie, to haue bene e- » uen till this day inuincible, and to haue guided all your enterpriſes to a moſt happie end, with ſo » great proſperitie and reputation. It is without doubt the moſt precious iewell, and moſt ſingular » treaſure amongſt all your treaſures. Then how may it better be eſtabliſhed, how may it better be » aſſured, or more certainly kept, then in leauing the warres with an end ſo honourable and wor- » thy, & in taking out of the power of fortune the glorie gotten, and in reducing from the midſt » of the ſea to the port of ſafetie, this veſſell loaden with merchandize of ineſtimable value? But » let vs proceed. The greatneſſe which is preſerued willingly, is it not more to be deſired, then that » which is maintained by violence? No man doubts of it, for that it is more ſtable, more eaſie, » more plauſible, and more honorable. If the Emperour bind the French King to him by ſo great » a liberalitie, and by ſo great a benefite, ſhall he not be alwayes Maiſter and Lord both of him » and his kingdome? If he giue to the Pope and other Princes ſo manifeſt a certaintie, that he is » content with the Eſtates which he hath, and that he thinketh of no other thing then of an vni- » uerſall peace, will they not remaine without ſuſpition? And hauing no more any cauſe to feare » him, nor any quarrell with him, they will not onely loue, but alſo adore ſo great a bountie. By » this meanes, with the good wils of all, he ſhall giue lawes to all, and by this meanes preuaile » more without compariſon with Chriſtians by good will and authoritie, then with forces » and ſubiection: and he ſhall haue the meanes, being followed and aided of all men, to turne his » armes againſt the Lutherans and Infidels, with greater glorie, and with more occaſion of greater » conqueſts, the which I know not why they ſhould not be alſo deſired in Afrike, in Greece, or in » Leuant, although it were ſo eaſie to amplifie his dominion amongſt the Chriſtians, as many (in » my iudgment) do vainly imagine. For the power of your Maieſtie is ſo much augmented, that it » is almoſt become terrible to them all; and when they ſhall ſee your purpoſes extended further, » all the world will by neceſſitie vnite themſelues againſt you. The Pope redoubteth your power, » the Venetians ſtand in feare, all Italy is aſtoniſhed, and by the tokens that are diſcerned, it is cre- » dible that the King of England enuieth your felicitie. You may for certaine moneths entertaine »

cc the French men with faire hopes and vaine practiſes, but in the end the King muſt be deliuered, cc or they muſt be out of hope. If they deſpaire, they will ioyne with all the reſidue. And if you cc deliuer the King with conditions of litle profite to your Maieſtie, what ſhall you winne, to loſe cc the occaſion to vſe ſo great a magnanimitie? which if you expreſſe not at this beginning, when cc you would ſhew it hereafter, it will haue neither the like praiſe, glorie, nor grace. If you deliuer cc him with couenants profitable to your ſelfe, he will not obſerue them, for that no ſuretie that cc he ſhall giue you, can ſo much import him, but that it will import him much more not to haue cc his enemie to become ſo great, as afterwards he ſhall not be able to oppreſſe him. And ſo ſhall cc we haue either an vnprofitable peace, or verie dangerous wars, whoſe end is vncertaine; and the cc change of fortune is more to be feared of him who hath enioyed ſo long felicitie, and the griefe cc and heauineſſe farre greater when things ſucceed ill, to him who hath had power to aſſure all cc things. Me thinkes (moſt mightie Emperour) I haue ſatisfied your commandement, if not with cc wiſedome, yet at leaſt with affection and fidelitie; and now there remaineth nothing elſe but to cc beſeech God to inſpire you with a mind and facultie to make a deliberation which may be moſt
cc agreeable to his will, moſt for your owne glorie, and in the end may be moſt for the benefite cc of the commonweale of Chriſtendome, whereof both for your ſupreme dignitie, and for that cc it is apparent that ſuch is the will of God, it is neceſſarie that you be the father and defender.

The opinion of the Duke of Alba touching the Kings imprisonment.

This counſell was heard of the Emperour with great attention, without declaring by any ſigne, whether he allowed or condemned it: but after he had pawſed a while, giuing the ſigne to the reſidue to ſpeake, Federike Duke of Alba, a man of great authoritie with the Emperour, roſe vp and ſpake in this ſort: I deſire to be excuſed (moſt inuincible Emperour) if I confeſſe
cc that my iudgement differeth not from the cõmon iudgment of others, nor my wit able to pierce
cc into ſuch things as the vnderſtanding of others cannot reach vnto: yea haply I may deſerue more cc commendations, if I perſwade you to follow the ſame way which your fathers and elders haue cc alwayes taken. For new and vnuſuall counſels may haply at the firſt ſight ſeeme more glorious cc and magnanimous, but, without doubt, are in the end found more dangerous and deceitfull cc then ſuch as at all times haue bene approued of all men by reaſon and experience. The will of cc God principally, and next the valour of your Captaines and armie, haue giuen you the greateſt cc victorie that any Chriſtian Prince hath gotten of a very long time; but all the fruite of the victocc rie conſiſteth in the well vſing of the ſame, which whoſoeuer doth not, incurreth an infamie ſo cc much the greater then not to know how to ouercome, by how much it is a greater fault cc to be deceiued by the things that are in a mans power, then by thoſe that depend vpon fortune.
cc Wherefore ſo much the more heed is to be taken not to make a deliberation which in the end
cc may cauſe ſhame before others, and repentance to your ſelfe: and by how much more weightie cc the matter is that is treated of, ſo much the more circumſpectly ought it to be proceeded in, and cc thoſe deliberations to be maturely made, wherein the faults that are once committed cannot cc afterwards be amended: and it is to be conſidered, that if the King be deliuered, he may no lon-cc ger be retained; but ſo long as he remaineth your priſoner, it is alwayes in your power to giue cc him libertie; and if there be no haſte made to deliuer him, he cannot maruell at it, for that if I cc be not deceiued, he knoweth well in his owne conſcience how he would vſe the Emperour if he cc were his priſoner. Truly it was a very great thing to take the French King, but who ſo conſidereth cc the matter well, ſhall find, that it would proue a farre greater matter without compariſon, to let cc him go: and it will neuer be eſteemed a wiſe action, to make a deliberation of ſo great conſe-cc quence without good and long conſultation, and without hauing infinitely reuolued it in the cc mind. And haply I ſhould not be of this opinion, if I could be perſwaded that the King being cc preſently deliuered, would acknowledge ſo great a benefite as he ought, and that the Pope and cc the other Potentates of Italy would lay aſide their ſuſpition, together with their couetouſneſſe cc and ambition. But who knoweth not how dangerous it is to ground a reſolution of ſo great cc importance vpon a preſuppoſition ſo vntrue and vncertaine? He that diligently conſidereth cc the natures and manners of men, will iudge the contrary, for that ordinarily there is nothing cc of leſſe continuance then the remembrance of benefites receiued; and by how much they are cc greater, by ſo much the more (according to the prouerbe) are they payed with ingratitude, ſee-cc ing that he who either cannot or will not efface them with recompence, ſeeketh oftentimes to cc deface them with forgetfulneſſe, or at leaſt to extenuate them, in perſwading themſelues that cc they were not ſo great: and ſuch as are aſhamed to be brought to that paſſe, that they haue ſtood

in

in need of a benefit, are alſo diſcontent to haue receiued it: ſo that hatred is more powerfull in them for the remembrance of the neceſſitie wherein they were fallen, then thankfulneſſe in reſpect of the fauours that was vſed towards them. Moreouer, to whom is inſolence more naturall and lightneſſe more familiar then to the French men? But where inſolencie is, there is inconſideration, and where is lightneſſe, there is no knowledge of vertue, no iudgement to diſcerne of the actions of others, nor grauitie to meaſure that which concerneth themſelues. What then can be hoped for in a French King, filled with as great preſumption as may enter into any King of the French men, but that he burneth in diſdaine and rage to be priſoner to the Emperour, in a time when he hoped to haue triumphed ouer him? He will haue alwayes before his eyes, the remembrance of this infamie, and being deliuered, he will neuer beleeue that the meanes to quench it, is acknowledgement, but he will alwayes ſtriue to be ſuperiour, and perſwade himſelf that you haue let him go for the difficultie to retaine him, and not through your bountie and magnanimitie. Such is for the moſt part the nature of men, and ſuch hath bene alwayes the condition of the French men, from whom who ſo looketh for conſtancie or magnanimitie, expecteth a new order and rule in humane things. For peace therefore, and in ſtead of reducing the world into order, there will be cauſed greater warres and more dangerous then the former: for that your reputation will be leſſened, and your armie, which now expecteth the fruite due for ſo great a victorie, being deceiued of their hopes, will haue no more the ſame vertue and vigor, nor your affaires the ſame fortune, who is hardly holden by him that retaineth her, and much leſſe will ſhe tarrie with ſuch as chaſe her away. Neither will the Pope and the Venetians be much better, but repenting themſelues to haue ſuffered you to go away with the victorie paſt, they will ſeeke to hinder thoſe that are to come: and the feare they haue now of you, will compell them to vſe all their endeuour, to the end not to returne into a new feare: and whereas you haue now in your power to hold all men bound and aſtoniſhed, your ſelfe with an inconſiderate bountie will be he that will vnbind them and giue them heart. I know not what is the will of God, neither do I thinke others can reach to the knowledge of it, for that it is vſually ſaid, that his iudgements are ſecret and deepe: but if any coniecture can be made by that which appeareth ſo clearely, I beleeue that he fauoureth your greatneſſe, and cannot beleeue that he extendeth his graces vpon you in ſo great abundance, to the end you ſhould diſſipate them of your ſelfe, but thereby to make you ſuperiour to others, as well in effect, as you are in title and right: and certainly to loſe ſo rare an occaſion which God ſendeth you, would be no other thing then to tempt him, and make you vnworthy of his grace. Reaſon hath alwayes taught, and experience doth well confirme it, that things which depend vpon the counſels of many, do neuer ſucceed well: therefore I know not whether he meaſure rightly the nature of the world, who thinkes himſelfe able to roote out the Heretikes or ſuppreſſe the Infidels by the vnion of many Princes. Theſe are enterpriſes that haue need of a Prince ſo mightie and great, as to be able to giue lawes to others. If that be not conſidered, they will be debated and performed hereafter with the ſame ſucceſſe, wherewith they haue bene debated and acted heretofore. I beleeue that for this cauſe God ſends you ſo great victories, and that for the ſame reaſon he hath opened you the way to the Monarchie, whereby onely ſo great and holy effects may be performed: and it is beſt to be ſlow to giue the firſt beginnings, to the end to accompliſh them with better and more certaine foundations. Let not the feare of ſo many leagues as are contracted, eſtrange you from this deliberation, for as much as the occaſion which you haue in your hand, is very great; and if things be well negociated, the Kings mother, for her affection to her ſonne, and for the neceſſitie to recouer his libertie, will neuer caſt off her hopes to redeeme him of you by accord; neither will the Princes of Italy euer ioyne themſelues with the gouernment of France, who knowing that it is alwaies in your power, by deliuering the King, not onely to ſeparate him from them, but alſo to turne him againſt them, they will remaine aſtoniſhed and in ſuſpence, to the end they may be the firſt to receiue lawes of you, towards whom it will be a glorious thing to vſe clemencie and magnanimitie, when matters ſhall be reduced to that degree, as they cannot chuſe but acknowledge you for ſuperiour. Alexander and Cæſar did euen ſo, who were forward to pardon iniuries, but not raſh and inconſiderate, to bring themſelues againe into thoſe difficulties and dangers which they had already ſurmounted. He that doth thus, deſerueth praiſe, for that he doth an act which hath very few examples; but haply he is vnwiſe who doth that which hath no example. Therfore (moſt inuincible Emperour)

" I am of opinion, that there be as great profite made of this victorie as possibly there may, and " that to this end, the King (whom you may alwayes vse with such honours as belong to a King) " if he cannot be sent into Spaine, at least might be conueyed into Naples: and that for answer " to his letter, there may be a man sent vnto him with very gracious words, who should propound " vnto him conditions of his deliuerance, such as (vpon more particular consultation) may be a " worthy recompence and reward of so great a victorie. Thus, these foundations being layed, " and you propounding such ends, time and the accidents which will be discouered, will make ei- " ther more quick or more slow the deliuerie of the King, and wil beget occasions of peace or war " with the Italians, to whō for the present good hopes may be giuen, & the fauour and reputation " of armes augmented as much as may be with art and industrie, to the end not to proue euery " day a new fortune, and that we may be readie to accord either with this or that Prince, either " with all together, or with none, as occasion shal counsel vs. These be the wayes which wise Prin- " ces haue alwayes followed, and particularly those who haue left to you the foundations of such " a greatnesse: who haue neuer reiected the occasions to raise themselues, nor any way let slip the " fauour of fortune when they saw her well disposed towards them: the same also ought you " to doe, to whom by right appertaine those things which in any of your predecessors may be " said to be ambition. Remember your selfe (most noble Emperour) that you are a Prince, and " that it is your dutie to imitate Princes, and that there is no reason either diuine or humane that " perswadeth you to leaue the occasion to restore the authoritie of the Empire, vsurped and op- " pressed, yea that bindeth you not wholly to stirre vp your mind to recouer it rightfully: and re- " member aboue all, how easily occasions are lost, and how difficultly they are gotten, and there- " fore whilest you haue them, it is necessary to do all your endeuour to retaine them, and not to " build vpon the goodnesse or wisdome of the vanquished, seeing the world is full of folly and wic- " kednesse. And further, seeing the estate of Christendome cannot be defended by any other " meanes then by your greatnesse, faile not to increase it as much as you can, not so much for the " interest of your owne authoritie and glorie, as for the seruice of God, and zeale of the publike " good.

It cannot be expressed with what fauour of all the Councell, the Duke of Alba was heard, euery one hauing already propounded in his mind the Empire of all Christendome: so that there was not one amongst them who without reply did not confirme his opinion, which the Emperour himselfe also approued, though more not to seeme to swerue from the counsell of his friends, then in disclosing his owne inclination. Then Monsieur Beaurain who lay in his chamber, and was much in his fauour, was dispatched to make his deliberation knowne to the Captaines, and in his name to visite the French King, and to propound vnto him the conditions whereby he might obtaine his deliuerance: and taking his way by land (for the Kings mother hindred not the passage of messengers and posts to come and go to the Emperours Court, for the more easie negociation of the affaires of her sonne) he went together with the Duke of Bourbon and the Viceroy to Pisqueton, where the King remained as yet, and offered him his libertie, but with such and so hard conditions, that the very hearing of them was grieuous to the King. For, besides the giuing ouer of the rights which the King pretended in Italy, the Emperour demanded that he should render vnto him the Duchie of Burgondie as properly appertaining to him, and to giue Prouence to the Duke of Bourbon: and he required besides, that he should accord as well for himselfe as for the King of England, to other conditions of very great importance. To which demands the King answered constantly, that he had rather offer vp his life in prison, then to depriue his children of any part of the Realme of France, and though he should determine otherwise, that it was not in his power to execute it: for that the ancient constitutions of France suffered not to alienate any thing belonging to the Crowne without the consent of the Parliaments, and others in whose hands rested the authoritie of the whole kingdome, who in like cases were wont to preferre the vniuersall safetie afore the particular interest of the persons of their Kings: That they should demand things that were in his power, and then they should find him most ready to ioyne with the Emperour, and to fauour his greatnesse: and from that time forward he ceassed not to offer diuers conditions, making no difficultie to accord largely touching the Estates of others to obtaine his libertie, without promising any thing of his owne. In the end, he offered to take to wife the Emperours sister, who remained a widow by the death of the King of Portugal, with acknowledgment to hold Burgondie as her dowrie, and that it should ſhould appertaine to the children iſſuing of that mariage: That he would reſtore to the Duke of Bourbon the Duchie that had bene confisked from him, and would adde thereto ſome other Eſtate: and in recompence of the Emperours ſiſter who had bene promiſed to him, he would giue him his ſiſter, a late widow by the deceaſſe of Monſieur d'Alenſon: That he would ſatisfie the King of England with money, and that he would giue a great ſumme to the Emperour for his ranſome: That he would yeeld vp vnto him his rights in the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan: That he would promiſe to accompanie him, both with a nauie by ſea and an armie by land, at ſuch time as he ſhould go to Rome to take the Crowne Imperiall, which was as much as if he ſhould promiſe to giue him in prey the whole Monarchie of Italy. Monſieur Beaurain returned with theſe capitulations to the Emperour, and there went with him Monſieur Montmorancie, a perſonage then very acceptable to the King, and afterwards made by him great Maiſter, and at length great Conſtable of France.

But when the newes came into France of the ouerthrow of the armie, and the taking of the King, the aſtoniſhment and deſpaire of all men was ſo great, as it is almoſt impoſſible to be imagined. For, beſides the incredible ſorrow which the pitifull accident of the King brought to that nation, naturally very deuout and affectionate to their Kings, there appeared infinite mournings and heauineſſe, as well publike as priuate: priuate, for that as well of thoſe of the Court as of the Nobilitie, there were very few who had not loſt in the battell, their children, their brethren, or other their kindred and friends of qualitie: publike, for ſo great a diminution of the authoritie and glorie of ſo flouriſhing a Realme: which was ſo much the more grieuous vnto them, by how much naturally they are haughtie and preſuming of themſelues, and for that they feared leſt ſo great a calamitie would be the beginning of a greater ruine, the King being priſoner, and with him either taken or ſlaine in the battell, the heads of the gouernment, and almoſt all the chiefe Captaines, and the Realme exhauſted of money, and enuironed with moſt mightie enemies. For the King of England, notwithſtanding he had holden many treaties, and ſhewed in many things the inconſtancie of his mind, yet a litle before the battell he had cut off all the negociations which he had entertained with the King, and publiſhed that he would paſſe into France if the things of Italy tooke any good ſucceſſe. Therefore it was much feared leſt in ſo great an oportunitie the Emperour and he would raiſe warre againſt France, either for that there was no other Gouernour then a woman and the litle children of the King, of whom the eldeſt was not yet eight yeares of age; or becauſe the enemies had with them the Duke of Bourbon, who was a puiſſant Prince, of ſo great authoritie in the Realme of France, that any ſtirre they ſhould make, would be very dangerous. And alſo among ſo many afflictions which the Ladie Regent ſuffered, as well for the loue of her ſonne, as for the dangers of the Realme, ſhe was not without her proper and particular paſſions: for that being full of ambition, and very deſirous of gouernment, ſhe feared that if the Kings deliuerie were prolonged, or that any new difficultie happened in France, ſhe ſhould be conſtrained to yeeld vp the adminiſtration to ſuch as ſhould be deputed by the Realme. Yet in ſo great aſtoniſhments, ſhe and ſuch as were about her, hauing taken heart, beſides ỳ they fortified the frontiers of the Realme with all the diligence that could be, and cauſed good prouiſion of money to be made, the Ladie Regent, in whoſe name all expeditions and diſpatches went out, wrote to the Emperor letters full of humilitie and compaſſion, propounding, and afterwards ſoliciting from hand to hand, as much as ſhe could, the practiſes of accord; by vertue whereof, hauing a litle after deliuered Don Hugo de Moncado, ſhe ſent him to the Emperour, to offer him, that her ſonne ſhould renounce all rights to the kingdome of Naples and the Eſtate of Millan, and ſhould be content to referre to the cenſure and arbitration of the law, to whom the right of Burgondie appertained, and if it belonged to the Emperour, to acknowledge it for the dowrie of his ſiſter: That he ſhould render to Monſieur Bourbon his Eſtate, together with his moueables and goods, which were of great value, and the fruites and reuenues which had bin leuied by the cõmiſſioners deputed by the Regall chamber, and that he ſhould giue to him his ſiſter in mariage, and conſent that he ſhould haue Prouence, if it were found and iudged that he had better right thereto. And to the end theſe practiſes might be the more eaſie, rather then for any deſire ſhe had to hearken to warre, ſhe diſpatched immediatly Embaſſadours into Italy, to recommend to the Pope and the Venetians the ſafetie of her ſonne, offering that if for their proper ſecuritie they would contract with her, and raiſe armes againſt the Emperour, to furniſh for her part fiue hundred Lances, and to contribute a great ſumme of money. But the principall deſire, as well of her, as of the whole Realme of France, was; to appeaſe the King of England, iudging (as the truth was) that if they had not him for enemie, the Realme of France ſhould remaine without moleſtation; but if he on the one ſide, and the Emperour on the other, ſhould raiſe armes, hauing with them the Duke of Bourbon and ſo many occaſions, that all things would be full of difficulties and dangers. Now it happened that the Ladie Regent began to diſcerne ſome good hope hereof: for notwithſtanding the King of England immediatly after the firſt newes of the victorie, had expreſſed great tokens of gladnes, and publiſhed that he would paſſe in perſon into France, and withall had ſent Embaſſadours to the Emperour to ſolicite and treate of the mouing of warre ioyntly together; yet proceeding at that time after the ſame maner that he vſed at other times, he ſent to the Ladie Regent, to diſpatch to him a man expreſſe, which was preſently accompliſhed, and that with verie large commiſſions, vſing all ſubmiſſions and meanes poſſible to appeaſe the mind of that King, who gouerning himſelfe alwayes by the counſell of the Cardinall of Yorke, made ſhew that his principall end was, to take ſuch knowledge of the controuerſies that were betweene other Princes, that all the world might acknowledge that the conſummation of great affaires depended of him. And for this cauſe he offered to the Emperour at the ſame time to deſcend into France with a puiſſant armie, to giue perfection to the alliance concluded formerly betweene them; and to remoue all ſuſpition, he offered preſently to deliuer vnto him his daughter, who was not as yet at age fit for mariage. But in theſe matters he found very great difficulties, depending partly vpon himſelfe, and partly vpon the Emperour, who was not now ſo forward to contract with him as he had bene before. For that King demanded for himſelfe almoſt all the rewards of the victorie, as Normandie, Guyen, and Gaſcoigne, with the title of King of France: and that the Emperour, notwithſtanding things were ſo far vnequall, ſhould paſſe himſelf into France, and participate equally in the expences and dangers. The inequalitie of theſe conditiõs troubled much the mind of the Emperour, and that ſo much the more, for the remembrance that in the yeares next before, he had alwayes deferred to make warre in the greateſt dangers of the French King: ſo that he perſwaded himſelfe he could make no foundation vpon that confederation: and being much drained of money and treaſure, and wearied with ſo many dangers, he hoped to obtaine more from the French King by the meanes of peace, then by armes and warre in ioyning with the King of England: and likewiſe he made not that account which he was wont to do of the mariage of his daughter who was yet vnder age, for whoſe dowrie that money was to be reckoned which he had borrowed of the King of England: but being puſhed on with a deſire to haue children, and coueting to get money, he was deſirous to marrie the ſiſter of John King of Portugal, who was ready for mariage, and with whom he hoped to receiue for her dowrie a verie great ſumme of money; and many of his peoples alſo offered in caſe the mariage went forward, to giue him a beneuolence: ſuch was their deſire to haue a Queene of the ſame nation and language, and that would preſently bring forth children. So that the negociation becoming euery day more difficult betweene both theſe Princes, and the ordinarie inclination of the Cardinall of Yorke towards the French King being added thereunto, together with the open complaints againſt the Emperour, as well for the intereſts of his King, as for that he thought the Emperor began to make ſmall account of him: who being accuſtomed afore the battel of Pauie, neuer to ſend vnto him any letters, but ſuch as were written with his owne hand, and ſubſcribed, Your ſonne and couſin Charles; but after the victorie he began to cauſe letters to be written vnto him, wherein was nothing of his owne hand but the ſubſcription, no more full of titles of ſo great reuerence and ſubmiſſion, but onely with his owne name Charles. All theſe things were the cauſe that the king of England (who receiued with very gracious words and demonſtrations the man ſent by the Ladie Regent, and encouraged him to hope wel of the time to come) wholy giuing ouer the negociations betweene him and the Emperour, he made a confederation with the Ladie Regent, contracting in the name of her ſonne, wherein he would haue inſerted this expreſſe condition, that for the Kings deliuerie there ſhould not be giuen to the Emperour any thing that at that time was in the power of the Crowne of France. This was the firſt hope of ſafetie which the Realme of France began to receiue, and this was the firſt conſolation in ſo many aduerſities, which was continually augmented by the diſorders of the Imperials in Italy: who becoming moſt inſolent for ſo great a victorie, and perſwading themſelues that all men and all difficulties ſhould giue way to their will, they loſt the occaſion to accord with the Venetians,

and ſwarued from that which they had promiſed to the Pope, and filled the Duchie of Millan and all Italy with ſuſpition, ſowing the ſeeds of new troubles, which in the end brought the Emperour into a neceſſitie to make a raſh deliberation, to the great danger of his Eſtate in Italy, if his ancient felicitie, and the hard fortune and deſtinie of the Pope, had not bene of greater force: matters aſſuredly moſt worthy of particular knowledge, to the end that of ſuch and ſo memorable accidents the foundations and counſels may be vnderſtood, which being oftentimes hid, are for the moſt part publiſhed farre from the truth thereof. The Pope then had ſcarcely capitulated with the Viceroy, when the great offers of France to ſtirre him vp to the warre, were preſented vnto him: and although he wanted not the perſwaſions of many to the ſame effect; & that the diſtruſt which he had before of the Imperials was not diminiſhed, yet he determined to proceed ſo in all things, as he would giue no cauſe to either of them to ſuſpect him for his actions. Therefore as ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Viceroy had accepted and publiſhed the contract made at Rome, he alſo cauſed it to be publiſhed in S. Iohn de Latran, without tarrying till the ratification of the Emperour which was promiſed him, were come: and the better to demonſtrate his intention, he honored with his preſence, and with the ſolemnitie of his coronation, the publication which was made the firſt day of May, and ſolicited the Florentines to make paiment of the money promiſed, interpoſing as much as he could to draw the Venetians alſo to enter appointment with the Imperials. But on the other ſide, they gaue him many iuſt cauſes to complaine, for as much as in the payment of the money promiſed, they would not accept the fiue and twentie thouſand duckats payed by the Florentines by his appointment, whileſt the accord was in debating, the Viceroy alledging impudently, that if other promiſe were made, it was done without his commiſſion: and alſo they retired not their ſouldiers from off the lands of the Church, but filled the townes of Plaiſance with garriſons. To theſe things, which in ſome ſort might haply be excuſed by their want of money, and neceſſitie of harbour and lodging, was added, that not onely in the mutation of the ſtate of Sienna, they gaue ſuſpition to beare a mind eſtranged from the Pope, but alſo they ſuffered afterwards the Citizens of Montenouo to be ill intreated and ſpoiled of their goods by the Libertines, notwithſtanding that the Pope complaining oftentimes thereof, they gaue him hope to remedie it. But that which vexed him moſt of all, was that the Viceroy ſuddenly gaue eare to the Duke of Ferrara, and put him in hope not to force him to leaue Reggia and Rubiera, & to induce the Emperor to take his Eſtates into protection, notwithſtanding he dayly made promiſes to the Pope, that when the Florentines had performed to pay that which they ought, he would reeſtabliſh him in thoſe townes: and that the Pope, the better to ſolicite the effects of theſe promiſes and hopes, and alſo to obtaine to haue the companies of men of warre to retire from the territories of the Church, had ſent vnto him the Cardinall Saluiati, his Legate in Lombardie and Deputie Legate with the Emperour, to whom the Viceroy ſaid that he had determined to procure the reſtitution of Reggia by force of armes, if the Duke refuſed to render it voluntarily. But the effects were not anſwerable to his words; which matter being not to be excuſed by the neceſſitie of money, for that vpon the rendring of thoſe townes there grew to them a greater quantitie, gaue cauſe to conceiue that in all likelihood that matter proceeded either of a deſire they had of his embaſement, or elſe to winne the Duke of Ferrara, or to be alwayes the more readie and prepared for the oppreſſing of Italy. Theſe matters brought to the Pope a ſuſpition and griefe of mind almoſt incredible, but much more for that he eſteemed ſuch actions to be nothing different from the intention of the Emperour, who hauing diſpatched to the Pope letters of ratification of the confederation made in his name by the Viceroy, deferred to confirme the three articles accorded apart from the capitulation: alledging touching the reſtitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, that he might not preiudice the rights of the Empire, nor force that Duke, who proteſted to hold them in fee of the Empire, and therefore offered to referre that controuerſie to the triall of law, or to a friendly compoſition. And it was eaſily comprehended, that he could haue bene contented they ſhould ſtill haue remained to the Duke vnder his inueſtiture, paying him for the ſame an hundred thouſand duckats, and as much to the Pope for the inueſtiture of Ferrara and the penaltie appointed by the contract which he had made with Adrian. He alledged, that it was a thing impertinent to accord with his officers touching the furniſhing of the Duchie of Millan with ſalt, becauſe the ſoueraigne profite of that Dukedome, by reaſon of the inueſtiture agreed vpon, although not as yet conſigned, appertained to Francis Sforce; and therefore the Viceroy was not ſimply bound by that article to compell him to take it from Ceruia, but to do what he could to induce him to conſent thereto, and that that promiſe, for that it contained the action of a third perſon, was notoriouſly of no force touching the effect to bind either himſelfe or another: and yet for the deſire he had to gratifie the Pope, he had endeuoured to induce the Duke to conſent thereto, if the matter had not become no more his owne intereſt, but the intereſt of another, ſeeing the Duke of Millan in recompence of the ſuccours which the Archduke had ſent him, had already couenanted to take ſalt of him: and yet notwithſtanding, he ſaid he would interpoſe and do all he could to induce his brother (receiuing recompence of money) to accord and conſent to it, yet not for euer, as the article expreſſeth, but during the Popes life. He would not admit alſo the article of matters touching Benefices, vnleſſe to that which was expreſſed in the inueſtitures, were ioyned ſuch things as had bene obſerued by his predeceſſors Kings of Naples. In regard of theſe difficulties, the Pope would not accept the letters of ratification, nor ſend his to the Emperour, and demanded that ſeeing the Emperour had not ratified within the terme of foure moneths according to the promiſe of the Viceroy, that the hundred thouſand duckats might be reſtored to the Florentines: which demand was anſwered rather with cauillations, then with firme and good foundations: that the condition of reſtitution of the hundred thouſand duckats was not ſet downe in the inſtrument, but promiſed in an article apart by the Viceroys Agents by oath, and that it belonged not to the ratification of the league, which the Emperour had ratified within the terme of foure moneths, and ſent letters in due forme. Moreouer, the Pope was aduertiſed that the Emperours Court was vniuerſally ill diſpoſed to the eſtate of Italy, and he knew alſo that the Captaines of his armie went about to perſwade him, that to aſſure himſelfe abſolutely of Italy, it were good to cauſe Modena to be rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, to repoſſeſſe the family of the Bentiuoleis of Bolognia, and to take the iuriſdiction of Florence, of Sienna, and of Lucques, as townes appertaining to the Empire: ſo that being full of doubt and ſuſpition, and hauing not whereon to rely, knowing alſo that the French men offered the Emperour to giue him Italy in prey, he was conſtrained by neceſſitie to temporize and diſſemble.

A treatie of accord betweene the Viceroy and the Venetians.

At this time the accord betweene the Viceroy and the Venetians was ſolicited continually, wherein beſides that the Viceroy ſought to bind the Venetians againe to the defence of the Duchie of Millan, he demanded a very great ſumme of money to ſatisfie their fault of inobſeruation of the confederation paſſed. There were many reaſons which enclined the Venetians to giue place to neceſſitie, and many which on the contrary incited them to remaine in ſuſpence: ſo that their counſels were full of varietie and irreſolution. In the end, after many diſputes, the Venetians being aſtoniſhed as wel as others for ſo great a victorie of the Emperor, & to ſee themſelues to remaine alone on all ſides, they ſent commiſſion to Peter of Peſera their Embaſſadour reſident with the Viceroy, to confirme the league in the ſame manner it had bene made afore, paying notwithſtanding to the Emperour foureſcore thouſand duckats for ſatisfaction of matters paſt: but the Viceroy anſwering them reſolutely, that he would not renew the confederation, vnleſſe they payed an hundred thouſand duckats, it happened (as oftentimes it chanceth in matters which are vnwillingly deliberated) that ſo much time was ſpent in diſputing and debating for this litle ſumme, that the Venetians had aduertiſement that the King of England ſhewed himſelfe no more ſo hote againſt the French as was feared in the beginning, and that in the Imperiall armie they had already payed and diſmiſſed many Lanceknights; the Senate aſſuring themſelues to receiue no vexation for the preſent, determined to dwell as yet in ſuſpence, and to reſerue in themſelues (as much as they could) power to take ſuch deliberations, as by the generall euent of things they ſhould know to be the beſt.

The perſon of the Frēch king led priſoner into Spaine.

Theſe things incited the Viceroy and the other Captaines ſo much the more, beſides the deſire which they had alwayes had to tranſport the perſon of the French King into a place of ſuretie, iudging that for the ill diſpoſition of others, they could not keepe him in the Duchie of Millan without perill. Therefore they reſolued to conuey him to Genes, and from thence by ſea to Naples, to keepe him within Newcaſtle, where they had alreadie prepared his lodging: whereat the King was maruellouſly grieued, who from the beginning had vehemently deſired to be caried into Spaine, for the opinion he had (haply meaſuring others by his owne nature, or for that men eaſily deceiue themſelues in the things they deſire) that if once he might come in preſence of the Emperour, either through his benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer, offer, he ſhould eaſily be deliuered. The Viceroy was of the ſame deſire, for the augmentation of his own glorie, but for as much as he was retained by a feare of the French armie by ſea; Monſieur Montmorancie went by common conſent to the Ladie Regent, and when ſhe had granted him ſixe light galleys of thoſe that lay in the port of Marſeilles, vpon promiſe to haue them reſtored as ſoone as the King was arriued in Spaine, he returned with the galleys to Portofino, where the Kings perſon was already arriued; and theſe being ioyned to ſixteene galleys of the Emperour, which was the nauie appointed at firſt to conduct him to Naples, when they were armed with Spaniſh footmen, they tooke ſuch a courſe the ſeuenteenth day of Iune (not onely the Princes of Italy, but alſo the Emperours Captaines and the Duke of Bourbon, holding for certaine that the King ſhould be conueyed to Naples) that with a happie voyage they arriued the eight day at Roſa a hauen of Catalognia, to the great ioy of the Emperour, who till that day had vnderſtood nothing of that reſolution: & as ſoone as he had knowledge thereof, he ſent commandement that in all places where he ſhould paſſe, he ſhould be receiued with great honours, and gaue charge neuertheleſſe that vntill it were otherwiſe determined, he ſhould be kept in the Caſtle of Sciatiua neare to Valence, where anciently the Kings of Aragon vſed to keep great perſonages, and wherein the Duke of Calabria had lately bene kept priſoner for many yeares. But this deliberation ſeeming to the Viceroy too rigorous, and farre differing from the promiſes he had made to the King in Italy, he procured by letters from the Emperour, that vntill he tooke other order, he might be kept neare Valence, in a place apt for hunting and other delights: where when he had lodged him with ſufficient guard, vnder the charge of Captaine Alarcon, in whoſe cuſtodie he had alwayes remained, he went together with Montmorancie to the Emperour, to report vnto him the eſtate of Italy, and the things which till that day had bene debated with the King, perſwading him with many reaſons to come to accord with him, for that he could haue no faithfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians: ſo that the Emperour after he had heard the Viceroy and Montmorancie, determined that the King ſhould be brought into Caſtile to the Caſtle of Madrill, a place farre remoued from the ſea and the confines of France, where being honoured with ceremonies and reuerences agreeable to ſo great a Prince, he ſhould neuertheleſſe be kept vnder carefull and ſtrait guard, except that it was lawfull for him to iſſue out of the fortreſſe certaine times of the day, mounted vpon a Mule: and the Emperour would not conſent that the King ſhould be admitted into his preſence, vntill the accord were eſtabliſhed, or reduced to an aſſured hope of reſolution: the which to the end it might be negociated by an honorable perſonage, and one who was in a maner all one with the King, Montmorancie was ſent in great diligence into France, to bring the Ducheſſe of Alenſon the Kings ſiſter who was a widow, with fulneſſe of authoritie to debate and contract: and to the end the accord might not be hindered by new difficulties, there was made a litle after a truce vntill the end of December, betweene the Emperour and the gouernment of France. Moreouer, the Emperour gaue order that part of thoſe galleys which were come with the Viceroy, ſhould returne into Italy to bring the Duke of Bourbon into Spaine, without whoſe preſence he affirmed he would make no conuention: which galleys notwithſtanding for want of money were diſpatched ſomewhat ſlowly. And ſhewing himſelfe vehemently diſpoſed to eſtabliſh an vniuerſall peace among Chriſtians, and purpoſing at the ſame time to giue ſome forme to the affaires of Italy, he inſtantly ſolicited the Pope to haſten away the Cardinall Saluiati, or others with ſufficient authoritie: and when he had excuſed himſelfe to the King of England, that he could not reſiſt the will of his people, he ſent alſo Lopes Vrtado to the Pope, for a diſpenſation to marrie the infant of Portugal his couſin german, who by that meanes was conioyned to him in the ſecond degree, whom he had already reſolued to take to wife. He ſent by the ſame Lopes, who departed in the end of Iuly, the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan to Francis Sforce, with this condition, that he ſhould promiſe preſently to pay an hundred thouſand duckats, and be bound to pay fiue hundred thouſand more at diuers termes, and to take the trade of ſalts of the Archduke his brother: and the ſaid Lopes carried alſo a commiſſion, that except the regiments of Spaniſh footmen who were beſtowed in the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa, all the others ſhould be diſmiſſed: and that ſixe hundred men at armes ſhould returne to the Realme of Naples, and the reſidue remaine in the Duchie of Millan: and that the Marquis of Peſquiero ſhould be Captaine generall of the armie. The Emperour added to this commiſſion, that certaine money which he had ſent to Genes to arme foure Caricks, with intention ſpeedily to paſſe in perſon into Italy, ſhould be conuerted to the neceſſities of the armie, for that he was now determined not to depart out of Spaine: and that the Protonotarie Caracciol ſhould go from Millan to Venice in the name of the Emperour, to induce that Senate to a new confederation, or at leaſt leaue all men ſatisfied that all his actions tended to the vniuerſall peace of Chriſtendome. But the going of the French king into Spaine, brought no litle perplexitie to the Pope and the Venetians. For the Emperors armie being much diminiſhed, they ſuppoſed ẏ into what part ſoeuer of Italy the Kings perſon ſhold be tranſported, the neceſſitie to guard him well would much trouble the Imperials; ſo ẏ either there might eaſily ariſe ſome occaſion to deliuer him, or at leaſt a difficultie to carrie him into Spaine; and the litle ſuretie to keepe him in Italy, would conſtraine the Emperour to giue ſome honeſt forme to the generall affaires. But when they ſaw he was gone into Spaine, and that himſelfe being diſappointed of his vaine hopes, had giuen meanes to the enemies to leade him into a ſure priſon, they diſcerned that all treaties and negociations were wholly in the hands of the Emperour, and that there could no foundation be eſtabliſhed vpon the practiſes and offers of the French: in ſo much as the reputation of the Emperour increaſing dayly, men began to expect from his Court and fr ōhis hand laws and rules for all affaires. And I know not whether the diſpleaſure were leſſe which the Duke of Bourbon & the Marquis of Peſquiero took (but for diuers cauſes) for that the Viceroy tooke vpon him without their priuitie to leade the French King into Spaine. The Duke of Bourbon, for that ſeeing himſelfe chaſed out of France for the alliance with the Emperour, he had more intereſt then any other to haue a hand in all practiſes of accord: in regard whereof he determined to paſſe into Spaine, and yet he was driuen to ſtay longer then willingly he would, for that he tarried for the returne of the galleys that carried the Viceroy. The Marquis, being angrie for the ſmall eſtimation which the Viceroy made of him, and alſo diſcontented with the Emperour, for that he was not ſo thankfull as appertained to his merites and the many ſeruices he had done him in the laſt warres, and ſpecially in the battell of Pauie, for which victorie albeit he had deſerued more praiſe and glorie then all the other Captaines, yet he iudged that the Emperour had transferred the whole reputation to the Viceroy, with many praiſes and demonſtrations: which the Marquis being not able to endure, he wrote letters to the Emperour full of detraction againſt the Viceroy, complaining that wrongfully and without cauſe he had bene ſo much deſpiſed by him, as not to be thought worthy at leaſt to be made priuie to ſuch a reſolution: and that if in the warre and dangers thereof, the deliberation of things had bene referred to the counſell and aduice of the Viceroy, the French King had not onely not bene taken, but as ſoone as Millan was loſt, the Imperiall armie abandoning the defence of Lombardie, had retired to Naples: That the Viceroy was gone to triumph of a victorie, wherein it was well knowne to the whole armie, he had no part at all: and that in the heate of the battell, being without courage or counſel, there were many that heard him crie diuers times, We are vndone: the which if he would denie, he offered to iuſtifie, with weapon in hand, according to the lawes of warre. The Marquis was alſo further incenſed, for that ſending immediatly after the victorie, to take poſſeſſion of Carpy, thinking the Emperour would deliuer it to him, he was not ſatisfied in that deſire, for that the Emperour hauing granted it two yeares before to Proſper Colonno, affirmed that notwithſtanding he had neuer inueſted him, yet he would for the loue of him that was dead, leaue to Veſpaſian his ſon the recompence of that which he had done in his life time, in acknowledgement of his vertue and ſeruices: which reaſon although it was iuſt, and that ſuch examples of gratitude ought to be wel pleaſing to the Marquis, if for no other cauſe, yet at leaſt for that his hope was thereby augmented, that the great ſeruices which he had done to the Emperour ſhould be recognized: yet it was not accepted of him, for that for the opinion he had of himſelfe, he held it conuenient that that deſire of his, proceeding of couetouſneſſe, and an irreconciliable hatred which he bare to the name of Proſper, ſhould be preferred before all other reſpects, how iuſt ſoeuer. Therefore he complained much both to the Emperour and to all the Councell, and his complaints were ſo open through all Italy, and with ſuch deteſtation of the Emperours ingratitude, that they encouraged others to make new plots.

Occaſions giuē to the Emperor of new emotiōs

By reaſon whereof there was offered to the Emperour (though he purpoſed to proceed no further in the affaires of Italy) iuſt cauſe, yea almoſt a neceſſitie, to take other reſolutions: and if he had ambitious purpoſes, he had meanes to couer them with the moſt honeſt occaſion and faireſt colour he could deſire: and ſeeing that was the beginning and cauſe of right great ſtirres, it is fit to declare it very particularly.

The

The warre which in the life of Pope Leo, was begun as well by him as by the Emperour, for the chasing of the French King out of Italy, was attempted vnder colour to reestablish Francis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan: and albeit for the execution thereof, after the victorie was obtained, the obedience of that State was consigned vnto him, together with the Castle of Millan, and the other places of strength, as they were recouered; yet that Duchie being so faire and commodious, the former feare ceassed not, which men had that the Emperour aspired to make himselfe Lord of it, who iudged, that the great impediments which he receiued by the French King, were the cause that he kept cloked as yet such a desire, for that it would haue altered the people much, who desired vehemently to haue Francis Sforce for their Lord, and would haue stirred vp all Italy against him, who would not haue bene content that he should rise to such a greatnesse. So that Francis Sforce held that Duchie but with very great subiection, and charges almost intollerable. For all the foundation of his defence against the French consisting in the Emperour and his armie, he was constrained not onely to respect him as his Prince, but also to be subiect to the will of his Captaines: and he was compelled also to entertaine those souldiers that were not payd by the Emperor, sometimes with money which he leuied vpon his subiects with great exactions and difficulties, somtimes suffering them to liue licentiously in one place, and then in another, the Citie of Millan excepted: which things of themselues being very grieuous, were by the behauior of the Spaniards made more intollerable, being by nature couetous and cautelous, and when they haue the meanes to discouer what they are, very insolent. Neuertheless the imminent danger of the French men infinitely hated of the people, and the hope that those vexations would one day draw to end, caused men to suffer more then their forces or faculties could well beare. But after the victorie of Pauie the people could no longer endure, seeing the same necessities continued not by reason of the taking of the King, that ỹ same calamities should continue; and therefore they required that the whole armie should depart from the Duchie of Millan. Likewise the Duke, who till that day had enioyed of the Dukedome no other thing then the bare name and title, vehemently desired the same, and no lesse for that he feared lest the Emperour, being now assured of the French King, would occupie and retaine it for himselfe, or at least giue it to some that depended absolutely of him. Which feare and doubt, ingendred of the very nature of the affaires, was not a litle increased in him by the insolent words spoken by the Viceroy afore he conueyed the King into Spaine, and those of other Captaines, together with the demonstrations they made that they respected the Duke but litle, and to desire openly that the Emperour might oppresse him: and much more for that the Emperour, after many delayes, hauing sent to the Viceroy the priuiledges of the inuestiture, the said Viceroy, when he presented them to the Duke, demanded that for recompence of charges for conquering and defending that State, he should pay within a certaine terme twelue hundred thousand duckats; which was a demand so excessiue, that the Duke was driuen to haue recourse to the Emperour, to the end the summe might not be so great and intollerable. But these difficulties drew a doubt lest such exorbitant demands were not interposed to deferre still. Moreouer, such as sought to excuse the necessitie of Francis Sforce, alledged many other causes which had iustly brought him into suspition, and particularly the knowledge he had that the Imperiall Captaines had resolued to retaine him: in so much as being summoned by the Viceroy to a certaine meeting, he refused to go, faining to be sicke, and had done the like in all places where they might do him violence. Now this suspition, whether true or false, was the cause that he perceiuing there remained very few companies in the State of Millan, for as much as part of the Spanish footmen were gone into Spaine, first with the Viceroy, and after with the Duke of Bourbon, and also for that many finding themselues very rich, by reason of so many booties and pillages which they had gotten, were retired by troupes into sundry places; and considering also the great indignation that appeared in the Marquis of Pesquiero, he thought to assure himselfe frō that danger, and entred into hope that the armie might easily be dissolued, by the consent of the said Marquis. The author of this counsell was Ierome Moron his Chancellor, who was in great authoritie with him, and who for his wisedome, eloquence, promptitude, inuention and great experience, and for that he had oftentimes made singular resistance against euill fortune, was, in our age, a personage worthy of memorie, and had bene yet more worthy, if such gifts had bene found accompanied with sinceritie of mind, and more loue of honestie, and with such maturitie of iudgement, that his counsels might not for the most part haue

bene diſcerned to be rather raſh and impudent, then honeſt or aduiſed. This man ſounding the intention of the Marquis, entred ſo farre in diſcourſe with him, that they began to ſpeake of cutting in peeces the regiments that remained in the Duchie of Millan, and to make the Marquis King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would be concurrant therein. To which counſell, the Pope being full of doubt and perplexitie, after he was founded by the aduice of Moron, ſhewed himſelfe no whit diſagreeing, although on the other ſide, he aduertiſed the Emperour, vnder colour of friendſhip, that he ſhould keepe his Captaines in good contentment; which he did, not to diſcloſe the practiſe, but to prepare a refuge for himſelfe if the matter ſucceeded not wel. But the Venetians ſhewed themſelues very affectionate hereunto, euery one perſwading themſelues that no leſſe readineſſe of mind would be found in the Ladie Regent, who began to perceiue, that ſince her ſonne was arriued in Spaine, the negociations of his deliuerie were not continued with that facilitie that was looked for. Without doubt theſe counſels had eaſily ſucceeded, if the Marquis of Peſquiero had proceeded ſincerely in this confederation againſt the Emperour. But whether at the firſt the ſaid Marquis gaue eare to this practiſe or not, there was diuerſitie of opinions, euen amongſt the Spaniards, and in the very Court of the Emperour: and many obſeruing the times and euents of affaires, beleeued that at the beginning he had indeed bene concurrant with the reſidue, but that afterwards (conſidering many difficulties that might happen in time, and fearing principally the continuall ſolicitations of the French with the Emperour, and alſo for that it was reſolued that the Ducheſſe of Alenſon ſhould go into Spaine) he made new deliberations: yea ſome do aſſure, that he deferred ſo long to aduertiſe the Emperour of theſe nouelties that were practiſed in Italy, that the Emperour hauing receiued knowledge thereof by Anthonie de Leua and Marino Abbot of Nagera, Commiſſarie in his armie, all the whole Court maruelled at the ſilence of the Marquis. But howſoeuer it was then, it is certaine, that a litle after he ſent Iohn Baptiſta Caſtaldo to the Emperour, and that he manifeſted vnto him all the conſpiracie: and that with his conſent he continued the ſame practiſe; and further, the better to decipher the thoughts of euery man, and to take from them all the meanes to denie that they had conſented thereto, he ſpake himſelfe with the Duke of Millan, and perſwaded Moron to induce the Pope (who a litle before had giuen him the perpetuall gouernment of the Citie of Beneuent, and in whoſe fauour and ſeruice he kept himſelfe as much as he could) to ſend Dominicke Saulo with a letter of credence to conferre with him of that matter. The concluſions of the treatie were theſe: That betweene the Pope, the Realme of France and the gouernments of Italy, ſhould be a league, of which the Marquis of Peſquiero ſhould be Captaine generall: and that firſt he ſhould beſtow the Spaniſh footbands ſeuerally in ſundrie places of the Duchie of Millan, and then drawing to himſelfe ſo many as would follow him, the others ſhould be ſpoiled and put to the ſword; together with Anthonie de Leua, who next to himſelfe was the chiefe man in the armie: and then with the forces of all the Confederates, he ſhould execute the enterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, whereof the Pope would grant him the inueſtiture. The Marquis ſeemed to find no other difficultie in theſe actions, ſauing that afore he put any thing to triall, he deſired to be ſatisfied, whether without blemiſhing his honour and fidelitie, he might embrace ſuch an enterpriſe in caſe the Pope put it vpon him by his authoritie: whereupon was brought into conſideration, to whom, he (being a Baron and ſubiect of the Realme of Naples) ought to be obedient, either to the Emperour, to whom the profitable iuriſdiction of the Realme appertained by the inueſtiture he had receiued of the Church, or to the Pope, who had direct ſoueraigntie ouer it, being abſolute Lord thereof. Vpon which article, both at Millan by the ordinance of Francis Sforce, and at Rome by the appointment of the Pope, were called very ſecret conſultations of excellent Doctors with ſuppreſſion of their true names. Theſe hopes againſt the Emperour were augmented by the offers of the Ladie Regent, who iudging that either neceſſitie, or at leaſt the feare of the Emperour, would aduance much the matters that were treated with him for the deliuerie of her ſonne, ſolicited to take armes, promiſing to ſend into Lombardie fiue hundred Lances, and to be concurrant in the expences of the warre with a great ſumme of money. And Moron ceaſſed not to confirme the minds of the reſidue in this opinion. For, beſides the perſwaſions he made how eaſie it would be, euen without the aide of the Marquis of Peſquiero, to defeate that armie, ſo much diminiſhed in numbers, he promiſed in the Dukes name, that if the Marquis ſhould not ſtand firme in that which had bene debated, that immediatly after order giuen to the other buſineſſe, both he and the other Cap-

Capitulations betweene the Confederates againſt the Emperour.

Captaines who went dayly to the Caſtle to conſult, ſhould there be made priſoners. But albeit theſe occaſions ſeemed great, yet they had not bene ſufficient to cauſe the Pope to take armes without the Marquis of Peſquiero, if at the ſame time hearing of the prouiſion ſent to Genes to arme the foure Caricks, he had not likewiſe had ſome intelligence from Spaine of the Emperours inclination to paſſe into Italy; which matter maruellouſly afflicting him, as well in regard of the conditions of the preſent time, as for the ancient diſpoſition of the Popes of Rome, to whom nothing had wont to be more fearfull then the coming of the Emperours armed into Italy, deſiting to meete with this danger, he diſpatched ſecretly into France, with the conſent of the Venetians, to conclude the matters negociated with the Ladie Regent, Sigiſmund Secretarie to Albert Carpy, a fit man, and of ſingular confidence with the Pope: who riding in poſt, was ſlaine in the night by theeues neare the lake of Iſea, in the territories of Breſſia; which accident being kept ſecret many dayes, brought the Pope into great ſuſpition that he was ſecretly taken and ſtayed in ſome place by the appointment of the Imperiall Captaines, and haply by the Marquis himſelfe, whom they began to diſtruſt much for his maner of proceeding, and for the delays which he vſed.

In this eſtate of affaires, arriued the diſpatch giuen by the Emperour to Lopes Vrtado, who remaining ſick in Sauoy, ſent it preſently to Millan by expreſſe meſſengers, with ſ patteut whereby the Marquis of Peſquiero was declared Captaine generall, who to continue with others in the ſame ſemblance, made as though ſuch a charge was not very plauſible to him, and yet he accepted it immediatly. And the ſaid Lopes ſent alſo to the Pronotarie Caracciol, the commiſſion to go to Venice in the Emperours name, to induce the Senate to a new confederation, or at leaſt that all men might know what deſire the Emperour had to liue in peace with all men. Francis Sforce who was fallen into a very dangerous diſeaſe, accepted the inueſtiture of the Duchie, and payed for it fiftie thouſand duckats, but ceaſſed not for all that to continue the practiſes begun with the Marquis. The opinions were diuers touching this diſpatch of the Emperour: for ſome beleeued that he had ſimply determined to aſſure the Italians: and others iudged, that for feare of new ſtirres he ſought to hold men in ſuſpence with diuers hopes, and to proceed alwayes winning of time, in agreeing to the inueſtiture, and in appearance granting a commiſſion ſo agreeable to all Italy, to cauſe his armie to retire; though on the other ſide he had giuen direction to his Captaines not to ſtirre. Yea and there were ſome that had this opinion, that he had intelligence from the Marquis of the practiſes entertained with Moron, and therefore that he ſent ſuch a commiſſion, not to be obeyed, but to get ſome iuſtification, and with theſe hopes to lull mens minds aſleepe, vntill he ſaw fit time to execute his purpoſes. In which diuerſitie, it being verie hard to know the ſimple truth, ſeeing withall it was not knowne whether Lopes Vrtado was diſpatched at the ſame time that John Baptiſta Caſtaldo, ſent by the Marquis to aduertiſe the Emperour of the negociation, arriued at the Court: yet conſidering what courſe the Emperour hath taken ſince in many things, it is without doubt that he is leſſe deceiued that holds for true the better and more eaſie interpretation. In the meane while the Marquis ceaſſed not to entertaine Moron and the others with the ſame hopes, deferring notwithſtanding the execution with many excuſes: wherein he tooke one occaſion of the ſickneſſe of the Duke of Millan, who was growne ſo weake, that euery one held almoſt for certaine that he would die. For all the Captaines pretending that in ſuch a caſe that Eſtate ſhould returne to the Emperour, as ſoueraigne Lord in chiefe, he was not onely not permitted to retire the armie, but alſo was conſtrained to call in a new ſtrength of two thouſand Lanceknights, and alſo to take order that there might be a greater number in readineſſe: ſo that the ſoldiers being ſo puiſſant in the Duchie of Millan, there was no meanes either to diſſolue them, or to offend them: and he gaue hope to execute the counſels of the conſpiracie as ſoone as time would ſerue; in expectation whereof he ſaid he would proceed with great reſpect to the Pope; and to gratifie him, he leuied from off the Eſtates of the Church the garriſons, whereof he complained much. But at the ſame time almoſt all things were changed by a new accident which happened in Spaine. For the French King being much diſpleaſed that he had in vaine deſired the preſence of the Emperour, fell, by a ſickneſſe which tooke him in the Caſtle of Madril, into ſuch extremitie and danger of his life, that the Phyſitions appointed for his cure, told the Emperour, that they had no hope of his recouerie, if he himſelfe in perſon came not to comfort him, and giue him ſome hope of his deliuerie: and as he prepared himſelfe to go vnto him, his high Chancellor endeuoured to diſſwade him from it, and

and told him that it ſtood not with his honour to go, vnleſſe it were with intention to deliuer him preſently, and without any couenant: and that otherwiſe it would be a humanitie not royall but mercenarie, and a deſire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but puſhed on by his proper intereſt, to the end not to loſe by his death the occaſion of the profit hoped for by the victorie; a counſell indeed memorable, and worthy to be followed by ſo great a Prince: and yet others counſelling otherwiſe, he took poſt & went vnto him. The viſitation was ſhort, for that the Moſt Chriſtian King was now almoſt at the extremitie; yet for the time full of gracious words, and of moſt certaine hope that he would deliuer him as ſoone as he had recouered his health: and whatſoeuer was the cauſe, either the comfort that he gaue him, or his youth, which of it ſelfe was ſtronger then the maladie, he began after this viſitation to find himſelfe ſo much refreſhed, that within a few dayes he was out of danger, although he could not recouer his former health but with longer time. And now neither the difficulties that were ſhewed on the Emperours ſide, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, could ſtay the voyage of the Ladie Alenſon into Spaine: for that nothing was more hard to the French men then to leaue off the practiſes of accord begun with thoſe that had power to reſtore their King, and nothing more eaſie to the Emperour, then by giuing hope to the French, to diuert their minds from taking of armes, and by that meanes to keepe the Italians in ſuſpence, ſo that they had not the courage to enterpriſe any new thing: and thus, ſometimes vſing delayes, and ſometimes preſſing forward the affaires, to keepe the minds of all men confuſed and intangled. The Ladie Alenſon was receiued by the Emperour with very gracious demonſtrations and hopes, but the effects fell out both hard and difficult: for when ſhe had ſpoken to him the foureteenth day of October, for the mariage of his ſiſter the widow with the King, he made anſwer, that it was a matter which could not be done without the conſent of the Duke of Bourbon: and other particularities were debated by the deputies of both parts, the Emperour inſiſting obſtinately to haue the Duchie of Burgondie reſtored, as appertaining to him: but the French men conſented not, vnleſſe he would either accept it for dowrie, or referre it to the ſentence of the law, to decide to whom it belonged. They could eaſily haue agreed to the reſt, but becauſe they were ſo farre different in regard of Burgondie, the Ladie Alenſon returned at laſt into France, without hauing gotten any other thing then leaue to ſee the King her brother; who growing more and more into diſtruſt of his deliuerie, deſired her (as they ſay) at her departure, to admoniſh his mother and all the Councell from him, to looke carefully to the profite of the Crowne of France, without hauing any conſideration of him, as if he liued not: and yet for the departing of the Ladie Alenſon, the ſolicitations for the Kings deliuerie were not altogether layed aſide, for that the Preſident of Paris and the Biſhops of Ambrun and Tarbe remained behind, who had followed the matter till then, but with very litle hope, for that the Emperour would not hearken to any condition, if Burgondie were not firſt rendred, which the King would not conſent to giue him, but in a laſt neceſſitie. At this time the Cardinall Saluiati the Popes Legate arriued at the Court, where being receiued of the Emperour with great honour, he debated vpon his commiſſions, which principally contained the ratification of the articles promiſed by the Viceroy, and that for the common ſafetie of Italy, the inueſtiture might be giuen to the Duke of Millan. But the ſame Viceroy diſſwaded the reſtitution of Reggia and Rubiera, by the counſel and hopes of whom the Duke of Ferrara, who deſired to ſolicite his owne cauſe before the Emperour, when the Pope had promiſed him not to execute any enterpriſe vpon his Eſtate for ſixe moneths, tooke his way to the frontier of the Realme of France, with intention to paſſe further; but the Ladie Regent refuſing to giue him ſafeconduct, he returned backe againe to Ferrara. There was debated alſo betweene the Pope and the Emperour, touching a diſpenſation to take to wife the King of Portugals ſiſter, a mariage which the Emperour was determined to contract, notwithſtanding he had alreadie promiſed the King of England by oath, that he would take no other wife then his daughter. But the Pope ſtood long to accord to this diſpenſation, for that many perſwaded him, that the deſire to obtaine ſuch a grace, would make the Emperour more tractable to his deſires touching the matters in negociation: and that at leaſt in caſe he would make warre vpon him, it ſhould be very vnwiſely done, to giue him meanes to heape together ſo great a maſſe of money as would grow to him by that mariage, for that the King of Portugal offered him for a dowrie nine hundred thouſand duckats; of which, deducting ſo much as was ſet downe to defray the debts contracted betweene them, it was thought there would come to his hands hands at leaſt a ſumme of fiue hundred thouſand duckats; beſides the foure hundred thouſand which his ſubiects of Spaine offered to giue him, vnder the title of a benevolence or ſeruice, which taking beginning in time paſt of the proper wils of the people to relieue the neceſſities of their Kings, was reduced into an ordinarie Subſidie: and beſides, they offered alſo to giue him foure hundred thouſand duckats, if he went through with the mariage. On the other ſide, the Pope could not reſiſt the importunities of the Duke of Seſſa the Emperours Embaſſadour, for that there was almoſt alwayes in him great repugnancie betweene that he purpoſed and that which he executed: for being by nature much eſtranged from granting any grace that was demanded of him, he could not vſe difficulties, nor conſtantly make deniall, but oftentimes he ſuffered his will to be ouerruled by the importunitie of ſuch as ſued to him; and that in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed many times that he accorded to things more through feare then by grace, wherein he proceeded neither with that conſtancie nor maieſtie, which the greatneſſe of his dignitie and the importance of the affaires that were negociated did require. And thus it hapned in the diſpenſation which the Emperour required, that his proper profite ſtriuing in him on the one ſide, and on the other his facilitie, he layed vpon the backe of another (as he often vſed to do) that which it is not well knowne whether he had the boldneſſe or courage to ſuſtaine. He diſpatched by a Briefe the diſpenſation in the ſame forme the Emperour demanded it, and ſent it to the Cardinall Saluiati, with commiſſion, that if he had made a reſolution of his affaires with the Emperour, according to the hope he had giuen him, as ſoone as the ſaid Cardinall ſhould come to the Court, he ſhould deliuer the Briefe, but otherwiſe to retaine it; which was a commiſſion wherein the ſeruant (as ſhall be ſaid in his place) ſhewed himſelfe neither more firme nor more conſtant, then the maiſter had bene.

Deſcription of the nature of Pope Clement.

But whileſt the Cardinall debated the Popes commiſſions with the Emperour, and was alwayes entertained with hope to haue the expedition he deſired, there fell out in Lombardie very diuers effects. For the Duke of Millan being ſo well recouered of his ſickneſſe, that it was holden for certaine, that he was out of danger of ſudden death, the Marquis of Peſquiero hauing receiued by the ſame Caſtaldo commiſſion from the Emperour to prouide for thoſe dangers as he thought good, determined to enter vpon the Duchie of Millan, vnder this colour, that the Duke by reaſon of the conſpiracies and practiſes holden by Moron, was fallen from the rights of inueſtiture, and the freehold reuerted to the Emperour as ſupreme Lord. Therefore the Marquis, who was at Nouaro, although very ſicke, and had beſtowed part of the armie within Pauie, and lodged the Lanceknights neare Loda, which two Cities he had cauſed to be fortified, he reuoked to Nouaro (when there was leaſt doubt, and vnder colour to diſpoſe the armie through all the Eſtate of Millan) the reſidue of the bands diſperſed in Piedmont and the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa, which the Imperiall Captaines had occupied almoſt immediatly after the victorie. He called alſo Ierome Moron to Nouaro, in whoſe perſon the importance of all things might be ſaid to reſt, for as much as it was certaine that Moron being made priſoner, the Duke of Millan, depriued of men and counſell, could make no reſiſtance, whereas remaining at libertie, the Marquis might feare that he might trouble him much, with his wit, experience, and reputation, and giue many impediments to his deſignes. Beſides, it was neceſſarie for the Emperour to haue the perſon of Moron in his power and poſſeſſion, who had bene the author and inſtrument of all the conſpiracies, to the end to proue by his confeſſion, that wherewith the Duke of Millan was to be charged. There is nothing more hard to auoide then iuſtice, neither can any remedie auaile againſt the euils that muſt fall vpon vs. Moron might now diſcerne that the practiſe entertained with the Marquis was vaine, that he was much hated of all the Spaniſh ſouldiers, amongſt whom ranne alreadie many rumours of his infidelitie; and he knew that Anthony de Leua gaue out publike threats that he would kill him: it is very likely that he conſidered not the importance of his perſon, and that he diſcerned not to what eſtate the Duke of Millan was reduced, being then vnprofitable, and as it were dead: all things were in ſuſpence and full of ſuſpition betweene them many dayes before: euery one counſelled him not to go thither: himſelfe was full of doubt: and yet either for that his mind was troubled with the faire ſemblances of the Marquis, or ſetting vp his reſt vpon the great amitie that ſeemed to be betweene them, or repoſing confidence in his faith, which afterwards he aſſured he had receiued by a letter ſubſigned with his hand, or laſtly being puſhed on by that fatall neceſſitie which draweth on men that will not be led, he reſolued to go as it were to a manifeſt priſon; a matter ſo much the more wonderfull derfull vnto me, by how much I haue often heard Moron say in the armie in the time of Pope Leo, that in all Italy there was not a more impious and disloyall man then the Marquis of Pesquiero. The Marquis receiued him graciously, and they spake together alone of the former conspiracies, in a chamber apart, both how to kill the Spaniards, and to murder Anthonie de Leua, whom the Marquis had secretly caused to be hidden behind a peece of Tapestrie, to heare all that should be spoken: but as soone as he was gone from the Marquis (which was the foureteenth day of October) Anthonie de Leua apprehended him prisoner, and sent him to the Castle of Pauie, whither the Marquis himselfe went to examine him vpon the matters they had debated together, and Moron confessed from point to point the whole conspiracie, charging the Duke of Millan both as guiltie and consenting to all that had passed, which was the matter that principally was sought. Ierome Moron being prisoner, the Marquis who had in his hands already Loda and Pauie, required of the Duke that for the suretie of the Emperours Estate he should deliuer vp to him Cremona and the Castles of Trezzo, Lecquo, and Pisqueton, places supposed to be the keyes of the Duchie of Millan, for that they haue their situation vpon the passage of Adda, promising when he had them to introduce no more innouation. The Duke finding himselfe depriued of all things, and abandoned of counsell and hope, caused them to be presently deliuered. When he had them, he proceeded further, and demanded that he might be admitted and receiued into Millan to speake with him, as he alledged; which was granted him with the same facilitie: and when he was entred into Millan, he sent vnto him to make instance, that he would cause the Castle of Cremona to be deliuered vnto him; and that he would not demand the Castle of Millan, as being a request not reasonable, for that his person was lodged within it, but that he would require, for the suretie of the Emperours armie, that he would consent that the Castle might be enuironed with trenches. He required of him also to haue deliuered into his hands Iohn Angeo Riccio, his Secretarie, and Politian Secretarie to Moron, to the end they might be examined of that wherewith they were charged to haue conspired against the Emperour. To which demands the Duke answered: That he held the Castles of Millan and Cremona in the name and at the instance of the Emperour, to whom he had alwayes bene a most faithfull vassall, and that he would not deliuer them vp to any, vntill he first vnderstood his pleasure; for the better knowledge whereof, he would forthwith send an expresse messenger vnto him, so that the Marquis would giue him suretie of passage: and that he held it not conuenient to consent to be inclosed in the meane while in the Castle, from which violence he would defend himselfe with all his power: That he could not depart with Iohn Angeo, who was instructed in all his affaires of importance, and at that time the onely man about him: That he had greater need also of the Secretarie of Moron, to the end to present him before the Emperour, and by that meanes to proue, that whilest he was sicke, his maister had dispatched in his name, and without his priuitie many expeditions, wherewith he might be charged, if by that meanes he iustified not his innocencie, and shewed that the practises of Moron were farre different and separate from his practises. But the effect was, that after many replies and protestations past by writing, as well by the one as the other partie, the Marquis compelled the people of Millan to passe an oath of fidelitie to the Emperour, placed officers euery where in the name of the Emperour, to the great discontent of all men: and began with trenches to incompasse the Castles of Cremona and Millan, in the which the Duke was resolued to remaine with eight hundred choise footmen which he had there, and with such store of victuals as in so short time he could prouide: and that because of the great comforts and hopes of succours which were giuen him by the Pope and the Venetians, not failing to hinder with the artilleries as much as he could the working of the trenches which were made without, and of more distance from the Castle then those which Prosper Colonno had made. All Italy was much astonished, and that with good reason, for the vsurpation of the Dukedome of Millan, knowing well that it would fall into manifest seruitude, whensoeuer an Emperour should be Lord ouer Millan and Naples. But aboue all others the Pope was maruellously afflicted, perceiuing those practises to be disclosed, wherewith he had intended not onely to assure Millan, but also to destroy the Emperours armie, and to take from him the kingdome of Naples. Touching the Marquis of Pesquiero, it may be he wonne great fauour with the Emperour, but with all others he purchased perpetuall infamie, not onely for the opinion that most men conceiued of him that in the beginning he had an intention to play false with the Emperor, and to bandie against him, but also for that although he had alwayes bene faithfull vnto him, yet all men esteemed it a matter full of great infamie, to haue encouraged men, and with so great deceit and double dealing, to haue allured them to make conspiracies with him, to get occasion to discouer them, and make himselfe great by the transgressions of others, solicited with feigned words and subtilties. This alteration made difficult the hope of accord that was negociated with the Senate of Venice by the Pronotary Caracciol. The Pronotary hoped (for the termes wherein things stood) that the Senate would speedily draw to a conclusion to renew the former confederation with the same conditions: and that he should pay to the Emperour foure-score thousand duckats, in recompence for that in times past he had withdrawne his aide, leauing off wholly all demands to contribute hereafter with money: but the accident of Millan which happened, filled the Senate with great perplexitie. For on the one side it grieued them much to be the onely people in Italy against the Emperour with danger, seeing the Marquis of Pesquiero threatned them to cause the warre to be transported vpon their Estate, whereof they discerned already certaine preparations: and on the other side, they were not ignorant that in case the accord went through, the Emperour should with greater facilitie make himselfe absolute Lord of that Duchie, which being ioyned to so many Estates, and so many other oportunities, was a degree to subdue them, together with all the residue of Italy; a matter which was continually declared to them by the Bishop of Bayeux, whom the Ladie Regent had sent to debate of her vnion with the Italians against the Emperor: and in so great a doubt and so dangerous a straight, they made many assemblies, but without any resolution, by reason of the diuersitie of opinions. And albeit to accept the accord was a thing more conformable to their custome, for as much as that put them out of present dangers, so that they might haue hope in the length of time, and the occasions which follow Commonweales, which in comparison of Princes are immortall; yet it seemed to them a matter of too great importance, that the Emperour should confirme himselfe in the estate of Millan, and that the French should be excluded from all hope to haue any alliance in Italy. Therefore after they had at last resolued to be bound to nothing, they made this answer to the Pronotarie Caracciol: That their actions past made knowne to all the world, and he himselfe being present at the conclusion of the confederation, could well testifie, how much they had alwayes desired the amitie of the Emperour, with whom they had contracted a confederation at such a time, as if they had hearkned to the French, it had bene (as all the world knew) a matter of right great consequence; and that they had alwayes perseuered and would continue now more then euer in the same disposition, but by necessitie they were held in suspence, for that they saw in Lombardie changes and innouations of so great importance; and specially for the remembrance that their confederation with the Emperour, together with so many stirres happened that yeare in Italy, had bene to no other end, then to transferre to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, as the principall foundation of the libertie and suretie of Italy; and therefore they besought his Maiestie, that herein maintaining himselfe and his goodnesse, he would remoue this innouation, and establish the tranquillitie of Italy, as it was in his power to do, for as much as he should find them alwayes very ready, both with their authoritie and their forces, to follow so holy an inclination; and would neuer giue him cause to desire of them any kind of dutie, as well in respect of the vniuersall good, as of his particular interests. Which answer being without any hope of conclusion, bred not for all that any ouerture of warre: for that both the sickenesse of the Marquis of Pesquiero, who was dayly worse and worse, and the desire to impatronize himselfe first of the whole Estate of Millan, and to establish and assure that conquest, together with the desire of the Emperour to put an end to so many other affaires which he had in hand, would not suffer him to giue beginning to an enterprise of so great consequence.

The Duke of Bourbon in Spaine.

About this time the Duke of Bourbon passed into Spaine, who arriued at the Emperors Court the fifteenth day of Nouember; touching whom we must not forget to write, that albeit the Emperour receiued him with all ſ demonstrations and honors that could be, and that he entertained him as his brother in law, yet all the Lords of the Court, who are accustomed in all other things ordinarily to follow the example of their Prince, abhorred him as a person infamous, stiling him traitor to his owne King: and which more is, one of them being required in the Emperours name to lend his pallace to lodge him in, answered in the stout courage of a Spaniard, that he could not denie the Emperour whatsoeuer he would demand of him, but that he should well vnderstand, that as soone as Bourbon was gone out of it, he would burne it, as a pallace infected with the infamie of Bourbon, and vnworthy to be inhabited by men of honour. But the honors done by the Emperour to the Duke of Bourbon, increaſed the diſtruſt of the French men, who (both for this, and more for the returne of the Ladie Alenſon without effect, hauing litle hope in the accord, notwithſtanding it was continually negociated by men expreſſe which they had about the Emperour) laboured as much as they could to aduance the league with the Pope: wherein did concurre the perſwaſions and authoritie of the King of England, and the redoubled and vehement inſtances of the Venetians; whereunto was added an oportunitie, without doubt of great conſequence, that about that time (which was the beginning of December) the Marquis of Peſquiero died, haply by the iuſt iudgement of God, who would not ſuffer him to enioy the fruite of that ſeed which he had ſowne with ſo great malignitie. He was of the houſe of Aualos, originally of Catelano, whoſe predeceſſors came into Italy with Alphonſo King of Aragon, who was the firſt of that houſe which made conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples: and beginning at the battell of Rauenna, where, being very yong he was taken priſoner, he was preſent in all the wars which the Spaniards had in Italy: in ſo much as though he had not paſſed the age of ſixe and thirtie yeares, yet he was old in experience, ingenious, reſolute, very carefull, circumſpect and aduiſed, and much eſteemed and loued of the Infanterie of Spaine, ouer whom he had long bene Colonell: ſo that the victorie of Pauie, and all other memorable actions executed by that armie ſince certaine yeares, had principally ſucceeded by his counſell and vertue. He was aſſuredly a Captaine of great valour, but one who with art and faire ſhewes knew how to grace his doings, being herewithall proud, deceitfull, malignant, without any ſinceritie, and worthy, as oftentimes he deſired, to haue Spaine for his countrey rather then Italy. His death therefore put the whole armie into great confuſion, with whom he was in ſuch fauour and reputation; and gaue hope to others the more eaſily to oppreſſe it, ſince they had loſt a Captaine of ſo great authoritie and valour: and therefore the inſtances of ſuch as deſired that the league might be accompliſhed, were more vehement and importunate with the Pope: but the doubts which detained him were nothing leſſe, and that for iuſt cauſe, ſince on all ſides verie ſtrong reaſons troubled his mind, and ſuch as might hold confuſed and in ſuſpence any man right actiue and reſolute, and not Pope Clement alone, who proceeded alwayes in his affaires ſlowly and with much doubt. There was no further expectation from the Emperour of any deliberation which might aſſure Italy, and he was diſcerned vehemently to ſolicite the taking of the Caſtle of Millan; which being taken, all others, and chiefly the Pope, whoſe Eſtate was weake, and ſituate betweene Lombardie and the Realme of Naples, remained a manifeſt prey vnto him: and preſuppoſing that it were in the power of the Emperour to oppreſſe the Pope, it was much to be doubted leſt he would do it, either for ambition, which is almoſt naturall in the Emperours againſt the Popes, or for his owne ſuretie, or to reuenge himſelfe, being full of diſdaine and diſtruſt, as it was thought, for the conſpiracies which he entertained with the Marquis of Peſquiero: and if the neceſſitie to prouide for this danger was great, the foundations and hopes to do it ſeemed not light, but ſuch, as if the remedie could not ſucceed by the meanes of ſo mightie a league and vnion, it was vtterly to be deſpaired of. The Regent of France promiſed fiue hundred Lances, and to contribute for euery moneth ſo long as the warre ſhould endure, fortie thouſand duckats, with the which it was intended to wage ten thouſand Swiſſers. The Pope and the Venetians together, were to leuie eighteene hundred men at armes, twentie thouſand footmen, and two thouſand light horſemen. The French men and the Venetians were to take the ſea with a great nauie to aſſaile Genes or the Realme of Naples. The Ladie Regent promiſed to begin warre immediatly vpon the frontiers of Spaine with a ſtrong armie, to the end to hinder the Emperour for ſending of men and money for the warre in Italy. The armie that remained in Lombardie was not great, and had not Captaines of ſuch authoritie as was accuſtomed, the Marquis being dead, and the Duke of Bourbon and the Viceroy of Naples in Spaine: they were without meanes to recouer money, and had no plentie of victuals: the inhabitants were great enemies to them, for the deſire of their Duke, and for the intollerable exactions made by the ſouldiers in the Citie of Millan and elſewhere: the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona were holden for the Duke: and the Venetians gaue hope that the Duke of Ferrara would alſo enter into this confederation, if the Pope would be content to yeeld him Reggia, which by one meanes or other he had alwayes poſſeſſed. But on the other ſide, that which made the matter more difficult, was the ſubtiltie and vertue of the enemies, who vſed (when need required) to maintaine themthemſelues a long time with litle money, and to endure many neceſſities and diſcommodities: the towns which they held being wel fortified, and the facilitie no leſſe to reduce them to better ſtrength with rampiers, and other ſort of fortifications, for that they were townes ſituate in the plaine countrey: wherein they were able to entertaine themſelues vntill there came vnto them out of Germanie a ſufficient ſuccour to reduce all the warre to the fortune of a battell: and alſo the ſouldiers of the league could be no other but new and vntrained men, in compariſon of that armie reſolute and nouriſhed in ſo many victories: and beſides they wanted a Captaine generall, for that the Marquis of Mantua who was then Captaine of the Church, was not able to ſuſtaine ſo great a charge; neither could they with any ſuretie commit themſelues to the fidelitie of the Duke of Ferrara nor the Duke of Vrbin, whom they had ſo much offended, and who could not be well pleaſed with the greatneſſe of the Pope: and alſo the armes and weapons of the Church had but dull edges, and not much better thoſe of the Venetians: and, if either of them apart were bad, how much worſe being conioyned together? conſidering withall, that in the armies of leagues, prouiſions are ſeldome ſeene to arriue at conuenient times; and among ſuch diuerſitie of minds, where there are diuers intereſts and ſundrie ends, diſorders, diſdaines, diſcontentments and diſtruſts do eaſily happen, and neuer any readineſſe reſolutely to follow the fauour of fortune when ſhe ſhewes her ſelfe benigne, nor a diſpoſition to reſiſt her conſtantly when ſhe is aduerſe. But that which in this deliberation cauſed moſt feare and difficultie, was a ſuſpition leſt the French men, whenſoeuer the Emperor ſeeing himſelf conſtrained, ſhould offer them to deliuer their King, would not onely abandon the league, but alſo aide the Emperour againſt the Confederates: and albeit the King of England gaue his faith for them, that they ſhould not accord thereunto, and that it was negociated that they ſhould giue aſſurance in Rome, Florence, or Venice for three moneths pay, yet there was no meanes found to aſſure this ſuſpition. For the French men hauing no other end then to recouer their King, and it being manifeſt that they had no inclination to the warre vntill they ſaw no hope to effect the accord, it was a thing very likely, that whenſoeuer the Emperour ſhould conſent, they would preferre the accord with him afore all other regards and intereſts. And likewiſe it was well knowne, that by how much were great the preparations and forces of the league, by ſo much more would the Emperour be inclined to compound with the French King: and therefore it ſeemed a very dangerous matter to enter into confederation to make a warre in the which the ſtrong prouiſions of the Confederates might as well hurt as helpe. With theſe reaſons did the Embaſſadours and Agents of the Princes labour the Pope on all ſides, and no leſſe his owne ſeruants, for that his Court and thoſe of his Councell were deuided, each of whom fauoured euery one his owne inclination, with ſo much the leſſe regard, by how much the greater they eſteemed their authoritie to be with him, who till that time was accuſtomed to ſuffer himſelfe to be caried for the moſt part by the will of ſuch as in reaſon ought to haue obeyed the twinkling of his eye, and to be nothing elſe but miniſters and executers of the will and commandements of their Lord: for the better knowledge whereof, and of many other occurrences, it is neceſſary to declare the matter more at large.

Leo who brought the ſoueraigne Eccleſiaſtical dignitie into the houſe of the Medices, & being Cardinall, did ſo well ſupport both himſelfe and that family, which was fallen from a high degree into much declination, that they might expect the returne of a proſperous fortune, was a man very liberall, if this name be fit for ſuch an exceſſiue expence as is without all meaſure. In this man at ſuch time as he was choſen Pope, there was ſeene ſuch magnificence and maieſtie, and courage indeed royall, as might ſeeme wonderfull euen in one that by long ſucceſſion had deſcended of Kings and Emperours: and he was not onely prodigall of money, but alſo of all the fauours that are in the power of a Pope, the which he granted ſo vnmeaſurably, that he made the ſpirituall authoritie vile, diſordered the courſe of the Court, and by his too great expences, brought himſelfe into neceſſitie to ſeeke mony always by extraordinary meanes. This great facilitie was accompanied with a moſt deepe diſſimulation, with the which he beguiled all the world in the beginning of his Pontificacie: and that which made him ſeeme a good Prince (I ſpeake not of Apoſtolike goodneſſe, for that in thoſe corrupted times, the goodneſſe of the Pope is praiſed, when it exceeds not the malignitie of other men) was the opinion that was conceiued of his clemencie, and that he deſired to do good to all men, without doing harme to any man. Amongſt his other felicities which were very great, it was no litle happineſſe to him to haue about him Iulio de Medicis his couſin, whom (notwithſtanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage) he made Cardinall, being before a Knight of the Order of Rhodes. For Iulio being by nature graue, diligent, laborious in affaires, not giuen to his pleaſure, but ordered and regular in all things, and hauing vnder his hands by the will of Pope Leo the adminiſtration of all the affaires of importance of the Popedome, did beare out and moderate many diſorders which proceeded of his bountie and facilitie: and which more is, not following the cuſtome of all the other couſins and brethren of the Pope, he preferred the honour and greatneſſe of Leo, afore all the means he might vſe for his own good after the Popes death, & was very faithful & obedient vnto him, ſo that he ſeemed to be indeed a ſecond himſelfe: by reaſon whereof he was dayly more aduãced by the Pope, who put him continually more in truſt with his affaires; which being in the hands of two natures ſo different, did ſhew how well the mixture of two contraries doth oftentimes agree together, the aſſiduitie, diligence, order, grauitie of manners of the one, with the facilitie, prodigalitie, pleaſures and merrineſſe of the other: which things made many beleeue, that Leo was gouerned by Iulio, and that of himſelfe he was not able to rule ſo great a charge, nor to hurt any one, but rather deſirous to enioy the commodities of the Popedome: and on the contrary, that Iulio was of a ſpirit ambitious, ſtirring, and addicted to innouations: ſo that it was deemed, that all the rigours, all the ſtirres and enterpriſes of Leos time, proceeded from the inſtigation of Iulio, who was reputed a man malicious, but of great ſpirit: which opinion of his valour was confirmed and increaſed after the death of Leo, for that amidſt infinite contradictions and difficulties which befell him, he ſupported his affaires with ſuch a dignitie, that he ſeemed almoſt a Pope, and ſo conſerued his authoritie with the Cardinals, that making his entrie into two Conclaues abſolute commander of ſixteene voices, he was at laſt after the death of Adrian made Pope, within two yeares after the death of Pope Leo, notwithſtanding the infinite contradictions of the moſt part, and chiefly of the more ancient of the Colledge: and he entred into his Popedome with ſuch an expectation, that it was thought he would become the greateſt Pope, and do greater things then euer did any that till that day had ſate in that ſeate. But it was found out afterwards how farre men were deceiued in their iudgements as well of Leo as of him, for that Clement had many conditions much differing from that which [illegible]en beleeued of him before: ſeeing there was not in him either that deſire of innouation, or that greatneſſe of courage and inclination of mind to noble and high enterpriſes, which was ſuppoſed before; and that he had rather bene about Leo an executer of his deſignes, then a director and introducer of his owne counſels and deſires. And albeit he had a very capable wit, and a deepe inſight in all the affaires of the world, yet when he muſt come to reſolution and execution, he was not correſpondent to himſelfe, for that he was not onely hindered by a timiditie of mind which was not litle in him, and by a deſire of ſparing, but alſo by a certaine irreſolution and perplexitie, which was naturall in him: ſo that he ſtood in ſuſpence and doubt, when he was vpon the point to eſtabliſh things which he had aforetime with great foreſight conſidered and almoſt reſolued: whereby it happened, that as well in his deliberations, as in the execution of his proiects, euery ſmall reſpect newly happening, and euery light impediment that he met withall, ſeemed ſufficient to cauſe him to returne into the ſame confuſion wherein he was afore he determined, being alwayes perſwaded that after he had conſulted, that counſell was the beſt which he had reiected. For then, calling to mind thoſe reaſons onely whereof he had made no reckoning, he reuoked not into his minde the arguments which had moued him to make the election, the which being debated and compared with the contraries, would haue weakened their force; and was not careful not to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſurmounted by feare, by experience of himſelfe, who ought to remember, that he had often bene fearefull in vaine, and without any occaſion: in which confuſed nature, and diſorderly maner of proceeding, ſuffering himſelfe oftentimes to be tranſported by his ſeruants, he ſeemed rather to be led then counſelled by them. Of theſe, Nicholas Scõberg a German, & Iohn Mathew Gibert a Genoway, were of great authoritie with him: for Scomberg was reuerenced and almoſt feared of the Pope, and Gibert much loued and fauoured: Scomberg who was a diſciple of Ierome Sauonarola, became a preaching Frier whileſt he ſtudied the lawes, but afterwards leauing his religion and profeſſion, and retaining onely the habite and the name, he became a follower of State matters: Gibert had bene beſtowed very yong in the function of religion, but afterwards he left that vocation by the conſent of his father, notwithſtanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, and diſclaimed as well the habite as the name of his profeſſion. They agreed well together whileſt he was Cardinall, and alſo in the beginning and entrie to his Popedome, ſo that they cauſed him to do whatſoeuer they would: but beginning afterwards to diſagree, either through ambition, or by the diuerſitie of their natures, they vndid him, and brought him into great confuſion. For, Frier Nicholas either becauſe he was a Germane, or for ſome other regard, being much affected to the name of the Emperour, and naturally obſtinate and reſolute in his opinions, which oftentimes were different from the iudgment of others, the Pope entred many times into doubt of him, as if he loued more the profit of others then his owne. And touching the other, he affected no man but the Pope, nor acknowledged any other Lord, and naturally tooke his affaires to heart. And albeit in the time of Leo he had bene a great enemie to the French, and had fauored the affaires of the Emperour, yet after the death of Leo he was quite altered. Thus theſe two officers of the Pope, who were in great credite with him, being at manifeſt diſcord betweene themſelues, proceeded not diſcreetly, nor with any reſpect to the honour of the Pope; and being the cauſe that all men knew how irreſolute and weake the Pope was, they made him contemptible and almoſt ridiculous to moſt men: and thus he being alreadie by nature irreſolute, knew not which way to turne himſelfe in a deliberation ſo ſlipperie and difficult, ſeeing thoſe who ought to aide him to reſolue himſelfe, were the men that put him into greater confuſion. Neuertheleſſe at the laſt, more by neceſſitie to deliberate ſomething, then by reſolution or firme iudgement, and chiefly for that he found himſelfe in ſuch termes, that to deliberate nothing, was a kind of deliberation, he inclined to go through with the League, and in companie of the reſidue to begin the warre againſt the Emperour. They fell to accord, and drew the articles, and there wanted nothing but to giue the full perfection, at ſuch time as he receiued newes that the Commander Errera whō the Emperor had ſent to him, was arriued at Genes, and that he was coming with diligence with a gracious and good diſpatch; in which reſpect he determined to attend his coming, whereof the Embaſſadours, whom he had aſſured to paſſe the confederation the ſame day, complained much. The cauſe of his coming was, that the Emperour after he had ſent ſuch a commiſſion to the Marquis of Peſquiero, that at leaſt it was in his power to ſeize vpon the Eſtate of Millan, fearing leſt by that occaſion new ſtirres would be raiſed in Italy, he began to debate more ſtraitly of the accord with the Legate Saluiati, ſo that there paſſed betweene them a capitulation, reſeruing neuertheleſſe the condition of the ratification by the Pope, wherein he was ſatisfied touching the reſtitution of Reggia and Rubiera, and alſo the defence and conſeruation of the Duke of Millan was comprehended therein; matters which the Pope did principally deſire. And it was expreſly ſet downe, that if the Duke ſhould die, the Emperour ſhould not retaine that Dukedome, nor giue it to the Archduke his brother, but that he ſhould inueſt the Duke of Bourbon, which the Pope himſelfe very vndiſcreetly, and by the perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop of Capua, had propounded vnto them, together with George of Auſtria baſtard brother to the Emperour Maximilian, at ſuch time as the life of Francis Sforce was holden almoſt deſperate. Which capitulation being made, the Legate without tarrying till Pope Clement had giuen it perfection, either could not, or would not refuſe to preſent the Emperour with the writ of diſpenſation ſo much deſired: ỹ which for that it was made before, onely with mention of impediment to the ſecond degree without naming the King of Portugals daughter, the leſſe to offend the King of England, or becauſe there was betweene them a double bond of affinitie, mention being made of the mightier bond onely: it was neceſſarie to make another, which with expreſſe mention of the perſons, contained all the impediments. The Commander Errera departed from the Emperours Court with the diſpatch of this confederation, a day or two after the Emperor was aduertiſed of the impriſoning of Moron: and being come to the Popes Court the ſixt day of December, and brought into his preſence (after he had made many offers to his Holineſſe, and well informed him of the good will of the Emperour) he deliuered him the capitulations, wherein albeit the articles touching the ſalt, and matters of Beneſices in the Realme of Naples, were contrary to that which had bene ſolicited and reſolued vpon with the Viceroy, yet (for that his principall end was to be aſſured of ſuſpitions) he had accepted them, if he had ſeene and knowne that there had bene ſincere proceeding touching the Duchie of Millan. But ſeeing that in the article concerning Francis Sforce, there was no mention made of the imputation made againſt him, nor any promiſe to render vnto him the Eſtate that was taken from him, nor to pardon his faults if he had committed any, but the Emperour in the concluſion made with the Legate, and in the inſtructions giuen to his Agent, had made no ſhew to take any knowledge of ſuch things, their art and ſubtilties were eaſily diſcerned. For the confederation and promiſe made to defend and preſerue Francis Sforce in the Dukedome of Millan, depriued not the Emperour of power to proceed againſt him as againſt his vaſſall, and to declare the freehold to be confisked for that wherewith he was charged, that is, to haue conſpired againſt his Maieſtie: and Monſieur de Bourbon appointed to be Duke in caſe of his death, was alſo to ſucceed in caſe of his priuation, for the lawes do conſider the death natural and the death ciuill, by the which they iudge him to die, who is condemned for ſuch a crime. For this cauſe the Pope anſwered with very graue ſpeeches, that he had no particular matter of diſcord with the Emperor elect, yea touching all differences & contentions that might happen betweene them, he wold neuer chuſe other Iudge then himſelf; but alſo that it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh ſo good an order for the publike affaires, as Italy might remained aſſured, which could not be done vnleſſe he reſtored to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan. And he layed afore him reaſons, proouing that ſo generall an article was not ſufficient; concluding that it would be no ſmall griefe to him to be driuen to a neceſſitie to enter into new deliberations, and to eſtrange himſelfe from the Emperour elect, with whom he had alwayes bene moſt firmely conioyned. The Duke of Seſſa replied, that the Emperour had without doubt a ſincere and vpright intention, and that he was content, that notwithſtanding whatſoeuer had happened, the Duchie of Millan ſhould remaine to Francis Sforce, but that by inconſideration that article had not bene ſet downe in more ample forme, and that the Pope ſhould reforme it as he thought good, promiſing to preſent to him within two moneths the ratification, ſo farre forth alſo as he would giue his word not to conclude the League which was negociated with the gouernment of France and the Venetians during that time. It was clearely diſcerned, that this offer had no other foundation then a deſire to gaine the time of two moneths, to the end the Emperour might haue the more leiſure the better to aduiſe himſelf, and to prouide remedies againſt ſo great a League: and yet after many diſputes, and to the great diſcontentment of the Embaſſadours, the Pope conſented to that demand, as well for a deſire to enter as ſlowly as he could into expences and troubles, as for that he ſuppoſed that ſo long as the French King continued priſoner, all contracts and confederations made with the Regent of France would be very dangerous, for that it was in the Emperours power to diſſolue it whenſoeuer he would: and alſo that by this reſpite, it might be (although he had no great hope thereof) that he might obtaine his deſire; which delay if haply it wrought concord betweene the two Kings, he conſidered very wiſely (though many iudged otherwiſe) that it were better to be done in a time when the Emperour ſtood in leaſt neceſſitie, for that by how much his affaires were aduanced or ſtood in good traine, by ſo much the more heauie conditions would he lay vpon the French King, which being ſo ſeuere and rigorous, he ſuppoſed the King would not obſerue them when he was at libertie. There was alſo added to this treatie, that during the ſaid time, there ſhould be no new enterpriſe embraced, nor any action executed againſt the Caſtle of Millan, if Francis Sforce would be bound not to moleſt or offend thoſe without, which condition he would not accept.

1526. The yeare of the natiuitie of the Sonne of God 1525, being paſſed in theſe actions more diſpoſed to warre then to peace, there begun the yeare 1526, which was full of great accidents and wonderfull troubles: in the beginning whereof the Commander Errera returned to the Emperour with letters written with the Popes owne hand, by the which he denied not abſolutely, nor confeſſed the conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, but laying the fault vpon the Marquis of Peſquiero, he laboured to excuſe Francis Sforce, ſeduced (if he had committed any fault) by the counſels of Ierome Moron, and beſought him moſt affectionately, that for the benefite and quiet of all Chriſtendome, it would pleaſe him to pardon him. At which time the Emperour expecting the anſwer of the Pope, held in ſuſpence the practiſes of all others; and albeit he made much of the Duke of Bourbon, promiſing with ſpeed to aduance the accompliſhment of the mariage betwixt his ſiſter and him, yet when Bourbon vrged the finiſhing thereof, and would haue conſummated the mariage, he was alwayes put off till another time, & was told for excuſe, that the Emperour would firſt giue perfection to his owne mariage with the infant of Portugal, who was expected from day to day: but to the end it might be alwayes in the power of the Emperour (notwithſtanding his promiſe to the Duke of Bourbon) to giue her to wife to the French King

King if the accord went on: following herein the cuſtome of Princes, who are led rather by profite, then by honeſtie. Now after the Emperours mariage was conſummated at Seuile in Spaine, the Commander Errera arriued at the Court, with the breuiat of the article concerning Francis Sforce, which article the Pope had deduced at large in his fauour: ſo that the Emperour being well aſſured that the Legate Saluiati had no commiſſion to conclude any thing but according to that article, and all his Councell thinking it neceſſarie to hinder the league that was in hand, and dangerous to haue to do at one time with ſo great a number of enemies, he ſaw himſelfe reduced to ſuch termes, that he muſt either content the Pope and the Venetians by reſtoring Francis Sforce to the Duchie of Millan, or compound with the French King, who in the end, after long arguing and diſputation for the countrey of Burgondie, and being out of hope to recouer his libertie by any other meanes, he offered to render it to the Emperour, with all the appertenances and dependances, and to renounce all his rights to the kingdome of Naples and the Duchie of Millan, and to deliuer two of his ſonnes in hoſtage for the aſſurance of his promiſes. The diſputations were great vpon the election of the one or the other way, and the Viceroy who brought the Moſt Chriſtian King into Spaine, and had giuen him ſo many hopes, and ſo ardently procured his deliuerie, made greater inſtance then euer to that end, whoſe authoritie was great with the Emperour, for the reputation he had to loue his profite, and to be faithfull vnto him: but on the contrarie, Mercurie Gattinaro the great Chancellor, a man of baſe parentage in the countrey of Piedmont, who was of ſo great credite and experience, that he had managed of long time all the affaires of the Court of moſt importance, rather exclamed then diſputed. Theſe two being entred one day into the Councell, the Emperour being preſent, to reſolue at laſt all the matters that had bene diſcourſed ſo many moneths, the great Chancellor ſpake thus:

I haue alwayes feared (inuincible Emperour) leſt our too great couetouſneſſe, and that we haue propoſed vnto our ſelues immoderate ends, wold be the cauſe that of ſo ſingular and great a victorie, we ſhould reape in the end neither glorie nor profite: but yet I could neuer beleeue, » that the victorie could bring your reputation and eſtate into danger, as I ſee now manifeſtly it » will, ſince there is queſtion of an accord, by the which all Italy will become deſperate, and the » French King ſet at libertie, but vnder ſo vnequall conditions, that if not willingly, yet by ne- » ceſſitie, he will continue a greater enemie to you then before. For my part, I could alſo wiſh, and » with as great affection as others, that at one and the ſame time the Duchie of Burgondie might » be recouered, and ỹ foundations of your imperie in Italy eſtabliſhed: but this I know, that who- » ſoeuer will ſo ſuddenly embrace ſo much, puts himſelfe in danger to effect nothing: and that » there is no reaſon for which it may be ſaid, that the French King being deliuered, will obſerue ar- » ticles of ſo great importance. Knoweth he not, that in rendring Burgondie, he openeth you a way » into France, and that it will be alwayes in your power to runne vp euen to Paris? and that when » you haue the meanes to vexe France in ſo many places, it will be vnpoſſible for him to reſiſt you? » Doth not he know, and all the world ſee, that if he conſent that you go to Rome with an ar- » mie, you will become a bridle to all Italy, and diſpoſe at your pleaſure of the Eſtate ſpiri- » tuall and temporall of the Church, and by that meanes your puiſſance being redoubled, you » ſhall alwayes after neuer want money nor forces to offend him? and that he ſhall be conſtrained » to accept all ſuch lawes as you will impoſe vpon him? Can any man beleeue then, that he will » obſerue an accord, by the which he is made your ſlaue, and you his Lord? The lamentations » and exclamations of all the Realme of France, will they faile him, together with the perſwaſions » of the King of England, and the incitations of all Italy? It may be the amitie that is betweene you » two, may cauſe him to truſt you, or willingly to ſee your great power: but was there euer two » Princes, betweene whom there was greater cauſe of hatred and contention? There is not onely » betweene you a reciprocall iealouſie of greatneſſe, a matter apt to ſtirre vp one brother againſt » another; but alſo ancient and great hatreds, begun in the times of your fathers and great » grandfathers, ſo many and ſo great warres betweene theſe two houſes, ſo many peaces and ac- » cords not obſerued, ſo many iniuries and offences done and receiued. May we not beleeue » that he burneth with diſdaine, when he remembreth how many moneths he hath bene your pri- » ſoner? that he hath bene alwayes kept vnder very ſtrait guard, and neuer had ſo much fauour » ſhewed him as to ſee you or ſpeake with you? and that in this priſon he hath had ſo many per- » perplexities and incommodities, as he had almoſt died therewith? and that now he is not deli- »

" uered through magnanimitie, or any loue that is borne him, but for feare of ſo great a confe" deration conſpired againſt you? Shall we beleeue that an alliance made by neceſſitie, will be " more mightie then ſo many incitations? and who knoweth not, how much Princes eſteeme of
" ſuch bonds? and who can be a better witneſſe then our ſelues, of the eſtimation that is had of " parentages? But to ſome it may haply ſeeme, that we ſhall be greatly aſſured by the faith he will
" giue to returne againe into priſon. But what foundations can be more inconſiderate, and what
" hopes more vnwiſe then theſe? The great griefe which I haue found (inuincible Emperour)
" that there is a diſpoſition to take a courſe ſo hurtfull and dangerous, conſtraines me to ſpeake
" in this ſort. We all know well, what reckoning men make of their faith, when there is queſtion
" of intereſts of Eſtate; and of what force are the promiſes of the French men, who, though free " and open in all other things, yet in this regard are maiſters and moſt perfect in deceiuing; and " that this King is naturally ſo much the more hard and ſparing in effects, by how much he is plen-" tifull and prodigall in words. Therefore I conclude, that neither the good will betweene two " Princes, who haue for a very ancient inheritance iniuries and offences; nor the memorie of be-
" nefites, which are none; nor faith or promiſes, which in matters of eſtate import litle with ma" ny, but nothing with the French men, will induce him to follow an accord which raiſeth his ene-
" mie to heauen, and throweth himſelfe and his kingdome into manifeſt ſubiection. I know well
" it will be anſwered, that for feare of theſe things, and for better aſſurance, two of his children
" ſhall be demanded, and among others the eldeſt, whoſe loue he will eſteeme more then the price
" of Burgondie: but for my part I am of opinion, that the loue of his children will rather cauſe
" the contrary, when the memorie of them ſhall come to his mind, and the conſideration that to
" obſerue the accord, would be the beginning to make them your ſlaues. I know not whether ſuch
" a pawne would be ſufficient, if he ſhould be altogether deſperate to recouer it in other ſort: for
" that it is a matter of too great importance to put his Realme in danger, which being once
" loſt would hardly be recouered: but he may well hope to redeeme his children in time, either
" by accord, or ſome other occaſion; and in reſpect of their tender age, the expectation will not be " grieuous vnto him: but when he may haue almoſt all the Princes of Chriſtendome ioyned in " league againſt you, who doubteth but he will confederate with them? and that he will ſeeke to " moderate this accord by the way of warre? and that the gaine and profit which we ſhall reape by
" this victorie, will be nothing elſe but a very ſtrong and dangerous warre, ſtirred vp by the ha" tred, neceſſitie and deſpaire of the French King, the King of England, and all Italy? againſt all
" whom we may defend our ſelues, if God be not wearie with working dayly ſuch miracles for vs
" as he hath ſo often done, euen till this time; and if Fortune for our ſakes change her nature;
" and her inconſtancie and mutabilitie become vnto vs, contrary to all examples paſt, a mirrour
" of conſtancie and ſtabilitie. It is now many moneths ſince we haue concluded in all our coun-
" ſels, to vſe all poſſible meanes to let the Italians for vniting with the houſe of France: and now
" we throw our ſelues raſhly into a deliberation which takes away all difficulties that till this houre
" haue kept them in ſuſpence, which multiplieth our dangers, and increaſeth the forces of our " enemies. For who knoweth not, that that league will be more mightie which ſhall haue for
" chiefe the French King, free and in his owne kingdome, then that which ſhall be made with the " gouernment of France, the King remaining your priſoner? Who knoweth not, that nothing elſe
" hath detained the Pope till this day from entring confederation againſt you, then a feare leſt
" you ſhould ſeparate the French men from them, in offering them their King? But they will haue
" leſſe feare of ſuch a matter, when you ſhal haue ỹ children & not him: and ſo the medicine which
" we would vſe to preuent danger, will be that which without all compariſon will increaſe it,
" and in ſtead of breaking this vnion, we ſhall be the meanes whereby it will become both more
" firme and more puiſſant. But ſome may aske me, What is your aduice then? do you thinke it fit " to make no profite of ſo great a victorie? ſhall we alwayes dwell in theſe doubts and perplexi-
" ties? I confirme that which I haue many times ſpoken, that it is a matter too hurtfull to receiue
" ſo much meate at one time, as the ſtomacke cannot beare: and that it is neceſſarie, either by " returning into amitie with Italy, which demands nothing of vs but to be aſſured, to ſeeke to get
" Burgondie of the French king, and as much elſe as we can: or to make a compoſition with him,
" whereby Italy may remain at our diſcretion, but ſo eaſie in reſpect of his intereſts, ỹ he may haue
" cauſe to obſerue the conditions of it: and in the election of one of theſe two wayes, it is meet
" (moſt mightie Emperor) that your wiſedome & goodnes preferre that which is ſtable and more

iuſt, afore that which at the firſt ſhew may haply ſeeme more great and profitable. I confeſſe the Duchie of Millan is an Eſtate more rich and commodious for many regards then Burgondy, and that there can no amitie paſſe with Italy, vnleſſe Millan be transferred either to Francis Sforce or to ſome other to the Popes liking: and yet I rather like this, then to accord with the French men, for that Burgondie appertaineth to you more iuſtly then Millan, and is more eaſie to be maintained, then a countrey where no man deſireth you. To ſeeke to get Burgondie your ancient inheritance, is an action of great praiſe: but to aſpire to Millan, either for your ſelfe, or for any that dependeth wholly vpon you, cannot be without note of ambition. The firſt requireth of you ỹ memory of ſo many of your glorious predeceſſors, whoſe bones lying buried in captiuitie, do crie for nothing elſe, but that you deliuer and recouer them; and their ſo iuſt, ſo deuout, and holy deſires, may haply moue God to be more fauourable vnto you. It is a more diſcreete and eaſie counſell, to ſeeke to eſtabliſh an amitie with him that vnwillingly becomes your enemie, then with one who in no time can be your friend. For in the French king there wil always be a perpetual hate and deſire to oppoſe againſt your doings: but the Pope and the other Italians, once freed of ſuſpition by the reuoking of your armie that is in Lombardie, will haue no occaſion of controuerſie with you, either through iealouſie or feare, and remaining your friends, you ſhall draw from them both now and alwayes, great commoditie and profite. Therefore let honour, profite and ſuretie, make you the more inclined to this amitie, and no leſſe neceſſitie, if I be not deceiued. For, albeit you come to accord with the King, and bind him to no other thing then to aide you in the enterpriſes of Italy, yet me thinkes it is not likely he will obſerue it, for that he will be of opinion, that leauing you Italy in prey, he ſhould put his owne Realme in danger: and on the other ſide, the hopes and oportunities will be very great, that by the meanes of ſo mightie an vnion he ſuppoſeth he hath to trouble you, and to reduce you to accord vnder eaſie conditions: ſo that of a King priſoner, we ſhall make him free and our enemie, and giue a head to the Realme of France, ſo that ioyning with the reſidue, he may raiſe warre againſt vs with greater forces and more profite. How much better were it to confederate with the Italians? to make a good and true alliance with the Pope, who hath continually deſired it? and take from the French all hope to ioyne with the Italians? ſeeing that in that caſe neither neceſſitie nor feare of new leagues, but your owne will and the qualitie of the conditions, will draw you to accord with the French? Then ſhall you ſee that neceſſitie and deſpaire will conſtraine them not onely to deliuer Burgondie into your hands, and to grant you greater things, but alſo to deliuer you ſuch hoſtages, that you ſhall not neede to feare the obſeruation? For to ſpeake the truth, children are not ſufficient, ſo long as they may hope to effect ſo great an vnion: and ſcarcely Bayon, Narbon, and the armie by ſea, would ſuffice if they were put into your hands. Thus may you draw of this victorie a fruite great and honourable, iuſt and ſure: otherwiſe, either I vnderſtand nothing, or by this accord you ſhall embarke your eſtate into ſo great dangers, that I ſee no way to deliuer you therefrom, if haply it happen not that the indiſcretion of the French King become greater then ours. The Chancellor with this accurate and vehement ſpeech, and with the reputation of his wiſedome, had moued the minds of a great part of the Councell, when the Viceroy, principall and author of the contrarie opinion, ſpake, as they ſay, in this ſort:

The Oration of the Viceroy.

Certainly (moſt glorious Emperour) he is not to be praiſed, that by an appetite to haue much, embraceth more then he is able to hold; and he is no leſſe to be blamed, who by too much doubt and diſtruſt, doth willingly depriue himſelfe of great occaſions, gotten with ſo many difficulties and dangers: but both theſe faults being very great, that which proceedeth of feare and abiection of mind, is more to be reprehended and condemned in a great Prince, then that which proceedeth of generoſitie and greatneſſe of courage: and it is more laudable to ſeeke to winne much with danger, then for the auoiding of perill to ſuffer the occaſions to be loſt or interrupted, which very rarely happen to mortall men. Now this is that which indeed the Lord Chancellor doth counſell you, who doubting that by this accord Burgondie and Millan may not be obtained (for we muſt not thinke he is puſhed on either by the loue of Italy which is his countrey, or by the good that he wiſheth to the Duke of Millan) hath reſolued of a way, by the which, as he ſaith, we ſhall get Burgondie and loſe Millan, an Eſtate without compariſon of greater importance. But my opinion is, that we ſhould loſe Millan, and not winne Burgondie, and in ſtead that this victorie hath moſt glorioufly opened a way to the Imperie of all Chriſtendome,

« dome, there will remaine no other fruite of it, if you follow his counſell, then domage and in« famie. And certainly I cannot diſcerne any ſuretie in his counſell, but very great danger, and « verie ſmall profit, and that eaſie to ſlide out of our hands, which would be a matter ful of ſhame
« and indgnitie: but on the contrarie, in compounding with the French King, me thinks there is « great glorie, great profit, & ſufficient aſſurance. For I ask you, my Lord Chancellor, what reaſon « haue you, what ſuretie, what faith, that the Italians, after we haue left them the Duchie of Mil-
« lan, will obſerue the accord, and not intermeddle in the affaires that ſhall paſſe betweene
« the French King and vs? and not rather when they haue embaſed our reputation, when they haue « cauſed the armie to be diſſolued that doth reſtraine and bridle their malignitie, and when they « ſhall be aſſured that no new companies of Lanceknights can come into Italy, becauſe there is « no place in Lombardie to receiue them, nor where they may lodge; what ſuretie, I ſay, haue
« you, that the Italians will not then continue their practiſes, and will not by threatning the king« dome of Naples which will remaine almoſt at their diſcretion, force vs to deliuer the French
« King? Do you thinke, my Lord Chancellor, that Francis Sforce will acknowledge the fauours « that haue bene done vnto him? ſeeing he hath recompenced ſo many benefites receiued of the « Emperour with ſuch a trecherous part and wicked treaſon? What will he do now, when he « knoweth there is a purpoſe to puniſh ſo vile an act by the ſentence of law? when he feareth pu« niſhment, and expecteth his ſafetie and deliuerance from your enemies? Will you truſt the Ve- « netians, who are naturall enemies to the Empire and the houſe of Auſtria? and who tremble
« when they remember that almoſt yeſterday Maximilian your grandfather tooke from them ſo « many of thoſe townes which they now poſſeſſe? Haue you any confidence in the goodneſſe of « the Pope, or in his inclination towards the Emperour? with whom the firſt alliance that Pope
« Leo made, was (after he had attempted many things againſt vs) for a deſire either to be reuen-
« ged, or to be aſſured againſt the French men, and for ambition to occupie Ferrara? and after him
« the Pope now reigning who was hated of the one moitie of the world, continued by neceſſitie
« (after the death of Leo) in your amitie; but when he was become Pope, he returned immediatly
« to the nature of Popes, which is to feare and hate the Emperours, ſo that he had nothing more
« in horror then the name of the Emperour. All this haply may be excuſed, & it may be anſwered, « that their cõplots and enterpriſes proceeded not of hatred or ambition, but only of the iealouſie
« of your greatneſſe, the which being ceaſſed, all practiſes will take end. But either this is not « true, or if at the beginning it was true, it muſt of neceſſitie haue taken other rootes, and be« come another humor, for that it is a thing naturall, that hatred followeth ſuſpition, and offences
« and vexations come after hatred, and after offences men draw to alliance and amitie with the e« nemies of him whom they haue offended, labouring to raiſe practiſes, not onely for their proper
« the remembrance of wrongs is far greater and more ſtirring in the mind of him that doth them, « then in him that receiueth them. Wherefore although at the firſt they were moued onely with « ſuſpition, the ſame was the cauſe that moued them to become your enemies, & incited them to « turne as wel their minds as their hopes to the French part, and afterwards to begin to deuide a« mong themſelues the Realme of Naples, as they haue done in all contracts paſt: now let vs giue « them what ſuretie, and make what accord you will with them, hatred and feare will ſtill burne in « their breaſts; not truſting to that which ſeemeth to them to be done by neceſſitie; and « ſuppoſing they haue no more meanes to range you to their wils, fearing leſt in the « end there be made betweene the French King and vs a new appointment, ſemblable to that « which was made at Cambray, and deſiring (to vſe their owne words) to deliuer Italy of ſtrangers;
« they will preſume to giue you lawes, and to demand of you the deliuerie of the French King;
« the which if you refuſe (moſt noble Emperour) how can you defend againſt them the king-
« dome of Naples? and if you grant it them, you loſe all the fruits of the victorie, and remaine
« the moſt diſhonored and deſpiſed Prince that euer was. But let vs put the caſe that Italy will ob« ſerue the accord, and that neceſſitie conſtraine you either to leaue Millan or not to reco« uer Burgondie, what compariſon is there betweene theſe two? Burgondie is a countrey of litle « circuite, of ſmall reuenue, and not ſo commodious as many perſwade themſelues. The Duchie « of Millan, both for the riches and beautie of ſo many Cities, for the number and nobleneſſe of
« world, is more to be eſteemed then many kingdomes: and beſides the amplitude and puiſſance

of it, there is more reckoning to be made of the commodities that may reuert to you by the conqueſt thereof, then of the value of the thing it ſelfe. For Millan and Naples being at your deuotion, it will follow by neceſſitie that the Popes, as anciently they were wont, muſt depend vpon the Emperours: That all Tuſcane, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua, ſhall be your ſubiects: and the Venetians being enuironed by Lombardie and Germanie, will be conſtrained to accept lawes at your hand: and thus, I ſay, not with force and armes diſplayed, but with the reputation of your name, with one onely Herald, with the enſignes of the Empire, you ſhall command all Italy. And who knoweth not what Italy is? A Prouince by good right eſteemed the Queene of all others, for the oportunitie of her ſituation, for the temperature of the aire and Climate, for the multitude & excellencie of wits moſt apt for all honorable enterpriſes, for the fertilitie of all things neceſſarie to the life of man, for the greatneſſe and beautie of ſo many noble Cities, for her riches, for the ſeate of Religion, for the ancient glorie of the Empire, and for infinite other regards, the which if you command, you ſhal be always redoubted of all other Princes. It belongeth more to your greatneſſe and glorie, to looke after this, and is more agreeable to the bones of your elders (ſith theſe alſo are brought into conſideration) who both for their goodneſſe and pietie, we are not to beleeue do deſire any other thing then what is moſt conuenient, and moſt glorious for your name. So that, by following the counſell of the Lord Chancellor, we ſhall loſe a very great matter for a thing right ſmall, that litle alſo being very vncertaine, as we may well know by that which was like to haue happened certaine moneths paſt. Do we not remember how much we were troubled when the French King lay in ſo great danger of death? and that the ſame proceeded of no other thing then of the knowledge, that by his death we ſhould loſe all the fruite hoped for by the victorie? And who can aſſure vs that the verie ſame may not now happen? but more eaſily, for as much as the relikes of his maladie do yet hang vpon him, and for that the hope which till now hath ſupported him, being taken away, greater diſcontentments, the onely cauſe of his ſickneſſe, will returne vpon him: eſpecially ſeeing (by reaſon there is debating of new conditions and aſſurances, which cannot eaſily be agreed vnto) the negociation of new practiſes will be long and tedious, which will be ſubiect to this accident, and haply to others more great and more dangerous. Do we not well know, that nothing hath ſo long retained the Gouernment and Counſel of France, as the opinion they haue of his ſpeedie deliuerie? by meanes whereof the Nobles and Chieftaines of that Realme haue remained peaceable and obedient to the Ladie Regent: but as ſoone as they ſhall find this hope to faile, it may eaſily happen thereby that the Realme being moued therewith, will alter the gouerment: That if the great ones of the kingdome get once the bridle in their hand, they will take no care for the deliuerie of their King, but to maintaine themſelues in libertie and to be maiſters, they will be glad of his captiuitie: and ſo in ſtead of getting Burgondie and ſo many other great things, we can no more hope for any thing by his deliuerie. But I aske you further, my Lord Chancellor, whether the Emperour in this reſolution ought to haue any regard to his dignitie and Maieſtie? and what greater infamie he can receiue, and what greater diminution of his honour, then to be conſtrained to pardon Francis Sforce? and that a man halfe dead, a rebell, and ſingular example of ingratitude, not in humbling himſelfe; and imploring your mercie, but caſting himſelfe into the armes of your enemies, ſhould force you to yeeld vp & render vnto him the Eſtate which ſo iuſtly hath bene taken from him, and to receiue lawes of him? It were better (moſt inuincible Emperour) and more agreeable to the dignitie of the Empire and your greatneſſe, to expoſe your ſelfe againe to fortune, & to put all things again in danger, then forgetting the degree which you hold, and hauing no regard to the authoritie of the ſoueraigne Prince ouer all Princes, & to the name of the Emperor, hauing ſo often vanquiſhed ſo mightie a King, to accept & receiue at the hands of Prieſts and Merchants, ſuch conditions, as if you had bene ouerthrowne, there could not haue bene offered to you either more vniuſt or more vnworthy. Therefore all theſe reaſons conſidered; and how ſmall the profit wil be which may come to you by the accord with the Italians; and by how many accidents it may eaſily ſlip out of your hands; how vnſure it is to truſt them; and how vnworthy a thing it is to leaue the Eſtate of Millan; and alſo that it is neceſſarie to reſolue our ſelues, and once to conſider the end, and that the impriſonment of the King profiteth vs not, but in regard of the fruites that may be drawne of his deliuerie: I haue counſelled, and do counſell againe, that we compound rather with the King then with the Italians; which is a matter

ter that cannot be denied to be more glorious, more reaſonable, and more profitable, ſo farre forth as we may be aſſured of the obſeruation, wherein I make ſome foundation, both of his thankefulneſſe for the benefite he ſhall receiue of you, of the bond of affinitie, and of the vertue of your ſiſter, a fit inſtrument to maintaine this amitie; but much more of his two ſons, and among theſe of the eldeſt, which is ſuch a pawne, as I know not whether any more great or more importãt can be receiued. And ſeeing our neceſſity drieth vs to determine ſomething, we ought rather repoſe confidence in a French king vnder ſuch hoſtages, then in the Italians without any gage: and rather to truſt the word and faith of ſo great a King, then the immoderate couetouſnes of Prieſts, and the ſuſpitious niggardlineſſe of Merchants: and with more facilitie may we haue amitie for a time with the French (as our elders haue often had) then with the Italians our naturall and perpetuall enemies. And in this way I do not onely diſcerne greater hope that faith will be kept with vs, but alſo leſſe danger in caſe of promiſe breaking. For if the King refuſe to render vs Burgondie, at leaſt he will not dare (his children remaining hoſtages) to offend you againe, but will labour by ſolicitation and ſuite to moderate the accord: and beſides, being as it were but yeſterday vanquiſhed by you, and newly come out of priſon, he will ſtand in feare of you, and will not haue the courage to make a new proofe of your fortune. And if he take not armes againſt you, it is certaine that all others will be quiet enough: ſo that you may conquer the Caſtle of Millan, and ſo eſtabliſh your ſelfe in that Eſtate, that hereafter you ſhall not need to feare the malice of any man. But if you accord now with the Italians, and they will breake their promiſe, there remaineth no bridle to reſtraine them: and their power increaſing to offend you, their deſire will likewiſe augment and be more free therein. Therefore in my iudgement it would be verie great both timorouſneſſe and imprudencie, for too great ſuſpition to loſe an accord ſo full of glorie, and ſo honorable, and wherein there is ſufficient ſuretie, to take in place thereof a reſolution (if I be not deceiued) very dangerous and domageable.

When the Viceroy had ſpoken, the opinions of the reſidue of the Councell were diuerſe: all ſuch as were of vpright iudgement ſuppoſing that to accord with the French King according to the maner propounded, would be a deliberation very dangerous: and yet the deſire to get Burgondie was ſo great in the Flemings, as being the ancient patrimonie and title of their Princes, that it ſuffered them not to diſcerne the truth: and likewiſe the bruite went, that the gifts and great promiſes made by the French men, wrought much with many: but the Emperour aboue all the reſidue (either for that ſuch was his firſt inclination, or for that the authoritie of the Viceroy could do much with him, chiefly hauing the Count Naſſau concurrant with him, or haply becauſe he held it too great an indignitie to be conſtrained to pardon Francis Sforce,) hearkened willingly to ſuch as counſelled him to compound with the French King: ſo that when he had cauſed the Legate Saluiati to be ſounded againe, to know if he would conſent that the Eſtate of Millan ſhould be giuen to the Duke of Bourbon, and that he was certified that the Legate had no commiſſion to accept of that condition (in which caſe he would haue preferred the amitie of the Pope,) he determined to accord with the French king, with whom (matters hauing bene alreadie debated, and in a maner concluded) he came to concluſion in a very few days, the Popes Legate not medling with any thing: & the Emperor had alreadie obtained the conſent of the Duke of Bourbon to giue in mariage to the French King his ſiſter, whom he had promiſed to him; wherunto he conſented after he had bene much intreated, not ſo much for the deſire he had to get the Duchie of Millan, which was promiſed to him againſt the will of the great Chancellour and the Viceroy, although with condition to be bound to pay a great ſumme of money, as for that his affaires being reduced to ſuch termes that they neither depended nor could depend vpon any other then the Emperour, he was conſtrained to accommodate himſelfe to his will: and as ſoone as he had giuen his conſent, he departed forthwith by the Emperours direction, to the end not to be preſent at the Court at ſo inconuenient a time, taking his way towards Barſelonia, whither neceſſarie prouiſions to paſſe into Italy were to be ſent vnto him, the which for want of veſſels (for at that time there were but three galleys in Spaine) and for lacke of money, ſtayed verie long.

The ſolicitation of the peace which was reſolued the fourteenth day of February in the yeare 1526, contained: That betweene the Emperour and the French King ſhould be a peace perpetuall, in the which ſhould be comprehended all ſuch as ſhould be named by their common conſent:

ſent: That the French King by the ſixt day of the next moneth of March, ſhould be ſet at libertie, vpon the marches in the coaſt of Fontarabie; and that within ſixe weekes after he ſhould conſigne to the Emperour the Duchie of Burgondie, the Countie of Charrolois, the iuriſdiction of Noyers, the Caſtle Chinon dependances of the ſaid Duchie, the Viſcountie of Auſſone, the iuriſdiction of S. Laurence de la Roche a dependant of Franch Countie, together with all the appertenances as well of the ſaid Duchie as Countie of Burgondie, which hereafter ſhould be ſeparate and exempted from the ſoueraigntie of the Realme of France: That at the very houre and inſtant that the King ſhould be deliuered, there ſhould be put into the Emperours hands the Daulphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleans the Kings ſecond ſon, or twelue of the principall Lords of France, whom the Emperour ſhould name, leauing it in the election of the Ladie Regent, either to deliuer the Kings ſecond ſonne or the twelue Barons, who ſhould remaine as hoſtages vntill reſtitution were made of the lands and places aforeſaid, and the peace ſworne and ratified, together with all the articles, by the general Eſtates of France, and enregiſtred (which they call abſolute approbation) in all the Courts of Parliament of that kingdome, with neceſſarie ſolemnities: for the performance whereof, there was ſet downe a terme of foure moneths; at which time returning the hoſtages, there ſhould be put into the Emperours hands, the Duke of Angouleſme the Kings third ſonne, to the end he might be trained vp with the Emperour, the better to entertaine and aſſure the peace: That the French King ſhould renounce and giue vp to the Emperour all his rights to the Realme of Naples, and chiefly thoſe which were to come to him by the inueſtiture of the Church: and that he ſhould do the like touching his intereſts in the Eſtates of Millan, Genes, Aſt, and likewiſe of Arras, Tourney, de l'Iſle, and of Doway: That he ſhould render vp alſo the Towne and Caſtle of Hedin as a member of the Countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moueables that were in it when it was laſt taken: That he ſhould renounce the ſoueraigntie of Flanders and Artois, and all other places which the Emperour poſſeſſed. And on the other ſide, that the Emperour ſhould reſigne to him all the title and quarell which he pretended to any place poſſeſſed by the French men, and ſpecially the townes and Caſtlewikes of Peronne, Mondidier, Roye, the Counties of Bulleine and Poitiers, with other townes ſtanding vpon the ſhores of the riuer of Somme: That there ſhould be betweene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defence of their Eſtates, with obligation to aide one another when need required, with fiue hundred men at armes and ten thouſand footmen: That the Emperour ſhould promiſe to giue in mariage to the Moſt Chriſtian King the Ladie Eleoner his ſiſter, whom as ſoone as the diſpenſation ſhould be obtained from the Pope he ſhould contract, with words binding for the preſent, and afterwards ſhe ſhould be led into France to conſummate the mariage at the ſame time that according to the capitulations the hoſtages were to be deliuered: That ſhe ſhould haue for her portion two hundred thouſand crownes, with Iewels according to her eſtate, the one moitie of the money to be payed within ſixteene moneths, and the other halfe one yeare after: That a mariage ſhould be made betweene the Daulphin and the daughter of the King of Portugal, daughter to the Ladie Eleoner, as ſoone as their age would ſuffer: That the French King ſhould do all that he could to induce the ancient King of Nauarre to giue vp to the Emperour the rights of that kingdome; and in caſe he would not do it, that the King ſhould giue him no ſuccours: That the King ſhould likewiſe cauſe the Duke of Gueldres and the Count of Zutphen, and the principall townes of their eſtates, to promiſe with ſufficient ſecuritie, to giue themſelues to the Emperour, after their death: That the King ſhould giue no ſuccours to the Duke of Wittenberg, nor likewiſe to Robert de la March: That he ſhould furniſh and rigge for the Emperour, when he ſhould paſſe into Italy, and two moneths after he ſhall be ſo required, twelue galleys, foure ſhips, and foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed at his owne coſt, except the men of warre; and that the ſaid veſſels ſhould be rendred three moneths after, accounting from the day of his embarking: That in ſtead of the armie by land which the King offered for Italy, he ſhould pay two hundred thouſand crownes in money, the one halfe within ſixteene moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after: And that at the time when the hoſtages ſhould be deliuered, he ſhould be bound to giue bils of exchange for the pay of ſixe thouſand footmen for ſixe moneths immediatly after the Emperours arriuall in Italy: That he ſhould alſo furniſh for his ſeruice fiue hundred Lances payed, with a band of artillerie: That he ſhould ſaue harmeleſſe the Emperour of his promiſe made to the King of England for the penſions which the French King owed him, the arrerages whereof amounted to fiue hundred thouſand crownes, or elſe to deliuer ſo much readie money to the Emperour: That they ſhould both ioyne to intreate the Pope to call a generall Councell as ſoone as poſſibly might be, to the end to conſult of peace among Chriſtians, of an enterpriſe againſt the Infidels and heretickes, and to grant to all men the Croiſado for three yeares: That within ſixe weekes the King ſhould reſtore the Duke of Bourbon in moſt ample forme, into all his Eſtates & goods, moueable and vnmoueable, with the fruits and reuenues receiued: and that he ſhould not moleſt him for any thing paſt, nor conſtraine him to dwell or go to the Realme of France: and that it ſhould be lawfull to the ſaid Duke of Bourbon to demand by the way of iuſtice, the Earledome of Prouence: That in like ſort all thoſe that had followed him ſhould reenter in ſafetie into their goods and eſtates, and namely the Biſhop of Autun and Monſieur de Saint Valier: That the priſoners taken in the warre ſhould be deliuered on both parts within fifteene dayes: That there ſhould be reſtitution made to the Ladie Margaret of Auſtria of all that ſhe poſſeſſed afore the warre: That the Prince of Orange ſhould be ſet at libertie, with reſtauration to the Principalitie of Orange, and all that he poſſeſſed by the death of his father, which had bene taken from him for following the faction of the Emperour: and that the like ſhould be done to ſome other Barons: That the Marquis of Saluſſa ſhould haue his Eſtate reſtored vnto him: That the King, as ſoone as he arriued in the firſt towne of his Realme, ſhould ratifie this capitulation, and be bound to procure the Daulphin to ratifie it when he ſhould come to the age of foureteene yeares. Many were named by common conſent, and among them the Swiſſers: but not one of the Potentates of Italy, except the Pope, whom they named as conſeruator of this accord, and that more for manners ſake and ceremonie, then in effect and true meaning. Laſtly, it was expreſſed in the ſaid capitulation, that in caſe the King for any occaſion ſhould not accompliſh the things promiſed, he ſhould returne voluntarily into priſon. All Chriſtendome maruelled much at this accord. For when it was vnderſtood that the firſt execution thereof conſiſted in the deliuerie of the King, the vniuerſall opinion was, that being deliuered, he would not giue vp Burgondie, as being a member of too great importance for the Realme of France: and beſides thoſe few who had counſelled the Emperour to it, all his Court had the ſame iudgement, and aboue all the great Chancellor reproued and deteſted the matter with ſo great vehemencie, that notwithſtanding he was commanded to ſigne the capitulation according to the office of chiefe Chancellor, he refuſed to do it, alledging that in matters dangerous and hurtfull, as that was, he ought not to vſe the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he euer be altered from this opinion, notwithſtanding the Emperour was angrie with him: who ſeeing him ſo reſolute in his opinion, ſigned it himſelfe, and within few dayes after went to Madril to confirme the alliance and make a foundation of amitie and good-will with the King, by entertaining him with familiar and priuate conference. Great were the ceremonies and demonſtrations of amitie betweene them: oftentimes they ſhewed themſelues together in publike places; they had oftentimes alone in ſecret very long diſcourſes: they went together in one coach to a Caſtle halfe a dayes iourney from thence, where was Queene Eleoner whom the King contracted: and yet notwithſtanding all theſe great ſignes of peace and amitie, he was no leſſe ſtraitly guarded then before, without hauing any more libertie: ſo that at one and the ſame time he was embraced as a brother and guarded as a priſoner; which made manifeſt to the world, that it was an accord full of diſcord, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euery occaſion their ancient iealouſies and paſſions would be ſtronger in them then the regard of things done more by force then otherwiſe. Now when many dayes were ſpent in theſe actions, and that the ratification of the Ladie Regent was come, together with the declaration, that with the Daulphin of France they would rather giue in hoſtage the Kings ſecond ſonne then the twelue Barons, the King departed from Madril to go to the frontier of his Realme, where his perſon was to be exchanged for his ſonnes, who were verie yong: and there was ſent to accompanie him the Viceroy the author of his deliuerie, to whom the Emperour had giuen the Citie of Aſt and other Eſtates in Flanders and in the kingdome of Naples.

At this time the Emperour wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein he certified him, that for the deſire of peace, and the common good of Chriſtendome, ſo many iniuries and enmities forgotten, he had reſtored the French King to libertie, and had giuen him his ſiſter in mariage,

mariage, and that he had choſen him for the preſeruer of peace, and would alwayes continue his moſt obedient ſon: and not many dayes after he wrote to him another letter of his owne hand, which he ſent by the ſame Commander Errera, who had brought with him the letter written vnto him with the Popes owne hand, anſwering it partly with gracious and partly with rigorous words, concluding, that if Francis Sforce were not found guiltie of that whereof he was accuſed, he would reſtore to him the Duchie of Millan; and that he would haue the matter tried by the courſe of iuſtice, by ſuch Iudges as ſhould be deputed by himſelfe, as his ſuperiour: but in caſe it were found that he were guiltie, he could do no leſſe then inueſt in that Eſtate the Duke of Bourbon, to whom himſelfe was the cauſe that he had promiſed it, aduiſing him thereunto whileſt Francis Sforce lay ſicke; and as well to ſatisfie him, as to aſſure all Italy, he purpoſed not either to retaine that Dukedome for himſelfe, or to giue it to his owne brother, affirming vpon his faith, that ſuch was his ſimple intention, the which he earneſtly deſired him to approue, offering him alwayes his authoritie and forces, as an obedient ſonne to the Sea Apoſtolike. The ſame Errera alſo brought the anſwer to the draught of the article which had bene ſet downe at large by the Pope in fauour of Francis Sforce, which article the Emperour continuing in his firſt reſolution, would not allow: but ſent by the ſaid Errera to the Duke of Seſſa the forme of the accord as he was determined finally to paſſe it, with authoritie and power to contract if the Pope would accept it. The contents whereof were: That Francis Sforce ſhould be comprehended in the confederation, ſo farre forth as he were not found guiltie in the crime of treaſon: but in caſe of his death or depriuation, the Duke of Bourbon ſhould ſucceed in the confederation, and receiue of him the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan: The obligation was confirmed which the Viceroy had made for the reſtitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, but with condition that the Pope ſhould be bound to paſſe to him the inueſtiture of Ferrara, and forgiue him the penaltie of contrauention; matters contrary to the Popes drifts, who had determined to exact a paine of an hundred thouſand duckats, to pay the hundred thouſand which he had promiſed to the Emperour in caſe of that reſtitution: He would not admit that the eſtate of Millan ſhould take Salt of the Church, nor referre himſelfe touching the collation of benefices in the Realme of Naples to the tenour of the inueſtitures, but to the cuſtome of the former Kings, who in many caſes had contemned the rights and authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike. And becauſe a treatie had bene made with the Legate, that to remoue the armie out of Lombardie which was a great charge to all Italy, the Pope, and he as King of Naples, and the other Potentates of Italy, ſhould pay an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and the ſaid armie to retire into Naples, or into ſome ſuch place out of Italy as ſhould ſeeme good to the Emperour, who ſaid he would tranſport it into Barbarie: and it was added, that becauſe there was more due to the armie then was owing them at that time, there ſhould be leuied a pay of two hundred thouſand duckats. A copie of theſe articles was preſented to the Pope by the Duke of Seſſa and the Commander Errera, with proteſtation that it was not in their power to alter or change one ſyllable: and yet all other difficulties had eaſily taken forme, if the Duchie of Millan had bene ſo diſpoſed of as the Pope with the reſidue had had no cauſe to enter into ſuſpition. But they conſidered that the Duke of Bourbon was ſo implacable an enemie to the French King, that either for his ſuretie, or for a deſire to enter into France, he would be alwayes very ſubiect to the Emperour, and that it could neuer be hoped that he would be diſcontented with his exceſſiue greatneſſe: and that the article to remoue the armie out of Lombardie, a matter ſo greatly deſired of all, and for which they would not haue thought ſtrange to haue giuen any ſumme of money, would be to litle purpoſe, ſo long as there remained at Millan a Duke, who euen at the leaſt becke of the Emperour, would not onely admit him, but haply for his owne intereſt would wiſh and deſire him. Therefore the Pope, who (for that in the accord which the Emperour had made with the French King, there was no particular mention of him, nor of the ſuretie of the Eſtates of Italy) was confirmed in his former opinion, that the greatneſſe of the Emperour would be his ſeruitude, determined not to accept the accord in the maner it was offered him, but to keepe himſelfe free vntill he were aſſured what courſe the French would take touching the obſeruation of the peace: in which reſolution he remained the more willingly, for as much as beſides that which ſeemed likely vnto him, he had heard by the relation of certaine ſpeeches deliuered by the King afore his libertie, and ſpread abroad by ſome that were familiar in counſell with him, that the King would neuer obſerue the things he had promiſed the Emperour: and to confirme the King in that deliberation (for his owne ſuretie depended thereupon) he ſent in poſt into France, Paul Vettori a Florentine, Captaine of his Galleys, to the end to be at the Court at the ſame time the King ſhould arriue, vſing that diligence not onely to know his intention as ſoone as might be, but alſo to the end that the King hauing a readie hope to be able to draw into league the Pope and the Venetians againſt the Emperour, might take occaſion to reſolue the ſooner. Therfore Paul had in charge, to congratulate in the Popes name the Kings deliuerie, and to declare vnto him what he had done to that end, and how much the practiſes of confederation that were entertained with the Ladie Regent, had induced the Emperour to deliuer him: and further, that he ſhould impart vnto him the Popes vehement deſire to haue an vniuerſall peace in Chriſtendome, and that the Emperour and he ſhould make warre together againſt the Turke, who was reported to make mightie preparations to inuade that yeare the Realme of Hungarie. Theſe were his Commiſſions apparent and knowne; but the moſt important and ſecret was, that aboue all things he ſhould endeuour dexterouſly to ſound throughly the Kings inclination, and if he found him enclined to obſerue the treatie of Madril, then to paſſe no further, for feare of making his affaires with the Emperour worſe then before; but if he found him otherwiſe diſpoſed, or at leaſt in doubt, that he ſhould labour to confirme him in that diſpoſition; and ſeruing his turne of all occaſions, he ſhould counſell him to take that courſe, giuing him knowledge of the Popes deſire to ioyne with him for the common benefite. He diſpatched in like ſort into England the Pronotarie Gambaro, to vſe the like office with that King, to the ſame end: and at his perſwaſion the Venetians ſent into France their Secretarie Andrew Roſſe, with the like commiſſions: and for as much as Paul as ſoone as he came to Florence fell ſicke and died, the Pope ſent in his place Capin of Mantua, although he tooke it for an ill ſigne, that now the ſecond time the miniſters which he had ſent into France to aduance theſe practiſes, were dead by the way. In the meane while both he and the Venetians did all they could to encourage the Duke of Millan, and entertained him with hopes, leſt the peace of Madril might cauſe him vnaduiſedly to make ſome accord with the Emperour.

The manner of the deliuerie of the French King.

By this time the French King was come to Fontaraby, a towne appertaining to the Emperor, ſtanding neare the Ocean ſea, vpon the frontiers of Biſcay and the Duchie of Guyen: and on the other ſide, the Ladie Regent was arriued with the children of France at Bayon, which is not farre from Fontaraby: and ſhe had lingred ſome time longer then the day appointed for the permutation, by reaſon the gout tooke her by the way. Then the eighteenth day of March, the French King accompanied with the Viceroy and Captaine Alarcon, with fiftie horſe, came to the ſhore of the riuer that deuideth the Realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine: at the ſame time Monſieur de Lautrech with the Kings children and the like number of horſe preſenting themſelues on the other ſide. There was in the midſt of the riuer a great barke made faſt with ankers, in which was no perſon. The King approched to this barke in a litle boate, wherein he was accompanied with the Viceroy, Captaine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with ſhort weapons: and on the other ſide of the Barke were likewiſe brought in a litle boate Monſieur de Lautrech with the hoſtages, and eight others armed in the ſame maner. After this the Viceroy went into the Barke with all his companie, and the King with them: and preſently after Monſieur de Lautrech with his eight that accompanied him, ſo that within the Barke there was a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the Viceroy, and Monſieur de Lautrech and the others with the perſon of the King: who when they were all thus within the Barke, Monſieur de Lautrech fetched out of the boate into the Barke, the Daulphin, who being giuen to the Viceroy, and by him committed to Captaine Alarcon, was forthwith beſtowed in their boate, and after him followed the litle Duke of Orleans, who was no ſooner entred the Barke, then the French King leaped out of the Barke into his boate, with ſuch ſwiftneſſe, that this permutation was thought to be done at one ſelfe inſtant: and then the King being brought to the ſhore, mounted ſuddenly (as though he had feared ſome ambuſh) vpon a Turkiſh horſe of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe, which was prepared for the purpoſe, and ranne without ſtay to Saint Iohn de Lus, a towne of his obedience foure leagues from thence; and being there readily relieued with a freſh horſe, he ranne with the ſame ſwiftneſſe to Bayon, where he was receiued with incredible ioy of all the Court, from whence he diſpatched with great diligence a Gentleman to the King of England, with letters of his owne hand, whereby he ſignified in what ſort he was deliuered, and with charge to tell him, that he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought wholly by him, offering to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell: and soone after he sent vnto him other Embassadours, solemnely to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him when he was prisoner: for that he made great account of the amitie of that King.

THE XVII. BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGVMENT.

THe Pope and the French king, the Venetians and the Duke of Millan, draw into league against the Emperour. The Duke of Bourbon comes to Millan. The armie of the League breakes vp from before Millan. The Castle of Millan rendred to the Imperials. Many enterprises are dressed against the Pope. The Confederates send their armies by sea to Genes. Rome is surprised by the Colonnois. The Pope makes truce with the Imperials, which hurteth the deuices of Lombardy. The Duke of Ferrara confederates with the Emperour.

NOtwithstanding the pledges of the two children of France (of whom the eldest being heire apparent to so great a succession, was one) was added to the oath and faith that passed betweene the Emperour and the French King, for the confirmation of the accord solemnely made at Madril, and withall the King had contracted the Emperours sister: yet by his deliuerie all the Princes of Christendome were brought into no small expectation, and the eyes of all men which before were fixed onely vpon the Emperour, began now to be turned towards the King, for that sundry and great effects depended vpon his deliberation either to obserue or not to obserue the capitulations of Madril. For if he obserued them, they saw that Italy, vnable to defend it selfe, would fall, without any remedie, into seruitude; and that the authoritie and greatnesse of the Emperour would be maruellously increased: and if he obserued them not, the Emperour would be constrained by the inobseruancie of the French King to forget the conspiracies and enterprises dressed against him by the Duke of Millan, and to restore him to that Duchie, to the end the Pope and the Venetians might not haue cause to ioyne with the King; and that by this meanes he should lose the great profits he hoped to reape by his victorie: or else (his indignation against the Duke of Millan being more powerfull in him, together with his desires to haue no impediment of the French in Italy) to assure the accord made with the King, conuerting the obligation to restore Burgondie into the paiment of money: or else yeelding to neither of these, to haue against so many enemies a warre, which (almost by his owne confession) was very difficult; since to auoid it, he was reduced to this strait, to deliuer the French King with so great danger. But the world stood not long in doubt of the will & intention of the French king: for that as soone as he was arriued at Bayon, being required by a Gentleman of the Viceroys to ratifie the accord, as he had promised to do as soone as he was come into a free place, he deferred it from day to day with many excuses: wherewith to the end to hold the Emperour in hope, he sent vnto him a man expresse, to signifie vnto him, that he had not presently accomplished the ratification, for that it was necessarie before he proceeded to such an act, to reappease and moderate the minds of his subiects, who were discontented with obligations that tended to the diminution of the Crowne of France: but notwithstanding all difficulties, he would vndoubtedly obserue all that he had promised. By this dealing, his intentions being easily apprehended, shortly after the messengers that were sent to him by the Pope and the Venetians arriued, who needed not labour much to be well informed of his inclination. For, after he had receiued them very courteously, in the first discourses that he held seuerally and apart with each of them, he complained much of the inhumanitie of the Emperour towards him whilest he was his prisoner, not vsing him like a Prince as he was, nor with that affection which a Prince ought to shew being touched with commiseration for the calamities of another Prince, or with the consideration, that that which had befallen him, might also happen to himselfe: and he alledged the example of Edward King of England, (who was called Edward Long-shankes) to whom when John King of the French men was presented, being taken by the Prince of Wales his sonne in the battell of Poytiers, he did not onely receiue him with great courtesie, but also left him vnder a free guard all the time of his imprisonment within the Realme of England, during which time he had dayly familiar conuersation with him, tooke him oftentimes to accompanie him on hunting, and made him eate at his table: and yet for all that, he lost not his prisoner, nor obtained thereby an accord lesse fauourable for him; but thereby it came to passe, that there grew betweene them such familiaritie and confidence, that King John, euen after he was deliuered, and had continued many yeares in France, returned voluntarily into England for a desire he had to visite his host: That there was remembrance onely of two Kings of France that had bene taken prisoners in battell, King John and himselfe: but the diuersitie of the examples was no lesse notable: for that in the one might be seene mildnesse and courtesie, and in the other the seueritie and rigor of a conqueror: That he had not found him of a more milde and peaceable disposition towards others, but perceiued plainly by his speeches vsed at Madril, that being full of ambition, he thought vpon nothing more, then how to bring the Church, Italy, and all the other Princes into seruitude: and therefore he wished the Pope and the Venetians to be carefull to prouide for their proper safetie, which if they did, he would shew how desirous he was to concurre with them for the common safetie, and to make league with them to take armes against the Emperour; not that he intended to recouer for himselfe the Estate of Millan, or otherwise to increase his puissance, but onely that by the meanes of warre he might recouer his children, and reassure the libertie of Italy, seeing the too great couetousnesse of the Emperour had left him no colour to bind him in such sort that he should be constrained to obserue the capitulation: seeing that both at the first whilest he was in the Castle of Pisqueton, and afterwards in Spaine in the Castle of Madril, he had oftentimes protested to the Emperour by reason of the inequalitie of his demands, that if through necessitie he were driuen to compound vnder conditions vniust, or such as were not in his power to performe, that not onely he would not obserue them, but also reputing himselfe iniuried by him, in that he had constrained him to make promises vnreasonable and vnpossible, he would be reuenged if euer occasion were offered: and that he had not forborne oftentimes to tell him, that which of themselues they might know, and which he beleeued was obserued likewise in other Realmes, that it was not in the power of a King of France, to bind himselfe to the alienation of any thing depending vpon the Crowne, without the consent of the generall Estates of the Realme: and that the lawes of Christians did not permit, that he who was taken in warre should be detained in perpetuall prison, as being a punishment proper for malefactors, and not ordained to punish such as had bene beaten with the crueltie of fortune: That all men knew, that obligations made by constraint in prison, were of no value; and that the capitulation being of no force, the faith likewise which was but accessorie and the confirmation of the same, could not be bound: That the oathes which he had made at Rhemes, where the Kings of France are consecrated with so great ceremonie and with the heauenly oyle, were more ancient, by the which he was bound, according to the custome of all the other Kings of France, not to alienate the patrimonie of the Crowne: That for these reasons he was no lesse free then readie to moderate the pride of the Emperour. The Kings mother seemed to haue the same desire, and likewise his sister, who for that she had in vaine taken a long iourney into Spaine, complained much of the rigor of the Emperour; and likewise all the chiefe of his Court, who were of his most secret counsell, concluding that if Mandates came from the Pope and the Venetians, the league should presently be accomplished, which they said were best to be negociated in France, to the end to draw into it with more facilitie the King of England, whereof they shewed great hope. These were the discourses which the King held with them, which were much assured as well by himself as by thoſe about him: but in ſecret, his thoughts were farre otherwiſe. For howſoeuer he was reſolued not to deliuer vp Burgondie to the Emperour, yet his mind was far eſtranged from moouing warre againſt him, vnleſſe he were compelled by great neceſſitie ſo to do. But he hoped, that in debating to confederate himſelfe with the Italians, the Emperour (to auoide ſo great a gulfe of difficulties) would be induced to conuert into obligation of money, the article of the reſtitution of Burgondie: in which caſe, no regard touching the matters of Italy ſhould ſtay him from couenanting with him, for the deſire he had to bring home his children.

But when the Agents of the Pope and the Venetians had receiued from him ſo great hope, they made preſent relation of the anſwer they had, at a time when the neceſſitie and occaſion to confederate againſt the Emperour increaſed in Italy: the neceſſitie, for that the Duke of Millan (who at the beginning, partly by the fault of his officers, and partly for ỹ ſhortnes of the time he had to make prouiſion, had beſtowed within the Caſtle ſmall ſtore of victuals, and that litle was not diſpoſed in ſuch meaſure, as men reduced to ſo hard termes are wont to vſe) gaue notice oftentimes (for though he was beſieged in the Caſtle, he had always meanes to write) that he had want of victuals, and that being able to hold out no longer then the next moneth of Iune, he ſhould be conſtrained to giue himſelfe vp to the diſcretion of the Emperour if other prouiſion were not made. And albeit it was beleeued, that the Duke (according to the cuſtome of ſuch as are beſieged) propounded greater want then indeed there was, yet there were many reaſons to thinke that he had but ſmall ſtore of victuals: and to ſuffer the Caſtle to fall into the hands of the Emperour, beſides the increaſe of his reputation, it was a matter that made the recouerie of that State more hard. But the occaſion increaſed no leſſe then the neceſſitie, ſeeing the people were reduced to the laſt deſpaire. For the Emperour ſending no money to his armie, to whom many payes were due, and hauing no meanes to leuie any elſewhere, the Captaines had diſtributed the regiments of the men at armes and light horſemen in ſeuerall places of the countrey, charging this towne to contribute to one companie, and that to another, who were compelled to compound for money with the Captaines and the ſouldiers; a matter practiſed ſo exceſſiuely, that the bruite then ranne, which was aſſured to be true by many that vnderſtood the affaires of that State, that the Duchie of Millan payed euery day to the Emperors ſoldiers, fiue thouſand duckats; and it was ſaid, that Anthonie de Leua drew to himſelfe thirtie duckats a day. The footmen alſo that were lodged in Millan & the other townes, would not onely be furniſhed by the owners of the houſes where they lay, of all things neceſſary for their maintenance, but alſo many of them often getting into one houſe, the good man of that houſe was conſtrained to make prouiſion for them all: and ſuch houſes as had not means to feed them, were compelled to compound with them for money: and ſometimes one onely footman had to himſelfe many houſes, who taxed them all to giue him money, except him who prouided his diet. This miſerable condition exerciſed with ſo great crueltie, had brought all the inhabitants of that Duchie into deſpaire, and chiefly the townesmen of the Citie of Millan, who had not bene accuſtomed, before the entrie of the Marquis of Peſquiero into the Citie, to be charged either with victuals or contribution for the lodging of ſoldiers: and this people being puiſſant in numbers and arms, though not ſo much as before the plague, could not endure ſo great inſolencie and moſt grieuous exactions: and therefore to free themſelues thereof, or at leaſt somewhat to moderate them, the towne of Millan ſent Embaſſadours to the Emperour, who brought from him no other expedition then generall words, and without any remedie to their afflictions. Furthermore, the towne of Millan according to her proportion was charged with a greater number of ſouldiers then the other townes, and yet was taxed to pay money for publicke expences, to wit, ſuch as were to be made by the appointment of the Captaines for the conſeruation of the Emperors affaires: and thoſe moneys being hardly raiſed, the officers appointed for the exacting thereof vſed great crueltie. By reaſon of which things, the people being reduced to a laſt deſpaire, determined to reſiſt with weapon in hand thoſe exactions, and that whoſoeuer was grieued by the exactors, ſhould call his neighbours to defend him; who, together with all the reſidue that ſhould be called, ſhould runne at the commandement of the Captaines aſſigned in many parts of the Citie to reſiſt thoſe that gathered the exactions, and the ſouldiers that would fauour them. When they had taken this order, it happened that a Ioyner of the Citie, when the exactors came to him and troubled him, raiſed his neighbours for his defence, who being followed by a great part of the people, the whole towne was in a great tumult: for the appeasing whereof Anthonie de Leua and the Marquis of Guast running thither with some of the principall Gentlemen of Millan, at last the tumult was appeased: but it was after § Captaines had promised the people to rest contented with the publike reuenues, and to lay vpon them no other impositions, nor bring into the towne other bands of souldiers. This accord endured but till the next day, for that aduertisement being come that new regiments of souldiers approched the towne, the people tooke armes againe, but with greater tumult, better gouerned, and with greater affluence of people then the day before: and the Captaines who began to feare they should not be able to resist so great a furie, were vpon the point (as some affirme) to go out of the towne with their bands, which also it was thought they would haue done, if the people with a setled resolution had marched on to be reuenged of them and their souldiers: but they went inconsiderately to sacke the old Court, where lay the Captaine of criminall iustice with certaine bands of footmen, executing that first which should haue bene the last; by which error the Imperials hauing resumed courage, began to fortifie the wayes, and hauing called the most part of the footmen that kept the Castle enuironed, they assembled all into one strength, to resist and make head against the people, if they offered to assaile them. By this occasion the besieged issued out of the Castle to assaile the ramparts that were made within the towne: but they retired quickly to the Castle when they saw the people came not to their succours, who partly for that they were vnexperienced in actions of warre, and partly for that they were busied in carying away of the pillage they had made at the old Court, did not onely omit to do that which appertained, but also began to separate themselues: by which occasion the Captaines by the aide of certaine Gentlemen of the towne, reappeased againe this tumult, but with promise to leade out of the towne and countrey of Millan all the souldiers, except the Lanceknights which held the Castle besieged. Thus the men of warre, by their subtiltie easily auoided a great danger, scorning the disorders and ignorance of the people to manage armes; errors which familiarly do follow a communaltie drawne into mutinie, hauing no Leaders of experience and valour. But by these appeasements the conspiracies being not broken, nor the weapons of the people laid downe, a disposition to greater emotions dayly appearing, great occasion seemed to be giuen to such as would take vpon them to trouble the affaires of the Emperour, considering principally the small forces, and other difficulties which the Imperials had, together with the remembrance that in the last warres, the wonderfull valour of the people of Millan and of other townes expressed in their fauour, had bene a great foundation for the defence of that estate.

In this estate were the affaires of Italy at such time as information came out of France of the readie disposition and offers of the King, together with his request for the sending of Commissions: and at the same time the Embassadours of the King of England resident with the Pope, laboured to induce him to thinke vpon some meanes whereby the greatnesse of the Emperour might be abated, and to encourage the French King not to obserue the capitulation. By reason of which inducements, not onely the Venetians, who at all times, and in farre lesser occasions, had giuen counsell to take armes, but also the Pope, notwithstanding his hard disposition to enter into that trauell, iudged that of necessitie he must call his wits together, and deferre no longer to take some deliberation. Now the reasons which in the moneths before had made him inclined to the warre, were not onely the same, but also more mightie, and of greater consideration. For the Emperour, both by how much the practises had bene holden out in longnesse, was the better able to discouer what intentions the Pope bare against his greatnesse: and the Pope by the accord which the Emperour had made with the French King, was entred into a suspition not to be able to obtaine of him any reasonable conditions, and that he had a purpose to oppresse the residue of Italy: and the danger was daily more apparent, for that the Castle of Millan being not able to hold out long, stood almost vpon the point of rendring. He was prouoked by the iniuries renewed by the Imperiall Captaines, who since the capitulation of Madril, had sent certaine Ensignes of Italian footmen to lodge vpon the territories of Plaisance and Parma, where they did infinite domages; and when the Pope complained thereof, they made him answer, that they were gone thither of their owne authoritie, for that they were not payed. He was likewise incensed by matters haply more light, but taken, as it hapneth in suspitions and quarrels, in the worse part: for that the Emperour hauing uing publiſhed in Spaine certaine edicts againſt the authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike, by vertue whereof his ſubiects were forbidden to debate the cauſes of the benefices of thoſe Realmes in the Court of Rome, a Spaniſh Notarie tooke the boldneſſe in the Chamber of audience, to command certaine men in the Emperours name, to deſiſt to pleade any more in that Court. And not onely that knot which had held all men in doubt, ſeemed to be broken by the deliuerie of the French King, to wit, leſt the French men hauing recouered their King, would not ſticke to abandon the league: and it was well diſcerned, that the companie of the King was of farre greater importance for the enterpriſe then the fellowſhip of his mother and the Gouernment: but alſo there were ſeene other greater occaſions. For the riſing of the people of Millan ſeemed to be a matter of great conſequence: and by reaſon of the want of victuals that was in that Eſtate, it was thought it would be a great aduantage to ſet vpon the Imperials, before (by the meanes of harueſt) they had the oportunitie to reuictuall their ſtrong places; before the Caſtle of Millan were loſt, and before the Emperour had time to ſend into Italy new ſupplies of men, or prouiſion of money. Moreouer, there came into conſideration, that the French King, who for the memorie of things paſt, in all likelihood diſtruſted the Pope, not finding in him a zeale and forwardneſſe to make warre, would reſolue to obſerue the accord made at Madril, or elſe reconfirme it of new: and it was not doubted, ſo great forces both by ſea and land being conioyned in one, with ſufficient meanes to continue for a long time the expences, although very great, that the conditions of the Emperour, ſtanding both abandoned of all others, and made naked of money, would be farre inferiour in the warre. Onely there was one ſcruple to the contrary, cauſed by a feare, that the French King to redeeme his children, would forſake the other Confederates, as it was doubted the Gouernment of France would haue done at ſuch time as the King was priſoner: and yet it was thought there was great difference, for that taking armes againſt the Emperour with ſo many occaſions, there was great hope to recouer them by force: and it ſeemed that this would ſucceed with ſo great a reputation to the King, that he would haue no cauſe to hearken to any particular accord, which would not onely bring infamie to him, but alſo preiudice, if not preſent, yet afterwards: ſeeing it was a thing which in the end would be moſt dangerous for the Realme of France, to ſuffer the Emperour to diſpoſe of Italy according to his owne mind: whereupon it will follow, that he will make ſharpe warre, for as much as this ſeemed to be a poore counſell to confederate againſt the Emperour, depriuing himſelfe of the meanes to recouer his children by the obſeruation of the accord: and yet on the other ſide, to lay apart thoſe things by the which he might hope to redeeme them gloriouſly by armes. Such as diſcourſed in this ſort, looked haply more into that which reaſonably he ought to do, then they conſidered what is the nature and prudence of the French men; a fault whereinto men do oftentimes fall in the deliberations & iudgements that are made of the diſpoſition and will of others. Perhaps alſo they did not ſufficiently conſider, how much Princes, culpable for the moſt part of their owne inclination, which is, to preferre vtilitie afore fidelitie, do eaſily perſwade themſelues the like of other Princes: and that therefore the French King ſuſpecting leſt the Pope and the Venetians would become negligent and careleſſe of his intereſts, when by the conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan they ſhould ſtand aſſured of the power of the Emperour, would iudge that the longneſſe of the warre would be more profitable to him then the victorie, as a meanes more eaſie to induce the Emperour, wearied with troubles and expences, to reſtore his children vpon ſome new compoſition. But the precedent reaſons mouing the Pope, and much more the diſcontent to haue idlely expected the iſſue of the battel of Pauie, and for that he was reproched and reprehended by euery one of timorouſneſſe, together with the common murmure of all his Court, and of all Italy, who caſt in his teeth, that the Sea Apoſtolike and all Italy was reduced into ſo great danger by his fault; he determined in the end, not onely to enter confederation with the French King and the reſidue againſt the Emperour, but alſo to haſten the concluſion thereof: both for other regards, and principally for this, that prouiſions might be readie in time to ſuccour the Caſtle of Millan, before the extremitie of famine compelled them to yeeld to the enemies; which neceſſitie was the cauſe of all the aduerſities which followed: for that otherwiſe the Pope proceeding more ſlowly (vpon whoſe authoritie the Venetians depended much in this action) had expected, whether the Emperour being moued with the inobſeruation of the French King, would propound for the common ſuretie, thoſe conditions which had bene ſet downe before, if he ſhould be conſtrained to take

armes: and for that not being compelled to make knowne to the French king ſo great a neceſſitie, he had eaſily obtained of him, as well for himſelfe as for the Venetians, better conditions: and without doubt the articles of the confederation had bene better ſet downe and particulated, and there had bene more aſſurance of the obſeruation, and finally the warre had not begun vntill the Swiſſers had ſtirred, and all the prouiſions neceſſarie had bene readie: and haply the King of England had entred into the confederation, with whom for the diſtance of places, there was no leiſure to negociate. But when the Pope and the Venetians ſaw, that (for the danger of the Caſtle) celeritie was of great importance, they diſpatched with ſpeed (but very ſecretly) commiſſions to their Agents, to go through with the confederation, wherein they were enioyned to follow almoſt all thoſe articles which had bene debated before with the Ladie Regent, the more to haſten the expedition. But new aduertiſements coming dayly of the neceſſitie of the Caſtle, the Pope entred into conſideration, that whereas it was neceſſary (for that the right way from Rome to the Court of France was ſtopped) that the poſts muſt make a long circuite through Swiſſerland, and that in the capitulation there might eaſily fall out ſome difficultie, & conſequently tract of time, it might happen that they might ſtand ſo long vpon the concluſion of the confederation, that if they ſhould deferre to begin to make prouiſions to reſcue the Caſtle vntill after the concluſion, there were danger leſt the ſuccours would come too late: and therefore when he had conſulted of this danger with the Venetians, and likewiſe at the perſwaſion of the Agents of the Duke of Millan reſident at Rome and at Venice, and of many others of his faction who propounded many conditions, they reſolued to prepare forces ſufficient to reſcue the Caſtle, to the end to employ them as ſoone as the concluſion of the league was come out of France, and in the meane while to giue hope to the people of Millan, and to nouriſh many practiſes, which were propounded vnto them in the townes of that State. They concluded therefore with one conſent, that the Venetians ſhould ſend the Duke of Vrbin to their frontiers towards the riuer of Adda, with their companies of men at armes, and ſixe thouſand footmen Italians, and the Pope to ſend to Plaiſance the Count Guido Rangon with ſixe thouſand footmen: and for that it was thought neceſſary to haue a good number of Swiſſers, of which nation the Duke of Vrbin counſelled the Venetians to leuie twelue thouſand for the aſſured obtaining of the victorie, and that the Pope and the Venetians, to the end not to diſcloſe themſelues ſo much againſt the Emperour, ſo long as they were not aſſured that the league was made, ſhould not ſend their Agents to leuie ſuch a number of Swiſſers, they gaue eare to Iohn Iaques de Medicis of Millan, who of a Captain of the Rocke of Mus, for the knowledge he had of the ſituation of the place, and by the fauour of the times then running, had made himſelfe Lord thereof. This Iohn Iaques told them, that many moneths before he had wrought many of the Swiſſer-Captaines to that effect, and offered to cauſe ſixe thouſand Swiſſers to deſcend as ſoone as they ſhould ſend vnto him ſixe thouſand duckats, which Swiſſers ſhould not be leuied by the decree of the Cantons, but particularly, and that as ſoone as they were deſcended into the Duchie of Millan, they ſhould proceed to furniſh their pay. Now, as it often happeneth in enterpriſes which of the one ſide are eſteemed eaſie, and on the other ſide are preſſed with the ſhortneſſe of time, the offer of this man was accepted by the Pope and the Venetians, being alſo approued by the Agents of the Duke of Millan, and by Ennia Biſhop of Verula, in whom the Pope repoſed wholly for matters of the Swiſſers, for that he had a long time followed the ſolicitation of thoſe affaires in the name of the Church, and to that end had lyen many moneths at Breſſia by his direction, and was at that time with the Agent of the Venetians, where he treated continually with many of that nation. In like ſort they hearkened at Venice to Octauian Sforce Biſhop of Loda, who offering to make an eaſie leuie of a great number of them, was immediatly ſent by them into Swiſſerland (without communicating with the Pope) to wage ſixe thouſand more, in the ſame ſort, and at the ſame rate of payes: of which deuices, ill digeſted and worſe vnderſtood, was bred (as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter) a great beginning to bring to confuſion the enterpriſe which was dreſſed with ſo great hope.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand in Italy, the Emperour beginning to enter into ſuſpition for the delayes interpoſed to the ratification, ſent the Viceroy of Naples (who together with the hoſtages and Queene Eleoner ſtayed in the Citie of Victoria, to bring them to the King as ſoone as he had accompliſhed the contents of the capitulation) and with him Captaine Alarcon, into France, to be fully certified of the Kings intention, who was gone from Bayon to Congnac.

nac. And albeit the Viceroy was receiued with very great honour and kind vſage, as ſeruant to the Emperour, and as he by whom the King acknowledged a great part of his deliuerie, yet he found him wholly eſtranged from leauing of Burgondie, ſometimes excuſing himſelfe that he could neuer obtaine the conſent of the States of the Realme; and ſometimes alledging that he had neuer willingly conſented to a promiſe, which being very preiudicial to ỹ Crown of France, was impoſſible for him to obſerue: but that deſiring as much as he could to entertaine himſelfe in the amitie begun with the Emperour, and to giue perfection to the mariage, he would be contented (obſeruing all other couenants betweene them) to pay vnto him two millions of crownes, in ſtead of the reſignation of Burgondie: and he declared, that no other thing induced him to confirme with this moderation the accord made at Madril, then the great deſire he had to continue in good intelligence with the Emperour, for that he wanted not offers and prouocations from the Pope, the King of England, & the Venetians, to incenſe him to renew the warre. Which anſwer, comprehending his laſt reſolution, the Viceroy ſignified to the Emperour, and the King ſent one of his Secretaries to certifie the ſame vnto him. Hereupon it happened, notwithſtanding the commiſſions from the Pope and the Venetians, ſo much deſired before, were now come to the Court, that the King who was more inclined to haue agreement with the Emperour, and in that regard had determined to expect his anſwer vpon the new offer, whereof the Viceroy had giuen him ſome hope, began openly to deferre the concluſion of the confederation; not altogether diſſembling (for it was impoſſible to hide it) that he ſolicited a new accord with the Emperour, which being propounded to him by the Viceroy, was a matter no way hurtfull to be vnderſtood: and he affirmed for certaine (notwithſtanding he had other intentions) that he would neuer make any concluſion which ſhould not containe the reſtoring of his children, the releaſe of the Duchie of Millan, and the ſafetie of all Italy: a matter ſufficient to qualifie the Pope, if for the ſuſpition and feare that was fixed in his mind, he had not iudged that the onely remedie for his affaires, was to confederate himſelfe with the French King. But it is not to be imagined how much the Emperour was troubled in his mind when he had receiued the aduertiſement of the Viceroy, & vnderſtood the charge of the Secretarie of the French King: for it was not a litle grieuous vnto him to loſe his hope to recouer Burgondie, which he vehemently deſired, as well for the augmentation of his glorie, as for the oportunitie of that Prouince for greater things. He was very angrie that the French King departing from his promiſes and faith giuen, declared manifeſtly to all the world, that he deſpiſed him: but the thing that troubled his mind yet more, was a certaine ſhame, for that (contrary to the counſell of almoſt all his Nobles, againſt the vniuerſall iudgement of all his Court, and contrarie to that, which after it was knowne the accord was made, had bin foretold of Flanders by the Ladie Margaret his Aunt, and by all his officers in Italy) he perſwaded himſelfe, meaſuring ill the importance and condition of affaires, that the French King would obſerue the accord. And amid theſe thoughts, when he had diligently conſidered that which concerned his owne dignitie, and in what dangers and difficulties his affaires at all aſſayes would ſtand, he determined to alter no iote of that article which ſpake of the reſtoring of Burgondie, and to accord rather with the Pope, and to conſent to the reintegration of Francis Sforce, as a thing more comely for him to pardon a Prince leſſe then himſelfe, then by yeelding to the will of a puiſſant Prince, and one that enuied his greatneſſe, to make as it were a confeſſion of feare: and rather to haue a moſt dangerous warre with euery one, then to remit the iniury receiued of the French King. For he feared leſt the Pope ſeeing his amitie to haue bene contemned, were wholly eſtranged in mind from him: and his ſuſpition was augmented by the knowledge he had, that the Pope beſides ỹ he had ſent a man into France to congratulate the King, had alſo ſent thither publikely an Embaſſador: but much more, for that he had newly taken into his pay (vnder colour to aſſure againſt the Moores the ſea coaſts of the Church) Andrew Dore with eight Galleys vnder the pay of thirtie thouſand duckats, and a yearely penſion: a matter which both for the qualitie of the man, and for that neuer heretofore the Pope had any thought to make himſelfe ſtrong vpon the ſea, and alſo becauſe Andrew Dore had bene many yeares in the pay of the French King; made him enter into ſuſpition leſt it were done with intention to trouble the Eſtate of Genes. For theſe reaſons preparing himſelfe for all accidents, and making at one & the ſame time many prouiſions, he ſolicited the paſſing of the Duke of Bourbon into Italy, who before made but ſlow preparation, and gaue order to that end, that ſeuen of his Galleys which lay at Monaco in Italy, ſhould come to Barcelona to be ioyned with the reſidue, and that there ſhould be ſent into Italy an hundred thouſand duckats, for that otherwiſe the going of the Duke of Bourbon would be to no purpoſe. He diſpatched to the Pope Don Hugo de Moncada, with commiſſion (as he ſaid) to ſatisfie him: but he directed him firſt to go to the Court of France, to the end that when he had learned of the Viceroy whether there were any hope that the King would obſerue, either he ſhould paſſe no further, or if he did, that he ſhould change his inſtructions and commiſſions according to the eſtate and neceſſitie of affaires. But to euery good counſell of the Pope, was oppoſed the danger leſt the Caſtle of Millan where the victuals were almoſt quite ſpent, would render to the enemie: the feare leſt by ſome meanes there would be contracted a new accord betweene the French king and the Emperour: the vncertaintie of that which might be wrought by the coming of Don Hugo de Moncada, who was much ſuſpected, for that he muſt firſt paſſe by the Court of France: and the diſſimulations and cunnings that would be vſed when he ſhould come into Italy.

Therefore the Pope, together with the Venetians, ſoliciting the concluſion of the confederation, the King at laſt when he vnderſtood by the coming of Don Hugo de Moncada, that the Emperour would alter nothing of the articles of the capitulation, fearing if he ſhould defer any longer to confederate, he ſhould induce the Pope to new counſels; and iudging that by this confederation his affaires ſhould ſtand in better eſtate of reputation with the Emperour, and that feare might haply moderate the rigour of his mind: and being alſo incited thereunto by the King of England, who more with perſwaſions then effects fauoured that concluſion, he began to hearken better to the treatie of the league: the which was concluded the tenth day of May, in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and ſixe, at Congnac, betweene the Kings Councell, deputies for the King, on the one part, and the Agents of the Pope and the Venetians on the other part: That betweene the Pope, the French King, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan (for whom the Pope and the Venetians aſſured the ratification) ſhould be a league and confederation perpetuall, to the end to repoſſeſſe Francis Sforce freely of the Duchie of Millan, and reſtore to libertie the French Kings children: That the league ſhould be ſignified to the Emperour, to whom was granted power to enter into it within three moneths, vpon condition to redeliuer the Kings children, receiuing a competent ranſome, ſuch as ſhould be arbitrated by the King of England: and with condition alſo to leaue wholly the Duchie of Millan to Francis Sforce, and the other Eſtates of Italy as they were afore the laſt warre began: That for the deliuerie of Francis Sforce, beſieged within the Caſtle of Millan, and for the recouerie of that eſtate, a preſent warre ſhould be made with eight hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen for the Popes part: and for the Venetians, with eight hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen: and for the Duke of Millan foure hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, as ſoone as he ſhould be able, and in the meane time the Pope and the Venetians ſhould furniſh them for him: That the French king ſhould preſently ſend into Italy fiue hundred Lances, and pay (ſo long as the warre ſhould endure) fortie thouſand crownes a moneth to the Pope and to the Venetians, with which money bands of Swiſſers were to be entertained: That the French king ſhould immediatly open the warre againſt the Emperour beyond the Mounts on what ſide he ſhould thinke beſt, with an armie at leaſt of two thouſand Lances, and ten thouſand footmen, and with ſufficient ſtore of artilleries: That the French king ſhould arme twelue light Galleys, and the Venetians thirteen, at their owne coſt: That the Pope ſhould ioyne to theſe Galleys thoſe wherewith he had entertained Andrew Dore into his pay: That the charges ſhould be common for ſhips neceſſarie for the ſaid armie by ſea, with the which they ſhould addreſſe their courſe to Genes: and afterwards the Emperours armie in Lombardie being either vanquiſhed or weakened, they ſhould mightily inuade the kingdome of Naples as well by ſea as by land, which being once conquered, the inueſtiture thereof ſhould be transferred to whomſoeuer it pleaſed the Pope: and yet in an article ſeparate it was ſet downe, that he might not diſpoſe thereof without the conſent of the Confederates, but that the tributes which anciently were vſed to be payed to the Sea Apoſtolike ſhould be reſerued for him, and an eſtate of fortie thouſand duckats of reuenue for whom he thought good: That to the end the French King might be certaine, that by the victory to be obtained in Italy and the conqueſt of Naples, the deliuery of his children might be made eaſie, in which caſe, if the Emperour would within

foure moneths after the losse of that kingdome enter into the confederation vnder the condi-ons aforesaid, it should be restored to him; but if he would not accept that power to enter into the league, then the French king should take and enioy the yearely and perpetuall rent of that Realme: That the French king should not at any time, nor for any cause molest Francis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan, but should be bound, together with the others, to defend him against all men, and to do what he could to introduce betweene him and the Swissers a new confederation; but that he should receiue of him yearely a perpetuall tribute, such as should be set downe by the Pope and the Venetians, the which notwithstanding by their arbitrage should not be lesse then fiftie thousand duckats: That Francis Sforce should take to wife such a Ladie of the bloud of France, as it should please the King to prouide for him, and should be bound to entertaine his brother Maximilian decently, in stead of the yearely pension which he receiued of the King: That the King should reenter into the Earledome of Ast: and if Genes were recouered, that he should haue the same superioritie there which he was wont to haue in times past: and that Anthoniot Adorney, who then was Duke there, if he would accord to the league, should be receiued, acknowledging the French king for superiour, in the same sort and maner as Octauian Fregosa had done a few yeares before: That all the Confederates should demand of the Emperour the deliuerie of the children of France, and if he should refuse so to do, that it should be denounced to him in the name of them all, that the League would do all that they could to haue them againe: That as soone as the warres of Italy were finished, or at least the Realme of Naples taken, and the Emperours armie so weakened as there was no feare of it, the Confederates should be bound to aide the French king against the Emperour beyond the Mounts with a thousand men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, and ten thousand footmen, or else to giue him money in stead of men, at the Kings choise: That not one of the Confederates without the consent of the residue, might contract with the Emperour, to whom it should be permitted, in case he entred into the confederation, to go to Rome to take the Imperiall Crowne, with such a traine of men as were not to be feared, the same to be rated by the Pope and the Venetians: That though any one of the Confederates were taken away by death, yet the League should stand good: That the King of England should be protector and defender thereof, to whom was left power to enter into it: and in case he would enter, there should be giuen to him in the Realme of Naples an estate of fiue and thirtie thousand duckats of reuenue, and another of ten thousand to the Cardinall of Yorke, either in the same Realme, or in some other part of Italy. The Pope would not suffer the Duke of Ferrara to be comprehended in this confederation, notwithstanding the French king and the Venetians solicited it: and which more is, he procured that it should be set downe in the confederation (though vnder generall words) that the Confederates should be bound to aide him to recouer those places for which the Duke was in contention with the Church. Touching the Florentines, there was no doubt made but they were effectually comprehended in the confederation, for that the Pope made his reckoning not onely to serue his turne with their men at armes and all their forces, but also to cause them to concurre with him, yea euen to make them sustaine the greatest burthen of the expences of the warre: but to the end not to hinder the traffike and commerce which that nation had with the subiects of the Emperour, as also not to put in danger their Merchants and factors, they were not named as Confederates: onely it was set downe that for the Popes sake they should enioy all the exemptions, priuiledges and benefites of the confederation, as if they had bene expresly comprehended, the Pope promising for them that they should be in no sort against the league. It was not prouided who should be Captaine generall of the armie and of the warre, for that the shortnesse of time gaue no leisure to bring into counsell vpon whose shoulders (both for his authoritie and qualitie, and for the confidence that euery one was to haue in him) they should lay so great a burthen: and certainly it was not easie to find out a man, in whose person were concurrant such conditions.

When the League was contracted, the King, not hauing as yet altogether withdrawne his mind from the practises with the Viceroy of Naples, deferred to ratifie it, to begin to cause his companies of men at armes to march, and to send the fortie thousand duckats for the first moneth, vntill such time as the ratification of the Pope and the Venetians was come: and albeit such an intermission troubled their minds, yet being pressed to prosecute their purpose by the necessities we haue declared, the ratification being dispatched, they determined immediatly to giue beginning to the warre, vnder colour that they would reſcue the Caſtle of Millan. And therefore the Pope, who had ſent before to Plaiſance, Guido Rangon Generall of the Church armie, with his companies of men at armes, and fiue thouſand footmen, had ſent thither of new with other regiments of footmen and the men at armes of Florence, Vitello Vitelli who was Gouernour there, and Iohn de Medicis whom he made Colonell of the Italian footmen, and created Francis Guicciardin, at that time Preſident of Romagna, his Lieutenant generall ouer the armie, and ouer the whole iuriſdiction, enduing him with moſt ample and almoſt abſolute power. The Venetians alſo for their part increaſed their armie, which remained at Chiara in the countrey of Breſſia, whereof the Duke of Vrbin was Generall, and Peter Peſero Treaſurer, both the armies hauing direction to endomage the Imperials, & to inuade them, without any reſpect or delay. In this meane while Don Hugo de Moncada was arriued at Millan, who, albeit the League was ſtill kept from the knowledge of the Viceroy and him, yet diſtruſting by the Kings anſwers, that matters could not be reduced to the Emperours contentment, had followed his way into Italy; where taking with him into the Caſtle of Millan the Pronotarie Caracciol, when he had aſſured the Duke of the clemencie and benignitie of the Emperour, he laboured to perſwade him to referre himſelfe to his will. But the Duke made anſwer, that in regard of the iniuries which the Emperours Captaines had done him, he was driuen to haue recourſe to the Pope and the Venetians, without whoſe participation it was not fit that he ſhould diſpoſe of himſelfe. Don Hugo put him in hope, that the Emperours intention was, that the crimes wherewith he was charged ſhould be ſummarily looked into by the Pronotarie Caracciol, who was a Prelate in whom the Duke put great confidence; and gaue him to vnderſtand, that it was rather to reſtore vnto him his Eſtate with better conſeruation of the Emperours reputation, then for any other occaſion; and that when he had ſpoken with the Pope, he would giue perfection to theſe things: and yet he would not conſent that the ſiege might be firſt leuied, nor that promiſe ſhould be made to innouate nothing, according to the inſtance of the Duke. It was beleeued, and the bruite afterwards was ſuch, that the authoritie and power which the Emperour gaue to Don Hugo was very ample, and not onely to contract with the Pope agreeing to the reintegration of the Duke of Millan, but alſo with the Duke alone, taking aſſurance, that when he was reſtored to his Eſtate, he would do no act preiudiciall to the affaires of the Emperour: but that this commiſſion was with limitation, according to the traine of times and neceſſities; and that Don Hugo conſidering into what extremitie the Caſtle was reduced, and that to compound with the Duke would nothing profit the affaires of the Emperor, but ſo farre forth as it was a meanes to come to accord with the Pope and the Venetians, he iudged it would be a matter vnprofitable to contract with him alone. Afterwards Don Hugo and the Pronotarie cauſed Moron to be brought to Monce, who was kept priſoner within the Rocke of Trezzo: which they did, rather that the Pronotarie who was to be iudge of the cauſe, might take information of him, then for any other occaſion. After this, Don Hugo went from Millan to Rome, hauing firſt written to Venice, that they ſhould ſend ſufficient authoritie to their Embaſſadour at Rome to debate of the affaires occurrent: and when he was arriued at Rome, he preſented himſelfe before the Pope, together with the Duke of Seſſa, to whom he declared with braue words, that it was in his power to accept either peace or warre, for that the Emperour (although by his good intention he enclined more to peace) was neuertheleſſe both in courage and forces readie both for the one and the other. Whereunto the Pope anſwered generally, complaining notwithſtanding that the hard termes which the Emperours officers had vſed towards him, and the very late arriuall of Don Hugo, was the cauſe that whereas afore he was at his owne libertie, he ſtood now bound to others. They returned to him the next day, ſignifying that the Emperours intention was to leaue wholly the Duchie of Millan to Francis Sforce, ſo that the Caſtle might be deliuered into the hands of the Pronotarie Caracciol, vntill for the Emperours honour the cauſe were examined, not to the bottome, but in apparence and by way of ceremonie: and alſo that his intention was to put end to the quarels betweene him and the Venetians by ſome honeſt meanes, and to withdraw his armie out of Lombardie, with the payes which had bene treated vpon at other times: and that for all this he demanded no other thing of him, then that he would forbeare to interpoſe betweene him and the French king. To this propoſition the Pope anſwered, that he doubted not but it was well knowne to all the world, how much he had alwayes deſired to keepe amitie with the Emperour, and that he had neuer demanded greater things, then ſuch as the Emperour perour himſelfe did willingly offer him, the which could not be more agreeable to his will, for that he deſired rather the common benefite then his owne profit: That now alſo he continued in the ſame inclination, though many occaſions were giuen him to fall from it: and yet he heard now with greater griefe of mind the accord that was offered him touching theſe matters, then he had heretofore heard the refuſall, for that it was no more in his power to accept them, as it was in time paſt: which proceeded not of his fault, but in that the Emperour deferred ſo long to reſolue: which was the cauſe, that no hope being euer brought him of the aſſurance of the common affaires of Italy, and ſeeing in the meane while the perill of the Caſtle of Millan, he had bene conſtrained for the ſafetie of himſelfe and others, to confederate with the French king, without whom (vnleſſe he would breake his faith) he had no power to determine any thing. In which anſwer the Pope perſeuering cõſtantly, notwithſtanding many things were replied to the contrary, Don Hugo, after he had in vaine talked often with him, departed from Rome much diſcontented, as likewiſe were the Imperiall Captaines, for that the hope of peace being cut off, things tended to manifeſt warre, which for the power of the League, and for their owne extremities and diſorders, they ſuppoſed it would be very hard for them to ſuſtaine.

About this time the Popes Lieutenant ſurpriſed a packet of letters, written by Anthonie de Leua to the Duke of Seſſa, by the which he aduertiſed him of the ill diſpoſition of the people of Millan, and that there was no other remedie for their affaires then the fauour of God: and other letters written from himſelf & the Marquis of Guaſt to Don Hugo after he was gone from Millan, wherein making earneſt ſolicitation to aduance the peace, they inſiſted greatly to know forthwith what would enſue thereof; not failing to put him in mind of the danger wherein they ſtood, together with the Emperours armie. But there was not ſo great aſſurance in the minds of thoſe that were to diſpoſe of the forces of the league, as the feare was great of the Imperiall captains. For the Duke of Vrbin (by whõ, for the title he had of Captain generall of the Venetian armie, and for his ſingularitie of eſtate, authoritie and reputation aboue the others, the abſolute gouernment of the whole armie was in effect to be managed) eſteeming haply more then was conuenient, the valour of the Spaniards and Lanceknights, and doubting much the Italian ſouldiers, had reſolued in his mind not to paſſe the riuer of Adda, if he had not in the army fiue thouſand Swiſſers at the leaſt: and fearing alſo leſt the Imperials would paſſe Adda and ſet vpon him, if he ſhould paſſe the riuer of Oglia onely with the companies of the Venetians, he made inſtance that the armie of the Church which was then at Plaiſance, paſſing ouer Po beneath Cremona, might come and ioyne with the Venetians neare the riuer of Adda, and afterwards in ſome place of ſtrength vpon the ſhores thereof, to attend the coming of the Swiſſers: who (beſides their owne nature) were hindered with many difficulties, the charge to leuie them being vndiſcreetly committed to Captaine Mus and the Biſhop of Loda. For the Biſhop, being a man full of vanitie, managed not that buſineſſe as appertained; and Captaine Mus ſought chiefly by fraud to get for himſelfe part of the money that was ſent vnto him to pay the Swiſſers: and neither of them both had ſuch authoritie with that nation, as was needfull to leuie ſo great a number, chiefly with ſo ſmall a ſumme of money, and with ſuch ſpeed as the neceſſitie of the ſeruice required; and that alſo was corrupted by the enuie that happened betweene them, being more carried with ambition and their particular intereſts, then any thing elſe. Moreouer, the French kings Agents that were in the countrey of Swiſſerland oppoſed ſome difficulties, for that they knew not what was the inclination of their King herein, nor whether it was a matter contrary or conformable to his intentions. For not by forgetfulneſſe, but expreſly, following thoſe counſels which oftentimes ſeeming very wiſe, are found in the end too ſubtill, they had failed to aduertiſe the King of that expedition: for that Albert Pio the Kings Embaſſadour reſident with the Pope, had ſignified, that if the King vnderſtood before the concluſion of the League of the direction giuen to make a leuie of Swiſſers, it was to be feared leſt he would deferre longer to conclude, for that it ſeemed to him euery way, that the warre againſt the Emperour had bene begun without him by the Pope and the Venetians. Thus for the long tarrying of the Swiſſers, was foreſlowed one of the moſt principall and mightie foundations layed for the reſcue of the Caſtle of Millan, notwithſtanding both the Biſhop and Captaine Mus gaue dayly certaine and almoſt preſent hope, that they would be ſpeedily at the campe.

But when the Imperiall Captaines ſaw that the warre was prepared openly, they determined, to the end not to be trauelled at one time with enemies both within and without, to ſtand aſſured of the people of Millan, who becoming euery day more inſolent, did not onely denie them all thoſe prouiſions that they demanded, but alſo if any of the ſouldiers were found in the Citie ſeparate from the reſt, he was ſlaine by the people. The Imperiall Captaines therefore taking occaſion of the diſorders that were done in the towne, required that certaine Captaines of the people ſhould depart out of Millan: by reaſon whereof the people beginning to draw into tumult, certaine Spaniards were ſlaine going along the ſtreetes: and for this cauſe Anthonie de Leua and the Marquis of Guaſt, after they had ſecretly drawne their forces neare to Millan, and denounced to the people that they were no more bound to the accord made certaine dayes before, the ſeuenteenth day of Iune (to giue beginning to a tumult) they cauſed to be ſlaine in their preſence one of the cõmon people, who had done no reuerence to them in paſſing by, and three others after him: and then iſſuing out of their lodgings with a troupe of Lanceknights, they gaue occaſion to the Commons to ſound the alarme, who though at the firſt they had forced the old Court, and the great tower of the Biſhopricke guarded by Italian footmen, yet fighting in the end without order, and according to the maner of ignorant people, more with exclamations then with their weapons, and being much endomaged by certaine ſhot beſtowed in places of aduantage, which the Spaniards had ſeized vpon before, many of them were hurt and ſlaine: inſomuch as their diſorders and feares increaſing continually, and the Lanceknights hauing begun to put fire to the next houſes, the Spaniſh footmen, called by their Captaines, being now very neare the Citie, the people fearing the laſt harmes, agreed that their Leaders and many other perſons agreed vpon, ſhould go out of Millan, and that the popular multitude ſhould depoſe armes, and ſubmit themſelues to the obedience of the Captaines: who with theſe conditions, haſted to ceaſſe the tumult before the Spaniſh footmen entred the towne, fearing if they ſhould enter whileſt both the parties were in armes, leſt it would not be in their power to bridle the furie of the warre, or to reſtraine their ſouldiers from ſacking the towne; from which haning their minds eſtranged, as well for feare leſt the armie being made rich with ſo great a bootie would be much diminiſhed, as for the conſideration of the want of money and other difficulties which they might ſuffer in the warre, they iudged it more profitable to preſerue that Citie wherein they might long nouriſh the armie, then in one day to conſume all the ſtrength and ſpirit thereof. Thus it ſeemed that the affaires of the League proceeded not with that proſperitie which men had promiſed themſelues in the beginning, ſeeing there were ſo many difficulties found already in the deſcending of the Swiſſers, and that the hope of the people of Millan had failed them: but a new accident that happened, made their reputation and the facilitie to ouercome, much greater and more apparent then before. In ſo great a diſcontentment, or rather laſt deſpaire of the Duchie of Millan, there was entertained for certaine moneths by the working of many perſons, ſundrie practiſes of innouation almoſt in all the Cities of that State: but the reſidue ſeruing to no purpoſe, one ſucceeded to good effect, being managed by the Duke of Vrbin and the Treaſurer of Venice in the Citie of Loda with Lodowike Viſtarin a Gentleman of that Citie: who, puſhed on for that he had bene an ancient ſeruantto the houſe of the Sforces, or moued with compaſſion ouer the calamities of his country, being no leſſe rudely dealt withal by Fabricio Maramo Colonell of fifteene hundred footmen Neapolitans, then Millan was by the Spaniards and Lanceknights, he determined to bring in the Venetian regiments, notwithſtanding he was in the pay of the Imperials: but he aſſured, and the Duke of Vrbin confirmed it, that he had before both demanded and obtained leaue to go his way, making his excuſe that he could no longer without money entertaine the bands of ſouldiers which were committed to his charge. The matter was directed in this ſort: That vpon the foure and twentieth day of Iune in the night, Malateſta Baillon with three or foure thouſand footmen of the Venetians, ſhould approch in the beginning of the night neare the walls of the Citie, on that ſide where was a certaine baſtillion, to be let in by Viſtarin, who a litle before, with two others that accompanied him, being come neare the baſtillion, which ſixe footmen guarded, as it were to ouerlooke them, and being followed with ſome others, whom he had hidden in certaine houſes there by, he entred into the baſtillion, and began to fight with thoſe that guarded it. For albeit he had before pronounced the watchword, according to the cuſtome of warre, yet the ſouldiers being doubtfull of treaſon, were come to blowes with him, and foraſmuch as others ranne to them by reaſon of the bruite, the baſtillion was in danger to be recouered, for that they began to fight vigorously, in which bickering Lodowike was hurt: but as he was now reduced to the last necessitie, Malatesta arriued with his bands, who being mounted vpon the same bastillion with ladders, they entred the towne, by reason whereof Fabricio Maramus who heard thereof by the bruite, and came to the walls with part of his souldiers, was constrained to retire into the Castle. The towne was taken, and the most part of the souldiers that were lodged in sundrie places of the Citie were stripped and made prisoners: and a litle after the Duke of Vrbin arriued there with part of his regiments, who to the end to be the nearer, was gone the day before to lodge at Orago, vpon the riuer of Oglio, which he passed the same night by a bridge made in haste, when he vnderstood that Malatesta was entred into Loda, and passed also vpon a like bridge the riuer of Adda: and when he had bestowed a greater garrison within Loda, for the better defence thereof in case succours should come by the Castle, he returned immediatly to the armie. But as soone as the tidings hereof was come to Millan, the Marquis of Guast with certaine troupes of light horsemen, and three thousand Spanish footmen, amongst whom was John of Vrbin, drew presently to Loda, and hauing without impediment bestowed his bands of footmen by the gate of succours within the Castle, situate in such sort, that they might enter with safetie by a way naturally couered, without danger to be annoyed with shot coming from the flankes of the Citie: he entred sodainly into the Citie by the Castle, and got to the market place, where the forces that Malatesta brought with him, and the succours that came afterwards, stood in battell ray, and put diuers houses vnder guard, together with the streete that led to the gate whereby they were entred, to the end they might be able to retire and issue with safetie, if it happened that the Imperials became maisters. The fight was valiantly performed at the beginning, and it was the opinion of many, that if the Spaniards had perseuered, they had recouered Loda, for that the Venetian souldiers were very weary and out of heart: but the Marquis distrusting, either for that he found there a greater number of souldiers then he esteemed in the beginning, or for that he had a conceit, that the Venetian armie approched, retired presently from the fight, and leauing a garrison in the Castle, he returned to Millan. A litle after the Duke of Vrbin hapned to come, who gloried, that without staying he had passed his armie ouer two great riuers by the benefit of bridges: and the better to assure the victorie, he resupplied the regiments that were within Loda, to the end to make the better resistance in case the enemies returned thither againe, and caused the artilleries to be planted round about the Castle. But those within, for that they expected no succours, and that they could hardly defend the Castle, which for the small circuite was not capable of many men, the night following, being receiued by certaine horsemen sent from Millan for that purpose, they abandoned the Castle.

The conquest of Loda happened very conueniently and gaue great reputation to the affaires of the League, for as much as the Citie was well fortified, and one of those which it was alwaies thought the Imperials would defend to the vttermost. From Loda they might go without any impediment, euen to the gates of Millan and Pauie, for that those Cities situate triangle-wise, are twentie miles one from another; and for this cause the Imperials dispatched with great expedition fifteene hundred Lanceknights to Pauie. Moreouer, the passage of Adda, which before was supposed to be very troublesome, was wonne: there was now nothing to hinder the vniting of the armies of the league: the enemies had no more meanes to succour Cremona, in which Citie Captaine Conradin lay in garrison with fifteene hundred Lanceknights: and they were depriued of a place very commodious to vexe the state of the Church, and that of the Venetians: in so much as the common voice was through the armie, that if they aduanced with diligence, the Imperials would be reduced into very great perplexitie and confusion. But the Duke of Vrbin was of another iudgement, being resolued that it would be a very dangerous enterprise to draw neare to Millan without a great band of Swissers: who for that he would not discouer to others that such was his secret intention, he determined in marching slowly, and reposing alwayes one day at the least in euery lodging, to giue time to the descending of the Swissers, in hope that within a few dayes they would be with the armie, and despised all that was propounded to be done in case they came not, although in respect of that which had passed till that day there was great doubt of their coming. Therefore the day after the conquest of Loda, the Church armie marching to Saint Martin, within three miles of Loda, it was resolued by common counsell, that when the Ecclesiastikes and the Venetians had soiourned yet one day in their tents, they should draw the next day towards old Loda, which is fiue miles from Loda (where it is said that Pompey the Great builded Loda) and three miles from the high way that leadeth to Pauie, by taking which way, they threatned Millan and Pauie; to the end to hold the Imperiall Captaines the more in ſuſpence: and the ſame day the armies Eccleſiaſtike and Venetian ioyned together in the field as they marched, being almoſt equall in numbers of footmen, and containing in all few leſſe then twentie thouſand: but the Venetians had more men at armes and light horſemen (the Eccleſiaſtikes continually furniſhing themſelues,) and alſo greater prouiſion of artilleries, munitions, and all other neceſſary things. At old Loda, where they remained the day following, the Captaines tooke further aduice, and it was determined that hereafter the armies ſhould keepe along the high way, the better to auoide the incommodities of the countrey, which out of the high way is full of ditches and banks, for that it was thought it would be more eaſie to giue ſuccours to the Caſtle by the way that leadeth towards the gate of Coma, then by the way of Landriano, which turneth to the gate of Vereeil, whither they could hardly come by reaſon of the ſituation of the countrey; and for that going that way, there was a more ſafe recourſe for victuals, and more facilitie to receiue the Swiſſers who were alwayes to backe them. With this reſolution the armies being vnited, arriued the laſt day of Iune at Marignan, where conſulting what was to be done, the Duke of Vrbin perſwaded to abide the comming of the Swiſſers, whoſe deſcending was as much and haply more vncertaine then before: and he was of opinion, that without ſuch a ſtrength and firme backe, it could not but be dangerous to draw neare Millan, with new companies, leuied in haſte, notwithſtanding there was within the towne but a very ſlender ſtrength of horſemen, three thouſand Lanceknights, and but fiue or ſixe thouſand Spaniſh footmen, who were without money, and had very litle prouiſion of victuals. But many of the other Captaines were not of his opinion, who iudged that marching in order, and always cauſing their camping places to be known the day before, they might approch to Millan without danger, ſeeing the countrey is euery way ſo ſtrong and defencible, that without difficulties they might alwayes incampe in very ſure places: and they thought it not likely, that the Imperials would iſſue out into the field to inuade them, for that it being neceſſary for them to leaue the Caſtle beſieged, & that for feare of the people they durſt not leade all their companies out of the Towne, there would remaine too ſmall a number to aſſaile ſo great an armie, wherein albeit it was lately leuied, there was a good number of old ſoldiers, and of the moſt renowmed Captaines of all Italy: and ſeeing they might approch Millan without danger, it was alſo not without hope of the victorie, for that the ſuburbes of Millan being not fortified, but by the negligence that had bene vſed in repairing them, left open in many parts, it ſeemed not credible that the Imperials would ſtand to defend ſo great a circuit of place: whereof there were diſcerned manifeſt tokens, in that vſing ſmall care to repaire the ſuburbes, they had all ſet themſelues to fortifie the towne: and abandoning the ſuburbes, where the armie may preſently lodge, it cannot be thought that the towne can long hold out: not onely for that the armie is without money, and ill ſtored of victuals, but alſo for that both Proſper Colonno and many other Captaines were alwayes of this opinion, that it was very hard to defend Millan againſt an armie that was Lord of the ſuburbes; as well for that the Citie is very weake in walls (the houſes of particular perſons ſeruing for walls in many places) as for that the ſuburbes haue a great aduantage of the Citie: whereunto was added, that they had the Caſtle at their deuotion. But not onely this deliberation, but alſo all others depended chiefly vpon the will of the Duke of Vrbin: for that albeit he was Captaine onely ouer the Venetians, the Eccleſiaſtikes to auoide contentions, and for that they could not do otherwiſe, had determined to referre themſelues to him as to their Generall. Neuertheleſſe though theſe reaſons incited him not to paſſe further, nor the vehement inſtances which (by order from their ſuperiours) the Popes Lieutenant and the Treaſurer of Venice vrged, many other Captaines alſo being of the ſame mind, yet in the end he conſidered that if he made any long abode in that place, without better certaintie of the comming of the Swiſſers, it would be to his great charge and infamie. Therefore when the armie had reſted two dayes at Marignan, he remoued it the third of Iuly to S. Donato, fiue miles from Millan, determining to paſſe further, more to ſatisfie the deſire and iudgement of others, then of his owne deliberation; but with intention to put alwayes one day betweene the remouing of the campe, to giue the more time to the coming of the Swiſſers, of whom a thouſand deſcending by Bergama, were arriued at the armie, and (according to their cuſtome) there came daily meſſages that the reſidue would not ſtay long.

Then the fift day of Iuly, the armie paſſing from S. Martin, went and lodged within three miles of Millan, out of the way on the right hand, in a ſtrong and ſure place, where the ſame day was executed a light enterpriſe againſt certaine harquebuziers of the Spaniards who were fortified within a houſe; and the day following, the campe being at the ſame place, ſuch another; vpon which day there arriued at the campe fiue hundred Swiſſers led by Ceſar Gallo. In this place they conſulted againe of the maner to paſſe further; and albeit the firſt intention was to march directly to ſuccour the Caſtle of Millan, where the trenches that encloſed it about were not ſo ſtrong but that there was great hope to winne them: neuertheleſſe the Duke of Vrbin (whoſe aduice was at laſt approued of all the others, for that in the counſels, he propounded, and without attending the anſwers of others, declared his opinion, or at leaſt in propounding vſed ſuch words, that he was eaſily diſcouered, ſo that the other Captains durſt not contradict him) was of opinion that the armies ſhould take the way that leadeth directly to the ſuburbes of Millan, alledging, that the making plaine of the ways, which of neceſſitie muſt be done by reaſon of the ſtrength of the countrey, would be a labour long, and not without danger of ſome diſorder to leade the armie out of the high way to the reſcue of the Caſtle, for that they were to ſhew themſelues too neare in flanke to the enemies; and it would giue them meanes to make the greater reſiſtance, becauſe they would range all their forces on that ſide towards the Caſtle: whereas otherwiſe they ſhould be conſtrained to remaine deuided to reſiſt their enemies, and not abandon the guard of the Caſtle; and drawing to Rome gate, it would be alwayes in the power of the Captaines of the league to turne themſelues eaſily on what ſide they would, as occaſions were offered. According to which counſell it was reſolued, that the ſeuenth day the campe ſhould lodge at Bufaletta and Pillaſtrella, which are villages along the high way within cannon ſhot, with intention there to take ſuch courſe as occaſion and the proceeding of the enemies ſhould offer. Many were of opinion, that the enemies when they ſhould ſee the campe ſo neare them, would not (ſpecially in the night) vndertake to defend the ſuburbes, for that the ditches were filled vp in many places, and the rampiers made plaine, and on ſome ſides ſo open, that they could hardly be defended. But the night before the day wherein the armie was to aduance, the Duke of Bourbon, who was arriued a few dayes before at Genes with ſixe galleys, and with bils of exchange for an hundred thouſand duckats, entred with about eight hundred Spaniſh footmen whom he had brought with him, into Millan, being much ſolicited by the Marquis of Guaſt and Anthonie de Leua, by whoſe coming the ſouldiers were much encouraged: and thereby the affected negligence or rather cold diſpoſition of the French King to the warre might be perceiued. For the Pope hauing in the beginning when he entertained Andrew Dore into his pay, conſulted with him, with what forces and preparations the enterpriſe of Genes ſhould be aſſayed, he propoſed much facilitie, ſo that it were put to execution when the warre ſhould be begun in the Duchie of Millan, and ioyning the Kings galleys riding in the port of Marſeilles to his eight galleys, or at leaſt hindering the coming of the galleys of the Duke of Bourbon: for that remaining in that ſort Lord of the ſea with his eight galleys, Genes hauing the ſea ſhut vp, could not maintaine it ſelfe many dayes, both for the reſtraint of merchandize, and the impediment of commerce and victuals. And notwithſtanding the King promiſed to ſtop the coming of the Duke of Bourbon, yet theſe were but vaine words, for that his veſſels were not in order, and the Captaines of his galleys partly for want of money, partly through negligence, and haply of purpoſe, had receiued money too late, as the like happened afterwards with the men at armes.

But the arriuall of the Duke of Bourbon being vnknowne to thoſe without, the reſolution that had bene ſet downe to aduance, was peruerted by the Duke of Vrbin, either (as it was thought) by ſome aduertiſements which he had receiued from Millan, or by report of ſome ſpie: for, leauing off the diſtruſt which he had retained till that day, he aſſured the Popes Lieutenant in the preſence of the Venetian Treaſurer, that he made an aſſured reckoning, the day following would be a day of happie ſucceſſe: for as much as if the enemies iſſued out to fight (which he could not beleeue) they would vndoubtedly be ouerthrowne; but if they iſſued not, he was certaine that either they would abandon Millan the ſame day and retire into Pauie, or at leaſt abandoning the defence of the ſuburbes, they would gather themſelues into the Citie, which they could not well defend when the ſuburbes was loſt: and that any of theſe three things ſufficed to make them maiſters of the warre. Therefore the day following being the ſeuenth of Iuly, they they left the lodging appointed the day before, hoping to win the ſuburbes without reſiſtance; and aſpiring to the glorie to haue them by aſſault, certaine ſouldiers in marching, ranne in their inſolencie to giue a charge vpon Rome gate and Toſa: where, notwithſtanding the aduertiſements they had the day before and the ſame day, that the Spaniards would breake vp and go away, yet they found that they preſented themſelues and made head, not (as it was ſaid) that they meant to make a continuall reſiſtance, but to retire into Millan rather as men of warre and after they had ſhewed their faces to the enemie, then to leaue the ſuburbes cowardly abandoned: and that by making ſuch reſiſtance, they might not onely preſerue the reputation of their armie, ſpecially for that it was in their power to retire always into the citie without diſorder, but might alſo get ſome occaſion to take heart and perſeuere in the defence of the ſuburbes; a matter of right great importance: ſeeing that to retire into the towne, was an election to be made rather by neceſſitie then of will, as well for many other reaſons, as for that by reſtraining themſelues into ſo ſtrait a circuit, it would be ſo much the more eaſie for the Italians to ſtop the entrie of victuals into Millan, without which they could not hold out long, for as much as the prouiſions of new corn were not yet come in. Thus the harquebuziers preſenting themſelues to the defence of the two gates, where the Spaniards beſides the defence they made, ceaſſed not to labour and fortifie continually; the Duke, who contrary to his opinion found reſiſtance, cauſed three cannons to be drawne within a crosbow ſhot of Rome gate, which being brauely planted, he began to batter the gate, and to aſſay to diſmount a Falconet; which being remoued, he cauſed many of his men at armes to deſcend to giue the aſſault, and gaue direction to bring on the ſcaling ladders: and yet not continuing in his purpoſe to giue the aſſault, the matter turned into light skirmiſhes of ſhot betweene thoſe that were without and thoſe that were vpon the rampiers, who hauing great aduantage, ſlue about fortie footmen of the Confederates, and hurt many. In this meane while the gate had bene beaten with many blowes of the cannon, though with very ſmall domage, for that the cannons were farre off: but the Duke alledging it would be very late to lodge the campe, the aſſault was not giuen, and the armie lodged in the ſame place, neuertheleſſe for the ſhortneſſe of the time with ſome confuſion. There was left a good guard for the three cannons, and the reſidue of the campe were beſtowed almoſt all vpon the right hand of the way, euery one hauing great hope of the victorie, for that by many aduertiſements, and by report of the priſoners taken by Iohn de Nalda who was in the pay of the Venetians, they had information that the Imperials truſſed baggage, and prepared rather to depart then otherwiſe: and in good time there came to the campe the ſame euening ſixe cannons of the Venetians. But not long after, not onely the hope changed, but alſo the whole eſtate of affaires, for that certaine bands of Spaniſh footmen iſſuing out almoſt in the beginning of the night to aſſaile the artillerie, were repulſed and beaten in by the Italian footmen that had the guard thereof, notwithſtanding the Duke of Vrbin ſaid, that they were driuen into diſorder: who, two or three houres of the night being now paſt, finding himſelfe beguiled in his hope, that there would be no reſiſtance made at the gates and rampiers of the ſuburbes, and the feare which he had had before of the footmen of the enemie coming to his conſideration, he determined raſhly to retire with the armie: and beginning with as great haſte to execute that which he had determined, he gaue order to the artilleries and munitions to march away, and commanded the regiments of the Venetians to prepare to depart, and ſent to ſignifie to the Treaſurer, to the Lieutenant, and to the Captaines of the Church, the reſolution he had ſet downe, perſwading them to do the like without deferring: with which propoſition being confuſed and almoſt aſtoniſhed, as of a matter not onely new, but contrary to the expectation of all the world, they went to him to know more particularly what had moued him, and to aſſay to induce him not to depart thence: who with words very plaine and reſolute, complained that contrary to his aduice, and onely to ſatisfie others, he was approched ſo neare Millan: and told them it were better and more wiſely done, to amend the fault paſt, then to perſeuere therein: That he knew that foraſmuch as the armie the day before, for the ſhortneſſe of the time, had bene lodged confuſedly, and for the cowardiſe that the Italian footmen had ſhewed the ſame euening when the artilleries were aſſailed, that if the campe ſhould lie there till the day following, it would be the deſtruction not onely of the enterpriſe, but of all the ſtate of the league: for he was ſo certaine that they would be there defeated and broken, that making no doubt thereof, he would not ſtand to diſpute with any man, ſeeing the Imperials the ſame euening

had planted a Saker betweene Rome gate and the gate of Tosa, which beat in flanke vpon the moſt dangerous lodging of the Venetian footmen: and that the ſame night they would plant there other peeces of artilleries, and that when day was come, ſounding the alarme, and for that cauſe the armie being conſtrained to fall into order, they would beate them in flanke, by meanes whereof driuing them into diſorder, they would iſſue forth to aſſaile them, and very eaſily ouerthrow them: That he was ſorie that the ſhortneſſe of the time, and the impediments of the munitions and artilleries, which were farre greater in his armie then in the armie Eccleſiaſtike, had compelled him to begin to breake vp afore he had communicated the matter with them; but that in matters done by neceſſitie, it was a labour ſuperfluous to alledge excuſes: That he had aduentured a greater matter then euer any Captaine had done, offering in marching to giue an aſſault to Millan, and that now he muſt vſe diſcretion, and not deſpaire of the victorie of the enterpriſe for the retraite: That Proſper Colonno, haply with cauſes leſſe iuſt, leuied his ſiege from before Parma when it was halfe taken, and yet not long after he gloriouſly conquered the whole Dukhie of Millan: That he aduiſed the Eccleſiaſtikes to follow his counſell, and not to deferre their departure, for that he replied to them againe, that if the Sun found them in that lodging, they ſhould be ouerthrown without remedie, & therfore he willed them to returne to their lodging at S. Martin. The Lieutenant anſwered, Albeit there was none amongſt them who thought not that his reſolutions were made with great wiſedome, yet none of the Captaines ſaw any cauſe to conſtraine him to breake vp ſo ſodainly: and he put him in mind what the Duke of Millan would do ſeeing their retraite, and deſpairing to be ſuccoured; and how much that would diſcourage the Pope and the Venetians, together with the imaginations which are wont to moue in the minds of Princes when enterpriſes ſucceed ill, eſpecially in the beginning: That if the ill diſpoſing of their campe was the cauſe of ſo great a danger, it was eaſie, without depriuing of the armie of ſo great a reputation, to remedie it, by lodging it againe with better order, and retiring it in ſuch ſort, that the Sakers planted by the enemies ſhould haue no meanes to annoy it. The Duke confirmed againe his firſt concluſion, and that according to the reaſon of warre they could not take any other deliberation: That he would take the blame vpon himſelfe, and be well content that all the world ſhould know that he had bene the author thereof: and that it was not well done to conſume vainly any more time in words, for that it was neceſſarie to diſlodge before the end of the night. With this concluſion euery one returned to his lodging, and diſpatched to make his companies depart; of whom thoſe that lay before, brake vp with ſuch aſtoniſhment, that going away almoſt as if they were broken, many bands of footmen and horſemen of the Venetians disbanded themſelues, whereof there were ſome that ſtayed not till they came to Lodi: and the artilleries of the Venetians paſſed beyond Marignan, but being reuoked, they ſtayed there. The reſidue of the bands, and principally the areareguard, marched away in order: and Iohn de Medicis, who with the footmen of the Church was in the laſt part of the armie, would not ſtirre till it was high day, for that he thought it not fit, in ſtead of the victorie ſo much hoped for, to carry away the infamie of flying away by night; a matter which experience made manifeſt there was no need to do, for that none of the Imperials iſſued out of their rampiers to charge vpon the taile of the army, but perceiuing when it was day how tumultuouſly the campe was diſlodged, they maruelled much, not being able to imagine what might be the cauſe thereof. And that which increaſed yet more the infamy of this retrait, was, that notwithſtanding the Duke had ſaid that he would haue the campe to ſtay at Saint Martins, yet he appointed ſecretly that the campe-maiſters of the Venetians ſhould leade their men to Marignan, either for that he feared the enemies would iſſue out to aſſaile him in his lodging at Saint Martins, or at leaſt (as himſelfe confeſſed afterwards) for that he held for certaine, that the Caſtle of Millan, ſeeing the forces retire that were come to reſcue it (a matter that ſo terrifieth the beſieged as nothing more) would yeeld. In which caſe, becauſe he durſt not abide at Saint Martins, he iudged it leſſe diſhonorable to retire once for all, then to make two retraits in ſo litle time: and therefore the artilleries, the baggage, and the foremoſt regiment of the Venetians matched on to Marignan without ſtaying at Saint Martins: whereof when the Lieutenant demanded the cauſe, the Duke anſwered, that touching their ſuretie he put no difference betweene the one and the other place, for that he eſteemed Saint Martins as defenſible againſt the enemie as Marignan; but the cauſe was, for that the bands of ſouldiers being made weary with the actions of the dayes before, might more commodiouſly repoſe and refreſh themſelues,

receiuing there no impediments or vexations of the enemies: and the Lieutenant replying touching the equall ſuretie of the one and the other, That if the campe retired to Marignan, the hope of ſuccours would be more withdrawne from thoſe that were beſieged in the Caſtle of Millan, then if the armies ſtayed at Saint Martins, he anſwered with vehement words, that ſo long as he caried in his hands the ſtaffe of commandement ouer the Venetians, he would not ſuffer any other to intermeddle with his authoritie, and that he would go lodge at Marignan: ſo that both the one and the other armie, with the great diſhonour, but not without the clamor of all the ſouldiers (who might ſay, contrary to the ſaying of Caſar, Veni, vidi, fugi, I came, I haue ſeene, and am fled) went to lodge at Marignan, the Duke determining to remaine there vntill the campe were poſſeſſed not onely of the number of fiue thouſand Swiſſers, whereunto were reſtrained the promiſes of Captaine Mus and the Biſhop of Loda, who at the ſame time that the campe brake vp came thither with fiue hundred, but alſo of ſo many more as would make vp the number of twelue thouſand: and that for an opinion he had, that becauſe there was no more hope of the Caſtle of Millan, it would be impoſſible to force the Towne, or to reduce it to a neceſſitie to yeeld for want of victuals and other neceſſaries, without two armies, and either of them ſo mightie of itſelfe, that it might ſuffice to make defence againſt all the forces of the enemies vnited together.

The armie of the league broken vp frō before Millan.

Thus the armies retired from the wals of Millan the eight day of Iuly, a matter of no ſmall aſtoniſhment to many men, and no leſſe the diſaſtrouſneſſe of the prediction; for that the ſame day, with the common conſent of the Confederates, the league was publiſhed at Rome, at Venice, and in France, with the accuſtomed ceremonies and ſolemnities: and in the iudgement of all men, there was ſo litle neceſſitie to take a courſe ſo infamous, that many doubted leſt the Duke of Vrbin were caried into that deliberation by the ſecret direction of the Senate of Venice, who for ſome end vnknowne to others, might deſire to haue the warre protracted: and others were of opinion, that the Duke, remembring the iniuries receiued of Pope Leo, together with thoſe which the Pope reigning had done to him when he was Cardinall, and fearing leſt his greatneſſe would put his Eſtate in danger, either for hatred or feare could not brook ſo ſudden a victory of the war: ſpecially ſeeing that which gaue him ſo iuſt cauſe to doubt and feare the Pope, was, that the Florentines held Saint Leo with all the countrey of Montfeltro, and that the onely daughter of Laurence de Medicis being as yet very yong, retained ſtill the name of Ducheſſe of Vrbin. Neuertheleſſe the Popes Lieutenant was aduertiſed by very ſpeciall meſſengers, that the Venetians were not a litle diſcontented with that maner of retiring, and that they had neuer ceaſſed to ſolicite that the armie might approch Millan, in hope that the towne might be eaſily carried: and ſeeing it was not likely that the Duke, if he had hoped to take Millan, would haue depriued himſelfe of a glorie, ſo much the more great then any other Generall in times paſt had had, by how much the reputation and renowne of the Imperiall armie was great aboue all other armies which had bene in Italy many yeares before, of which glorie would haue followed almoſt by neceſſitie, the ſuretie of his Eſtate, ſeeing the Pope, both to auoide ſo great an infamie, and not to offend ſo much the Venetians, would not dare to inuade him: and conſidering alſo diligently the progreſſion of all thoſe dayes, the Lieutenant iudged it very likely (and many others were concurrant with him in that opinion) that the Duke being fallen from the hope which two dayes before he had conceiued, that the Imperials at leaſt would abandon the ſuburbes, was returned ſo earneſtly to his firſt opinion, whereby he ſhewed himſelfe to be more fearefull of their forces, and to diſtruſt more the valour of the Italian footmen then any of the other Captaines did, which repreſenting vnto him greater feare then to others, he embraced raſhly that deliberation.

Katherine de Medicis.

The Pope in great aſtoniſhment.

This retrait did not a litle aſtoniſh the Pope and the Venetians, who were entred ſo farre into hope, that they expected from day to day to heare newes of the taking of Millan: but principally the Pope, who was not prepared either with money or conſtancie of mind to endure the protraction of the warre: and withall, as well at Rome as in other quarters of his Eſtate, many emotions and difficulties were diſcloſed. For three hundred footmen and certaine cornets of horſemen that lay in garriſon within Carpy, began to make incurſions and to do very hurtfull actions vpon all the confines of the Church, giuing by that meanes many impediments to the paſſage of poſts and money ſent to the armie from Rome and Florence; which could not be preuented but by putting of ſtrong garriſons into the townes: and the Pope, who was entred into the warre with very litle ſtore of money, and oppreſſed with great expences, could hardly, with his owne money, and that which was continually brought to him from Florence to furniſh the charges of the warre, make ſufficient prouiſions to ſtop them, being withall buſied in a new enterpriſe in Tuſcane, and conſtrained to ſtand vpon his guard about Rome. For, after Don Hugo and the Duke of Seſſa were departed from the Pope, and had left off their embaſſage, Aſcanius and Veſpaſian Colonno being gone into the ſmall boroughs of the Colonnois, which are neare to Rome, made many demonſtrations to ſtirre vp ſome emotion on that ſide, and many of their partakers had made themſelues ſtrong within Alagna, which is a Citie of Campagnia: and the Pope was forced to keepe a diligent eye vpon their doings, as well in regard of the Gibelin faction in Rome, as for that not many dayes before many ſignes of the ill diſpoſition of the Commons of Rome againſt him were diſcouered: for that when he tooke into his pay Andrew Dore, and for the better furniſhing of that charge, had raiſed and improued certaine impoſts, vnder colour to aſſure the ſeas of Rome againſt the foiſts of the Mores, by whom the abundance of victuals which was wont to haue acceſſe to that Citie was greatly hindered, the butchers who refuſed to pay them were aſſembled in maner of a tumult at the lodging of the Duke of Seſſa who was not as yet departed from Rome, and almoſt all the Spaniards that were within the towne ranne thither in armes; which tumult neuertheleſſe was eaſily appeaſed. At this time the Pope ſtood in doubt whether he ſhould enterpriſe to alter the ſtate of Sienna, for that the counſels of ſuch as were about him were diuers. For ſome repoſing confidence in the great number of the exiles, and the confuſion of the popular gouernment, perſwaded him by many reaſons, that it was very eaſie to alter it, and told him that it was a matter of great importance at ſuch a time to aſſure himſelfe of that State: for that in any misfortune that might happen, the entrie which the enemies might take there, might be very dangerous for the affaires of Rome and Florence. Others aſſured him that it were farre better for him to addreſſe all his forces into one place onely, then to intangle himſelfe with ſo many enterpriſes, with very litle, yea almoſt no diuerſion of principall effects, for that in the end ſuch as ſhould remaine maiſters in Lombardie, would become commanders in euery place: and that he ſhould not truſt ſo much and depend vpon the forces and traine of the exiles (whoſe hopes in the end would be found vaine) as to aſſay the mutation of that State without making of mightie prouiſions; which was hard for him to do, as well for the greatneſſe of the expences, as for that he had ſent all his principall Captaines to the warre of Lombardie. It may be theſe laſt perſwaſions had preuailed more with him, if thoſe that gouerned within Sienna had proceeded with that moderation which in affaires of ſmall importance the inferiours ought to vſe towards their ſuperiours, hauing more regard to neceſſitie then to a iuſt diſcontentment. But it happened, that a certaine Sienois, named Iohn Baptiſta Palmier, who was Captaine within Sienna of an hundred footmen for the Citie, hauing long before giuen hope to the Pope, that when his ſouldiers ſhould approch the towne, he would bring them in by a gutter that paſſed vnder the wall neare to a baſtillion, and that the Pope at his requeſt hauing ſent to him two footmen whom he truſted, to one of which Iohn Baptiſta gaue his Enſigne to beare, that the Magiſtrates of the Citie (with whoſe priuitie Iohn Baptiſta abuſing the Pope, entertained this practiſe) when they ſaw a fit time, apprehended the two footmen, againſt whom when they had proceeded by way of accuſation, and made publication of the conſpiracie, they put them to death publikely, to the end to diſcredite the Pope as much as they could. Moreouer they ſent certaine bands of their ſouldiers to beſiege Iohn Martinozzi one of the exiles, who dwelt in the countrey of Sienna in a farme of his at Montelifre. With all which things, as done in deſpite, the Pope being much incenſed, determined to aduenture to reſtore the exiles into Sienna with his owne forces and thoſe of the Florentines: but it was with prouiſions more weake then was needfull, and eſpecially of footmen: and likewiſe the valour and authoritie of the Captaines did not ſupply the weakneſſe of the armie, which was led by Virginio Vrſin Count of Anguillaro, Lodowike Count of Petillano, and Iohn Franceſco his ſonne, Gentil Baillon, and Iohn Seſſatello: who making their muſters at Centina, and drawing to Tauernelle vpon the riuer of Arbia, much renowmed for the worthy victory of the Gibelins againſt the Guelfes of Florence, they approched the walls of Sienna the ſeuenteenth day of Iuly, with nine peeces of artilleries, twelue hundred horſe, and more then eight thouſand footmen, but almoſt all leuied in the States of the Church and the Florentines, or elſe ſent without money to the exiles by their friends, from Perouſa and other places: and at the ſame time Andrew

Dore

Dore with his galleys & 1000 footmē ſent to him as an ouerplus, made inuaſiō vpō the hauen of the Siennois. But whē they approched the wals of Sienna, they within made no ſigne of tumult, as the exiles hoped they would, ſo that they were conſtrained to incamp and beſiege the towne, in which there was ſixe hundred horſemen and three hundred footmen forreiners. Wherefore being approched neare the gate of Camollia, they began to batter the wall on that ſide with their artilleries. But in the Citie, being ſtrong by ſituation, and well fortified with rampiers, and of ſo great a circuit that the armie enuironed but the leſſer part of it, the people were vnited, and reſolued to conſerue the preſent gouernment; and the hatred they bare to the Pope and the Florentines ſurmounted their affection to the exiles: and on the contrary, in the armie without, the ſouldiers that were not payed were vnprofitable, and the Captaines being of no reputation were at diſcord among themſelues, and ſo were the exiles alſo, not onely in the deliberations and dayly prouiſions, but alſo in regard of the forme of gouernment, ſeeking to impart and deuide, being without, the thing which could not be eſtabliſhed but by ſuch as were within. For which cauſes after they had made a vaine battery vpon the wall, without hauing the courage to go to the aſſault, they began already to haue a very ſlender hope of the victorie. At this time the difficulties of the Confederates increaſed in Lombardie: for, notwithſtanding the fiue thouſand Swiſſers leuied by Captaine Mus and the Biſhop of Loda were at laſt come to the armie, yet for that the Duke of Vrbin held them not a number ſufficient, they expected alſo thoſe which they had ſent to require of the Cantons in the name of the French king, in hope that if for no other cauſe, yet at leaſt to deface the ignominie receiued at the battell of Pauie, they would be very ready to grant them, and that for the ſame cauſe the footmen agreed vpon would go to the warre with great courage, ſpecially in ſo great a hope of the victorie. But in that nation, who not many yeares before, for their valour and authoritie they had wonne, had great oportunitie to get very large dominion, there was no more either the ſame deſire of glorie as before, or any care of the intereſts of the Commonweale: but on the contrary, being full of incredible couetouſneſſe, they propounded to themſelues, as the chiefeſt end of the exerciſe of warre, to returne to their houſes loden with money: and therefore the Cantons dealing in matters of warre after the maner of merchants, making vſe publikely of the neceſſities of others for their owne profit, or elſe hauing amongſt them men whoſe minds were vendible and corrupted, they did either accord or refuſe to depart with ſouldiers according to thoſe ends: and the Captaines which were ſought vnto to be entertained in pay, by how much they ſaw that men had need of them, by ſo much the more did they raiſe the higher, and made their demands ſo much the more ſhameleſſe and intollerable, to the end to make the better compoſition. In regard of theſe reaſons, the French King demanding of the Cantons that according to the articles of the contract, they ſhould aide him with men, who by common conſent were to be payed with the fortie thouſand duckats which the King deliuered out of his treaſury; the Cantons after many deliberations, made him anſwer according to their cuſtome, that they would not agree to any leuies of ſouldiers, vnleſſe the King would firſt pay them all that he owed them, in regard of the penſions which he was bound to pay them yearely: which ſummes being great, and hard to be ſatisfied in a ſhort time, the Kings Agents were conſtrained (whē they had, not without difficultie, obtained leaue of the Cantons) to entertaine Captaines particular: a courſe which beſides the long tract of time which was very dangerous for the preſent eſtate of affaires, ſucceeded not either with that effect and reputation, as it would haue done, if the conſent and authoritie of the Lords of the Cantons had concurred.

The inhabitāts of Millan ill handled by the Spaniards.

By this occaſion, the Imperials who in this meane while receiued no vexation of the enemies, who lay at Marignan without doing any thing, vſed all their diligence to fortifie Millan; not the Citie, as they did in the beginning of the warre, but the rampiers and baſtillions of the ſuburbs, diſtruſting no more to be able to defend them, for that they had taken heart, & the reputation of the enemies was diminiſhed: and for as much as they had diſarmed ỹ people of Millan, and thruſt out of the towne the perſons ſuſpected, not onely they had not now ſo great ſcruple and feare of, but alſo hauing reduced them to ſo great ſeruitude, they were altogether careleſſe of the payment of the ſouldiers, who being lodged in the houſes of the inhabitants, they did not onely compell the maiſters of the houſes from day to day to giue them victuals plentifully and to feed them delicately, but alſo to furniſh them with money for all other things, which either they had need of or deſired, not forgetting (to the end to haue no want) to exerciſe

all extreme rigor: which things being intollerable, the Citizens had no other remedie, then ſecretly to flie from Millan, for that they durſt not do it openly. But to aſſure themſelues of this, many ſouldiers, but eſpecially the Spaniards (for in the Lanceknights was more modeſty and humanitie) kept diuerſe of their hoaſts bound in their owne houſes with their wiues and little children, the moſt part of euery ſexe and age being alſo expoſed to their luſt: by reaſon whereof all the ſhops of Millan were ſhut in, and euery man had hidden in places vnder ground or in ſome other ſort his goods & Iewels of moſt value, as they had likewiſe done, with the riches & ornaments of Churches, which for all that were not altogether in ſurety: for that the ſouldiers vnder colour to ſearch for armour and weapons, tooke liberty to ranſacke all the corners of the towne, and withall forced the ſeruants to tell where their maiſters had hidden their goods, and when they found any thing, they left to the owners ſuch portions as they thought good: in ſuch ſort that the face of that Citie appeared very miſerable, and it was pitifull to behold men reduced into ſo great trouble and aſtoniſhment; a matter worthy of great commiſeration, and an incredible example of the mutation of fortune, to ſuch as had ſeene it a few yeares before repleniſhed with inhabitants, rich Citizens, and an infinite number of Merchants and Artificers, abounding with all things neceſſary for the life of man, proud in pompes, and very ſumptuous in ornaments for men and women, naturally addicted to feaſtings and pleaſure, not onely full of reioycing and ſolace, but alſo moſt flouriſhing and happy aboue all the other Cities of Italy: whereas now it was almoſt naked of inhabitants, by reaſon of the great domage the plague had done there, and for the continuall euaſions of ſuch as were fled, and continually did flie: men and women were there very poorely apparelled, and in ill order: there was no appearance of Merchandiſe or trades, by means whereof that Citie was wont to be much enriched: and the chearefulneſſe and courage of men was wholly conuerted into extreme dolor and feare. Neuertheleſſe the comming of the Duke of Bourbon did ſomewhat comfort them, perſwading themſelues, that ſeeing (as the bruite went) he had brought ſome prouiſion of money, & that for the retraite of the campe of the Confederates the neceſſities and dangers ſeemed ſomewhat diminiſhed, they ſhould no more be ſo much oppreſſed and cruelly handled; and they hoped further, that the Duke, to whom it was ſaid the Emperour had giuen the Duchie of Millan, would take order and prouide (for his owne profite, and the better to preſerue entire to himſelfe the reuenewes and eſtate of the City,) that they ſhould not thenceforth be ſo miſerably torne in peeces; which was the onely hope they had, for that they knew by the Embaſſadors whom they had ſent to the Emperour, that they could expect no remedie from him, either for that being ſo farre off he could not apply neceſſary prouiſions for their ſafety, or elſe (as experience had often ſhewed) the compaſſion of the oppreſſions and miſeries of the people was farre leſſe in him then the deſire (for the intereſts of his eſtate) to maintaine the armie: to the which payment being not made in due times, neither he nor his Captaines could cauſe them to abſtaine from inſolencies and iniuries: & that ſo much the rather, for that the Captaines, to win the hearts of the ſouldiers, and for that all thing being in prey, they likewiſe had profite thereby, were not much diſpleaſed with that military licence, ſeeing they had ſome excuſe to ſuffer it, for that they were not payed. Therefore all thoſe that held any degree within Millan aboue others, aſſembling themſelues in great number, and expreſſing in their face, in their attire, and in their countenances, the miſerable eſtate of their countrie, and of euery one of them, they went, with many teares and complaints, to preſent themſelues before the Duke of Bourbon, to whom one among them, to whom the reſidue had giuen the charge to vtter their griefe, ſpake (as I haue heard) in this ſort.

The inhabitants of Millan implore the compaſſion of the Duke of Bourbon.

If this Citie which for many iuſt cauſes hath alwaies deſired to haue a peculiar Prince, were not for the preſent oppreſſed with greater and more ſharpe calamities then euer was any Citie in the memory of man, certainly (moſt noble Duke) your coming had bene entertained with maruellous ioy. For what better hap could befall the Citie of Millan then to receiue from the Emperour, a Prince of moſt noble bloud, and of whoſe wiſedome, iuſtice, valour, clemency, and liberality, we our ſelues haue ſundrie times had experience? But our very il fortune conſtraineth vs (for we neither hope nor expect remedy thereof from any other then your ſelfe) to powre out afore you our extreme miſeries, greater without compariſon then thoſe which townes taken by aſſault do vſually endure by the couetouſnes, hatred, cruelty, luxurie, and other affections of the victors; which things, of themſelues intollerable, are yet made more grieuous by the con-

cc continuall reproches heaped againſt vs, that they are inflicted vpon vs for a puniſhment of the cc infidelitie of the people of Millan to the Emperour: as though the late tumults had proceeded cc by publike conſent, and not (as it is well knowne) by the incitation of certaine yong ſeditious cc heads, who in their raſhneſſe drew the Commons into commotion, who by their pouerty were cc aſſured to loſe nothing, and by their nature are alwaies deſirous of innouation; and being cc eaſily filled with vaine errors and falſe perſwaſions, are moued at the appetite of any that will cc prouoke them, as the waues of the ſea are caried with the blaſts of winde. To excuſe and exte-cc nuate the matters wherewith we are preſently charged, we will not recount what the people of cc Millan (from the higheſt to the loweſt) haue done for the ſeruice of the Emperour theſe yeares cc paſt: when our Citie for her ancient deuotion to the name of the Emperour, roſe with great cc readineſſe againſt the Gouernours and the armie of the French King; when afterwards with cc ſo great conſtancie we ſuſtained two moſt tedious ſieges, ſubmitting willingly our victuals cc and our houſes to the commoditie of the ſouldiers, and entertaining them very readily (for that cc the Emperours pay failed them) with our owne money, and expoſing ſo chearefully our perſons cc day and night in the companie of the ſouldiers to all watches, all dangers, and all actions of cc warre: when at the battell of Bicocque the inhabitants of Millan defended ſo brauely the bridge, cc which was the onely paſſage whereby the French hoped to pierce into the very tents of the Imcc periall armie: then was our faith magnified, and our conſtancie exalted to the heauens, by Proſ- cc per Colonno, the Marquis of Peſquiero and the other Captaines, euen to the Emperour himſelfe.
cc Of which things who is a better and more certaine witneſſe then your ſelfe, who being preſent cc in the warre which the Admirall Bonniuet made, ſaw, commended, yea ſometimes maruel-cc led at, ſo great fidelitie, and ſo ardent a diſpoſition? But let vs vtterly lay aſide the memory of cc theſe things, and not counterpoiſing merits with offences, let vs conſider the preſent actions.
cc If there be found in the people of Millan any ſigne of ill affection againſt the Emperour, cc we will refuſe no puniſhment. Certainly the people of Millan loued Francis Sforce not a litle, as cc a Prince giuen them by the Emperour, as one whoſe father, grandfather and brother had bene cc our ſoueraigne Lords, & for the good opinion that was had of his vertue. For theſe reaſons we cc are much grieued when we ſee our ſelues ſo ſuddenly ſpoyled, without knowing the cauſe there-cc of, being not certified that he had conſpired any thing againſt the Emperour; but of the con-cc trary, both he and others affirming, that this proceeded rather of the ambition of him that go-cc uerned the armie, then of any commiſſion from the Emperour: and yet all the Citie paſſed an cc oath of fidelitie to the Emperour, and ſubmitted themſelues to the obedience of his Captaines.
cc Such was the reſolution of the Citie of Millan, ſuch was the publike conſent, ſuch was the cc counſell, and chiefly of the Nobilitie; whom to perſecute thus cruelly for faults particular, is cc there either reaſon, iuſtice or example? And alſo did not our faith appeare in the very dayes of cc the tumults? for when the Commons aroſe, was there any but our ſelues that interpoſed with our cc authoritie and petitions to make them leaue armes? And in the laſt day of the tumult, were there cc any others then we that induced the chieftaines and ſeditious yong men to go out of the Citie?
cc and perſwaded the Commons to ſubmit themſelues to the obedience of the Captaines? But cc both the commemoration of our actions, and the iuſtification of the infamies which are put cc vpon vs, might haply be neceſſary or conuenient, if there were any correſpondencie betweene cc the puniſhments we endure and the faults wherewith we are accuſed, or at leaſt if they did not cc farre exceed them. But there is difference betweene the one and the other. For we dare affirme cc (moſt iuſt Prince) that if the ſinnes of euery one of vs were farre greater then the wickedneſſes cc committed by any other Citie againſt their Prince, the puniſhment, yea the crueltie of the cc chaſtiſements which we wrongfully endure, is greater without proportion then we haue de-cc ſerued: and are bold to ſay, that all the calamities, all the cruelties, and inhumanities (without cc ſpeaking, for our honour, of the luſt) which at any time within the memorie of men hath bene cc endured by any Citie, people, or congregation of inhabitants, gathered together, are but cc a litle part of thoſe miſeries which we do ſuffer, euery day, euery houre, and euery moment: ſee-cc ing that in one inſtant we are ſpoyled of all our ſubſtance, and free men are tormented, impriſocc ned in their houſes, and ſome chained by the ſouldiers, who will continually be prouided of vi-cc ctuals, and vſed not as becometh ſouldiers, but as if they were Princes, and haue whatſoeuer cc cometh in their fancie, and withall euery day more money, which when we cannot poſſibly fur-cc niſh, they conſtraine vs with threats, iniuries, beatings, and all ſorts of outrages: ſo that there is not

not one of vs which esteemeth it not a singular grace and felicitie, leauing all his goods in prey, to saue his person, if he may flie naked out of Millan, with condition to lose for euer his countrey and his goods. In the time of our ancestors Federike Barberosso made desolate this Citie, and vsed great cruelties against the inhabitants, against the buildings, and against the walls: and yet the miseries of that time are not to be compared to ours, not onely for that the tyrannie of an enemie is more easie to be endured, as being more iust, then the vniust crueltie of a friend, but also for that one day, two dayes, three dayes, do suffice to glut the wrath and inhumanitie of the victor, and the punishments of the vanquished take an end: but it is more then a moneth that we haue bene exercised with these cruell miseries, our torments increasing dayly; and as those that shall be damned in the other world, we suffer without hope to see an end of our woes, that which before we would haue thought it had bin impossible for the humane condition to endure. Onely we hope now, that your magnanimitie and clemencie will take order for such offences, and that you will not suffer a Citie lawfully made yours, and committed to your protection, to be wholly destroyed with so great crueltie: and winning vs to your selfe with that propertie of pietie, besides the perpetuall honour of your name, to be the onely patron and restorer of a Citie so renowmed through the world, you shall settle & establish your Principalitie more in one day with the good wil and deuotion of your subiects, then other new Princes do in many yeares with force of armes. In summe, all our petitions, all our humilities, all our oblations, and all our desires tend to this, that if (for any cause whatsoeuer) your will be estranged to deliuer vs frō this great cruelkie, or if any thing restraine you therefrom, we beseech you with all our hearts and affections, that you will turne against vs, and discharge vpon this people, vpon vs all, vpon euery one, euery sexe, and euery age, the furie, forces, swords and artilleries of your armie: for that it would be an incredible felicitie for vs, to die violently, and all at one blow, rather then to continue in our present torments and miseries: and your pietie shall be no lesse commended (if you haue no other meanes to succour vs) then their inhumanitie detested: and thus we shall be no lesse glad to finish in this sort our most wretched life, and such as loue vs will reioyce no lesse at our death, then fathers and kinsmen are wont to do at the birth of their deare children.

These pitifull words were followed with the weepings and lamentations of all the rest; to whom the Duke answered with very great affabilitie, that he was much agrieued with their infelicities, and no lesse touched with a desire to relieue them, and to do the best he could for the Citie, and for the whole Duchie of Millan: excusing that which had bene done, to be not only against the will of the Emperour, but also contrary to the intention of all the Captaines, and that for as much as there was no meanes to pay the souldiers, necessitie had induced them rather to consent to such a thing then to abandon Millan, and leaue the armie in danger, and all the estate which the Emperour had in Italy in manifest prey to the enemies: That he had brought with him some prouision of money, but not so much as might suffice to content the souldiers to whom many payes were due: neuertheless if the Citie of Millan would furnish him with thirtie thousand duckats for the pay of one moneth, he would cause the armie to issue out of Millan, and bestow them elsewhere, assuring them, though at other times they had bene abused in the like promises, that now it should not happen so vnto them, for that he would not go against his faith and word, vpon which they might assuredly repose themselues: and he added, that he prayed God, if he failed of his promise, that his head might be taken from his shoulders by the first shot of cannon from the enemies. And albeit such a summe was very hard to be found in the Citie so much wasted, yet the miseries they endured in lodging the souldiers being greater then all other degrees of calamities, they accepted the condition that was propounded vnto them, and began to make prouision thereof with as great diligence as they could. But although part of the souldiers by degrees as they were payed with the money that was receiued, were sent to lodge in the suburbes of Rome gate and the gate of Tosa, to guard the rampiers, and worke at the fortifications, and also to labour at the trench towards the garden where Prosper Colonno had made one before; yet they retained still, no lesse then the others that abode in the towne, the same lodgings they had, and continued to handle their hosts with the same rudenesse, the Duke of Bourbon making no reckoning of his promise, or at least (as was beleeued) not being able to resist the will and insolencie of the souldiers, being entertained and pushed on in that humour by certaine Captaines, who either by will, or through ambition, or for hatred, gaue impediments to his counsels. Of which hope the people of Millan seeing themselues depriued, and hauing no further hope, nor whither to flie, they fell into such despaire, that it is very certaine that some of them, to put an end by dying to so many miseries and cruelties which they could not ouercome by liuing, threw themselues headlong from the top of their houses into the streets, and some wretchedly hanged themselues; the extreme greedinesse and inhumane crueltie of the souldiers being nothing appeased for all that. At this time the plaine countrey also was in poore estate, being marueilously ransackt by the souldiers of the Confederates, who being at first expected with great ioy, had by their rapines and extortions conuerted the first affection that was borne vnto them into very great hatred; the men of warre of our time being generally so corrupt, who taking example by the Spaniards, wasted and spoiled no lesse their friends then their enemies. For, although for many ages, the libertie of souldiers had bene great in Italy, yet the Spanish footmen had infinitely increased it, but for causes, if not iust, at least necessary, for that in all the wars of Italy they were very ill payed. But as by examples, notwithstanding at the beginning excusable, men alwayes proceede from ill to worse: the Italian souldiers although they had not the same necessitie, for that they were payed, yet following the example of the Spaniards, they began to be nothing inferiour to them in any of their enormities. So that to the great reproch of the men of warre of this age, the souldiers made no difference betweene their friends and their enemies, by meanes whereof both peoples and countries were no lesse spoiled and ruinated by such as were payed to defend them, then by such as were payed to inuade and spoile them.

At this time those that were besieged in the Castle of Millan were reduced to such streights for want of victuals, that they were at ỹ point to render the Castle: but because some of the chiefe in the Confederates armie entertained them with hopes to be succoured, to the end they might hold out as long as they could, they thrust out in the night before the seuenth day of Iuly at the Castle gate towards the trenches that enuironed it without, more then three hundred, as well footmen, as women, children, and vnprofitable mouthes: and albeit the guard of the enemies hearing the noise, gaue the alarme, yet no impediment being giuen, and the trenches being so straite that they might passe with the helpe of their pikes, they passed all in safetie. There were two trenches about two stones cast from the Castle, and between them both a rampier of foure fadome high, which rampier as it serued for a guard against the Castle, so also it couered such as issued out to assaile them. This troupe then went to Marignan, where the armie was, and giuing good testimonie of the extremitie wherein the besieged were, and of the weakenesse of the trenches, seeing they had passed them euen with women and litle children, they constrained the Captaines to returne and attempt to succour the Castle, and the Duke of Vrbin consented thereunto, to the end not to take vpon himselfe alone the burthen of the excuse, which was not so easie as before, for that hauing in his armie more then fiue thousand Swissers, the principall cause alledged by him, that it was dangerous to approch Millan without other footmen then the Italians, was remoued. Therefore it was set downe with a full consent of counsell, that the armie, no more by the other side, but directly, should approch the Castle, and seizing vpon the Churches of S. Gregorie and S. Angelo neare adioyning to the counterscarps, they should incampe below Millan. With which resolution the armie departed from Marignan, and marched in foure dayes by a troublesome way, for the impediment of banks and ditches, and incamped the two and twentieth day of Iuly betweene the Abbey of Casaret and the riuer of Ambro, in a place commonly called Ambro: in which place the Duke changing the first direction set downe in counsell, gaue order to dispose the lodgings of the armie in such sort, that the front of the campe might haue his prospect vpon the Abbey of Casaret, which is within a litle mile of Millan, and keeping the riuer of Ambro vpon his backe, it might stretch out on the right hand to Nasilio, and on the left to the bridge: so that the armie might be said to be lodged betweene the gate of Renza & the gate of Tosa, for that it held litle of the new gate, and was lodged in a strong place, as well for these regards, as for the nature of the countrey. The Duke alledged, that he had exchanged the lodging of the Monasteries for that place, both for that it was more neare the Castle, and also not so neare the walls, as they should be compelled thereby to put themselues in danger, and be depriued of power to turne which way he would, and for that threatning the enemies in many places, they should be constrained to bestow greater guards in seuerall quarters; which would much increase their difficulties, considering the smalnesse of their number.

Now the armie being thus lodged, whereof a ſmall part being ſent the ſame day to beſiege the towne of Monce tooke it by compoſition, and the day following with the artilleries ſubdued the Caſtle wherein was a garriſon of an hundred footmen Neapolitans, the Captaines began to looke more ſtrictly how to put victuals into the Caſtle of Millan, which they were informed was reduced into an extreme neceſſitie, with intention to draw Francis Sforce from thence: and albeit many Captaines, either for that ſuch was their opinion ſimplie, or elſe to ſhew themſelues forward and valiant in thoſe things which were to be determined with greater danger of the honour and reputation to others then of themſelues, they counſelled to giue a charge vpon the trenches: neuertheleſſe the Duke of Vrbin iudging it a very dangerous matter, gainſayed it not openly, but propounding difficulties, and temporizing with delayes, he hindered that there was no concluſion made: in ſo much as the deliberation being referred ouer till the next day, the Captaines of the Swiſſers demanded to be admitted into the counſell, where they had not wont to be preſent: and Captaine Mus, who for that he had leauied the greateſt part of them retained among them the title of Colonell, ſpake for them to this effect: That the Captaines of the Swiſſers maruelled, the warre being begun for the reſcue of the Caſtle of Millan, and the neceſſities being ſo great, that where there was need of courage and reſolution, they trifled out the time, diſputing vainely whether they ſhould ſuccour it or not: That they could not beleeue that they would make any other deliberation then ſuch as was requiſite for the common ſafetie, the honour of ſo many Captaines and ſo great an armie: in which caſe they gaue them to vnderſtand, that they would take it for a great ſhame and iniurie, if at the approch to the Caſtle ſuch place were not giuen them, and that they might not beare ſuch part of the perill and danger, as the fidelity and honour of the nation of the Swiſſers deſerued: and that they would not faile to teſtifie vnto them, that in taking this deliberation they ſhould not haue cauſe ſo much to remēber ſuch as with infamie had loſt the enterpriſes begun, as therby to forget the glorie and fortune of thoſe that had vanquiſhed. Whileſt they ſpent the time in theſe deliberations, it being plainly diſcerned that the Duke of Vrbin was of opinion that the Caſtle could not be ſuccoured, newes came (though not very certaine) that thoſe in the Caſtle had compounded with the Imperials, or at leaſt were vpon the point to agree: to which aduertiſements the Duke giuing credit, ſaid in the preſence of all the Councel, that although the matter went ill for the Duke of Millan, yet it was agreeable and profitable for the League, ſeeing it freed them of the danger, leſt either the deſire or neceſſitie to relieue the Caſtle might induce the armie to attempt any thing raſhly, the follie of ſuch being great, who had euer perſwaded themſelues that it might be ſuccoured: & that now being deliuered of that danger, they were to begin againe to conſult and deliberate of the warre, in the ſame ſort as if it were the firſt day of the beginning thereof. Shortly after there came certaine newes of the accord. For the Duke of Millan, the Caſtle being reduced to ſuch an extremitie of victuals that it could ſcarcely hold out one day more, and altogether out of hope to be reſcued, for that he perceiued not the armie of the League to ſtirre at all, which two dayes before was lodged ſo neare, continuing the practiſes, which now for many dayes, to make himſelf readie in ſuch a caſe, he had holden with the Duke of Burbon, who after the retiring of the armie, had ſent to viſite him in the Caſtle, he fell to accord with him the foure and twentieth of Iuly, in this ſort: That without prejudice to his rights he ſhould deliuer vp the Caſtle of Millan to the Captaines, who ſhould receiue it in the Emperours name, promiſe him that he ſhould depart in ſafetie, together with all thoſe that were with him: That it ſhould be lawful for him to remaine at Coma, which was deliuered to him with the gouernment and reuenues of the ſame towne, vntill the deliberation of the Emperour touching his affaires were further knowne: and that there ſhould be added thereunto ſo much other reuenues, as ſhould in the whole amount to thirtie thouſand duckats a yeare: That they ſhould giue him ſafe conduct to go in perſon to the Emperour, with obligation to pay the ſouldiers that were within the Caſtle all that was due to them for the time paſt, which was ſaid to amount to twenty thouſand duckats: That the Duke of Millan ſhould put into the hands of the Pronotarie Caracciol, Iohn Angelo Riccio, and Politiano, that they might be examined, who neuertheleſſe gaue his faith to ſuffer them to go away afterwards, and to giue them ſafe conduct to ſome place of ſuretie: That the Duke ſhould deliuer the Biſhop of Alexandria, who was priſoner within the Caſtle of Cremona, & that New Caſtle in Tortono ſhould be deliuered to Sforzino. In this conuention there was no mention made of the Caſtle of Cremona, which the Duke being no longer able to reſiſt the rage of hunger, had giuen charge to Iames Philip Sacco, whom he had ſent to the Duke of Bourbon, to promiſe to the Imperials, if compoſition could not be obtained otherwiſe: but he diſcerning by their words and maner of dealing, what deſire they had to accord, and declaring vnto them that the Duke could neuer paſſe ſuch a matter, he obtained ſo much that there ſhould be no ſpeech of it. For albeit the Imperiall Captains had many coniectures that there was no great ſtore of victuals in the Caſtle, and that the neceſſitie of the defendants would ſoone bring them to reaſon: yet being deſirous to aſſure themſelues of it, they determined to accept it vnder any condition, for that they ſtood doubtfull leſt the armie of the League that lay neare, would aduenture to ſuccour it: in which caſe hauing no confidence to be able to defend the trenches, they had reſolued to iſſue out into the field and fight: which doubtfull euent of fortune they were willing to auoid in accepting what conditions they could obtaine of the Duke, who the day following iſſued out of the Caſtle, and being accompanied with many of the Imperiall Captaines euen as farre as the barriers and limits of the armie, when he had taried there one day, he tooke the way to Coma; but the Imperials alledging that they had promiſed to giue him ſafe retraite and lodging within Coma, but not to cauſe their companies of ſoldiers that were there in garriſon to depart out of the town, he wold no more truſt them; and albeit he had determined before to do nothing that might incenſe the Emperour, he went to Loda, which Citie the Confederates put wholly into his hands: and for as much as there was no one article of the capitulations obſerued to him, ſauing that he and his companies came away in ſafetie, he ratified by publike inſtrument, the league made in his name by the Pope and the Venetians.

But at the ſame time the Pope, although for the commotion of the Colonnois, he had publiſhed a Bull againſt the Cardinall and the reſt of the family of Colonno; yet ſeeing his hope to change the gouernment of Sienna much diminiſhed, and it being grieuous to him to be troubled in the territories of Rome, he willingly gaue eare to Don Hugo de Moncada, who not with intention to contract, but to make him more negligent in aduancing his prouiſions, made a motion, that vnder certaine conditions the offences ſhould ceaſſe againſt the Siennois, and betweene him and the Colonnois: to deale in which matters Veſpaſian Colonno whom the Pope truſted much, being come to Rome, was the cauſe that the Pope, who hauing loſt all hope of ſucceſſe touching Sienna, treated of leuying the armie from before the walls, delayed the execution of that good counſell, expecting (to run into a leſſer ſlander) to make it breake vp as ſoone as the accord now in negociation ſhould be concluded: and yet the diſorders and confuſions of the armie multiplying continually, it was determined at Florence that it ſhould retire. Thus it happened the day before the armie was appointed to depart, that foure hundred footmen iſſuing out of the towne, marched towards the artilleries which were guarded by Iames Corſo, who preſently turned his backe with his companies; and a bruite being raiſed, and the flight begun, all the armie, wherein was neither order nor obedience, betooke themſelues to flying, being neither charged nor followed, ſtriuing who could make beſt ſpeed, as well Captaines, Commiſſaries and horſemen, as footmen, for the deſire they had to eſcape the danger: and they left to the enemies their victuals, their baggage and artilleries, of which ten peeces as well great as ſmall belonging to the Florentines, and ſeuen appertaining to Perouſa, were caried into Sienna with great reioycing, and almoſt in maner of triumph; and the ignominie which the Florentines incurred long time before for loſing their artilleries before Sienna, was renewed with great cries; which artilleries were kept yet vpon the publike place of the ſame Citie. This chaſe was giuen the day after the rendring of the Caſtle of Millan to the Imperials: and at the ſame time the publike calamities of all Chriſtendome being added to the particular afflictions, the Pope had aduertiſement out of Hungarie, that Soliman Ottoman who was come from Conſtantinople with a very mightie armie to inuade the kingdome of Hungarie, hauing paſſed the riuer of Sauo without impediment, for that a few yeares before he had made himſelfe maiſter of Belgrade, had taken the Caſtle of Peter Varadin, and paſſed the riuer Drauo: inſomuch as hauing no more impediments, all Hungarie was in manifeſt danger. But in Italy, by reaſon the Caſtle of Millan was fallen into the hands of the Emperour, the ſtate of the warre ſeemed to be wondefully changed, becauſe of the neceſſitie (as the Duke of Vrbin alledged) to take new counſels and deliberations, and ſuch as ſhould haue bene ſet downe, if from the beginning of the warre the Caſtle of Millan had bene in the hands of Francis Sforce: by reaſon whereof, the ſame day the Caſtle was rendered, in a diſcourſe which he made to the Popes Lieutenant and the Treaſurer of Venice, touching the ſtate of the affaires, he added, that it was neceſſarie to make a Captaine generall of the whole League, who might take charge of the armies; and that that which he ſaid was no more for himſelfe then for others, but that he was fully reſolued without that authoritie to take no other care then to command the Venetian armie; intreating them to ſignifie his intention to the Pope and the Venetians. And to diuert him from that demand, made in a time ſo inconuenient, and ſo greatly diſcontenting the Pope, the Senate of Venice was in a maner forced to ſend to the campe Lewis Piſan, a Gentleman of great authoritie, by whoſe working his vehement inclination was rather ſomewhat moderated then his determination altered. But touching the maner of proceeding in the warre hereafter, it was determined that the armie ſhould not remoue from the place where it was till the Swiſſers were come, who were waged vnder the name, and with the money of the French King: and the Duke affirmed, that as ſoone as they were come it was neceſſary to lodge them about Millan in two ſeuerall quarters; not to aſſaile it, or proue to force it, but to driue it to yeeld for want of victuals, which he hoped would come to paſſe within three moneths, and ſtood alwayes vehemently againſt the opinion of thoſe, who counſelled that after the campe was ſetled, they ſhould aduenture to take the towne; inferring that the League being mightie in men and money, and the Imperials in neceſſitie of both, all reaſons promiſed the victory of the enterpriſe, whereunto nothing was oppoſite but the deſire to haſten it; for that the enemies conſuming themſelues with time and patience, it could not be otherwiſe, but matters muſt needs ſucceed happily: and being anſwered at one time among others, that his diſcourſe would be very true, if there were any aſſurance that there would not come out of Germanie any ſuch ſuccours of footmen as might enable the Imperials to take the field, which if they did, it was not to be doubted but matters would be wholly expoſed to the arbitrement of fortune; he replied, that in that caſe he held the victory no leſſe certaine; for that he knew the Duke of Bourbon to be ſo hote and actiue by nature, that he had this opinion of him, that whenſoeuer he eſteemed himſelfe to be equall in forces with the armie of the Confederates, he would aduance ſo faſt, that he would giue them occaſion eaſily to haue ſome happie ſucceſſe, which would haſten the victory. But becauſe that for the difficulties which he vnderſtood fell out in leuying the Swiſſers, they might feare leſt they would be long in coming, and therefore it was not amiſſe to remaine ſo long without doing any thing, it was determined by the counſell of the Duke of Vrbin principally, and alſo at the inſtance of the Duke of Millan, to ſend Malateſta Baillon preſently with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, to take the towne of Cremona, which they ſuppoſed might be eaſily forced, for that there was therein not paſt an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, 1000 Lanceknights of choiſe, and three hundred Spaniards, very ſmall ſtore of artilleries, and leſſe quantitie of munitions; ſlender prouiſion of victuals; and the inhabitants (notwithſtanding appalled in courage) enemies: and the Caſtle againſt them, the which, although it was ſeparate from the Citie by a trench, yet by the report of Hannibal Piccinard, who was Captaine thereof, it was eaſie to ſupplant the flankes, and by that meanes to carrie it. With theſe directions Malateſta went to Cremona, for whoſe departure the armie being diminiſhed, the Duke of Vrbin was in no ſmall feare, leſt the regiments that were within Millan ſhould come in a faire night and aſſault the campe, ſo farre were things remoued from hope of the victory. Neuertheleſſe John de Medicis skirmiſhed often with the enemies, and although his courage and valour was well ſhewed in theſe skirmiſhes, together with the vertue of the Italian footmen, which had not bin ſeene but ſince he had the charge of them; yet thoſe skirmiſhes did rather hurt then helpe the ſubſtance of the warre, for that ordinarily there were alwayes ſlaine ſome of the moſt braue and beſt experienced ſouldiers.

But in the meane while the contrary euent of affaires had much aſtonied the Pope, who was not well prouided of money to furniſh the longneſſe of the warre which was now diſcerned, not being diſpoſed to make prouiſion thereof by ſuch meanes as the importance of the affaires required, and ſuch as other Popes were wont: but that which troubled him yet more, was, that he ſaw the effects of the French King were not correſpondent to the obligations of the league, and to that which euery one expected of him: For, beſides that he had bene very long before he payed the fortie thouſand duckats for the firſt moneths pay, and to giue order for the leauying of the Swiſſers, it was not diſcerned that he made any preparation to begin the warre beyond the Mounts: but he alledged, that it was neceſſary firſt to ſignifie to the Emperour what had bene contracted in the articles of the confederation; for that otherwiſe the King of England, who had a particular league with the Emperour for their common defence, might haply aide him; whereas ſignification being made in that ſort, that reſpect would ceaſſe; and that then he would immediatly begin the warre, hauing good hope that the King of England would do the like, who promiſed, as ſoone as ſignification were made, to proteſt againſt the Emperour, and then to enter into the confederation made at Coignac. Moreouer, the French King proceeded coldly to prepare his armie by ſea: and his intention was further diſcouered, in that the fiue hundred Lances which he was bound to ſend into Italie were long in paſſing the Mounts. And albeit it was alledged, that ſuch a lingring proceeded either of the negligence of the French men, or of the diſabilitie to recouer money, and for that they had loſt their credite the yeares before with the Merchants of Lions, or for that the companies of men at armes were very ill prouided, for the loſſe receiued in the battel of Pauie, & becauſe that ſince that time they had receiued no money or very little, ſo that it being needfull for them almoſt wholly to refurniſh themſelues, they could not do it without a good ſpace of time: yet ſuch as conſidered more nearely the progreſſe of things, began to doubt leſt the length of the warre was no leſſe diſpleaſing to the King then the ſuddenneſſe of the victorie, for feare (according to the ſmall fidelitie and confidence that is amongſt Princes) that the Italians when they ſhould haue recouered the Duchie of Millan, making ſmall account of his intereſts, would grow to accord with the Emperour without him, or at leaſt would be negligent ſo to vexe and trouble him, as to compell him to reſtore his children. And that which kept the Pope in ſuſpence was, that the King of England being required to enter the confederation that was made by his perſwaſions, expreſſing no correſpondencie to the promiſes which he had made before, demanded, rather to protract then for any other cauſe, that the Confederates ſhould be bound to pay him the money which the Emperour ought him, and that the eſtate and reuenue promiſed him in the kingdome of Naples might be aſſigned him in the Duchie of Millan. Moreouer, the Pope feared leſt the Colonnois, who with many commotions held him in continuall ſuſpition, would in the end riſe to inuade him with the forces of the realme of Naples. Therefore all theſe difficulties and dangers collected together, he made inſtance to the Confederates, that beſides that euery one in particular ſhould ſolicite and aduance ſuch prouiſions both by ſea and land as they were bound vnto by the articles of the League, they ſhould ioyntly aſſaile the kingdome of Naples with an armie of a thouſand light horſmen, and twelue thouſand footmen, and with a conuenient number of men at armes; iudging by the experience of things done till that day, that matters could not ſucceed happily if warre were not made vpon the Emperour in ſome other place then the Duchie of Millan. For which cauſes he ſent to the French King Iohn Baptiſta Sanga, a Romane, one of his Secretaries, to incite him to the warre with a better inclination, and to impart vnto him how much he was drayned of money, and the ſmall meanes he had to go on with ſuch expences, if he ſuccoured him not with ſome quantitie of money: and to tell him that he was determined to hearken preſently to the warre of Naples, notwithſtanding it was not debated in the confederation to aſſaile that kingdome ſo long as the warre ſhould endure in Lombardie: That the Venetians although to auoid ſo great expences, they had in the beginning made ſome difficulty, yet being ouercome with his importunities, they had conſented to be concurrant in the action, yea without the King, but with a number of men ſo much leſſe then imported his part and contribution: That the King for this cauſe, ouer and beſides the fiue hundred Lances, to whom he was minded to giue for Generall and Commander the Marquis of Saluſſa, being moued thereunto, as he ſaid, more by the good fortune then the valour of the man, would alſo ſend other three hundred Lances into Lombardy, to the end to tranſport one part of them to the warres of Naples: That the coming of the armie by ſea might be ſolicited, either to hold Genes reſtrained with it, or elſe to conuert it againſt the kingdome of Naples: the which, although it was as ſlowly aduanced by the French men as other prouiſions had bene, yet it went on ſtill. Now the Kings Nauie conſiſted of foure Gallions and ſixteene light Gallies; that of the Venetians of thirteene Gallies, and the Popes of eleuen: ouer all which Nauie entirely Peter Nauarre was appointed Captaine generall at the Kings inſtance, notwithſtanding the Pope could haue wiſhed that Andrew Dore had bene the man. Beſides all this, the Pope gaue a ſecret charge to Sanga, to perſwade the French King

to vndertake the enterprise of Millan for himselfe, to the end he might haue cause to imbarke himselfe in the warre with all his forces. Moreouer, Sanga had commission to go afterwards to the King of England, to demand of him succours of money, for as much as that King, who at the first desired nothing more then warre against the Emperour, so farre foorth as the League were negociated in England, as he and the Cardinall of Yorke desired, was entred (as was beleeued) into the League; but the nature of the time and necessitie of the Castle of Millan not suffering a long treatie, when he saw the League was made by others, he thought he might remaine indifferent as a looker on and a Iudge. The Pope also solicited at the perswasion of the Venetians, and no lesse of the French King, who to that end had sent the Bishop of Bayeux to Ferrara, to compose the controuersies he had with that Duke: but it was rather in apparence then in effect, propounding vnto him many offers, and among others, to giue him Rauenna in counterchange of Modena and Reggio; an offer whereof the Duke made no reckoning, not onely for that hauing taken courage by the retiring of the armie from before the walls of Millan, he was become more hard then before to the offers that were made, & chiefly to that of Rauenna; but also for the inequalitie of the reuenues, and that he supposed the same would be a meanes to cause him in time to fall at variance with the Venetians. These were the practises, the preparations and operations of the Confederates, deferred, broken off, and changed, according to the forces, ends, and counsels of the Princes.

But the Emperour, whose deliberations depended of himselfe, was neither negligent nor irresolute, so farre forth as his power and forces stretched. For, after the French King, at the instance of the Confederates, had denied the Viceroy leaue to passe into Italy, which he demanded euen with teares, the said Viceroy (refusing to take the Kings present, which was worth twentie thousand crownes) returned into Spaine, bearing with him a writing of the French kings owne hand, wherein he said he was ready to obserue the accord made at Madril, so farre forth as he would alter the article of the restitution of Burgondie into the paiment of two millions of crownes: at whose returne the Emperour being out of hope that the King would obserue the capitulation, determined to send the Viceroy into Italy by sea with the Lanceknights that were in Parpignan, being almost three thousand, with the like number of Spanish footmen, containing in all a number of sixe thousand: and gaue order to send a new supply of an hundred thousand duckats to Millan, soliciting the expedition of the armie by sea, which could not be so soone ready, for that besides the time that was needfull to assemble and prepare the Spanish souldiers, it was necessary to pay the Lanceknights an hundred thousand duckats, which was due vnto them for wages past. Furthermore he sent continuall directions into Germanie to send to Millan new succours of footmen; but for that he tooke no order for money to pay them, and his brother by reason of his pouertie was not able to do it, that expedition proceeded very slowly: and yet the delayes and ill successe of the Confederates gaue them oportunitie to attend all delayes. For Malatesta Baillon being come before Cremona, planted his artilleries by night on the seuenth day of August before the gate of Mussa, iudging that place to be weake, for that it was ill flanked and rampiered: and for that he thought at the same time to giue the assault on the Castle side, he supposed it best to make his battery in a place farre off, to the end those within might be constrained to deuide their strength so much the more. Neuertheless after the artilleries had battered, he was of opinion that the place was strong, and fortified with rampiers, and the battery made so high, that the descent into the towne would be too troublesome; so that he resolued not to giue the assault, but with a counsell quite contrary, to begin a new battery neare the Castle, in a place called Santa Monaca, which afore time had bin battered by Federike de Bossolo: and at the same time he caused two trenches to be cut vpon the Castle greene, whereof the one drew on the right hand towards the riuer of Po, where the defendants also had made two trenches: and he hoped with his trench to take from them a bastillion, within sixe fadomes whereof they were already arriued, which bastillion was in their first trench neare the wall of the towne: and in taking it, he layed his plot to make a Caualier thereof to batter along the walls, as the French men had done afore: and for that cause the Imperials made another bastillion behind their last trench. The other trench which Malatesta cast, was on the left hand towards the wall, and so neare to theirs, that they were within the cast of a stone; and he determined to begin the battery as soone as the trenches were made according to his deuice, to the which the artilleries of the enemies gaue no great impediment, for that within Cremona there there were but foure Falconets, wherewith they ſhot but ſeldome, for that they had but ſmall ſtore of powder: yet the footmen that were within, ceaſſed not to make ſallies out to vexe thoſe that laboured at the trenches, and put them oftentimes to great diſtreſſe, although they had a great guard. By reaſon whereof Malateſta who was in a maner vncertaine what to do, with litle praiſe to himſelfe, confounded (by diuers aduices written in his letters) the Captains of the armie, who ſeeing that the taking thereof was continually found more difficult, ſent to his campe twelue hundred Lanceknights who were newly leuied by the Venetians, at a ioynt charge with the Pope: and not many dayes after, to the end to reconcile the diſcord and iealouſie that was betweene Malateſta and Iulius Manfron, the Treaſurer Peſero, who after a great amitie was now in ſmall grace with the Duke of Vrbin, went thither from the armie with three thouſand footmen. But the night before the thirteenth day of Auguſt, Malateſta cauſed foure peeces of artillerie to be planted betweene Saint Lukes gate and the Caſtle, to take a Baſtillion; where, after he had battered almoſt all the day, he cauſed the trench to be opened, in hope to take the Baſtillion the ſame night: but about the fourth houre of the night, a ſmall crue of Lanceknights iſſuing out of the towne, gaue a charge vpon thoſe that guarded the trenches, who as well within as without were more then a thouſand footmen; and hauing put them in diſorder, they forced them to abandon the place: neuertheleſſe the day following they were compelled to depart, ſo that the trench that had bene made with ſo great paine, remained abandoned, as well of the one part as of the other. Thus it happened that Fortune would ſhew her ſelfe fauourable to thoſe without, if they could haue knowne how to diſcerne or embrace the occaſion: for in the night before the fifteenth day, about fortie fadome of the wall fell of it ſelfe betweene Saint Lukes gate and the Caſtle, together with one peece of their artillerie: in which place if they had giuen the aſſault as ſoone as the day appeared, thoſe within, who were aſtoniſhed with an accident ſo vnexpected, would haue had no hope to be able to reſiſt, for that the place which they ſhould haue occupied for defence, lay open to the artilleries of the Caſtle. But whileſt Malateſta ſtood long, firſt to reſolue, and then to range his ſouldiers to go to the aſſault, the defendants labouring diligently within, the firſt thing they did, was to defend themſelues with bankes againſt the artillerie of the Caſtle, and afterwards they rampiered themſelues in front of the enemies: ſo that when the aſſault was preſented, foure houres before the ſetting of the Sunne, albeit the moſt part of the campe were turned to that ſide, yet they approched with very great domage, for that they went thither too openly: and when they were approched, beſides other defences, they found themſelues wonderfully beaten with ſtones which thoſe within caſt vpon them: ſo that Iulius Manfron and Captaine Maſon were ſlaine vpon the place, together with many other ſouldiers of condition. At the ſame time there was another aſſault giuen by the Caſtle, but that was repulſed with very ſmall domage: and it was appointed that at the battery made at Santa Monaca, another aſſault ſhould be performed with foureſcore men at armes, an hundred light horſemen, and a thouſand footmen: but the ditch being found full of water, and the place well fortified, they retired without doing any thing. After this arriued the Treaſurer Peſero with three thouſand footmen Italians, more then a thouſand Swiſſers, and new artilleries: ſo that being now aboue eight thouſand footmen, the Captaines thought to make two batteries, giuing the aſſault to either of them with 3000 footmen, and alſo to aſſaile the towne with two thouſand on that part towards the Caſtle: and the ſaid Treaſurer hauing brought to the campe a great number of pioners, they laboured diligently in the trenches, of the which one being finiſhed the ſecond day of Auguſt, they preuailed ſo much after long fight, that they couered a flanke of the enemies. Afterwards, in the night of the fiue and twentieth day, they made two batteries; the one (whereof Malateſta had the charge) beyond that place which Federike had battered heretofore: the other at Muſſe gate, managed by Camilla Vrſin: but the ſucceſſe both of the one and the other was very ſlender; for that the place where Malateſta braked his artilleries, by reaſon it was mooriſh, was vnfit for the artilleries, which in ſinking at the breech by the ſoftneſſe of the place, and riſing at the mouth of the peece when they ſhot, made them ſhoot ouer: and touching that of Camilla, it was low, but they found there a ditch full of water, and ſo many flankes of harquebuziers that it was vnpoſſible to paſſe further. Therefore albeit notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties they gaue the aſſault, they receiued in that place great harmes: and albeit on Malateſtaes ſide the footmen went euen to the wall, paſſing a ditch, wherein the water was deeper then was looked for, yet they were eaſily repulſed. Moreouer on the Caſtle ſide one part of the Cauelier being reuerſed, the footmen mounted vpon it, but for that the deſcent withinſide was too high, they were put backe, and thus being come in on all ſides to the aſſault with very little order, many were hurt and many ſlaine, with little hurt to their enemies. Theſe diſorders, together with the priuation of hope otherwiſe to take Cremona, ſeeing there wanted gouernment and obedience in the Campe, conſtrained the Duke of Vrbin to go thither in perſon, who drawing out of the armie that lay before Millan, almoſt all the Venetian footmen, and leauing there ſome of the men at armes, with all the regiments of the Church, together with the Swiſſers, who were arriued to the number of thirteene thouſand: and now when there remained in the armie a leſſe number of men, and that it was ſpoyled of a Generall of ſuch authoritie, deſpiſing the danger which he ſeemed alwaies before to feare when there were greater forces, and affirming that it was not the cuſtome of men of warre, and of the Spaniards leſſe then others, to inuade other men of warre in their Campe, he went from the armie to Cremona, laying his plot, not to carrie it with the onely force of batteries and aſſaults, for that the rampiers of the enemies were too ſtrong, but by endeuouring with a great number of Pyoners to approch their trenches and Baſtillions, and to make himſelfe maiſter of them more by the benefit of vndermining then by force of armes. He was taxed and reprehended in many things by the Imperiall Captaines touching the gouernment of this enterpriſe againſt the State of Millan, and chiefly for the retraite from before Millan; but no leſſe for that from the beginning he had attempted to take Cremona with very ſmall forces, truſting vainely to accompliſh it with facilitie: and that afterwards when the difficulties were diſcouered, perſeuering therein, he had entangled ſuch a part of the armie, that farre greater occaſions that offered themſelues during the time that he ſpent there, were loſt thereby. For, the full number of Swiſſers ſo much deſired being now come to the campe, he might by enuironing Millan with two armies, as was alwaies determined, cut off that great ſtore of victuals which continually had paſſage thither by the way of Pauie, which for the great circuit that was to be made, the ſingle armie that lay at Ambra could not reſtraine. But it was a matter of farre greater importance to loſe the occaſion that haply was offered to force Millan, for that the ſouldiers within were ſo weakened by ſickneſſe & diſeaſes that fell among thē, that thoſe that were in health being ſcarcely able to keepe the ordinary watch, it was the opinion of many, and of the Imperials themſelues, that if they had bene inuaded at that time, they had bene in great danger to be ouerthrowne.

But the occaſion was greater and more certaine that was offered to take Genes; for that the Venetian Nauie being ioyned with the Popes at Ciuita Vecchia, and afterwards theſe armies ſtaying in the port of Liuorne to tarrie for the armie of the French, which with ſixteene Gallies, foure Gallions, and foure other veſſels was fallen into the riuer of Ponent, when they had by the conſent of the inhabitants gotten Sauona, and all the riuer of Ponent, and alſo taken many ſhips loden with graine going to Genes, they paſſed to Liuorne to ioyne with the reſidue. It was alſo determined, that at the common expences of the Confederates, there ſhould be armed in the port of Marſeilles twelue great ſhips, to the end with the French Gallies, and by the direction of Peter of Nauarre, to aſſaile the Nauie that was prepared in the port of Carthage, or at leaſt to encounter them at ſea. Thus the three fleets of the Confederates ſetting ſaile the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt, the Nauie Eccleſiaſticke and Venetian ſtayed at Portofino, & the French fleete returned to Sauona, from which places ſcouring all the ſeas without reſiſtance, they reſtrained Genes ſo narrowly (where there was want of victuals) that nothing could come thither by ſea, ſo that it was not to be doubted, if they had ſent a certaine ſtrength of ſouldiers on the land ſide to cut from them that onely refuge, but the towne of Genes would haue come to compoſition: and the Captaines of the ſaid Nauies made inſtance for no other thing, both by letters and Meſſengers expreſſe, demanding at leaſt that there might be ſent foure thouſand men on land. But there could be no ſouldiers drawne from the campe that lay before Cremona: and the Duke of Vrbin and others, holding it dangerous to diminiſh the armie that lay before Millan, entertained them with hope, that as ſoone as Cremona was taken there ſhould be ſent to them a ſufficient ſtrength of ſouldiers. But the enterpriſe of Cremona, which as well for the vertue of the defendants, as for the great workings of the Pyoners required a long time, proceeded daily with greater delay then was expected. For the Duke who would needs haue at the campe two thouſand Pyoners, a great quantitie of munitions, and great ſtore of all ſorts of inſtruments, cauſed continuall working at the trenches of the Caſtle, and at the Baſtillion towards wards Po, to win it, and to ſerue his turne of the Caualier, notwithſtanding the enemies who were in doubt hereof many dayes before, were retired behind with a ſtrong rampier. There was working alſo at the two heads of the trenches which went ouerthwart the Caſtle greene, to the end to ruinate the Caualiers which the enemies had made there: and betweene the two trenches of the campe, he caſt another trench of ſixe fadomes broad, the pioners fencing themſelues in front and in flanke with the earth they digged vp, to the end to make a Caualier at ſuch time as they ſhould come to the trench of the enemies. Moreouer, he cauſed a ditch to be caſt without the Caſtle, neare the towne wall, which ſhould leade to the Baſtillion neare the wall that was ruinated: and he made another trench at Saint Lukes gate, drawing vp euen to the ſame wall: and the artilleries of the Caſtle ceaſſed not to batter the rampiers of the enemies, the which for the malignitie of the earth, being very light and looſe, was eaſily pierced through with the ſhot of the artilleries. And on the other ſide, the defendants loſt no time: for, diſtruſting to be able to keepe their trenches and Caualiers long, they made a ditch towards the houſes of the towne, and yet iſſued out often, and with great courage charged vpon the works of the enemies: and the night before the ſeuenth day, they aſſailed in three places the trenches which the enemies caſt vpon the ſide of the Caſtle, and finding almoſt all the footmen that were ſent to guard them aſleepe, they ſlue more then an hundred of them, together with diuerſe Captaines, and proceeded euen vp to the rauelin of the Caſtle: and yet they were more and more reduced into ſtreights, and their affaires began to be in ill tearmes. For the Duke who had made way with his trenches euen to their rampiers, which ſeparated the Caſtle from the towne, aſſailing them with certaine harquebuziers & other good ſouldiers couered with their targets, did them great domage, as likewiſe did the artilleries from the towers of the Caſtle. By reaſon whereof the Imperials burned their rampier that was made at the Caualier, to the end it ſhould not ſerue for a parapet to thoſe that were without: and two trenches being beaten open into their ditches, about the nineteenth day they retired into other trenches, of which the Duke of Vrbin made ſmall accompt, becauſe that for the ſhortneſſe of time they could not be well fortified, and for that by their retiring themſelues more at large, there was need of a greater guard to defend them. And yet, although theſe workes were brought to an end, the proceedings of the campe were but ſlow, for the neceſſitie to reorder and renew the Venetian footmen, who had bene long time without pay, and for this cauſe were much diminiſhed in numbers, as alwaies in the affaires of the Confederates one diſorder hapned vpon another: and whileſt they were about theſe things, the Imperials made many ſallies by night to attempt the trenches, but it was in vaine, for that their enemies were now made wiſe by the harmes they had receiued there before. At laſt when they had got a ſufficient ſtrength of footmen, the Duke of Vrbin began the two and twentieth day furiouſly to batter a tower on that ſide where Federike had battered, where after he had ſhot certaine bullets, he found that the enemies were reduced to ſuch termes as they could not refuſe to compound; and therefore he ſent vnto them a Trumpet to ſummon them to render the towne, with whom came forth a Captaine Lanceknight, and a Spaniſh Captaine, together with Guido Vaine: and the day following it was thus capitulated with them: That if they were not ſuccoured before the end of the moneth, they ſhould depart out of Cremona: and that the Lanceknights ſhould be permitted to go into Germanie, and the Spaniards to the realme of Naples, with promiſe that in foure moneths they ſhould not beare armes for the defence of the State of Millan: That they ſhould leaue behind them all the artillerie and munitions, and depart with their Enſignes folded vp, and without ſound of drumme or trumpets, except at the time of their breaking vp.

Cremona rendred to the Confederates.

In this meane while the French King (in whoſe Court the Cardinall Saluiati who was departed out of Spaine with the leaue of the Emperour, was ſhortly after ſetled as Legate,) had anſwered to the requeſts that were made to him on the Popes behalfe, excuſing himſelfe that his doings were not correſpondent to his will, by reaſon he was much exhauſted of money: but if he would permit him to take through his realme a tenth of the reuenues of benefices, he would relieue him with twenty thouſand duckats monethly out of the money which ſhould be ſo collected, and would be concurrant in the warres of Naples. He refuſed to hearken to the conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan for himſelfe, although at the firſt he had ſhewed ſome inclination that way, from the which his mother & Monſieur Lawtrech had chiefly diſſwaded him. He gaue hope that he would make war out of Italy: but he alledged that it was neceſſary that the denuntiation

ſhould proceed, which being done, he offered to begin the warre vpon the coaſt of Flanders and Parpignan: and yet it was diſcerned that he had no diſpoſition to it, his intention therein being nothing different from the will of the King of England, with whom the expedition ſent by the Pope ſerued to no purpoſe, for that the Cardinall of Yorke, whoſe humour was to entertaine euery one, and be ſued vnto of all men, would giue no reſolution: but the King and the Cardinall made oftentimes this anſwer: The affaires of Italy appertaine nothing to vs. At which time the Confederates fearing leſt the Griſons, who during the ſiege of the Caſtle of Millan had reconquered and raſed Chiauenna, would enter into the pay of the Duke of Bourbon, or at leaſt permit the Lanceknights whom he expected for ſuccours, to paſſe through their countrey, the Pope and the Venetians bound themſelues to take into their pay two thouſand Griſons, and to pay Captaine Mus (who for feare of the Duke of Millan was fled from the campe when he came to the armie, and afterwards pretending there was money owing him for the payes of the Swiſſers, he detained priſoners two Embaſſadours of the Venetians who were going into France) fiue thouſand and fiue hundred duckats, which the Embaſſadours had promiſed him by force: and to reſtore vnto them as much as he had exacted from them: That they would cauſe the ſaid Griſons to be freed from the new taxes impoſed by the Duke vpon ſuch as traffiqued vpon the Lake of Coma. And touching the Griſons, they bound themſelues to ſtop the paſſages of the Lanceknights, and tooke ſuch order that Tegane their Captaine who had compounded with the Duke of Bourbon to ſerue him with two thouſand footmen, aduanced not. In the meane while the affaires of Italy proceeded very ſlowly. For the armie that was before Millan (wherein was greatly diminiſhed the numbers of the Swiſſers, but not of ſuch as were payd) lay there without doing any other thing then skirmiſhing according to cuſtome. But the Spaniards that lay within Carpy did the worſt they could, who being ſecretly aduertiſed by their eſpials, with the commoditie to withdraw themſelues vpon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara, gaue great impediment to the Poſts and other perſons that went to the armie, and ouerrunning all the countrey thereabouts, euen to the confines of Bologna and Mantua, they did infinite harmes, but not to any others then the ſubiects of the Church. But at laſt the Marquis of Saluſſa was paſſed into Piemont with the fiue hundred French Lances, by reaſon of whoſe comming, Fabricio Maramo, who battered the towne of Valence and lay encamped before it, (John Biraguo lying there in garriſon) retired himſelfe to Baſſignan. But the Marquis refuſed to paſſe further, vnleſſe foure thouſand footmen whom he had brought out of France for that intention, were payed by the Confederates by equall portions: and the King making great inſtance to that end, as well for the ſurety of his men at armes, as for the greater reputation of the Marquis, it was needfull to conſent thereunto. At the ſame time Synibald Fieſqno made himſelfe Lord of the towne of Pontriemoli, which Sforzino held, but it was ſoone recouered againe with the ſame facilitie, by meanes of the Caſtle. Within Millan there was great want of money, ſince they receiued none at all from the Emperour; and the pouerty and intollerable defrayments of the inhabitants was ſuch, that they could hardly furniſh the thirty thouſand duckats promiſed to the Duke of Bourbon, who had receiued into his pay Galeaz Birago and Lodowike Belioioſo, who till that day had alwaies followed the French part: the reaſon was, for that the Confederates would not accept them, becauſe of the intollerable expences which they ſuſtained: about which time Iohn Birago ſeized vpon Nouy.

During theſe ſtirres the State of the Marquis of Mantua was in a manner common to both ſides, whereof he excuſed himſelfe, for that he was in the pay of the Pope, and a freeholder of the Emperour: and when the end of the terme of his pay drew neare, he put himſelfe againe into the pay of the Pope and the Florentines for foure yeares more, with expreſſe condition, that he ſhould not be bound to do any thing, againſt the Emperour either with his perſon or his Eſtate: although in the beginning of the warre he had deſired to go in perſon to the armie; which being not agreeable to the Pope, as hauing no confidence in his gouernment, he made him anſwer, that in regard he was a freeholder of the Emperour, he would not bring him in danger. Such was at that time the eſtate of the affaires in Lombardy.

In Tuſcane, the Florentines who had neither armie nor armes vpon their lands, were grieued with the burthens of the warre, for the charges that were impoſed vpon them. For the Pope hauing no money by ordinarie meanes, and would not vſe any extraordinarie meanes, layed vpon their ſhoulders with a great impietie, almoſt all the charge of the expences of Lom- bardy. The Siennois alſo were not without their vexation on the ſea coaſt, for that Andrew Dore, who at the firſt had ſeized vpon Talamone and Porthercule, made them ſtand continually vpon their guard, although not long after Talamone was reſtored to the Siennois by the Captaine that was appointed to keepe it: and alſo the exiles of Sienna being ſupported by the Pope, moleſted them in Maremma, where Iohn Paule the ſonne of Rance de Cere, who was entertained by the Pope, made himſelfe Lord of Orbatello, by reaſon the gate of the towne was ſurpriſed by certaine horſemen, whom he followed foorthwith with his companie.

But at Rome there happened matters of right great conſequence, not cauſed by force of armes, but by conſpiracies and ambuſhes, to the great infamie of the Pope, and confuſion of the affaires of Lombardy: where, by reaſon of the conqueſt of Cremona, there was hope of good iſſue in the enterpriſe of Genes, and to be able following the plots ſet downe at the firſt, to encampe in two parts about Millan. For ſince the chaſe giuen to the Eccleſiaſtikes before Sienna, the Pope hauing no hope to do any great matter againſt the family of the Colonnois, and hauing wholly turned his mind to inuade the realme of Naples with greater forces, as we haue ſhewed: and on the other ſide, the Colonnois and the Emperors Agents, finding themſelues vnable to do any notable matter againſt him, and deſiring to protract time vntil the Viceroy were come out of Spaine with the Nauie; when they had ſent Veſpaſian Colonno to Rome, in whoſe fidelity the Pope repoſed much, they fell to capitulate together the two and twentieth of Auguſt: That the Colonnois ſhould render Anagnia, with other places which they had taken: That they ſhould withdraw their power to the kingdome of Naples, and entertaine no more ſouldiers in the townes which they poſſeſſed in the dominion of the Church: That they might freely ſerue the Emperour againſt all men for the defence of the kingdome of Naples. And on the Popes ſide, that he ſhould pardon all offences paſt, and reuoke the bull publiſhed againſt the Cardinall Colonno: That he ſhould not inuade their eſtates, nor ſuffer them to be endomaged by the Vrſins. By reaſon of which reconciliation, the Pope, who made more account of the fidelity of Veſpaſian then of any other thing, repoſing himſelfe vnwiſely hereupon, and doubting nothing, he diſmiſſed almoſt all his horſemen and footmen which he had waged; and thoſe bands that remained, he diſperſed in ſeuerall townes about Rome, and ſo began to grow cold in the deſigne of inuading the kingdome of Naples. But as by the complaints and proteſtations which ordinarily came from Millan and Genes to the Emperours officers reſident in the realme of Naples, it was diſcerned that thoſe cities could hold out no longer, vnleſſe the Confederates were turned from the purſute of their enterpriſe with a mightie diuerſion: the ſaid officers, hauing no meane to make openly a ſtrong warre, and ſuch as might miniſter ſo ſpeedie remedies, diſpoſed immediatly all their minds and thoughts to oppreſſe the Pope with ambuſhes and deuices. But whileſt theſe practiſes were in preparing, God purpoſing that the affliction which the Pope ſuffered for his particular affaires, ſhould be accompanied with other afflictions in regard of the publike: there came aduertiſements that Soliman Ottoman Prince of the Turkes had ouerthrowne in ranged battell, Lewis King of Hungarie, getting ſuch a victorie, no leſſe through the temerity of his enemies, then by his owne forces. For the Hungarians, notwithſtanding they were but a very ſmall number in compariſon of ſo many enemies, and being more confident for the many victories formerly had againſt the Turkes, then in the condition of things preſent, they perſwaded their King, who was very yong in yeares, and more yong in counſell, that not to obſcure the reputation and ancient glory of warre gotten by his people (without attending the ſuccours that were to come from Tranſiluania) he would go meete the enemie, and alſo that he ſhould not refuſe to fight in open field, wherein the Turkes are almoſt inuincible by reaſon of their infinite numbers of horſemen. The euent therefore being correſpondent to the raſhneſſe and follie, his armie which was compounded of all the Nobilitie and valiant men of Hungarie was ouerthrowne, with a great ſlaughter, and with the death of the King himſelfe, with many of the principall Barons and Prelates of the realme. By reaſon of which victorie all men holding for certaine, that the Turke would appropriate to himſelfe the whole realme of Hungarie, to the great preiudice of all Chriſtendome, whereof that realme had for many yeares bene the buckler and forewall, the Pope was much troubled; as in the minds of men already troubled and afflicted, new diſpleaſures make a deeper impreſſion, then they do in minds that are free of other paſſions. The Pope then hauing many new matters in his head, and expreſſing in his actions, his words, and and his countenance vnmeaſurable griefe, when he had called the Cardinals into the Conſiſtorie, he complained much together with them of ſo great a domage and ignominie to the common weale of Chriſtendome: which he had not in any ſort failed to prouide for, as well by exhorting and perſwading the Princes of Chriſtendome to peace, as in ſuccouring that Realme with a great ſumme of money, when he himſelfe had very great need of it: That he had foretold and knew from the beginning, that the preſent warre would be very inconuenient, and very dangerous for the defence of that kingdome: but that neceſſitie had conſtrained him, ſeeing there was no reckoning made of all the honeſt conditions propounded by him for the tranquillitie and ſuretie of the ſea Apoſtolike and Italy, to take armes, contrary to his perpetuall intention. For both the neutralitie which he had vſed before that neceſſitie, and the conditions of the league that he had made, all which reſpected the common benefit, did ſufficiently ſhew that he was not puſhed on by the conſideration of his owne intereſts, or the particular reſpects of thoſe of his family. But ſith it hath pleaſed God, haply for ſome good end, that the head of Chriſtendome ſhould be hurt, ſpecially in a time when all the other members of the ſame bodie were diſtracted with other thoughts then ſuch as tended to the common ſafetie, he beleeued that the will of God was, that they ſhould ſeeke to cure ſo great a maladie by ſome other meanes. And therefore foraſmuch as that care appertained more vnto him then to any other, in reſpect of his office of Paſtor, he was determined, laying aſide all the conſiderations of incommoditie, of danger, and of his dignitie, and ſoliciting as ſoone as he could vnder ſome good conditions, a ſurceaſſing of armes in Italy, to mount vpon his galleys, and in perſon to go meet the Princes of Chriſtendome, to obtaine of them with perſwaſions, petitions, and teares, an vniuerſall peace among Chriſtians: That he exhorted the Cardinals to prepare themſelues for this expedition, and to aide their common father in ſo holy a dutie: and to beſeech God to fauour ſo holy a worke: the which if for the common ſinnes it could not be brought to perfection, that it would pleaſe him at leaſt to grant him ſo much grace, that he might die in the negociation thereof, rather then to ſee himſelfe out of hope to accompliſh it; for as much as no infelicitie, or greater miſery could befall him, then to loſe the hope and the meanes to put a helping hand to quench ſo pernicious and great a fire.

The propoſition of the Pope was heard with great attention, and no leſſe compaſſion, and was much commended: but it had bene much more commended, if his words had caried ſo much credit, as in themſelues they had dignitie. For the moſt part of Cardinals were of opinion, that he was touched with the difficultie whereinto the preſent warre was reduced, rather then with the danger of that Realme; for that he had taken armes againſt the Emperour in a time, when, for the open preparations of the Turkes, the danger of the Realme of Hungarie was manifeſt. But of this there could no true experience be made. For the Colonnois beginning to execute the treaſon they had pretended, had ſent Ceſar Filettin their confederate, with two thouſand footmen, to Anagnia, where there was for the Pope a garriſon of two hundred footmen payed: and to the end to hide their intentions, they made ſhew as though they would take Anagnia. But for as much as in true meaning their purpoſe was otherwiſe, they occupied all the paſſages, and vſed extreme diligence that their proceedings might not be knowne at Rome; and when they had aſſembled their forces which they had ſent about Anagnia, with whom, and others, which were in all about eight hundred horſemen and three thouſand footmen, almoſt all trained, they retired with great celeritie towards the Citie of Rome, where their coming was nothing ſuſpected: and being arriued there the night before the twentieth day of September, they tooke by ſurpriſe three gates of Rome, making their entrie by the gate of Saint Iohn de Lateran; and there were preſent in perſon, not onely Aſcanio Colonno, and Don Hugo de Moncada (for the Duke of Seſſa was dead many dayes before at Marino) but alſo Veſpaſian, who had ſolicited the accord, and giuen his faith as well for himſelfe as for all the reſidue, and the Cardinall Pompey Colonno, who was ſo farre tranſported with ambition and furie, that he had conſpired not onely to put the Pope to a violent death, but (a thing credibly beleeued by all men) to occupie with bloudie hands, and meanes full of impietie and ſacriledge, the Pontificall ſeate, conſtraining the Cardinals with force of armes to make election of his perſon. The Pope when he had information about the breake of day of their arriuall, and how they were already aſſembled about Saint Coſmo and Saint Damiano, being full of feare and confuſion, fought in vaine to appeaſe the tumult, for that he had no forces particular or proper to defend himſelfe: and the people of Rome, who were partly glad of his trouble, and partly iudged that the publike domage would not touch them, made no ſigne to ſtirre: by reaſon whereof the enemies being encouraged, they aduanced forward, and ſtayed with all their bands at Santo Apoſtolo, from whence they ſent beyond Tiber by the bridge Siſto about fiue hundred footmen with certaine horſemen: who, after a ſmall reſiſtance, repulſed from the gate of Santo Spirito Stephen Colonno being in the Popes pay, and appointed for that place with two hundred footmen. Then (taking the way of the old ſuburbes) they drew to Saint Peters, and to the Biſhops pallace, where the Pope as yet was, who in vaine imploring the aide of God and men, and hauing a deſire to die in his ſeate, prepared himſelfe, according to the example of Pope Boniface the eight when he was aſſailed and ſurpriſed by Sarra Colonno, to ſet himſelfe with the habite and ornaments Pontificall in the Pontificall chaire: but being with great difficultie turned from that purpoſe by the Cardinals that were about him, who coniured him to come out of it, if not for his owne ſake, at leaſt for the good of that Sea, and to the end the honour of God might not ſo wickedly be violated in the perſon of his Vicar: he withdrew himſelfe with ſuch of them as he truſted moſt into the Caſtle, about fiue of the clocke; and at ſuch time as not onely the footmen and the horſemen who were come before, but alſo all the reſt of the armie, ſacked the Pallace and the holy ornaments of the Church of Saint Peter, without any regard to the maieſtie of Religion, and reſpecting as litle holy things as did the Turkes in the Churches of the Realme of Hungarie. Then they entred into the new ſuburbes, of which they ſacked about the third part, and paſſed no further for feare of the artilleries of the Caſtle. Afterwards, the tumult being appeaſed, which laſted not much aboue three houres (for within Rome they did no domage or hurt to any man) Don Hugo vnder the Popes faith, and receiuing as hoſtages for his ſuretie the Cardinals Cibo and Rodolfo the Popes couſins remoued, went into the Caſtle to ſpeake with the Pope, where vſing ſuch termes as appertained to a victor, he propoſed vnto him conditions of truce: whereunto anſwer being deferred till the next day, the accord was concluded in this ſort: That there ſhould be betweene the Pope as well in his owne name as in the name of the Confederates, and betweene the Emperour a truce for foure moneths, with the ſpace of other two moneths to renounce it, and libertie to the Confederates to enter within two moneths: That in the ſame truce ſhould be comprehended not onely the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike and the Realme of Naples, but alſo the Duchie of Millan, the Florentines, the Genowaies, the Siennois, the Duke of Ferrara, and all the ſubiects of the Church, mediatly and immediatly: That the Pope ſhould be bound to retire immediatly on this ſide the riuer of Po, his men of warre that lay before Millan, and to call home from his armie by ſea Andrew Dore with his galleys: That he ſhould be bound to pardon the Colonnois, and any other whoſoeuer had participated in this aſſault and commotion: That he ſhould be bound to deliuer for hoſtages of obſeruancie, Philip Strozzi and one of the ſonnes of Iames Saluiati, and to ſend them to Naples within two moneths, vpon paine to loſe thirtie thouſand duckats: That the Imperials and the Colonnois with their companies ſhould depart out of Rome and all the Eccleſiaſtike Eſtate, and retire to the kingdome of Naples.

This truce was willingly accepted by both the parties: of the Pope, for that there was not ſufficient prouiſion of victuals in ỹ caſtle: of Don Hugo, (the Colonnois notwithſtanding making inſtance to the contrary) for that he thought he had done enough for the Emperour, and for that almoſt all thoſe that had entred Rome with him, being loden with bootie, were ſlipt away into diuers places. This truce brake off all the plots of Lombardie, and tooke away all the fruite of the victorie of Cremona. For, notwithſtanding almoſt at this ſame time the Marquis of Saluſſa was come to the armie with the French lances, yet the Popes regiments beginning to faile, who for the moſt part, by reaſon of the truce, retired to Plaiſance the ſeuenth day of October, the deuice to ſend ſouldiers to Genes was no leſſe diſſolued, then the reſolution to enuiron Millan with two armies. And that which cauſed alſo ſome diſturbance was, that the Duke of Vrbin after he had made a compoſition with thoſe in Cremona, went to viſite his wife at Mantua, without tarrying for the conſignation, although he was credibly aduertiſed of the truce made at Rome: and hauing accorded to the companies that were within Cremona a prolongation of time to depart, the ſouldiers ſtayed ſo long about Cremona before they diſlodged, that he arriued not at the armie with the ſaid companies that were before Cremona before the midſt of October; a matter that brought great preiudice to all the affaires, for that there was ſolicitation to ſend men to

Genes,

Genes, which Peter of Nauarre and the Venetian Treasurer of the armie by sea demanded with greater instance then euer, for as much (as the Venetian regiments being reassembled) there were in the armie as great forces as might suffice for that effect, without being needfull for that cause to remoue the campe: and because the Marquis of Saluss had brought with him fiue hundred lances and foure thousand footmen, besides a daily expectation of two thousand Grisons, who were waged according to the accord made with them: and the Pope, albeit he made open demonstration to obserue the truce, yet his secret intention being otherwise, he had left in the armie foure thousand footmen vnder the charge of Iohn de Medicis, pretending that the French King should pay them; an excuse not without apparent colour, for that Iohn de Medicis was alwaies in the Kings pay, and in his name retained continually a company of men at armes. At last the Imperials that were within Cremona went out of that Citie, the possession whereof was consigned to Francis Sforce: and the Lanceknights with their Captaine Conradin tooke their way to Trent: but the horsemen and footmen of the Spaniards hauing passed ouer Po to returne to the realme of Naples, and the Lieutenant Guicciardin making some difficultie to giue them sufficient passeports and safe conducts, for that it was offensiue to the Pope that they should go to the Realme of Naples, they suddenly tooke their way by the mountaine of Parma and Plaisance, and with great diligence repassed the riuer of Po at Chiarella, from whence they went in safetie to Lomellina, and afterwards to Millan. And not onely the Lieutenant Guicciardin, for the obseruation of the truce, went from before the wals of Millan with the Popes regiments, but also Andrew Dore remoued himselfe from Genes with his Gallies, out of which towne not many daies before were issued sixe thousand footmen, as well bodies payed (whereof there were foure thousand) as voluntary men, with direction to set vpon the sixe hundred footmen, who were vpon the land with Philippin Fiesqo. But Philippin had made on the top of the mountaines neare to Portofino such fortifications with rampiers and bastillions, that he constrained them to retire with great detriment: and yet not many dayes after Andrew Dore returned to Portofino with sixe Gallies, to continue together with the residue, the siege of Genes by sea.

Cremona giuen by the confederates to Francis Sforce.

At the same time that these matters succeeded in Italy with diuerse euents, the Embassadours of the Pope, the French King, and the Venetians, signified to the Emperour the fourth day of September (so long delay was interposed before it was done) the League that was made, together with the libertie that was left to him to enter according to the conditions set downe in the Capitulations. At which act the Embassadour of England being present, he deliuered from his King a letter, which modestly perswaded him to enter into the League. When the Emperour had heard the Embassadours, he answered them, that it agreed not with his dignitie to enter into a confederation made principally against his estate & honor: but that hauing alwaies bene most desirous of the vniuersall peace, whereof he had made so euident demonstrations, he offered to accomplish it presently, if they had sufficient warrant and commissions for the same. Neuertheless it was beleeued that his intention was farre otherwise, and that he did but insinuate that offer for his greater iustification, to giue occasion to the King of England to deferre to enter into the League; to slacken with that hope the preparations of the Confederates; and so by meanes of the treatie of peace, to cause them to enter into some iealousie and distrust among themselues. And yet he solicited on the other side the prouisions for the armie by sea, which was supposed to be forty ships and sixe thousand footmen payed: and to make that armie aduance being assembled at the famous port of Cartagena, the Viceroy departed from the Court the foure and twentieth day of September, the Emperor shewing himselfe more prompt and diligent in affaires then the French King, who notwithstanding he was pressed with so great interests, passed the most part of his time in hunting, beholding dancing, and courting of Ladies: and his children were carried vp to Valledolid, when it was discerned there was no more hope that the accord would be obserued. The coming of this armie by sea compelled the Pope to take armes, who was iealous of the fidelitie of the Viceroy and the Spaniards. Therefore he called to Rome not onely Vitelly with his regiments and the bands of his Nephewes, but also an hundred men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred light horsemen of Peter Maria Rosso: and there was sent to him from the armie two thousand Swissers at his owne charges, and three thousand footmen Italians: and yet he ceassed not to assure that he would go into Spaine to conferre with the Emperour, from the which almost all the Cardinals dissuaded him, chiefly for that he followed an action vncertaine, aduising him rather to send thither his Legates.

Deliberation of the Duke of Vrbin.

But when the Duke of Vrbin was returned to the army, which lay still before Millan, and seeing there was no hope to take the towne, either by force or by famine, and that the Captaines of the sea armie made great instance that men might be sent them to vexe by land the people of Genes, he determined forthe better aduancement of that expedition, to draw the armie farre from the wals of Millan, and yet disposing of things in such sort, that the victuals that were to come to that Citie might alwaies be cut off: for which occasion he began to fortifie Monce, to the end to leaue there with more suretie some companies of souldiers, which might giue some impediment to the victuals that came from mount Brianso and other places confining, and by the commoditie of that fortification, to transport the armie into such a place as might stop the victuals coming continually to Millan from Biagrassa and Pauie: which lodging being fortified, the Marquis of Salussa should march to Genes with his footmen and a band of Swissers; a matter much desired by the sea armies, for that the towne of Genes was brought into such extremitie of victuals, that it could scarcely hold out any longer. But these deliberations being such as could not be put in execution but with a farre greater tract of time then was conuenient for the estate of the affaires and for the necessitie of Genes, for the getting whereof there needed no other thing then to stop the victuals that came by land, the things determined were not brought to effect, notwithstanding there were in the armie foure thousand Swissers, two thousand Grisons, the foure thousand footmen of the Marquis of Salussa, and foure thousand others vnder John de Medicis payed by the Pope, together with the Venetian footmen, which according to the obligation of the League, and testimonie and report of themselues, were assured to containe ten thousand men: but in truth were much lesse. In the end, the armie dislodged the last of October from the place where it had so long incamped, and drew to Pioltello fiue miles from the first lodging, and in discamping they had a great skirmish with the souldiers of Millan, among whom the Duke of Bourbon was in person. The intention of the Duke of Vrbin was to stay at Pioltello vntill the fortifications of the Citie of Monce were ended, where he purposed to leaue in garrison two thousand footmen with certaine horsemen, and after to go to Marignan, where he was determined to lodge the armie; and that lodging taken & fortified, and haply, as he said, Biagrassa first taken, to send the bands of men afterwards to Genes; which were matters of such length, that there was reason to accuse him, notwithstanding he alledged for some part of his excuse, the ill prouisions of the Venetians, who not paying their footmen in conuenient time, had neuer their numbers which were promised complete, and many of those which they had, going away continually for the slackenesse of their payes, they were constrained when the pay-dayes came, to put others in their places, so that (as he said probably) he had eftsoones new companies & a new army. But this protraction which hitherto seemed to haue bene voluntary, began to haue a cause and colour of necessitie. For after many practises holden in Germanie to send a succour of footmen into Italy, which came to no effect, as well for the disabilitie of the Archduke, as for that the Emperour sent no money thither, George Frongspergh who affected the affaires of the Emperour and the glorie of his Nation, and with great commendation had at two seuerall times commanded in Italie two great bands of footmen for the Emperour against the French men, determining to supply with his owne goods that wherein the Princes were defectiue, stirred vp with his authority many bands of footmen, shewing vnto them the faire occasion that was offered to make them rich with the spoyles of Italie: and when he had contracted with them, that receiuing of him euery man a crowne, they should follow him to the succours of the Emperour, and had obtained of the Archduke certaine horsemen and artilleries, he prepared to passe, making the muster of all his men betweene Bolzano and Maran. The rumour of which preparation being come into Italie, was the cause that the Duke of Vrbin left off the resolution to molest Genes, reduced almost to the last extremitie, although Andrew Dore diminishing his first demands, required no more but fifteene hundred footmen, making his reckoning to furnish as many for his owne part. But the Duke refused also that demand, alledging for his excuse, the necessitie he had had to send from the armie fifteene hundred footmen of the Venetians, into the countrey of Vincensa, for a feare which that Senate had lest the armie of the Lanceknights would take that way; an opinion which the Duke confuted, perswading himselfe that they would rather take the way of Lecqua, and for that reason he stirred not from Pioltello, to the end to be the more neare to the riuer of Adda, and publiſhed that he would march to meet them, and fight with them beyond Adda at their coming out of the vale of Sarſina.

Thus the affaires of Lombardie beginning to returne into new and farre greater difficulties, a new fire was alſo kindled in the Citie of Rome. For the Pope being much appalled for the accident of the Colonnois, and inclined to the peace, and to go with the armie at ſea to Barcelona to contract it perſonally with the Emperour, had (as ſoone as his enemies were gone out of Rome) ſent Paul d'Arezzo his Chamberlaine to the French King, to the end to paſſe to the Emperour with his conſent to negociate the peace, and to ſignifie vnto the King his neceſſitie & dangers, and to demand of him an hundred thouſand crownes to enable him to defend himſelf. In which matters he was ſo much diſcordant to himſelfe, that in demanding money of the King, and vrging him to a greater readineſſe in the warre, he would not onely not conſent to the tenths vnleſſe he had the one halfe to himſelfe, which the King refuſed, ſaying that it was contrary to the vſage of France; but alſo he could not be reſolued to create Cardinall the Chancellor Prat, who for the authoritie he bare in the Kings counſels, and for that all expeditions of money paſſed through his hands, might haue ſtood him in great ſtead in his deſignes. The King forgat not to bemoane with Paul d'Arezzo and the other Nuncios, the accident happened at Rome, and to offer to the Pope all his meanes for his defence, and to admoniſh him to repoſe no more confidence in the Emperour, exhorting and counſelling him for this cauſe not to perſeuere in the truce: in which caſe and not otherwiſe, he ſaid he would ſatisfie the twentie thouſand duckats promiſed for euery moneth. The Pope was alſo incited to this by the King of England, who counſelled him not to go to Barcelona, and vnderſtanding what had happened him, he ſent him fiue and twentie thouſand duckats. The French king diſſwaded the Pope from the voyage which he purpoſed to make to the Princes of Chriſtendome, as a matter which for the importance thereof required a further conſultation: and at the firſt he refuſed that Paul d'Arezzo ſhould go to the Emperour, either for ſuſpition that the Pope would begin to entertaine with him ſome practiſe ſeparate, or for that it was a matter more honorable to worke the peace by the meanes of the King of England, then to ſeeme, as he ſaid, to beg it of the Emperours: and yet ſhortly after the Pope making a new inſtance, he conſented that he ſhould go, either for that he deſired the peace, or elſe becauſe he began to diſlike that it ſhould be wrought by the King of England, who caried himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that he had good reaſon to doubt leſt for his particular intereſts he might be drawne by him into inconuenient conditions, ſeeing the ſame King of England (or rather the Cardinall of Yorke vnder his name) being full of ambition, and deſirous to be iudge of all, propounded conditions very ſtrange, and had ends alſo different from the purpoſes of others, by reaſon whereof he feared leſt he would ſuffer him to be abuſed by the Emperour, and would not be ſorie that the Duchie of Millan ſhould fall to the Duke of Bourbon by the benefit of the peace, ſo farre forth as he maried the Emperours ſiſter, to the end it might remain in his power to giue his daughter in mariage to the French king. Therfore the perſwaſions tendred to the Pope by the one and the other King; the feare to loſe the amitie of the Confederates, and (being depriued of their aides) to remaine in prey to the Emperour and his officers: the prouocations of his owne counſellors; the diſdaine conceiued againſt the Colonnois, and the deſire to recouer (by a iuſt reuenge) in ſome ſort the honour loſt; induced him to conuert againſt the townes of the Colonnois, all thoſe forces which he had afore called into Rome onely for his ſafetie: and he was of opinion that no reaſon might compell him to obſerue the accord which he had made vnwillingly, being abuſed by their frauds, and forced by their armes, contrary to the faith receiued. Therefore he ſent Vitelli with his companies to vexe the lands of the Colonnois, making his account to burne and raze all their townes, for that by reaſon of the ancient affection of the inhabitants and the faction, it was a matter of ſmall preiudice to take the townes onely. And at the ſame time he publiſhed a Bull againſt the Cardinall and the reſt of that family, by vertue whereof he afterwards depriued the Cardinall of the Hat, who ſeeking before to defend himſelfe with the Bul of Simonie, had publiſhed his appellations at Naples, and had appealed to the Councell to come: but he deferred to pronounce ſentence againſt the other Colonnois, who entertained horſemen and footmen in the Realme of Naples. The Popes bands being entred into their townes, burnt Marina and Montfortin, whoſe Caſtle was yet holden by the Colonnois. They razed Gallicano and Tagarolo, the Colonnois being carefull of nothing elſe, then to defend their places of ſtrength, and chiefly the towne of Paliano, which is a place of ſtrong ſituation, and of very hard acceſſe for great artilleries, and hath no other acceſſe vnto it but by three wayes, whereof one cannot ſuccour another: and withall the wall being very thicke, the inhabitants were well reſolued to defend it. Neuertheleſſe it was beleeued, that if Vitelli had marched with diligence to aſſaile it, notwithſtanding many of the inhabitants of thoſe townes that had bene taken were retired thither, he had eaſily caried it, for that there was not one ſouldier within it. But whileſt he deferred to go thither, following the inclination of his nature, full of irreſolution and feare when he was to put any thing in execution, fiue hundred footmen, as well Lanceknights as Spaniards, ſent from the Realme of Naples, and two hundred horſemen, entred the towne by night, which made the taking thereof ſo difficult, that Vitelli, who at the ſame time kept his companies about Grotta Ferrata, not daring to make any further enterpriſe vpon Paliano, nor againſt the Popes Rocke, determined (when he had ſent to batter the Rocke of Montfortin guarded by the Colonnois) to gather together all his forces at Valmonton, more to looke to the defence of the countrey if any emotion were made towards the Realme of Naples, then with hope to be able to do any thing of importance: for the which the Pope blamed him much, who at a time when his purpoſe was to inuade the kingdome of Naples, and afterwards when he called into Rome the regiments for his defence, had deſired that Vitelli and Iohn de Medicis ſhould be ſent thither, who were two Captaines conioyned in amitie and alliance; and the coldneſſe of the one of them ſeemed ſufficient both to temper and be tempered by the valour and forwardneſſe of the other. But deſtinie drawing Iohn de Medicis to a ſodaine death in Lombardie, the Pope following the counſell of his Lieutenat (ſeruing his turne in the meane while of Vitelli in leſſer things) had deferred to call the ſaid Iohn de Medicis vntill there was greater neceſſitie of him, or that the occaſion of ſome greater enterpriſe preſented it ſelfe, to the end not to depriue the armie in Lombardie of ſo worthy a perſonage, who for his great courage and vertue gaue great terror to his enemies and much aſſurance to his friends: and that ſo much the more, by how much the rumor of the deſcending of the Lanceknights for the Emperour increaſed, the which conioyned to the aduertiſements that came, that the Spaniſh Nauie was vpon the point to depart out of the port of Cartagena, conſtrained the Pope, being vrged thereto by many of the Confederates, and by his own counſellers, to deuiſe (contrary to his meaning alwayes before) to make ſome compoſition with the Duke of Ferrara; not ſo much to ſtand aſſured of his conſpiracies and emotions, as to draw from him ſome great quantitie of money, and to induce him to be preſent in the armie as Captaine generall of all the League. To which purpoſe after he had many times dealt with Mathew Caſella of Faenza, the Dukes Embaſſadour reſident with him, and ſuppoſing that the Duke was well inclined that way, he ſent to his Lieutenant Guicciardin, who was then at Parma, to go to Ferrara, giuing him a commiſſion very large in apparence, but indeed full of reſtraints and limitations, for that he would haue him conſent to render to the Duke of Ferrara the townes of Modena and Reggia, receiuing of him within a ſhort time, two hundred thouſand duckats: That the Duke ſhould be bound to declare himſelfe, and be preſent in the armie as Captaine generall of the League: That his eldeſt ſonne ſhould take in mariage Catherine the daughter of Laurence de Medicis: and that they ſhould trie if there were any meanes to giue one of the Dukes daughters in mariage to Hippolito de Medicis ſonne of Iulian, with an equall dowrie: with many other conditions, which being of themſelues almoſt impoſſible to be decided for the ſhortneſſe of the time, the Pope notwithſtanding, who condeſcended thereunto no otherwiſe then by a laſt neceſſitie, charged him not to paſſe this matter, nor to make any abſolute concluſion, vntill he had from him new direction and a new commiſſion. Not long after he enlarged his commiſſion, as well in regard of the conditions, as for the power to conclude, becauſe he had aduertiſement that the Viceroy of Naples was arriued with two and thirtie ſhips in the gulfe of Saint Florent in Corſica, and had brought with him three hundred horſe, fiue and twentie hundred Lanceknights, and three or foure thouſand Spaniards.

Catherine de Medicis.

But now the will of the Pope was to litle purpoſe, for that a Gentleman of the Duke of Ferrara was come with the Viceroy, who being diſpatched with great diligence from the place aboueſaid, did not onely ſignifie to the Duke the coming of the armie by ſea, but alſo brought vnto him from the Emperour, the inueſtiture of Modena and Reggia, with promiſe in words of the next mariage of the Lady Margarite of Auſtria baſtard daughter to the Emperour, with Hercules eldeſt ſonne to the Duke. By reaſon of which aduertiſements, Alphonſo who before expected pected with great desire the coming of the Lieutenant, changing his mind, and supposing, for that the Lanceknights of the armie by sea approched, that the affaires of the Emperour began to haue cleare passage, he signified by his Counseller Iames Aluarot of Padua to the Popes Lieutenant (who being gone from Parma, was then at Centa) the expedition he had receiued out of Spaine; by the which albeit he was not bound to declare himselfe either against the Pope or against the League, yet for that he had receiued so great a benefit from the Emperour, it was not conuenient that he should entertaine any further practise against him, and that the negociation for the which he went to Ferrara being thereby dissolued, he thought good to aduertise him of it, to the end to giue the Pope by his silence no iust cause of discontentment against him: not forbidding him notwithstanding to come to Ferrara, but referring it to his discretion. The Lieutenant who discerned manifestly by this relation that it would be in vaine for him to go to Ferrara; not purposing any more to abuse the Popes reputation without hope of any profit, and being also called backe by the necessitie of the affaires of Lombardie, he returned immediatly to Modena, after he had (notwithstanding) preferred in some other forme new solicitations of accord, for that the State of the Church on that side was dayly reduced into greater danger: seeing that George Fronspergh with his Lanceknights, who were about thirteene or foureteene thousand, hauing taken their way by the vale of Sabio, and being come by the Rocke of Auso towards Salo, were now come to Chastilion de Striuieri vpon the confines of Mantua: against whom the Duke of Vrbin (who not many dayes before, to the end to be ready to encounter the Lanceknights, had led the armie to Vaury vpon the riuer of Adda, betweene Trezzo and Cassan, and there had erected a bridge and fortified his campe) leauing at Vaurie the Marquis of Saluss with the French bands, the Swissers, the Grisons, and his owne footmen, he departed the nineteenth day of Nouember from Vaurie, leading with him Iohn de Medicis, fiue hundred men at armes, many cornets of light horsemen, and eight or nine thousand footmen; with intention not to set vpon them directly in the plaine field, but to molest them, and cut off their victuals, alledging that the onely way to vanquish men of that humor, was to driue them to fall into some disorder. The one and twentieth day he arriued at Sonzin, from whence he caused Mercario to aduance forward with all the light horsemen, and a troupe of men at armes, to trouble them, & to giue time to the armie to ouertake them, for that he feared lest he should come very late, because they were lodged the same day at Caurians: by which occasion excusing himselfe of his long tarying at Vaury, he layed the fault vpon the negligence and couetousnesse of the Treasurer Pisani, whereby the campe was constrained to remaine there a day or two more, tarying for the oxen that should draw the artilleries: of which fault he said, there proceeded afterwards very great disorder, and almost the ruine of the whole enterprise. Vntill that time there was great doubt what way the Lanceknights would take; for that at first it was beleeued they would draw towards Adda by the countreys of Bressia and Bergama, with purpose to be met by the Imperiall bands, and to go with them to Millan: and afterwards it was supposed they would passe the riuer of Po at Casalmaior, and that from thence they would take the way to Millan. But being come the two and twentieth day to Riuolto which is eight miles from Mantua, betweene the riuers of Minceo and Oglio, the Duke of Vrbin lodging the same day at Prato Albuino, forasmuch as they passed not Minceo at Goito, it was discerned that they would rather passe Po at Bourgfort or Viadana, then at Ostia or the places more lower: but passing at Ostia, it was a manifest signe that they would take the way of Modena and Bologna, in both which places there was made leuies of footmen and other prouisions. Afterwards the Lanceknights took the way of Bourgfort the foure & twentieth day, whither, because they had no artilleries, the Duke of Ferrara sent them foure Falconets by the riuer of Po; which of it selfe was but a slender succour, but did them great seruice by the benefite of fortune. For, as the Duke of Vrbin in following them was entred within the straite of Mantua which they call Serraglio, within the which they were as yet; as they approched to Bourgfort, Iohn de Medicis made after with his light horsemen to charge them vpon the taile, though without hope to do any great matter: and as he accoasted them very neare, not knowing that they had any artilleries, fire being put to one of the falconets, with the second shot Iohn de Medicis had his thigh broken a litle aboue the knee, by reason whereof being caried to Mantua, he died there within a few dayes after; to the great preiudice of the enterprise, wherein the enemies neuer stood in feare of any other armes then of his. For notwithstanding he was a yong man of nine and twentie yeares of age, age, and full of great forwardneſſe and courage, yet his experience and vertue ſurmounted his age, and the heate of his youth was dayly more qualified: and many plaine and euident ſignes of induſtrie and wiſedome appearing more and more in him, there was an aſſured expectation that he would in ſhort time become a famous Captaine in all things concerning the ſcience of warre. After this the Lanceknights without any impediment drew along the riuer of Po to Oſtia, the Duke of Vrbin being at Bourgfort: and hauing paſſed ouer Po at Oſtia the eight and twentieth day, they encamped at Rouero, where the Duke of Ferrara aided them with a certaine ſumme of money, and ſome other field peeces: and the inhabitants of Bologna, and all Tuſcane began to be very fearefull, for that the Duke of Vrbin (notwithſtanding he had alwaies aſſured before, that if the enemies paſſed Po he would do the like) was gone to Mantua, ſaying he would tarrie in that place for a commiſſion from the Senate of Venice, whether he ſhould paſſe Po or not. But the Lanceknights after they had paſſed the riuer of Secchia, turned to the way of Lombardy to ioyne with the companies that were within Millan. At which time the Viceroy, who was departed from Corſica with fiue and twentie veſſels (for two of his ſhips were periſhed in a ſtorme before he came to Saint Florent, and fiue others ſeparate from the Nauie floated here and there) encountred aboue Seſtria in the Leuant the Nauie of the League, which was compounded of ſixe gallies of the French Kings, fiue of the Popes, and fiue of the Venetians: and being grappled together aboue Codemont, they fought from two of the clocke till night: in which conflict Andrew Dore wrote, that he ſunke one of their ſhips, wherein were more then three hundred men, and did many other great domages to the whole fleete with his artilleries: and that for the ſtormie ſeaſon the gallies were conſtrained to retire vnder the hill of Portofino, and that they expected the ſame night the other gallies that were at Portouenere: and whether they came or came not, that vpon the appearing of the day he would go ſeeke the enemie. Neuertheleſſe albeit they followed the fleete to Liuorne, they could not ouertake it, for that they had wonne much afore thē, becauſe they beleeuing that the fleete had run vp either into Corſica or into Sardignia, were not diligent to follow it. Afterwards the Viceroy followed on his way, but ſo ſhaken with tempeſts, that his ſhips were diſperſed, part whereof, where Don Ferrand de Gonſaga was, were driuen into Sicile, and afterwards came to Caietta, where certaine Lanceknights were ſet on land: but touching himſelfe, he arriued with the reſidue of the Nauie at the port of Saint Stephen, from whence for that he was vncertaine in what termes the affaires ſtood, he ſent to the Pope being at Rome, the Commander Pignaloſa, with commiſſions expreſſing the good intentions of the Emperour: and after when the rage of the ſea was abated, he ſailed with his Nauie to Caietta.

In the meane while the Lanceknights after they had paſſed the riuer of Secchia, and were drawne towards Razzolo and Gonſaga, they lodged the third day of December at Guaſtallo, and the fourth at Newcaſtle and Powy, which is ten miles from Parma: where the Prince of Orange ioyned with them, being come from Mantua with two companions in the habite of a ſimple harquebuzier. The fift day, after they had paſſed the riuer of Lenza aboue the bridge and the high way, they lodged at Montchiaruculo, the Duke of Vrbin remaining yet at Mantua with his wife, being nothing touched with the preſent dangers. The ſeuenth day, after they had paſſed the riuer beyond Parma, they beſtowed themſelues in the villages of Felina, the riuers being high by reaſon of the great raines that fell: and Captaine George by the relation of his letters written to the Duke of Bourbon, which were ſurpriſed, ſhewed himſelfe very irreſolute what courſe to take. The eleuenth day they paſſed the riuer of Taro, and the day following they lodged at the borough Saint Danin, where they ſhewed their Lutheran malice againſt holy things and the images of the Saints. The thirteenth day they encamped at Firenzola, from whence, as was diſcerned by letters ſurpriſed, they ſolicited the bands of Millan to ioyne with them, who had the ſame deſire, but were retained by want of money: for the Spaniards ſaid they would not depart out of Millan, vnleſſe they were ſatisfied their old payes, and began alreadie to ſacke and ſpoile. But at laſt the Captaines preuailed ſo much with them, that they were content to receiue onely fiue payes; for the furniſhing whereof, they were driuen to ſpoile the Churches of their veſſels of ſiluer, and to impriſon many Citizens: and by degrees as the ſouldiers were payed they were ſent to Pauie, though with great difficultie, for that they were loth to depart from Millan: and becauſe theſe things would require ſome time, the Captaines in the meane while ſent beyond Po certaine bands of horſemen and Italian footmen to ioyne with the Lanceknights.

knights. The Lieutenant had made inſtance, for the better ſuretie of the Eſtate of the Church on that ſide, that the Duke of Vrbin would paſſe the riuer of Po with the Venetian regiments, who had not onely deferred ſo to do, ſometimes alledging that he expected aduertiſement of the will of the Venetians, and ſometimes ſhewing other cauſes and reaſons; but alſo perſwaded the Senate, that if he ſhould leade the armie ouer the riuer of Po, there would be danger leſt the Imperials ſhould inuade their Eſtates, they charged him not to paſſe: and in that regard he had retained many dayes the bands of footmen that were vnder the commandment of Iohn de Medicis, whom the Lieutenant had ſolicited to paſſe Po for the defence of the lands of the Church: and the Marquis of Saluſſa hauing paſſed the riuer of Adda, as well for that the Lieutenant had required ſuccours of him, as for that the Swiſſers and Griſons being diminiſhed, he eſteemed himſelfe not ſtrong enough in the lodging at Vaurie, the Venetians, who before had conſented that the Marquis ſhould paſſe Po to ſuccour the Pope with ten thouſand footmen, as well Swiſſers as of their owne people, whō they payed with the fortie thouſand duckats of the French King, (the care of receiuing and ſpending whereof was committed to them when the Pope made the truce, and there was a doubt, which was afterwards farre greater, that they conuerted ſome part thereof to the payment of their owne ſouldiers) being afterwards moued by the perſwaſions of the Duke of Vrbin, they intreated him not to paſſe: for which cauſe, the Duke who had ſent him word that he would conferre with him at Sonzin, deferred his coming ſo long, that the Marquis went his way: neuertheleſſe he not onely vſed all his endeuour to make him ſtay, the better to ſee what the Lanceknights would do, but alſo he counſelled him openly not to paſſe; wherein he was alſo hindered, for that the payes of the Swiſſers, (who were payed after the rate of ſixe thouſand and were in truth but foure thouſand) were not readie. And therefore although he deferred to paſſe vntill the ſeuen and twentieth of December, yet he ſent part of the French horſemen with certaine bands of footmen, to lodge in diuerſe places of the countrey, to ſtop the paſſage of victuals to the Lanceknights, who had now remained many dayes at Firenzola: and for this ſame cauſe Guido Vaine was ſent to the borough of Saint Donin with an hundred light horſemen: and Paul Luſaſquo came out of Plaiſance with a good troupe of horſemen, and drew neare to Firenzola, from which place part of the Lanceknights went to lodge at the borough of Arquà for the more commoditie of victuals: for feare of whom Plaiſance had bene refurniſhed before, but not with ſo ſufficient forces as were thought conuenient, for that the Lieutenant, who euer ſince the coming of the Lanceknights had feared leſt the difficultie to aduance their affaires in Lombardie, would force the Imperials to paſſe into Tuſcane, wiſhed that they would deſire to go encampe before Plaiſance: and for that reaſon, vnknowne to all other, yea to the Pope himſelfe, he ſo deferreed to furniſh Plaiſance, that they might haue hope to be able to take it: and yet furniſhing it in ſuch ſort as they could not eaſily carrie it, and hoping that if they went thither, he ſhould lacke no meanes to ſuccour it. But by the long abode which the Lanceknights made in the places thereabout, and the danger leſt (as all men beleeued) it would be taken, conſtrained him to conſent that Guido Rangon ſhould go thither with a great companie of ſouldiers, and withall, according to the direction of the Venetians, who had promiſed to ſend thither for garriſon a thouſand footmen to ſuccour the Popes neceſſitie, Babbon of Naldo one of their Captaines, was diſpatched thither with a regiment of a thouſand footmen: but becauſe they were ill payed, they were immediatly diminiſhed to foure hundred. At laſt the Marquis of Saluſſa paſſed, who in truth had not aboue foure thouſand Swiſſers and Griſons, and three thouſand footmen of his owne: and being come to Puleſine, notwithſtanding he was deſired not to depart from thence, to moleſt the Lanceknights that were lodged at Firenzola, whither Luſaſquo alſo made incurſions many times, euen vp to their lodgings, yet for his better ſuretie he went to Torricella and Siſſa. But within two dayes after the Lanceknights brake vs from Firenzola, and went to Carpineta and the places thereabouts: neither was it knowne what was the intention of the Duke of Bourbon, whether to go encampe himſelfe before Plaiſance when he was come out of Millan, or to paſſe further towards Tuſcane. Afterwards the Lanceknights paſſed the riuer of Nyno the laſt day of the yeare, to the end to paſſe afterwards the riuer of Trebia, and there to attend the Duke of Bourbon, as in a place leaſt ſubiect to the incurſions of the enemie. The affaires of Lombardie proceeded thus ſlowly, not ſo much for the ſeaſon of the yeare, which was ſharpe, as for the difficulties which the Duke of Bourbon had to pay his ſouldiers, by reaſon whereof the people of Millan were wonderfully trauelled and tormented for prouiſion of money: and in reſpect of this neceſſitie, Ierome Moron being condemned to death, compounded the night before he ſhould ſuffer, to pay twentie thouſand duckats; for which end they had made ſhew that they would put him to death: but when by this and other meanes he was deliuered out of priſon, before many dayes paſſed, of a priſoner he became by the dexteritie of his wit, a counſeller to the Duke of Bourbon, and almoſt his onely gouernour.

Ierome Moron out of priſon.

Now the treaties of truce or peace were great betweene the Pope and the Viceroy, but the plots of the Viceroy were indeed rather to make warre, at the incitation of the Colonnois, who had cauſed him take heart ſince he came to Caietta, and for that he vnderſtood that the Pope being deiected in courage, and drained of money, was very deſirous of peace, & making his pouertie and feare knowne to all the world, and refuſing to create Cardinals for money, as euery one counſelled him, he increaſed the courage and hope of ſuch as had any purpoſe to offend him. For the Pope not being entred into the warre with ſuch conſtancie of mind as was fit, had written a letter to the Emperour ſince the ſixe and twentieth day of Iune, which was very bitter and full of complaints, excuſing himſelfe that he was conſtrained by him to make warre: but as ſoone as he had ſent it, ſuppoſing it was too bitter, he preſently ſent another, more mild and amiable, charging his Nuncio to retaine the firſt, which neuertheleſſe was deliuered, for that it came firſt to his hands. Afterwards the other was preſented, and the Emperour anſwered them both ſeuerally, (but with one expedition) either of them according to that which was contained and propounded therein: to that which was bitter, bitterly; and to the courteous, kindly. Moreouer the Pope had readily hearkened to the Generall of the Grayfriers, who going into Spaine at ſuch time as the warre began, was charged by him to deliuer to the Emperour kind words: and being eftſoones returned to Rome by commiſſion of the Emperour, he brought many reports touching his good intention, and that he would be content to come into Italy with a traine of fiue thouſand men, and after he had taken the Crowne of the Empire, to paſſe preſently into Germanie to take ſome order for the affaires of Luther, without ſpeaking of the Councell: That he would be content alſo to accord with the Venetians vnder reaſonable conditions; To referre the cauſe of Francis Sforce to the arbitration of two Iudges aſſigned by the Pope and himſelfe; and in caſe he were condemned, to giue that Eſtate to the Duke of Bourbon: To cauſe his armie to depart out of Italy, the Pope and the Venetians paying three hundred thouſand crownes to ſatisfie the armie for that which was already due, which notwithſtanding he would endeuour to content with a ſumme more moderate: And alſo to reſtore to the French King his children, receiuing in counterchange two millions of gold at two or more termes. He ſhewed alſo that it would be eaſie to accord with the King of England, both for that the ſum that was in queſtion was not great, and alſo the King made offer of it. And to debate theſe matters (all which the Pope communicated to the Embaſſadours of the French king and the Venetians) the Generall of the Grayfriers offered a truce for eight or ten moneths, ſaying he had very large warrants and commiſſions from the Emperour, wherein all power was giuen to him, the Viceroy, and Don Hugo de Moncada. Wherefore the Pope, after he had heard Pignaloſa, and receiued aduertiſement that the Viceroy was gone out of the port of Saint Stephen, ſent the Generall to Caietta to treate of theſe matters with him: for that the Venetians would not refuſe the truce if the French King would conſent, who for his part was not farre eſtranged from it, and his mother had ſent to Rome Laurence Tuſcan declaring an inclination to a peace wherein all the world ſhould be comprehended. And ſuppoſing that no practiſe could be very ſure without the conſent of the Duke of Bourbon, he ſent vnto him for the ſame cauſes one of his owne Amners that was at Rome, whom the Duke returned ſhortly after to the Pope to ſolicite the ſame matters; and yet at the ſame time, not abandoning the prouiſions of warre, he ſent Cardinall Auguſtine Triuulce as Legate to the armie which was in Campagnia, and preparing alſo to inuade the Realme of Naples by ſea, Peter of Nauarre arriued the third day of December at Cinitauecchia with eight and twentie galleys belonging to the Pope, the French King, and the Venetians: at which time Ranſe de Cere being ſent by the French King for the expedition intended againſt the Realme of Naples, was arriued at Sauona with a fleet of ſquare ſailes. On the other ſide, Aſcanius Colonno with two thouſand footmen and three hundred horſemen, came to Valbon, fifteene miles from Tiboli, where are the lands of the Abbot of Farfa and of Iohn Iordan: with which forces he tooke Cepperano the twelfth day of December, for that it was not guarded: but Vitelli with the Popes companies reduced himselfe between Tibole, Palestrina and Velletri. Afterwards the Colonnois tooke Pontecoruo which was not guarded, and in vaine gaue an assault to Scarpa, which is a litle and weake place belonging to the Abbey of Farfa. After this Cæsar Filettin approched by night to Alagnia with fifteene hundred footmen, where when fiue hundred souldiers were secretly brought in by some Citizens through a certaine house adioyning to the walls, they were repulsed by Iohn Lion of Fano, a Commander of the footmen that were there for the Pope. In this meane while the Generall returned from the Viceroy, and related that he would consent to the truce for certaine moneths, to the end that in the meane while the peace might be debated: but that he demanded money, and (for suretie) the Castles of Ostia and Ciuitauecchia. But contrary to this, the Archbishop of Capua who arriued at Gaietta after he was departed, and whom haply the Pope had sent thither with an ill counsel, wrote vnto him, that the Viceroy wold heare no more speech of truce, but of peace with the Pope onely, or with the Pope and the Venetians, so farre forth as they would make paiment of money, to the end to maintaine the armie for assurance of the peace, and that afterwards the truce should be debated with others; which came to passe, either for that indeed the Viceroy had altered his determination, or else by the perswasions of the Archbishop, as many suspected. At which time Paul d'Arezzo being come to the Emperours Court, with authoritie from the Pope, the Venetians and Francis Sforce, whither also the King of England would haue the Auditor of the Chamber to go for the same cause of peace, for that the French Kings commissions were come thither alreadie: he found the Emperours mind wholly changed by the aduertisement which he had receiued of the arriuall of the Lanceknights and his Nauie in Italy: so that falling from all the conditions propounded before, he vrged that the French King should absolutely obserue the accord of Madril, and to haue the cause of Francis Sforce tried before Iudges assigned by himselfe. Thus did the will and intention of the Emperour vary according to the successe of the affaires: and the commissions giuen to his officers that were in Italy, had, by reason of the distance of place, either an expresse or silent condition, to gouerne themselues according to the variation of times and occasions. Therfore the Viceroy after he had many dayes abused the Pope with vaine practises, and would not so much as consent to a surceasse of armes for a few dayes till the negociation might sort to some issue, he departed from Naples the twentieth day of December to go into the Estate of the Church, propounding new and strange conditions of accord.

Capitulations betweene the Emperour and the Duke of Ferrara.

The last day of the yeare, the Duke of Ferrara capitulated, by the meanes of his Embassadour, with the Viceroy and Don Hugo who had commission from the Emperour: neuerthelesse that capitulation was made with very small liking of the Embassadour, who was almost constrained by the threats and rude words of the Viceroy, to consent: That the Duke of Ferrara should be bound as well in his person as in his Estate, to serue the Emperour against all his enemies; That he should be Captaine generall for the Emperour in Italy, with a companie of an hundred men at armes and two hundred light horsemen, but he should assemble and leuie them at his owne charges, which should be restored to him againe, and allowed in his accounts: That he should presently receiue the towne of Carpy and the Castle of Nouy which had appertained to Albert Pio, for the dowrie of the Emperours bastard daughter promised to his sonne, but that the reuenues should be answered in account of his entertainment; and that he should make satisfaction thereof vntill the consummation of the mariage: And that Sessa, Sassuolo and the Marquis of Guasto should disclaime and renounce the rights which they pretended thereunto: That he should pay two hundred thousand ducats when he had recouered Modena, but out of that should be deducted that which he had giuen to the Viceroy since the battell of Pauie: That if he did not recouer Modena, all the money that he had disbursed before, should be eftsoones repayed him: That the Emperour should be bound to his protection, and not to make peace without comprehending him, nor without obtaining for him of the Pope absolution of the paines and censures which he had incurred euer since he was declared Confederate to the Emperour. And that he should vse all his endeuour that he might obtaine absolution of those transgressions which he had incurred before.

This in the end of the yeare 1526, all things tended to a manifest warre.

The Argvment.

The Duke of Bourbon iſſueth out of Millan. The Viceroy and the Colonnois make warre againſt the Pope in the Eſtate of the Church. The Marquis of Saluſſa entreth into Bolognia. The Pope maketh war in the kingdome of Naples. The Duke of Bourbon leadeth his armie to Rome, taketh the towne, ſacketh it, and is ſlaine in the action. The Pope being abandoned of all hope, accordeth with the Imperials. A mutinie in Florence. The King of England is declared againſt the Emperor. The Confederates do many enterpriſes.

1527 THe yeare a thouſand fiue hundred twentie and ſeuen was full of moſt cruell accidents, & ſuch as had not bene heard of in many ages before: as the mutation of Eſtates, the captiuity of Princes, the horrible ſacke of Cities, the great dearth of victuals, and a great plague almoſt through all Italy; all things being full of death, flying, and rapine. To which calamities there was no other thing that ſtayed the beginning, but the difficulties which the Duke of Bourbon found to make the Spaniſh footmen depart out of Millan. For when it was determined that Anthony de Leua ſhould remaine for the defence of the Duchie of Millan with all the Launceknights which were there before, for whoſe entertainment were conſumed all the monies exacted of the Millannois, and that which had bene raiſed by the billes of exchange which the Duke of Bourbon brought from Spaine; and that twelue hundred Spaniſh footmen ſhould alſo remaine there with Leua, together with certaine bands of Italian footmen vnder the leading of Lodowike Belgioioſo & other Commanders, who had receiued no money of the Emperor, but were entertained with ranſomes and contributions; and hauing in prey the houſes and wiues of the Millannois, were well contented to liue ſtill at ſuch liberty. The other Spaniſh footmen who could not directly refuſe the Duke of Bourbon, demanded to be firſt ſatisfied of the paies due vnto them till that day, and afterwards promiſed to follow the Duke, ſo farre forth as he would pay them fiue paies; a condition very hard to accompliſh, for that there could no money be drawne from the inhabitants of Millan, either by threatnings, ſacking their houſes, or impriſoning their perſons; beſides that (to nouriſh the armie) the abſent were ſummoned to appeare, and the goods of ſuch as appeared not were giuen to the ſouldiers. At laſt all difficulties being ſurmounted, the Imperials paſſed the riuer of Po the laſt day ſaue one of Ianuarie: & the day after part of the Launceknight who before had paſſed the riuer Trebia, repaſſed it againe, and went to lodge at Pontenouo: and the reſidue of the armie ſtayed beyond Plaiſance. On the other ſide, the Marquis of Saluſſa, who had all his companies diſperſed in the countrie, was at Parma; & the Duke of Vrbin being come to Caſalmaior, to whoſe choyce the Venetians had referred either to paſſe or not to paſſe the riuer of Po, began to paſſe his companies, anouching, if the Imperials tooke the way of Tuſcan according to the aduertiſements he had receiued from Millan, that he would paſſe in perſon with ſixe hundred men at armes, nine hundred footmen, and fiue hundred light horſemen, and would be before them at Bolognia: and that the Marquis of Saluſſa ſhould do the like with his regiments and the bands of the Church. The armie Imperiall ſtayed about twenty dayes, the one halfe on this ſide, and the other beyond Plaiſance, which happened partly through the difficultie of money, the Launceknights hauing not receiued one penie of the Duke of Bourbon till that day: and partly for that he had a deſire to plant his campe before Plaiſance, haply more for the difficultie to passe further then for any other cause. By reason whereof he made instance to the Duke of Ferrara to furnish him with powder for the artilleries, and to come and ioyne with the army, offering to send out to meete him fiue hundred men at armes; and Captaine George with sixe thousand footmen. To which demand the Duke made answere, that it was vnpossible to send powder through the countrie of the enemie, and that he could not without hazard attempt to ioyne with him, for that all the cõpanies of the league were very neare: but though these things were easie, that the Duke of Bourbon was to consider, that he could not do a thing more commodious for the enemie, and more desired of them, then to stand temporising and lose time about those townes one after another, and to know that if he tooke not Plaisance, or if he did take it, with length of time, what would become of his reputation, & what means he would haue to pursue the warre hauing so great want of money and other prouisions: That the good of the Emperour, and the onely way to obtaine the victorie, was to addresse himselfe to the Head, and laying aside all other enterprises, to march directly to Bolognia, and there to determine either to force that towne (in which enterprise he could not want succours) or to passe forward either to Florence or Rome. But whilest these matters were in debating, and that the Duke of Bourbon was busied to get mony, not onely to make vp the full pay of the Spanish souldiers, but also to giue something to the Lanceknights, to whom at their departing from Plaisance he distributed two crownes a man; the warre was strongly kindled in the Estate of the Church. For Ranse de Cere at his returne out of France was newly gone to the the campe Ecclesiasticke, which campe lay very neare to the Viceroy, who was then vpon the confines of Cepperano, where certaine bands of Italian footmen ouerthrew three hundred Spanish footmen. But the opinions were diuerse touching the manner how to defend the State Ecclesiasticke. For Vitelly before the coming of Ranse, had counselled the Pope to abandon the prouince of Campagnia, and to bestow two thousand footmen within Tiboli, two thousand more within Pilestrina, and the residue of the armie to remaine at Velletri to stop the Viceroy for going to Rome. Which matter being now determined, Ranse arriuing on the sudden reproued the counsell to inclose themselues within Velletri, for as much as the Citie was great, vneasie to be fortified, and vnapt to stop the passage of the enemies: and he was of opinion to haue the armie placed in Ferentin, where by reason there was no need to gard so many places, it would be the greater, the place being withall very fit to hinder the enemies for passing further. Which counsell being approued, they bestowed within Frusolone the principall towne of Campagnia, and within fiue miles of Ferentin, the most part of those bands of Iohn de Medicis who were called the blacke bands: and thither went also Alexander Vitelly, Iohn Baptista Sauello, and Peter Birago, Captaines of light horsemen. But in this meane while the Colonnois had secretly conspired with Napoleon Vrsin Abbot of Farfa, to take armes in the Citie of Rome as souldier to the Emperour: which matter the Pope dissembling, who was secretly aduertised thereof, found meanes to send the Abbot, who had receiued mony of him before, to meete Monsieur Vaudemont the Duke of Lorraines brother, whom the French king sent to him to fauour the enterprise of Naples, and caused him to be apprehended neare to Bracciano, and sent prisoner to the castle Saint Angelo. The Pope was carefull to make prouision of money, and imploring the aide of other Princes, he receiued againe from the King of England thirtie thousand duckets, which the Lord Russell his Chamberlaine brought vnto him: and with him came Monsieur de Rabaudanges with ten thousand crownes, sent vnto him by the French king, because of the tenthes which the Pope constrained by necessity had accorded vnto him, vnder this promise, that besides the payments of the forty thousand crownes which he gaue to the League, and of the twenty thousand which he contributed to the Pope for euery moneth, he should presently pay him thirty thousand duckets, and as much more within a moneth. The King of England gaue commission also to the Lord Russell to signifie to the Viceroy and the Duke of Bourbon a surceassing of armes, to the end to giue time to the treatie of peace, the which according to the Emperours will was holden in England: and if he would not hearken thereto, that he should denounce warre against him. It seemed also at that time, that that King vnder a desire to marrie his daughter with the French King, was well inclined to the Confederates, and fauoured their cause; and he promised, assoone as the marriage was concluded, to enter into the League, and begin the warre in Flanders. It seemed also that he was particularly much disposed to pleasure the Pope: but there could be no great expectation of speedy remedies from a Prince who measured not well his forces and the present condition of Italy, nor ſtood reſolute in his purpoſes, but alwayes ſomewhat retired, by the hope which the Emperour gaue him to commit the practiſe of the peace into his hands, notwithſtanding the effects were not correſpondent thereunto. For the Auditor of the Chamber being gone vnto him to that effect, albeit the Emperour laboured with much art to perſwade him in many ſorts that ſuch was his intention: yet for that he would vnderſtand firſt what was done in Italy ſince the deſcending of the Lanceknights and the arriuall of his Nauie at ſea, whereof he expected ſome aduertiſement, he gaue him no certaine anſwer, excuſing himſelfe vpon the warrants and commiſſions of the Confederates, as though they had not bene ſufficient. But the accord which the Pope ſolicited continually with the Viceroy, hurt him not a little with the Confederates, for that they ſtood alwayes in feare leſt he would compound with him: and the French king and the Venetians were of opinion, that all the expences which they ſhould be at to ſupport him, would be in a manner vnprofible. And this ſuſpition was increaſed by the extreme feare which was diſcerned to be in him, and by the proteſtations which he made daily, that he was no more able to ſuſtaine the war: together with his obſtinacy not to create Cardinals for money, nor to relieue himſelfe in ſo great neceſſities, and amid ſo many dangers of the Church, with thoſe meanes which other Popes were wont to vſe, euen for their vniuſt and ambitious enterpriſes. In ſo much as the French king and the Venetians, to be readie and prepared in all accidents, bound themſelues againe particularly to make no accord with the Emperour the one without the other: and the French king for this cauſe, and for the great hope which the king of England gaue, to raiſe together with him (in caſe the marriage went forward) great emotions in the Spring following, became more negligent and leſſe carefull of the dangers of Italy.

At this time the Viceroy who ſolicited to inuade the Eſtate of the Church, ſent two thouſand Spaniſh footmen to aſſault a ſmall Caſtle of Stephen Colonno, who were repulſed: and becauſe the Viceroy aduanced, the Eccleſiaſtikes referred to another time to execute the reſolution taken to batter the Popes Rocke, the garriſons of which place had ſurpriſed the Caſtle Gandolfo, which was ill guarded, and at that time poſſeſſed by the Cardinall of Monte. At laſt the Viceroy, after he had aſſembled together twelue thouſand footmen, the greateſt part whereof (except the Spaniards & Lanceknights that came with him by ſea) were trained ſouldiers, he encamped with the whole armie the nine and twentieth day of Ianuarie before Fruſolone, a towne weake and without walles, ſauing that the Grot and the houſes of ſome particulars ſerued as a wall, and within the which the Captaine of the Church: haſt beſtowed a garriſon, becauſe they would leaue him no footing in Campagnia. Beſides the weakneſſe of this place, there was alſo ſmall ſtore of victuals: and yet the ſituation of the towne, ſtanding vpon a hill, giueth meanes to the inhabitants to ſaue themſelues alwaies on one ſide, for that it hath a certaine kinde of backing; which made the the garriſon within more reſolute to defend it, being withall of the beſt Italian footmen which at that time tooke pay. And alſo by reaſon of the height of the mountaine the enemies could not approch ſo neare to it with their artilleries, (of which they had planted three demy Cannons and foure Culuerines) that they might do them any great domage: but the greateſt care of the enemies was to ſtop as much as they could the entrie of victuals into the towne. On the other ſide, the Pope, although he was much exhauſted of money, and more apt to ſuffer the indignity to deſire others to relieue him then to furniſh himſelfe by meanes extraordinary, increaſed his campe as much as he could with bands of footmen payed and trayned, and had alſo newly taken into his pay Horacio Baillon, without remembring the iniuries done before to his father, and afterwards to himſelfe, whom he had long holden priſoner in the Caſtle of S. Angelo, as a diſturber of the quiet of Perouſa. With theſe ſupplies the Popes armie went on ſtill drawing neare to Ferentin, to make there his generall muſters, and to giue hope of ſuccours to the beſieged. The batterie of Fruſolone was ended the foure & twentieth day; but becauſe it was not ſuch as might giue hope to cary the place, there was no aſſault giuen: & yet Captaine Alarcon approaching the walles was hurt with the ſhot of an harquebuze, and likewiſe Mario Vrſin. The principall hope of the Viceroy ſtood vpon this, that he knew there was ſmall ſtore of victuals within, whereof the armie that muſtered at Ferentin had want alſo. For the ſouldiers of the Colonnois which lay within Paliano, Montfortin, and the Popes Rocke, the onely places which they yet held, made bootie of all they found vpon the wayes; and Ranſe going to the armie, they had defeated the bands of footemen of Cuio that were for his guard. Neuertheleſſe three hundred footmen iſſued one day out of Fruſolone, & part of the horſemen with Alexander Vitelly, Iohn Baptiſta Sauello, and Peter de Birago, and being approched within halfe a mile of Larnata, where were lodged fiue enſignes of Spaniards, they drew two enſignes into an ambuſh and ouerthrew them, and there died Captaine Peralta, with foureſcore footmen, and many were made priſoners, with the two enſignes. All this while the Viceroy was caſting of mines at Fruſolone, and thoſe within countermined, who ſtood in ſo little feare of the forces of their enemies, that they refuſed foure hundred footmen whom the Captaines of the armie would haue ſent thither for their ſuccours. And yet at the ſame time the ſolicitations of accord were followed with no leſſe vehemencie: for as much as at this time the Generall and the Archbiſhop of Capua were returned to Rome, & with them was come Caſar Fieramoſquo a Neapolitan, whom the Emperour had diſpatched to the Pope after the Viceroy was departed from Spaine: to whom he had giuen chiefly in charge, to aſſure him that he was very ſorrie for the entrie of Don Hugo and the Colonnis into Rome, together with the accidents that followed thereof; and to perſwade him, that the Emperour was very deſirous to cõpound all the controuerſies that were betweene them, and that the peace ſhould be contracted in his name, a matter which he ſeemed inclined to accompliſh alſo with the other Confederates, ſaying (according to the relation of the Nuncio) that if the Pope executed his enterpriſe to go to Barſelona, he would giue him ful & free power to pronounce it as he thought beſt. Theſe propounded for the Viceroy a ſurceaſſing of armes for two or three yeares with the Pope and the Venetians, euery one poſſeſſing all they held at the preſent, the Pope paying an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and the Venetians fiftie thouſand; and albeit this was a matter not a litle grieuous to the Pope, yet ſuch was his inclination to be deliuered of the trauels of warre, that to induce the Venetians to conſent thereto, he offered to pay the fiftie thouſand duckats impoſed vpon them: and to expect their anſwer, he made truce for eight dayes with the Viceroy the laſt of Ianuary, in which it was agreed, that the regiments of the Church ſhould not paſſe Ferentin, nor the bands of the Viceroy Fruſolone, and that nothing ſhould be done againſt the towne; thoſe of the towne being likewiſe forbidden to fortifie themſelues, and to put victuals into the towne but from one day to another. And Fieramoſquo thinking he had well founded the intention of the Pope, and that he could alſo diſcouer the meaning of the Emperor without doing wrong to his dignitie, he preſented vnto him a long letter written with the Emperours owne hand, full of good intention, offers, and deuotion towards the Pope: and afterwards being gone to ſignifie to the Viceroy and the Legate the ſurceaſſing agreed vpon, and to take order for the execution thereof, the ſame day he found the armie departed from Ferentin, and marching towards Fruſolone: and when he had communicated with the Legate all that had paſſed betweene the Pope and him, the Legate not willing to breake the great hope which his ſouldiers had of the victory, abuſed him with faire words, and ſent word ſecretly to his Captaines not to forbeare to march. The armie could not come to Fruſolone if they wonne not a paſſage in forme of a bridge, lying at the foote of the firſt hill of Fruſolone, and guarded by foure enſignes of Lanceknights. But when the vantguard commanded by Stephen Colonno was arriued there, and came to blowes with them, they brake them and put them to flight, after they had ſlaine about two hundred of them, and taken foure hundred priſoners, together with their enſignes. And thus the firſt hill being wonne, the others retired into places more ſtrong, leauing the entrie into Fruſolone free to the Eccleſiaſtikes, who (for that night approched) pitched their tents euen at their beards, with great hope to Ranſe and Vitelly (with whom the Pope was diſcontented for this enterpriſe) to defeate them, whether they ſtayed in that place or went their wayes, as was aſſuredly beleeued it would haue fallen out if they had encamped vpon the hill that was taken, or had bene diligent and carefull to obſerue the retiring of the enemies. For the Viceroy, not the day following, but the third day, making no ſigne that he would diſlodge, went away with the armie two or three houres before day, ſetting on fire certaine munitions that remained, and left behind him many bullets for artilleries: and albeit the Eccleſiaſtikes when they knew he was gone, ſent out after him their light horſemen, who tooke ſome of his baggage and a few priſoners of ſmall importance, yet they were not there in ſufficient time to do him any notable hurt: and yet he left behind him part of his victuals, and retired himſelfe to Ceſena, and from thence to Cepperano. By whoſe retrait the Pope taking courage, and at the incitation of the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, whom he could not otherwiſe ſatisfie, he reſolued to execute the enterpriſe of Naples: for Rabandanges who had brought ten thousand duckats to the Pope in regard of the tenths, and ten thousand more to Ranse, had commission not to disburse them without the consent of Albert Pio, Ranse, and Monsieur de Lange, and that in case they were assured that the Pope would not accord: and the Venetians (to whom was gone the Lord Russell to induce them to accept the truce offered by the Viceroy and approued by the Pope, but for that he had broken his legge by the way, he sent the packet vnto them) made answer, that they would not accept the truce before they knew the French Kings will, and that so much the more resolutely, by how much they vnderstood that Genes was reduced to great extremitie of victuals. It was determined therefore to inuade the kingdome of Naples as well by sea as by land, and that Monsieur de Vaudemont should be Admirall of the armie by sea, for whose better strength there was leauied twentie thousand footmen. But Ranse following that deliberation whereupon the French Kings money depended, determined, contrary to the Popes will (who was of opinion to conuert all the forces into one place) to cause sixe thousand men to enter Abruzza; hoping that by the working of the sonnes of Count Montoire, who had bene sent with two thousand footmen, they should easily make themselues Lords of Aquila, which accordingly hapned presently, for that Askanius Colonno, as soone as he heard of their approch, fled from them. The beginnings of this enterprise were full of great hope. For albeit the Viceroy who had bestowed garrisons in the places neare adioyning, redressed and refurnished his army as much as he could, yet for that part of his regiments were disbanded, and other parts by necessitie bestowed in garrisons, it was thought he would stand engaged in great difficultie to be able to resist onely the armie by land: and that Ranse in Abruzza, and the Nauies of the Church and Venetians, containing two and twenty Gallies, should find no head made against them, chiefly for that they were resupplyed with a strength of three thousand men, and Horatio going thither with two thousand footmen, together with Monsieur de Vaudemont in person, who vnder the ancient rights of King Rene, made claime to the succession of that kingdome, and managed the place of Lieutenant of the Pope. But matters proceeded very slowly, for that the armie Ecclesiastike was not yet departed from Frusolone the twelfth day of February, expecting the great artilleries from Rome, and that Ranse should enter Abruzza, and the sea armie arriue. And there was a further impediment and losse of time, in that the footmen of Frusolone falling into mutinie, demanded double pay, as a matter wonne and due for the victorie. Neuertheless the eighteenth day the souldiers of the Viceroy abandoned Cesena and other places confining, and withdrew themselues to Cepperana: by the opportunity of whose retrait, the armie Ecclesiastike beginning already to haue want of victuals, passed Saint Germain, and the Viceroy fearing to put things to hazard, retired to Caietta, and Don Hugo to Naples: and yet the Pope pressed still with his want of monie, and fearing no lesse the aduancing of the Duke of Bourbon, against whose armie he saw the Confederates endeuoured not much to make resistance, continuing in the same inclination to compound with the Emperour, had procured the Lord Russell to go vp to the Viceroy in the name of his King. Whereupon it followed, that Fieramosquo returned to Rome the one and twentieth day of February, who departed the day following, when he had published his commissions, leauing the Popes mind confused and full of irresolution: to whom, to the end he should not rashly fall to accord, the Venetians in the beginning of March, offered within fifteene dayes to make payment of fifteene thousand duckats, and of fifteene thousand more within other fifteene daies, so farre forth as he would grant a Iubiley for their dominion.

The Confederates resolue to inuade Naples

Monsieur de Vaudemont the Popes Lieutenant.

Exploits of the Nauie of the Confederates.

But the Nauie of the Pope and the Venetians, which had with great losse taried to expect the French fleet, and by reason of the winds was retired the three and twentieth day of Februarie into the Ile of Ponso, being againe aduanced, sacked the Mole of Caietta: and afterwards the fourth day of March hauing set on land the footmen at Pozzolo, and finding it well furnished, they returned againe to sea: and passing further, they descended againe neare to Naples by the riuer of the borough of Stabbia, where was Diomed Carafa with fiue hundred footmen: which borough was taken the third day by assault on the side of the Mountaine, and the Castle rendred the day after. The tenth day they tooke by force the Greeke Tower and Surrente: and many places on that side yeelded afterwards vpon composition. This Fleet had taken before certaine ships laden with graine that were going towards Naples, where there was but sorie prouision of victuals, whereof there was great want. Neither did they find any impediment by sea, by reason whereof the Fleet drew so neare the Mole the second day in Lent, that the Castle and the the Galleys ſhot at it: and the footmen before came on ſo faſt by land, that with great difficultie the Neapolitans could retire themſelues by the Market gate, and ſhut it. After this the armie by ſea tooke Salerne; and Monſieur Vaudemont being gone after certaine ſhips, and hauing left foure galleys at Salerne where Horacio was, the Prince of Salerne entred into the towne by the Caſtle with many ſouldiers, but he was ouerthrowne by Horacio, and there were more then two hundred footmen ſlaine, and many made priſoners. In Abruzza after the Viceroy had deliuered out of priſon the old Earle of Montoire, to the end he might recouer Aquila, the ſaid Earle was made priſoner by his owne ſonnes: and Ranſe who the ſixt day of March tooke Siciliana and Taillecouſſa, went vp towards Sora. And notwithſtanding ſo faire an occaſion, by reaſon of the great want of victuals that was in the armie by land, either through the negligence of the officers, or for the ill prouiſions of the Pope, the ſouldiers began the fifth of March to depart from the armie by troupes. But the practiſes of the peace continuing ſtill, Fieramoſquo and Serenon Secretary to the Viceroy, came the ſixt of March to Rome, where Monſieur de Lange was arriued the day before, with many words and promiſes, but without money, notwithſtanding they had aduertiſement out of France that he was departed with twentie thouſand duckats, to put footmen into the great ſhips which were expected at Ciuitauecchia; and that he brought twentie thouſand more for the Pope, with charge to incite him to aduance the enterpriſe of the Realme of Naples for one of the ſonnes of the French King, to whom ſhould be giuen in mariage Catherine the daughter to Laurence de Medicis and neece to the Pope. For the French King repoſing much in the negociation of England, and perſwading himſelfe that the Viceroy for the diſorder of Fruſolone could execute nothing, and that the Imperiall armie, ſeeing they ſtayed ſo long to moue, & that withall they had no money, would not go at all into Tuſcan, would heare no more of the motion of truce, no though all men ſhould be comprehended therein, & that he ſhould be acquitted from all paiments of money; and that to the end to giue no time to the Emperour to reorder & readdreſſe his forces. And yet in regard of his owne want of money, he ſent to the Pope no other thing of the twentie thouſand duckats which he had promiſed him monethly, nor of the money collected of the tenths, then ten thouſand duckats: and alſo the tenth of March he had not ſent the money for the footmen of the maine armie at ſea, which was at the common expences of himſelfe & the Venetians. And for that he had a deſire that nothing ſhould be done vntill ſome concluſion were made with the King of England, he thought it reaſonable that the Pope ſhould expect till that time. Thus the enterpriſe of Naples, begun with ſo great hope, went on euery day more coldly. For the armie by ſea which was not increaſed either with veſſels or men, & was to defend the places that were taken, could do no great matter: and the armie by land, wherein (for the ill diſpoſition of the time) the victuals that were ſent from Rome by ſea, were not yet arriued the fourteenth day of March, not onely aduanced not, but diminiſhing dayly for the neceſſitie of victuals, it retired at laſt to Piperna: and the footmen which Ranſe gouerned, were ſo diminiſhed for want of money, that Ranſe when he could not incloſe the Viceroy as he had purpoſed, returned to Rome: and likewiſe the continuall negociation of accord with the Pope, augmented much thoſe diſorders. For it abated the preparations of the Confederates, very backward of themſelues, which on the other ſide increaſed the Popes inclination to the accord, chiefly ſeeing he was induced to haue greater hope in the intention of the Emperour, by reaſon of a letter of his which had bene ſurpriſed, by the which he commanded the Viceroy that he ſhould ſeeke to accord with the Pope, if the eſtate of his affaires induced him not to take other counſell. But that which moued him yet more, was, that he ſaw the Duke of Bourbon aduance continually with the Imperiall armie: and that the reſolutions of the Duke of Vrbin and the prouiſions of the Venetians were not ſuch, as he might haue any aſſurance of the matters of Tuſcan, the feare whereof afflicted him maruellouſly. For, the Imperials being ſome on this ſide, & ſome beyond Plaiſance, the Duke of Vrbin had changed his firſt opinion, which was to get before, to put himſelfe with the Venetian armie into Bolognia, and had reſolued in his counſell, that as ſoone as he ſhould be aduertiſed that the enemies would remoue, the armie Eccleſiaſtike leauing good garriſon within Parma and Modena, ſhould go to Bolognia; and for himſelfe, he would march with the Venetian armie in the tayle of the enemies, but alwaies twenty or thirtie miles from them, for the more ſuretie of his people: according to which order, if afterwards the enemies would take the way to Romagnia or Tuſcan, the campe ſhould aduance continually, the armie of the Eccleſiaſtiks marching alwaies before, with the Marquis of Saluſſa leading the French lances, the Swiſſers footmen and his owne, and leauing alwayes garriſons in ſuch places as the enemies ſhould paſſe by after them, and gathering them together againe from hand to hand by degrees as the enemie ſhould paſſe by. The Duke alleaged many reaſons for this counſell, ſuch as the Captaines could not well comprehend. Firſt, that it was not ſafe to put themſelues all together in the field to ſtop the paſſage of the Imperials: for that it would be a matter either dangerous or vnprofitable: dangerous, in reſpect of the fight; for though the Imperials were not ſuperiour in number, yet they ſurmounted them in force and valour; and by that meanes would obtaine the victorie: vnprofitable, for that if the Imperials would not fight, it would be in their power to leaue behind them the armie of the Confederates, and ſo keeping alwayes before them, they might accompliſh great exploits: That though all matters were in his power, he held this counſell beſt, but now he was conſtrained by neceſſitie to follow it; for that the Imperiall armie being as was beleeued halfe ſhaken, he could not put his people into ſuch ſpeedie readineſſe as to be aſſured to be readie in time to march before: and that it was alſo to be conſidered, ſeeing the Venetians had wholly repoſed themſelues vpon him touching that deliberation, that he ought not to leaue their eſtate in ſuch danger, which if the enemies diſcerned to be vnfurniſhed, they might, taking new counſell vpon new occaſions, returne ouer Po, and endomage them. With theſe reaſons he perſwaded the Senate of Venice, who by nature haue for obiect to proceed aduiſedly and ſurely in all their affaires: but it did not ſatisfie the Pope, for the conſideration he had that by this counſell a way was opened to the Imperiall armie to come euen vp to Rome or into Tuſcan, or to what place they liſted, ſeeing the armie that was to go before, being inferiour in forces, & diminiſhed daily, for ẏ they muſt put garriſons in places as they paſſed, was not able to reſiſt thē: neither was it certain, that ẏ Venetians tarying once behind, would be ſo ready to follow in effect, as the words of the Duke promiſed, conſidering his cuſtome, and the maner of his proceeding in all the war: and he iudged, that if the armies were vnited all together, wherein there were far more ſoldiers then in the Imperials army, they might with more facilitie ſtop them for paſſing further, cut off their victuals, make vſe of all occaſions that were offered, and neuer be ſo far from them, that they might not be ready in good time to ſuccour the townes of the Venetians, if they offered to aſſaile them. And this reſolution diſpleaſed him ſo much the more, when he vnderſtood that the Duke of Vrbin, who was come to Parma the third of Ianuary, was retired the fourteenth day to Caſalmaior for a ſmall malady that befell him, and fiue dayes after from thence to Caſſola vnder colour to take phyſicke: to which place, being ſomewhat eaſed of his feauer, but tormented as he ſaid with the gout, he ſent for his wife. But ſuch as would take in good part, and interprete the beſt of this maner of dealing (very ſuſpitious to the Pope) ſaid, that the practiſes of peace were the cauſe thereof: but the Lieutenant Guicciardin comprehending partly by likelyhood, and partly by the report made vnto him of the Dukes words, that he was alſo induced by a deſire to recouer Montfeltro and Saint Leo poſſeſſed by the Florentines, and iudging that if in that he were not contented, he would leaue both the Pope and the Florentines abandoned in their greateſt neceſſities; and ſuppoſing thoſe places to be a reward not worthy enough for expoſing himſelfe to ſo great a danger: and knowing withall, that the ſame was deſired at Florence, he gaue the Duke an aſſured hope of the reſtitution of thoſe places, as though he had commiſſion from the Pope ſo to do: which neuertheleſſe was not approued by the Pope, who in that caſe ſuffered himſelfe to be caried more by old and new hatreds, then by reaſon. In the meane while the Imperials, who had giuen but litle money to the Lanceknights, kept themſelues incamped vpon the confines of Plaiſance, where was the Count Guido Rangon with ſixe thouſand footmen: to which place Paul Luzaſquo, with certaine other light horſemen of the Eccleſiaſtikes making ſometimes incurſions to diſcouer the countrey, one day amongſt others, being accompanied with certaine bands of footmen and ſome men at armes, they encountred a troupe of enemies of the ſame facultie, whom they ouerthrew, and tooke foureſcore horſe and an hundred footmen, ouer and beſides the Captaines Scalengo, Succar and Grugny, Burgonians, who remained priſoners. After this the Duke of Bourbon ſent out ten Enſignes of Spaniards to reuictuall Piſqueton, and a litle after the Count Caiazze with the light horſemen and with his regiments of footmen, came to lodge in the borough of Saint Donin which the Eccleſiaſtikes had abandoned: and the day after, according to an intelligence which was entertained with him before, and pretending, becauſe he was not payed, to be acquited of the oath which he had giuen uen to the Imperials, he paſſed to the Eccleſiaſtike campe, and was entertained by the Lieutenant, (more to content others then of his owne inclination) with twelue hundred footmen, and an hundred and thirtie light horſemen which he had with him: and with condition, that if the Emperour tooke from him his Earledome of Caiazze, the Pope within eight moneths ſhould indue him with ſo much in yearely value as the Earledome was worth, vntill he had recouered it againe.

The Duke of Bourbon deſired, following the counſell of the Duke of Ferrara (who refuſed notwithſtanding to come to the armie) to go rather to Bologna and to Florence, then to ſtay in thoſe townes. The ſeuenteenth day the Spaniſh footmen mutined, demanding their pay, and ſlue the Sergeant Maior whom he had ſent to appeaſe them; and yet when he had appeaſed the tumult as well as he could, he paſſed the twentieth day ouer Trebia with his whole armie, and incamped within three miles of Plaiſance, hauing with him fiue hundred men at armes, and many light horſemen Italians who were not payed, the Lanceknights newly come, foure or fiue thouſand Spaniards, all choſen ſouldiers, and about two thouſand Italians at libertie and out of pay: part of the old bands of Lanceknights remaining at Millan, and the reſt being gone to Sauona, to aide thoſe of Genes who were reduced to great neceſſitie. Surely the reſolution of the Duke of Bourbon and the armie which he led, was wonderfull, for that being without money, without munitions, without pioners, and without any order for victuals, they ſought to paſſe further in the midſt of ſo many townes of the enemie, and againſt foes who far exceeded them in numbers. And the conſtancie of the Lanceknights was yet more admirable, who being come out of Germanie with one onely duckat a peece, and hauing endured ſo long a time in Italy, without hauing receiued in all that time any more then two or three duckats a peece, they ſet themſelues, contrary to the cuſtome of all ſouldiers, and ſpecially of that nation, to paſſe further, without any other pay or aſſignation then the hope of the victorie, notwithſtanding it was manifeſtly diſcerned, that for the ſcarcitie of victuals, and the neareneſſe of the enemies, they could not liue without money. But that which made them hope and ſuffer much, was the great authoritie that Captaine George had with them, who propounded vnto them the ſacke of Rome, and the ſpoile of the moſt part of Italy. The two and twentieth day they marched to the borough of Saint Donin: and the day following the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Eccleſiaſtike regiments, leauing certain bands of Venetian footmen for the guard of Parma, iſſued out, & tooke the way of Bologna with eleuen or twelue thouſand footmen: but it was ordained that the Count Guido ſhould come from Plaiſance to Modena, and the footmen of the blacke bands to Bologna, leauing a ſufficient garriſon within Plaiſance. Thus marching by the countrey of Reggia, they came at foure remoues betweene Anzolo and the bridge of Rene. At which time the Duke of Bourbon was vpon the confines of Reggia: and the Duke of Vrbin (who being perſwaded at Caſalmaior by the Lieutenant Guicciardin to augment his number of Swiſſers, had refuſed it as a matter vnprofitable) made inſtance now vnto him that a new leuie of foure thouſand Swiſſers and 2000 Lanceknights might be propounded at Rome & at Venice; excuſing the contradiction made at that time, for that the ſeaſon did not permit to take the field, and that he was of opinion that the enemies would haue bin diſſolued, whom now he promiſed to accoaſt with that ſupply. But it was a counſell diſliked of all men, for that ſuch ſlow remedies did litle helpe preſent dangers; and for as much as he himſelfe might well perceiue, that for the want of money, and the diſagreement of the Confederates, theſe things could not be put in execution. At this time the Duke of Millan, who with the helpe of three thouſand footmen whom he had aſſembled, had defended Loda, Cremona, and all the countrey beyond Adda, and made incurſions vpon the territories of Millan, tooke with a ſodaine aſſault the towne of Monce: but his ſouldiers ſodainly left it abandoned, hauing aduertiſement that Anthonie de Leua (who after he had conducted the Duke of Bourbon, was returned to Millan) marched thither with two thouſand of the old Lanceknights, and fifteene hundred of a new leuie, a thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and fiue thouſand Italians vnder diuers Captaines.

The Duke of Ferrara perſwadeth the duke of Bourbō to go to Rome.

But after the Duke of Bourbon had paſſed the riuer of Secchia, he tooke his way on the left hand, and arriued the fift day of March at Bonport: where leauing his companies, he went to Finale to communicate with the Duke of Ferrara, who earneſtly perſwaded him that laying aſide all other thoughts, he ſhould draw towards Florence or Rome: yet it was beleeued that he counſelled him, leauing off all other enterpriſes, to draw ſtraight to Rome. In which deliberation many ny difficulties troubled the mind of the Duke of Bourbon; and chiefly the feare leſt the armie being come neare Rome, either conſtrained by neceſſitie, or to refreſh themſelues, or entring into any difficultie, (as doubtleſſe they would, vnleſſe the Pope were diſarmed) would encampe in the Realme of Naples. On which day the regiments of the Venetians paſſed the riuer of Po without the perſon of the Duke of Vrbin, who, notwithſtanding he was almoſt recouered, yet he remained at Gazzuol, but with intention to put himſelfe on the way forthwith. The ſeuenth day the Duke of Bourbon lodged at Saint Iohns vpon the confines of Bolognia, from which place he ſent a Trumpet to Bolognia, whither was retired the army Eccleſiaſtike, to demand victuals, ſaying he would go to ſuccour the Realme of Naples: and the ſame day the Spaniards that were within Carpy, when they had deliuered vp the towne to the Duke of Ferrara, ioyned themſelues with the Duke of Bourbon. The armie of the Venetians lay incamped along the riuer of Secchia, reſolued to paſſe no further, vnleſſe they firſt vnderſtood that the Duke of Bourbon were diſcamped from Saint Iohns, into whoſe armie victuals had paſſage by the territories of Ferrara: but becauſe men were to pay for it that had almoſt no money, they lodged themſelues at large, to eate vp the countrey, and ran into all places robbing men and beaſts, whereby they got meanes to pay for their victuals: ſo that it was holden for certaine, that if they had met with any ſtrong encounter, or if the armie Eccleſiaſtike that was in Bolognia and the confines thereabouts, would haue incamped neare them, the Imperials would ſoone haue bene much troubled: for that continuing to lodge ſo at large, they would haue bene in great danger, and reducing themſelues into one campe, they could haue no meanes to get victuals. But there were diſorders among the companies within Bolognia, as well through the condition of the Marquis, who was more apt to breake a lance then to manage the office of a Captaine, as alſo for that the Swiſſers and his footmen were not payed at due times by the Venetians, which cauſed them to loſe a faire occaſion. In the meane while the Duke of Bourbon, to the end to paſſe further, was at the point to draw from Ferrara a prouiſion of victuals for many dayes, together with a proportion of powder, pyoners, and oxen to draw foure cannons: and notwithſtanding he made many demonſtrations of that which he had in his mind, yet it was holden for certaine, that he was determined to paſſe into Tuſcan by the Stonie way: the like was confirmed by Ierome Moron, who many dayes before had holden a ſecret intelligence with the Marquis of Saluſſa, although in the iudgement of many, fraudulently and diſſemblingly. But when he had now determined to depart the fourteenth day of March, and to that end had ſent backe againe to Bodin the foure cannons: the day before, the bands of Lanceknights who had bene abuſed by many promiſes made to pay them, being ſeconded by the Spaniſh footmen, began to call for their payes, and fell to mutinie with very great tumult, and that to the great danger of the life of the Duke of Bourbon, if he had not with diligence eſcaped ſecretly from his lodging; whither being come, they made pillage of all they found, and ſlue one of his Gentlemen: by reaſon whereof the Marquis of Guaſt went forthwith to Ferrara, from whence he returned with ſome little ſumme of money, with the which the armie was appeaſed. The ſeuenteenth day there fell ſuch abundance of ſnow and raine, that for certaine dayes it was impoſſible to march, as well for the fowlneſſe of the wayes, as the ſwelling of the riuers; and Captaine George fell ſicke of an Apoplexie, whereof he was like to die, by reaſon whereof the enemies entred into great hope that at leaſt he would become vnprofitable to follow the campe, and that the Lanceknights in his abſence would no more beare out the incommodities and want of money: but the effect was otherwiſe. By this time the Venetian armie was at S. Fauſtin neare to Rubiera, to whom came the Duke of Vrbin the eighteenth day of March, promiſing to the Senate of Venice, according to his cuſtome, almoſt a certainty of the victory, not through the valour and weapons of the Confederates, but by the difficulties whereinto the enemies were reduced.

The Pope looſeth courage and why.

Now matters being on all ſides reduced to this paſſe, the Pope gouerned himſelfe in his affaires very negligently, for that he had no money, and becauſe the enterpriſe of Naples ſucceeded not according to his firſt deſignes, and his companies were retired to Piperna for want of victuals. But that which moſt of all put him out of heart, was that the promiſes of the French which were great in words, were daily found ſmall in effects; according to their cuſtome, euen from the firſt day of all the warre to the laſt. For beſides that the King was long in ſending the forty thouſand duckats for the firſt moneth of the warre, and to diſpatch the fiue hundred lances for the armie at ſea:

ſea: and beſides that, he would not (as he was bound) make warre beyond the mounts, which was one of the principall foundations and meanes ſet downe to attaine to the victory: he failed alſo to obſerue the promiſes which he made to the Pope from day to day. He had promiſed the Pope, that beſides the ordinary contribution, he would miniſter to him monethly twenty thouſand duckats to make warre in the Realme of Naples: and afterwards the truce being made by reaſon of the irruption of Don Hugo and the Colonnois, he counſelled him not to obſerue the truce, and had confirmed vnto him the ſame promiſe, not onely to aide him in the warre againſt the Realme of Naples, but alſo for his owne defence: and had promiſed likewiſe to ſend Ranſe de Cere to him, whom he eſteemed greatly, for that he had caried himſelfe valiantly in the defence of Marſeilles. Which things, albeit they had bene promiſed from the moneth of October, yet it was ſo long ere they were performed, that Ranſe came to Rome about the fourth day of Ianuarie without money, and the twenty thouſand duckats arriued there ten dayes after of which ſumme foure thouſand were retained by Ranſe, as well for his expences, as for his penſion, and ten thouſand to furniſh the enterpriſe of Abruzza; and the Pope, who vnder that promiſe had broken the truce almoſt three moneths before, neuer had any more then ſixe thouſand. Furthermore the King had promiſed the Pope for his conſent to a tenth, to pay vnto him fiue and twenty thouſand crownes within eight dayes, and fiue and thirtie thouſand more within two moneths: but he neuer receiued any more then nine thouſand, which were brought him by Monſieur Rabaudanges. Moreouer, after Paul Aretze had taken his leaue of the French King the twelfth day of February, the King beſides theſe things promiſed the Pope twenty thouſand duckats, to encourage him the better to make warre: but the ſaid twenty thouſand duckats which were ſent after Monſieur de Lange, neuer paſſed further then Sauona. The King was bound by the capitulations of the confederation to ſend twelue gallies, and ſaid he had ſent ſixteene, but the moſt part of them ſo ill prepared, and ſo ſlenderly furniſhed of men to ſet on land, that they ſtirred not from Sauona. But if at the firſt ouerture of the warre againſt the kingdome of Naples, they had immediatly ioyned with the gallies of the Pope and the Venetians, in the iudgement of all men, they might haue executed right great exploits. And touching the armie by ſea of great veſſels, certainly very puiſſant, notwithſtanding the King had oftentimes promiſed to ſend them out againſt Naples; whatſoeuer the cauſe was, they neuer went farre from Prouence, or Sauona: and after he had condeſcended to giue two payes to the ſouldiers of the Marquis of Saluſſa, he agreed with the Venetians, who had a leſſe number of ſouldiers then they were bound to prouide, that their pay ſhould be taken vpon the contribution of the forty thouſand duckats. The ſuccours of the King of England were too farre off and too vncertaine. He ſaw that the Venetians payed their companies alwaies very late, and for that cauſe the bands of the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Swiſſers that were within Bologna, ſerued almoſt to no purpoſe. The manner of proceeding of the Duke of Vrbin and his variations aſtoniſhed him, ſince thereby he diſcerned that no impediment would be giuen to the Imperials to paſſe into Tuſcan: & that by this meanes (conſidering the ill diſpoſition of the people of Florence, and the intelligence of Sienna with the Imperials) not only the State of Florence would fall into manifeſt danger, but alſo that of the Church. Theſe reaſons moued him much, neuertheleſſe after many drifts and doubts, for as much as he diſcerned likewiſe how infamous and dangerous it would be to ſeparate himſelfe from the Confederates, and to referre him to the diſcretion of the enemies; yet becauſe he was not ſufficiently ſuccoured by the reſidue, and withall would not aide himſelfe ſo much as he might, and alſo becauſe preſent feare was more powerfull in him, and that he had not the courage to reſiſt difficulties and dangers, he determined to accord with Fieramoſquo and Serenon, whom the Viceroy had ſent to Rome to that end: That there ſhould be a ſurceaſſing of armes for eight moneths, the Pope paying to the Imperiall armie threeſcore thouſand duckats: That whatſoeuer had bene taken from the Church, the Realme of Naples, and the familie of the Colonnois, ſhould be rendered: and that Pompey Colouno ſhould be reſtored to the dignitie of Cardinall, with abſolution of the cenſures, which was a condition moſt grieuous to the Pope, and whereunto he condeſcended with a very ill will: That the French King & the Venetians might enter into the accord within a certaine time: That in caſe they entred, the Lanceknights ſhould go out of Italy, and if they entred not, that they ſhould depart from the Eſtate of the Church, and likewiſe from the territories of Florence: That the Pope ſhould pay fortie thouſand duckats within two and twentie dayes, accounting from the preſent day, and the reſidue within a moneth after: That the Viceroy ſhould come to Rome, for that the Pope ſuppoſed it would be a meanes to aſſure him that the Duke of Bourbon would obſerue the accord, together with the hope he had already thereof; for the Lieutenant Guicciardin had ſurpriſed a letter which the Duke of Bourbon had written to the Viceroy, whereby he aduertiſed him of the difficulties wherein he was, and counſelled him to grow to accord with the Pope, if it might be done with the honour of the Emperour. The accord being made, either partie preſently retired their bands of ſouldiers, & reuoked their armie by ſea, and the places that were taken were rendred, the Pope vſing good faith in the execution of the contents of the capitulation, notwithſtanding at that time he had the better in the Realme of Naples; but in Aquila the ſonnes of the Count Montoire, diſtruſting to remaine there in ſafetie, deliuered vp their father, who forthwith with the fauour of the Imperiall faction chaſed them out of that Prouince, together with all thoſe of the contrary faction. After this the Viceroy came to Rome, by reaſon of whoſe coming, the Pope iudging that he was abſolutely aſſured of the obſeruation of the accord, diſmiſſed with a very ill counſell, all thoſe bands of ſouldiers that were in his pay in the quarters of Rome, and retained onely two hundred light horſemen and two thouſand footmen of the blacke bands. He was much incited hereunto by an opinion he had that the Duke of Bourbon was inclined to the accord, by reaſon of the difficulties that dayly increaſed vpon him, and for that he had alwayes giuen him to vnderſtand that he deſired peace. But the affaires went farre otherwiſe in the confines of Bologna. For aſſoone as the truce was eſtabliſhed, the Pope hauing diſpatched Ceſar Fieramoſquo to the Duke of Bourbon, to the end he might approue the accord, and that he ſhould depart from off the Church lands as ſoone as he had receiued money: infinite difficulties were diſcouered in the Duke of Bourbon, and many more appeared in the ſouldiers, who were reſolute to follow the warre, either for that they had propounded to themſelues the hope of ſome great profit, or becauſe the moneys promiſed by the Pope were not ſufficient to ſatisfie their two payes; which induced many to beleeue, that if the Pope had aduanced to the ſumme of an hundred thouſand duckats, they had eaſily accepted the truce. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, it is certaine that after the coming of Fieramoſquo, they ceaſſed not to rob and ſpoile the countrey of Bologna as before, and to expreſſe all demonſtrations of enemies. Neuertheleſſe the Duke of Bourbon cauſed the wayes to be leuelled, and Fieramoſquo gaue continuall hope to the Popes Lieutenant, that notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties and inſolencies, the armie ſhould accept the truce: the Duke of Bourbon affirming that he was conſtrained to plaine the wayes to entertaine the armie in hope to paſſe further, vntill he had reduced them to his deſire, which was, to keepe amitie with the Pope: and yet at the ſame time arriued in the campe many prouiſions, of meale, pioners, carts, powder, and other ſuch like things ſent by the Duke of Ferrara, who boaſted afterwards, that the money he had ſent them, and all theſe prouiſions, exceeded not the value of threeſcore thouſand duckats. And on the other ſide, the Duke of Vrbin ſeeming to be fearefull leſt if the armie ſhould accept the truce, it would turne towards Poleſina de Rouigna, he retired the Venetian regiments towards Po, and incamped at Caſalmaior. Matters continued in this eſtate of ſuſpence for the ſpace of eight dayes. But at laſt the Duke of Bourbon, either for that ſuch had alwayes bene his intention, or becauſe it was not in his power to command the armie, wrote to the Lieutenant Guicciardin, that (ſince he could not range the ſouldiers to his will) neceſſitie conſtrained him to paſſe further: and putting it accordingly in execution, he went the day following, being the laſt of March, to incampe at the bridge of Rene, with ſo great furie of the footmen, that a Gendeman ſent by the Viceroy to ſolicite the Duke of Bourbon to embrace the truce, had bene ſlaine by the Spaniards, if he had not fled. But the demonſtrations againſt the Marquis of Guaſt were farre greater, who being departed from the armie to go into the Realme of Naples becauſe of his indiſpoſition, or elſe not to tranſgreſſe againſt the will of the Emperour as others did, according to that which he wrote to the Lieutenant, or incited by ſome other cauſe, was publiſhed and proclaimed rebell by the armie. By the coming of the Duke of Bourbon to the bridge of Rene, the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Lieutenant being now certaine that the enemies would draw towards Romagna, (after they had left part of the Italian footmen for the guard of Bologna, and with great difficultie brought thither the Swiſſers, for the payment of whom the Lieutenant was conſtrained to lend ten thouſand duckats to John Vetturio) they went the ſame night with the reſidue of the armie to Forly, where they entred the third day of Aprill, leauing a ſufficient garriſon within Imola, neare to which Citie the Duke of Bourbon passed the fift day to incamp more lower, beneath the highway. And when aduertisement came to Rome that the Duke of Bourbon had not accepted the truce, the Viceroy making shew that he was much discontented, and perswading himselfe, that according to the first aduertisements he had receiued, it was needfull to aduance a greater summe of mony, he sent a Gentleman of his to make an offer of twentie thousand duckats more, which he would pay of the reuenues of Naples: but vnderstanding afterwards that the Gentleman had bene in danger, he departed himselfe from Rome the third of Aprill to conferre with the Duke of Bourbon, hauing promised the Pope that he would compell him to embrace the truce, by separating from him the men at armes and the most part of the Spanish footmen, if he could not compasse it by other meanes. But being arriued the sixt day at Florence, he stayed there to debate with the Deputies whom the Duke of Bourbon sent to him, as in a place most conuenient: by whom he was fully assured that the armie could not be stayed or retained, but by aduancing a greater summe of money, and that it must be leuied vpon the Florentines, vpon whom the Pope had layed all the charge of that prouision.

These variations increased much the difficulties and dangers of the Pope, yea there was now many dayes since they were much augmented. For in such vncertaintie of ỹ deliberations of the Duke of Bourbon, and of that which the coming of the Viceroy might produce, he stood in need of the succours of the Confederates, the actions of whom slackened, notwithstanding the perswasions and instance of the Lieutenant: because the Pope in all his speeches and demonstrations made knowne the great desire he had to accord, and the great hope he had of the successe thereof by the working of the Viceroy. And on the other side, the Lieutenant, who comprehended by many signes that the Popes hope was vaine, and knowing that the prouisions of the Confederates being foreslowed, the matters of Florence and Rome stood in most apparent danger, he was very earnest with the Marquis of Saluzza and the Venetians, to perswade them, that the accord would not fort to effect; and to induce them, if not in regard of others, yet at least for their owne interests, that they would not abandon the affaires of the Pope & Tuscan: and (to the end he might the rather be beleeued) he dissembled not that ỹ Pope did vehemently desire & demand truce, and vndiscreetly expected the same, not looking into the manifest deceitfulnesse of the Imperials: and he told them, that though by aiding him they obtained no other thing then to make easie for him the conditions of the accord, yet that would turne to their great good and profit, for that the Pope by meanes of their aide, might accord for himselfe and the Florentines vnder such conditions as should litle hurt the League: whereas if they abandoned him, he should be compelled of necessitie to pay to the Imperials a great summe of money presently, and some large contribution monethly for the entertaining of those forces, wherewith warre was afterwards to be made against them: and therefore vnlesse they would much preiudice themselues, they ought to raise all their forces to defend Tuscan whensoeuer the Duke of Bourbon should attempt to inuade it. The Marquis of Saluzza was in great doubt and perplexitie touching this deliberation, but much more the Venetians: for that the pusillanimitie of the Pope being knowne to all men, they held for certaine, that though they should endeuour to succour him againe, yet he would embrace the accord without any respect to the Confederates as often as he had meanes to obtaine it: by reason whereof it seemed to them a matter very strange, to be vrged to administer aide vnto him, to the end he might the more easily accord with the common enemies. They considered, that to leaue him abandoned, would be more preiudiciall to their common affaires: but they iudged they should leaue their men in manifest danger betweene the Appenine and the enemies, and in a countrey become already against them, if, whilest they were in Tuscan, the Pope did either confirme the accord, or make a new one. Moreouer the Senate of Venice feared lest the Pope would make instance to haue their men passe into Tuscan, to the end to constraine them to consent to a surceasing of armes, by meanes of the danger wherein they should be to lose their men. The Lieutenant had easily drawne the Marquis of Saluzza out of this doubt and perplexitie, although many of his counsell laboured to incline him to the contrary, to the end not to commit his souldiers to danger: wherfore as he had bin ready before to come to Furly, so he refused not to passe into Tuscan if need required. But the Venetians, who sought to hold the Pope and the Florentines in some hope, and on the other side to be ready to take from day to day such courses as the occurrences required, gaue direction that the Duke of Vrbin should issue out of Casalmaior the fourth day of Aprill, and ſhould ſend the horſemen by the way beyond Po, and the footmen by the riuer: and the Duke of Vrbin, plainly ſhewing that he ſtood in ſome feare for that the Imperials went into Romagna, diſpatched a regiment of two thouſand footmen Venetians for the guard of his owne Eſtate, although many were of opinion, and the Pope in particular, that he had ſecretly promiſed the Duke of Bourbon not to hinder him when he would paſſe into Tuſcan. In the meane while the Duke of Bourbon, who ſought to recouer victuals from all parts, of which he had great want, ſent part of the armie to Cotignola, which towne after it had endured certaine ſhot of the cannon, rendred vpon compoſition, notwithſtanding it had very ſtrong walls: for thoſe of the towne, together with many other places of Romagna, fearing the rapines of the ſouldiers that were their friends, had refuſed them. Cotignola being taken, the Duke of Bourbon ſent to Lugo foure cannons: and as well to make prouiſion of victuals, as for the impediment of waters, he abode three or foure dayes vpon the riuer of Lamone. Afterwards he paſſed Montone the thirteenth day of Aprill, and lodged at Villefranche, fiue miles from Furly: on which day the Marquis of Saluſſa ſtripped fiue hundred footmen, almoſt all Spaniards, who were gone out in diſorder towards Monte Poggioli to ſeeke victuals, according to the example of the whole army, for the great neceſſitie wherein they were. The fourteenth day the Duke of Bourbon incamped aboue the way drawing towards Meldola, which leadeth into Tuſcan by Galeata and Valdibagno: he was ſolicited to take that way by them of Sienna, who offered him great ſtore of victuals and pioners: and in the way the Lanceknights, who burned all as they paſſed, aſſaulted the towne of Meldola, which rendred, and yet was burned: on which day the Duke of Bourbon was aduertiſed that the Viceroy by the conſent of Monſieur de la Motte, ſent by him to that end, had capitulated the day before at Florence in this ſort: That without going from other matters, but confirming againe the capitulation made at Rome, the Duke of Bourbon ſhould begin within fiue dayes next to retire himſelfe with the armie, and that at the firſt lodging he ſhould make in retiring, there ſhould be payed him threeſcore thouſand duckats, whereunto the Viceroy would adde twentie thouſand: That he ſhould receiue threeſcore thouſand more by the end of the next moneth of May, whereof the Viceroy by a ſcedule ſubſigned with his owne hand, bound the Emperour to reſtore & repay fiftie thouſand; but that theſe laſt threeſcore thouſand duckats ſhould not be payed, vnleſſe Philip Stroſſy were firſt deliuered, and Iames Saluiati abſolued of the penaltie of thirtie thouſand duckats, as the Viceroy had promiſed the Pope, not in the capitulations of the truce, but vnder ſimple words. The knowledge of this detained not the Duke of Bourbon for paſſing further, nor the aduertiſement he had that the Viceroy was departed from Florence to come to the armie to him, to eſtabliſh with him all things that ſhould be neceſſary. For the Viceroy deſired the accord, as well for many other cauſes, as for that (as I haue heard by credible relation) he ſought to conuert the armie preſently againſt the Venetians: and albeit the Viceroy had promiſed at Rome, to take from the Duke of Bourbon the horſemen, and the moſt part of the Spaniſh footmen, yet he refuſed ſo to do, ſo long as he was vpon the treatie within Florence, alleaging that he would not be the cauſe of ruine to the Emperours armie. The ſixteenth day the Duke of Bourbon marched to lodge at Saint Sophia, a towne of the valley of Galeata, ſubiect to the Florentines: and ſtriuing with diligence and deceit to preuent the enemies, to the end no impediment might be giuen him in paſſing the Alpes, where, for want of victuals euery contrary accident had bene ſufficient to diſorder him, when he had receiued letters at Saint Peter at the Baines, from the Viceroy and the Lieutenant, whereby he was aduertiſed of the comming of the Viceroy, he made anſwer as well to the one as to the other, that ſuch aduertiſement was come to him in a place ſo incommodious, that it was vnpoſſible for him to ſtay there, but that the day following he would expect him at S. Marie of the Baines below the Alpes: and he ſhewed himſelfe (principally in the letters which he wrote to the Viceroy) very deſirous of accord, and to make knowne to the Pope the good inclination and deuotion he had thereto, although his intention was otherwiſe. The Viceroy went to meete the Duke at the day appointed, together with the Lieutenant Guicciardin, who was entred into doubt by reaſon of the Dukes aduancing: and to the end the enemies ſhould not enter into Tuſcan before the ſuccors, he perſwaded the Marquis of Saluſſa with many reaſons to go before: and when he had throughly diſputed the matter againſt Iohn Vitturio the Venetian Treaſurer, with the Marquis, and againſt others, who for feare leſt their companies ſhould be brought into danger, demanded, that before they paſſed into Tuſcan, there ſhould be aſſurance giuen for two hundred thouſand

duckats, or at leaſt ſome ſtrong places in pawne, he went with all his companies to Breſſiquella: and from thence he wrote to the Pope, that he found the Marquis ſo ready to march, that he made no doubt to procure him to paſſe with his armie into Tuſcan, aſſuring himſelfe that the Venetian regiments would do the like: but that by how much the matters of Florence were aſſured by their paſſage, by ſo much were endangered the affaires of Rome; becauſe the Duke of Bourbon hauing no other hope remaining, would be conſtrained to conuert his forces to that enterpriſe: and that he being more neare Rome, it would be hard for the ſuccours that ſhould be ſent, to equall his diligence, ſeeing he might well paſſe the Appenine in two remoues of incamping: for feare whereof the Florentines ſought aforehand to fortifie themſelues with the forces of the Venetians and the Duke of Vrbin, and had giuen hope, and afterwards promiſed to enter the League, in caſe their companies did paſſe into Tuſcan: to bind themſelues to pay a certaine number of footmen; and not to accord with the Emperor, though the Pope deſired it: and had alſo offered to the Duke of Vrbin (who when he had paſſed Po at Ficqueroles, was arriued the thirteenth day of Aprill at Finale, and afterwards at Corticella) to render vp to him the Caſtles of Saint Leo and Maiuolo; which offer was made by Pallas Rucellai, whom they ſent vnto him to negociate theſe matters: ſo that it was leſſe difficult for them to haue ready ſuccours, chiefly when there was aduertiſement that the Viceroy had not onely not found the Duke of Bourbon in the place appointed, who deluding him, endeuoured the ſame day to paſſe the Alpes; but alſo had bene in great danger to be ſlaine by the paiſants of thoſe quarters, riſing in armes for the iniuries and wrongs they had receiued by the armie. For the Marquis (notwithſtanding the Duke of Vrbin ſoliciting him to come and ſpeake with him in the borough of Saint Peter, ſought to interpoſe difficulties and delaye) was ready to paſſe the Alpes: ſo that the two and twentieth day of Aprill he lodged at the borough of Saint Laurence in Mugello: and the Duke of Vrbin, when he could with no honeſtie be farre from him, and would not haue all the blame layed vpon himſelfe, ſeeing the readineſſe of the French men, and knowing that the Venetians had referred themſelues to his will, but yet with this commiſſion, that if immediatly after he was arriued in Tuſcan the Florentines finiſhed not the confederation, he ſhould preſently repaſſe his armie, he alſo paſſed, and lodged the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth at Barberino.

At laſt the Duke of Bourbon hauing paſſed the Alpes the ſame day, lodged at Saint Stephens, which towne made a braue defence againſt the aſſault of his ſouldiers: and to entertaine the Pope with the ſame ſubtiltie, and to haue the greater occaſion to offend him, he ſent vnto him one of his Gentlemen, to aſſure him that he deſired to accord with him: but that in regard of the obſtinacie of his ſouldiers, he was driuen to accompanie them, to auoide a greater euill: and he aduiſed him not to leaue off the ſolicitations of accord, nor to ſticke for any ſumme of money. But it was a matter ſuperfluous to vſe ſuch ſedulitie with the Pope, who beleeuing too much the thing he deſired, and deſiring too much to eaſe himſelfe of expences, as ſoone as he was aduertiſed of the concluſion made at Florence, in the preſence, and with the conſent of the Agent of the Duke of Bourbon, he vndiſcreetly diſmiſſed almoſt all the footmen of the blacke bands, and Monſieur Vaudemont was gone to Marſeilles by ſea, as if the peace had bene very certaine. All the armies being now in Tuſcan, and the Confederates vnderſtanding that the Duke of Bourbon was gone in one day (which was the three and twentieth day) from Saint Stephens to incampe at Chiaſſa neare to Aretze, being eighteene miles diſtant, the Captaines who were aſſembled at Barberino, drew into counſell what was to be done: and many of the ſaid Captaines making inſtance, together with the Agents of the Pope and the Florentines, that the armies knit in one ſtrength, ſhould march and incampe in ſome place beyond Florence, to keepe the Duke of Bourbon from approching that Citie, it was reſolued to ſuffer the regiments to repoſe in the lodgings where they were, but that the day following the Captaines ſhould go to Anciſa thirteene miles from Florence, to leade thither all their companies afterwards, if they found they might ſafely lodge there, as Federike de Boſſolo who was the author of that counſel, affirmed they might. But as they marched the day after, and were approched neare Florence, there happened an accident which might haue brought forth very dangerous effects, if it had not bene remedied, which hindered much the execution of that counſell, and of many others which might haue followed thereupon. For at Florence the minds of all men were much moued, and the moſt part of the people diſcontented with the preſent gouernment, and the youth making inſtance to the Magiſtrates to giue them the publike armes, to defend them (as they ſaid) againſt the ſouldiers; before there could be any reſolution, there happened by chance the ſixe and twentieth day a certaine tumult in the publike place, where the moſt part of the people, and almoſt all the youth hauing taken armes, they began to runne toward the publike Pallace: and to this tumult was much helping the indiſcretion or timorouſneſſe of Siluio Cardinall of Cortona, who being determined to iſſue out of the towne to go meet the Duke of Vrbin, to the end to do him the more honour, forbare not to go, notwithſtanding he knew before his going that the tumult was begun; by reaſon whereof a rumor running through the towne that he was fled, euery one was the more ready to runne to the Pallace, which being in the power of the youth, and the market place full of the Commons armed, the great Magiſtrate was conſtrained to proclaime rebels by a ſolemne decree, Hippolito and Alexander the Popes nephewes, with intention to introduce againe the popular gouernment. But whileſt theſe things were in doing, the Duke and the Marquis being entred Florence with many Captaines, accompanied with the Cardinall of Cortona and Hippolito de Medicis, and fifteene hundred footmen in armes, who had bene kept many dayes in the Citie for feare of the Duke of Bourbon, they made head all together, and drew towards the market place, which being immediatly abandoned by the people, fell into their power: and yet none of them durſt remaine there, by reaſon of the ſtones that were caſt by thoſe within the Pallace, and the harquebuziers that ſhot; but they kept the ſtreets thereabout. Now the Duke of Vrbin was of opinion (a matter which albeit it ſeemed of no conſequence, yet was it the principall cauſe that Florence was that day deliuered of ſo great a danger) that the bands that were within Florence were not ſufficient to winne the Pallace: and iudging, that it would be dangerous, if it were not recouered before night, leſt the people taking courage ſhould haue recourſe again to armes, he determined with the conſent of the three Cardinals that were preſent, to wit, Cibo, Cortona, and Rodolpho, and of the Marquis of Saluſſa, and the Venetian Embaſſadors, being al aſſembled in the ſtreet of Garba, ioyning to the market place, to ſend for part of the Venetian footmen who were incamped vpon the plaine of Florence neare the Citie. By meanes whereof there was a dangerous encounter towards (for the Pallace could not be ſubdued without the ſlaughter of moſt part of the Nobilitie that were therein, & likewiſe there was danger leſt beginning to take weapon in hand, and to kill one another, the ſoldiers being victors would put to ſacke all the reſidue of the Citie:) yea that day had bene very vnhappie for the Florentines, if the Lieutenant Guicciadin had not cut in ſunder the knot that of it ſelfe was very hard to be vndone. For perceiuing Federike de Boſſolo to come towards them, and comprehending the cauſe thereof, he preſently left the others, and ranne to meete him, to the end to be the firſt to ſpeake to him. In the beginning of the mutinie Federike was gone to the Pallace, hoping to reappeaſe the riot, as well through his authoritie, as for the familiaritie he had with many of the youth: but he could preuaile nothing, yea, on the contrary, he receiued from ſome of them iniurious words, and being kept retained certaine houres, he could hardly obtaine libertie to be gone. But being got out of the Pallace full of diſdaine, and knowing how eaſie it was to take it, both for the ſmall forces they had, and the litle order they kept, he perſwaded the reſidue to aſſault it preſently. But the Lieutenant ſhewing him with very few words, what griefe the Pope would conceiue by the diſorders that might happen thereby, together with the domage that would follow vpon the affaires of the Confederates; and that it were better to deuiſe how matters might be appeaſed, then to incenſe the hearts of men: and therefore that it was a matter very pernicious to make knowne to the Duke of Vrbin and others, the great facilitie to force the Pallace, he eaſily drew him to his opinion; ſo that he ſpeaking to others as the Lieutenant had willed him, propounded the matter in ſuch ſort, and gaue ſuch hope to reconcile the mutinie without the helpe of armes, that this way being choſen as the beſt, they intreated them both to go together into the Pallace, to endeuor to appeaſe the tumult, promiſing pardon to euery one for whatſoeuer they had committed that day againſt the State: whither being gone vnder ſafe conduct of thoſe that were within, they induced them at laſt, after many difficulties, to condeſcend to abandon the Pallace, which they could no longer keepe. Thus the tumult being appeaſed; and yet as ingratitude and reproch are farre more ordinary then remuneration and praiſe for good workes, although for the preſent the Lieutenant was much commended and eſteemed of all men, neuertheleſſe, both the Cardinall of Cortona complained againſt him ſhortly after, that he reſpecting more the ſafetie of the Citizens, and particularly of Tumult in Florence.

Lewis

Lewis Guicciardin his brother, who at that time was Gonfalonnier of iuſtice, then the greatneſſe of the Medices, proceeding artificially, had bene the cauſe why the Eſtate had not bene that day eſtabliſhed for euer, with the armes and bloud of the Citizens, in the houſe of the Medices: and the Commons ſlandered him afterwards, for that when he went to the Pallace, making the dangers farre greater then they were, he had induced them, for the good of the Medices, to yeeld without any neceſſitie. Now though the tumult of Florence was appeaſed the ſame day without any murther, yet hereof many great diſorders tooke beginning: and haply it may be ſaid, that had it not bene for that accident, the ruine that fell out ſhortly after, had not happened. For the Duke of Vrbin and the Marquis of Saluſſa, abiding ſtill at Florence becauſe of this mutinie, went not according to the firſt reſolution, to view the lodging of Anciſa: and the day following, Lewis Piſan and Marke Foſcaro Embaſſadours for the Venetians with the Florentines, when they had ſeene the inconſtancie of the Citie, proteſted that they would not ſuffer the armie to paſſe Florence, vnleſſe there were firſt made a concluſion of the confederation which had bene negociated, in which they demanded contribution for ten thouſand footmen, ſuppoſing the oportunitie of the time ſerued their turnes to make vſe of the neceſſities of the Florentines: but in the end the concluſion was accompliſhed the eight and twentieth day, referring themſelues to ſuch contribution as the Pope ſhould appoint, who was ſuppoſed to be already reunited with the Confederates. Hereunto was added, that the time being come for the paiment of the Swiſſers, and Lewis Piſan hauing no money to furniſh them, by reaſon of the ill order the Venetians had taken for it, there paſſed certaine dayes before he could recouer it: in ſo much as the good counſell to go with the armies to lodge at Anciſa was not executed. In this eſtate of affaires, the Pope perceiuing the wiles wherewith the Duke of Bourbon had abuſed the Viceroy, and that he was paſſed into Tuſcan, turned by neceſſitie to the thoughts of warre, and after the fiue and twentieth day made a new confederation with the French King and the Venetians, by the which they were bound to aid him with a great ſumme of mony; but he would bind neither himſelf nor the Florentines to any other thing, then ſuch as their faculties were able to beare, alleaging that they were both very weary of the exceſſiue expences which they had bene at: and theſe conditions very grieuous of themſelues, were approued by the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, to the end entirely to ſeparate the Pope from the accords made with the Viceroy; but they were not approued by their Maiſters. The Venetians ſaid, Dominicke Venerio their Embaſſadour had much failed, in that without commiſſion of the Senate he had concluded a confederation of great expences and litle fruite, conſidering the inconſtancie of the Pope, of whom they iudged that in all occaſions he would returne to his firſt deſire to accord with the Viceroy: and the French king who was drained of money, and ſought rather to wearie the Emperour with the longneſſe of the warre, then with the victorie, iudged it would ſuffice now if he entertained the warre with ſmall expence: and which more is, although at the firſt when he vnderſtood that the Pope had made truce with the Viceroy, the ſaid truce was very offenſiue vnto him, yet afterwards looking better into the eſtate of affaires, he deſired that the Pope would diſpoſe the Venetians (without whom he would make no conuention) to embrace the truce. But at this time the Pope, who was not a litle diſcontented to ſee the warre transferred into Tuſcan, and yet leſſe then if it had bene transferred to Rome, leuied bands of ſouldiers, and made prouiſions for money, but ſlowly: and his purpoſe was to ſend Ranſe de Cere againſt the Siennois, and alſo to inuade them by ſea, to the end that the Duke of Bourbon being intangled in Tuſcan, might be ſtopped for taking his way to Rome: whereof neuertheleſſe this feare diminiſhed dayly, hoping, by reaſon of the difficulties which the Duke of Bourbon had to leade his armie to Rome without victuals and money, and for the oportunitie of the Eſtate of Sienna, where at the leaſt his ſouldiers might be nouriſhed, that he would be driuen to ſtay in Tuſcan, and make warre againſt the Florentines.

The Pope diſpoſed to hearken to the warre

But the Duke of Bourbon, either for that his firſt counſell was otherwiſe, the which, as many reported, was very ſecretly determined at Finale by the authoritie of the Duke of Ferrara and Ierome Maron; or diſtruſting to make any profit of that enterpriſe, for that the maine forces of the League were aſſembled neare the Citie of Florence for the defence thereof: and alſo being no longer able to entertaine the armie without mony, which he had till that day carried through ſo many difficulties with faire promiſes and vaine hopes, conſtrained either to periſh or to trie fortune, he determined to march with all diligence to ſurpriſe the Citie of Rome, where the reward

ward of the victorie, as well for the Emperour as for the ſouldiers, would be ineſtimable: and he was puſhed on by the hope which he ſaw very great to carry it, ſeeing the Pope, with an euill counſell, had firſt diſmiſſed the Swiſſers, and afterwards the footmen of the blacke bands, and began ſo ſlowly to refurniſh himſelfe at ſuch time as the accord was deſperate, that it was thought he could not in time aſſemble forces ſufficient. Therefore the Duke of Bourbon departed the ſixe and twentieth day of Aprill from the countrey of Aretze, without artilleries or baggage: and marching with incredible diligence, being not hindered either by the raines which in thoſe dayes fell in great abundance, or with the want of victuals, he drew to Rome at a time when the Pope was ſcarcely aduertiſed of his coming, and found no impediment either at Viterba, whither the Pope had not ſent ſufficient ſtrength in time, or in any other place. Therefore the Pope hauing recourſe (as many wiſe men had foretold it would come to paſſe in his laſt neceſſities, when they could ſtand him in ſmall ſtead) to thoſe remedies, which if he had vſed in their due time and place, might haue bene to ſpeciall purpoſe to turne away ſo great a ſtorme, he created three Cardinals for money, which could not be payed him for the importunitie of the affaires, and though he had receiued it, it could ſtand him in no ſtead, by reaſon of the danger that haſtened on ſo faſt. He called together the people of Rome, and intreated them, that in ſo great a hazard of their countrey, they would readily take armes to defend it, and that the richeſt of them would lend money to wage ſouldiers; whereunto no man would hearken, yea, it remaineth for a remembrance, that Dominicke Maximo the richeſt man among all the Romanes, offered to lend an hundred duckats, of which couetouſneſſe he bare the puniſhment afterwards, for that his daughters were made a prey to the ſouldiers, & touching himſelfe, being made priſoner with his ſonnes, he was rated at a huge ranſome. But when newes came to Florence of the diſcamping of the Duke of Bourbon, which being written by Vitelli lying then within Aretze, ſtayed a day more thē was conuenient in coming, the Captaines determined that the Count Guido Rangon with his horſemen and with the troupes of the Count Catazze, and fiue thouſand footmen of Florence and the Church, ſhould march preſently without baggage towards the towne of Rome with great diligence, and that the other armie ſhould follow after, in hope that if the Duke of Bourbon tooke his artilleries with him, that thoſe ſuccours would be at Rome before him; and if he marched with expedition, it would arriue ſo ſoone after him, that hauing no artilleries, and finding ſome reaſonable defence at Rome, where the Pope had written that he had ſixe thouſand footmen, it would be maintained vntill the firſt ſuccours were come, which being arriued, Rome would be out of danger. But the celeritie of the Duke of Bourbon, and the ſlow prouiſions made at Rome, marred all theſe deuices. For Ranſe de Cere, to whom the Pope had committed the principall charge of the defence of Rome, hauing, by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of the time leuied very few footmen of ſeruice, but a great crew of men vnexperienced in matters of warre, whom he had gotten together tumultuouſly out of the ſtables of the Cardinals and Prelates, and the ſhops of artificers, beſides Innes and victualling houſes: and hauing made rampiers in the ſuburbes, which in the iudgement of all men were very weake, but in his owne conceit ſufficient for defence, being ſo confident that he was able to defend them, that he would not ſuffer the bridges of Tyber to be cut to ſaue Rome in caſe the ſuburbes and quarter beyond Tyber could not be defended: and which more is, iudging the ſuccors to be ſuperfluous, and doubting the coming of Count Guido, he wrote vnto him the fourteenth day of May, by the Biſhop of Verona, in the Popes name, that for as much as the Citie of Rome was ſufficiently furniſhed and fortified, he ſhould onely ſend thither ſixe or eight hundred harquebuziers, and for himſelfe he ſhould go with the reſidue of his people to ioyne with the armie of the League, for that he might do more good that way, then if he ſhould be incloſed in the Citie of Rome. And though this letter did litle harme, for that the Count was not ſo farre aduanced as he might arriue in time, yet it ſhewed how ill the preſent dangers were calculated by him. But it was a matter no leſſe maruellous (if it be a wonder that mortall men either know not how or cannot reſiſt deſtinie) that the Pope, who before was wont to deſpiſe Ranſe de Cere aboue all other Captaines, threw himſelfe now into his armes, and referred himſelfe wholly to his iudgement: and much more, that he who was wont to be fearfull in far leſſer dangers, and who had bene often at the point to abandon the Citie at ſuch time as the Viceroy drew with his campe to Fruſolone, now in ſo great a danger, contrary to his nature, ſtayed conſtantly in Rome, and with ſo great a hope to defend himſelfe, that being become as it were the aduocate aduocate of the enemies, he did not onely forbid men to depart, but alſo gaue order, that no goods ſhould be carried away, which many Merchants and other men would haue ſent into places of ſafetie by the riuer.

The Duke of Bourbon incamped the fift day of May in the medowes neare to Rome, from whence with the inſolencie of a ſouldier he ſent a Trumpet to demand paſſage of the Pope through the Citie of Rome, to go with the armie to the Realme of Naples: and the next morning at the breake of day, he determined either to die or vanquiſh, (for that indeed he had not much other hope then this in his affaires) and being approched the ſuburbes on that ſide towards the Mountaine of the Holy Ghoſt, he began there to giue a furious aſſault: and Fortune fauoured him, in that ſhe cauſed him to approch the armie more ſafely by the benefite of a thicke miſt, which being riſen before day, couered the ſaid armie vntill ſuch time as they were come to the place where the aſſault was giuen: at the beginning whereof the Duke of Bourbon, who through a laſt deſpaire aduanced before all the companies, not onely for that in caſe he returned not victorious he had no other expectation of refuge, but alſo for that he thought the Lanceknights came on but ſlowly to the aſſault, he was ſtricken with a bullet of an harquebuze, of which blow he fell dead to the earth. But his death did nothing diminiſh, but rather redoubled the courage of the ſouldiers, who fighting valiantly for the ſpace of two houres, entred at laſt into the ſuburbes, wherein was much helping vnto them not onely the weakneſſe of the rampiers which was very great, but alſo the ill reſiſtance made by them within. By which accident (as at many other times) ſuch as haue not as yet learned by examples paſt to meaſure things preſent, may know how much the vertue of men exerciſed in warre, differeth from the valour of new armies leuied in haſte and compounded of a multitude of people gathered together. For at the defence of the ſuburbes there was a part of the youth of Rome vnder the enſignes of the people; notwithſtanding that many of the Gibelins, and the faction of the Colonnois deſired (or at leaſt did not feare) the victorie of the Imperials, hoping that in regard of their faction they ſhould receiue no harme by them, which was the cauſe alſo why they proceeded ſo coldly to the defence. Neuertheleſſe for that it is a hard matter to take townes without artilleries, there died of the aſſailants about a thouſand footmen: who hauing made the way open to enter, all the defendants fell to manifeſt flight, and many ranne by heapes towards the Caſtle; ſo that the ſuburbes being entirely abandoned, remained in prey to the victors; and the Pope, who expected in the Pallace of Vatican what would be the iſſue, hearing that the enemies were entred, fled preſently with certaine Cardinals into the Caſtle, where conſulting whether he ſhould remaine there, or retire through the Citie with the light horſemen of his guard into ſome place of ſuretie, he who was appointed by deſtinie to be an example of the calamities that may happen to Popes, and alſo how hard it is to extinguiſh their authoritie and maieſtie, being certified by Berard of Padua who was fled from the Imperiall armie, of the death of the Duke of Bourbon, and that the whole armie being abated in courage for the death of their Captaine, deſired to come to accord with him, he ſent out men to parley with the Captaines, and wretchedly left off the counſell to go his way; he and his Captaines remaining no leſſe irreſolute in the meanes to defend themſelues, then they were ſlow in the execution thereof. So that the ſame day the Spaniards finding neither order nor counſell to defend the quarter beyond Tiber, they entred the place without any reſiſtance; from whence finding no impediment, they entred the Citie of Rome the ſame euening an houre before Sunne ſetting, at the bridge Xiſto; where, except ſuch as truſted to the name of their faction, and certaine Cardinals, who for that they bare a name to haue embraced the Emperours quarrell, ſuppoſed themſelues to be in more ſuretie then others, all the reſidue of the Citie and the Court (as happeneth in accidents ſo furious) were in flight and confuſion. The ſouldiers being entred the Citie, euery one ranne in diſorder to make pillage, without any regard, not onely to the name of friends, and the authoritie and dignitie of Prelates, but alſo of Temples and Monaſteries, of holy Relikes honored by the reſort of all the world, and of holy things; ſo that it is impoſſible not onely to recount, but alſo to imagine the calamities of that Citie, raiſed by the ordinance of heauen to a wonderfull greatnes, and alſo deſtinate to many fortunes & calamities, hauing bene ſacked by the Gothes within nine hundred & foureſcore yeares. It is impoſſible to recount the greatneſſe of the prey, for the wealth and riches which lay in heapes, and ſo many rare and precious things belonging to Merchants and Courtiers: but that which made the ſpoile yet more great, was the qualitie

and great number of the priſoners, who were to redeeme themſelues with very great ranſomes. And to make vp the full meaſure of miſerie and infamie, many Prelates being taken by the ſouldiers, chiefly by the Lanceknights, (who for the hatred which they bare to the name of the Church of Rome, ſhewed themſelues cruell and inſolent) were with great contempt led through the Citie of Rome, ſet vpon Aſſes and leane Mules, clothed in the habites and enſignes of their dignitie, and many were cruelly tormented, who either died with the torments, or were handled in ſuch ſort that they ended their liues within a few dayes after they had payed their ranſome. There died as well at the aſſault as in the rage of ſacking, about foure thouſand bodies. The Pallaces of all the Cardinals were ſacked, except thoſe which to ſaue the Merchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the perſons and goods of many others, had promiſed a very great ſumme of money: and ſome of thoſe hauing compounded with the Spaniards were afterwards ſacked by the Lanceknights, or conſtrained to redeeme themſelues again. The Ladie Marqueſſe of Mantua compounded for her Pallace for fiftie thouſand duckats, which were payed by the Merchants and others that were retired thither: and the rumour ranne, that Ferdinand her ſon had ten thouſand thereof for his ſhare. The Cardinall of Sienna deuoted from the father to the ſonne to the name of the Emperour, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for himſelfe as for his Pallace, was made priſoner by the Lanceknights, who ſacked his Pallace, and afterwards led him with buffets, and his head bare, into the quarter called Borgo, where he was driuen to redeeme himſelfe out of their hands, with promiſe of fiue thouſand duckats. The Cardinals of Minerua and Ponſetta ſuffered almoſt the like calamitie: who being priſoners to the Lanceknights, payed their ranſome after they had bene baſely led in proceſſion through the Citie of Rome. The Prelates & Cardinals Spaniſh and Germains, who thought themſelues ſure that the ſouldiers of their Nation would do them no wrong, were taken, and as ill handled as others. There might be heard the pitifull cries and lamentations of the women of Rome, and of the Nunnes, whom the ſouldiers led by troupes to ſatisfie their luſt: ſo that it might truly be ſaid, that the iudgements of God were hidden from mortall men, ſeeing he would ſuffer the renowmed chaſtitie of the Romane womē to be ſo villanouſly & miſerably forced. There was heard in all places the infinite complaints of ſuch as were inhumanely tormented, partly to conſtraine them to pay ranſomes, and partly to diſcloſe the goods they had hidden. All holy things, the Sacraments and relikes of Saints, whereof the Churches were full, being diſpoiled of their ornaments, were caſt downe to the ground, whereunto was added infinite villanies by the barbarous Lanceknights: and whatſoeuer eſcaped the hands of the ſouldiers, which were things but baſe and vile, were carried away by the paiſants of the lands of the Colonnois, who came into Rome: but the Cardinall Colonno who arriued the day following, ſaued many women that were fled into his houſe. The rumor went, that the valuation of this ſacke, in gold, ſiluer and iewels, amounted to more then a million of duckats; but that in ranſomes there was gotten a farre greater ſumme.

The ſame day that the Imperials tooke Rome, Count Guido arriued with his light horſemen and eight hundred harquebuziers, at the bridge of Salara, to enter Rome the ſame euening: but hearing what had happened, he retired to Otricoly, where the reſidue of his forces came to him. For notwithſtanding the letters he had receiued from Rome, whereby he vnderſtood that there was no reckoning made of his ſuccours, yet for that he would not neglect the renowne to be the man that had ſuccoured Rome, he forbare not to keepe on his way: and there wanted not thoſe (as it is the nature of men to be fauorable and eaſie interpreters of their owne actions, but ſeuere cenſurers of the actions of others) who reprehended the Count Guido for not knowing how to vſe a faire occaſion: for that the Imperials being wholly diſpoſed to follow ſo rich a prey, to rob houſes, to ſearch out treaſure that was hid, to take priſoners, and to reduce into places of ſuretie ſuch as they had already taken, were diſperſed into all the parts of the Citie, without any order for their lodging, without knowing their Enſignes, and without obeing the commandements of their Captaines: ſo that many beleeued, if Count Guido with his companies had ſodainly entred Rome, and ſhewed their faces to the Caſtle which was neither beſieged nor guarded, that they had not onely obtained the deliuerance of the Pope, but had done ſome braue exploit; the enemies being ſo buſie and attentiue to make pillage, that for any accident that might happen, there could hardly haue bene drawne together any notable number, the ſame being verified by the experience of certaine dayes after, when by the com-

mandement of the Captaines or for ſome accident the alarme was ſounded, not one ſouldier was in readineſſe to reſort to his Enſigne. But men oftentimes perſwade themſelues, that if this had bene done, or that not done, the iſſue had certainly bene ſuch; whereof if the experience might be ſeene, ſuch iudgements would oftentimes be found falſe. Now there remained onely to thoſe that were incloſed within the Caſtle, an hope to be reſcued by the armie of the League, who being departed from Florence no ſooner then the third of May, (for the Venetians had deferred long to pay the Swiſſers) marched in ſuch ſort as the Marquis of Saluſſa went a dayes iourney before the Venetian regiments, but vnder this ordinance agreed vpon betweene him and the Duke, that they ſhould follow him the ſame way. Neuertheleſſe the Duke contrary to that reſolution, the ſeuenth day tooke the way from the lodging of Cortona to Perouſa, to arriue at Tody, and afterwards at Orti; and there paſſing Tiber, he ioyned with the reſidue: who as they marched along the way appointed, forced and ſacked the borough of Pieua, who had refuſed to lodge the Swiſſers, and there were ſlaine ſix or eight hundred of thoſe within. By reaſon of which diſorder, the ſouldiers ſpending time in pillage and ſpoile, they arriued not before the tenth day at the bridge of Granaiuola, where they had aduertiſement of the taking of Rome, and the eleuenth day they came to Oruietto, from whence by the counſell of Federike de Boſſolo, the Marquis of Saluſſa, Boſſolo, and Hugo de Peppoly, with a great troupe of horſe, drew towards the Caſtle, with intention that he and Hugo ſhould go vp to the Caſtle, and the Marquis to remaine behind to backe them, hoping to find the Imperials diſordered, and by arriuing ſuddenly, to get ſome occaſion to draw out of the Caſtle the Pope and his Cardinals, knowing that the ſouldiers for the greatneſſe of the bootie, laying aſide all enterpriſe, would looke after nothing elſe. But that deuice ſorted to no effect, for that when they were not farre from Rome, Federikes horſe falling vnder him, he receiued ſuch a hurt, as he could go no further; and Hugo ſhewing himſelfe before the Caſtle when it was high day, where, by his direction he ſhould haue arriued in the night, he retired, knowing (as he ſaid) that the enterpriſe was diſcouered; but, as Federike ſaid, fearing more then was need.

In this meane while, when the Duke of Vrbin had intelligence of the accident of Rome, albeit he aſſured that he would ſuccour the Pope with all his forces, yet ſuppoſing there was a faire occaſion offered to take the Eſtate of Perouſa out of the hands of Gentil Baillon, who was maintained there by the Popes authoritie, and to reſtore it to the diſpoſing of John Paul, he approched Perouſa with the Venetian regiments, and with threats compelled Gentil to depart thence: and leauing there certaine Commanders, ſuch as depended vpon Malateſta and Horatio, of whom the one was incloſed in the Caſtle of S. Angelo, and the other was in Lombardie with the Venetian regiments, when he had ſpent three dayes in that action, he departed the ſixteenth day to Oruietta, the way which he tooke at his departure from Cortona to go to Rome beyond Tiber, being the cauſe that he had lingred long. At Oruietta all the Commanders of the armie aſſembled themſelues together, to ſet downe ſome reſolution for their proceedings hereafter: whereupon the Duke of Vrbin, after he had ſhewed in the preamble of his ſpeech, great affection, he propounded many difficulties, putting them in mind chiefly to thinke vpon the ſuretie of their retrait in caſe the ſuccours of the Caſtle ſucceeded not well. And for that cauſe he vrged them of Oruietta to giue him hoſtages to aſſure him that at his returne they would not faile to relieue the armie with victuals: and interpoſing in all the affaires a tract of time, he reſolued at laſt to be at Nepy the nineteenth day, and that the ſame day the Marquis with his people, and the Count Guido with his Italian footmen, ſhould likewiſe be at Bracciano, to the end to go all the next day to the Iſle, which is a place nine miles from Rome. The coming of whom being expected by the Pope by reaſon of ſ letters which his Lieutenant Guicciardin wrote to him from Viterbo, was the cauſe, that the accord being almoſt concluded betwixt him and the Imperials, he refuſed to ſubſigne the articles; not ſo much for the hope he receiued by the letters, which (albeit they were aduiſedly written) made ſome diſcouerie to him of things which by diſcourſing of matters paſt, he was to looke and hope for of the time to come, as to auoide the ignominie, that it might be attributed to his fearfulneſſe and raſhneſſe that he had not bene reſcued. There was in the French an vniuerſall readineſſe to ſuccour the Caſtle, and the Venetians with letters and relation of great affection, augmented the ſame diſpoſition, the Prince ſoliciting the matter with great vehemencie in the councell of the Pregati: ſo that all excuſes being taken away from the Duke, he conſented that the day following a muſter ſhould be made of all the armies,

hoping perhaps to find the numbers ſo much diminiſhed, that he might haue a iuſt cauſe to refuſe the fight; which was a deuice that could not ſerue his turne, for that there were found in the armie, notwithſtanding many were gone, fifteene thouſand footmen, with an vniuerſall reſolution to fight, and do the office of ſouldiers. The muſter being ended, counſell was taken for the maner of their proceeding, and they all agreed to go and incampe at the croſſe of Montmary, as they were earneſtly requeſted by thoſe of the Caſtle: who alleaged, that in regard the place was ſtrong, and but three miles from Rome, and that there was no feare that the Imperials would come to incampe without the Citie, they might both remaine there, and retire without danger: and that in that place they might better know and execute the occaſion to ſuccour the Caſtle. But this reſolution not pleaſing the Duke of Vrbin, he embraced another deuice propounded by Guido Rangon, who offered to approch the Caſtle the ſame night with all the horſemen & footmen of the Church, to aſſay to get the Pope from thence, ſo that the Duke of Vrbin with the reſidue of the army would march to the three Cottages to backe him. But this deuice was not executed ỳ night, for that the Duke, being vrged by the Pope, went to ſuruey the campe of Montmary; and yet the night approching he paſſed not the three Cottages, but many houres being vainly loſt about this matter, they were driuen to deferre the execution of that enterpriſe till the night following. But being aduertiſed the ſame day by certaine ſpies (whether true or ſubborned) that the trenches which the Imperials had made in the medowes, were greater thē indeed they were, & that they had broken in many places the gallery wall that leadeth from the Vatican to the Caſtle S. Angelo, to the end to miniſter ſpeedie ſuccours on many ſides, if any ſouldiers were diſcouered (which alſo was falſe:) and vpon this report the Duke propounding many difficulties, which were all conſented vnto by Guido, & approued almoſt by all the other Captaines, it was concluded that it was vnpoſſible at that time to ſuccour the Caſtle, and ſome other of the Captaines that roſe vp to diſpute and defend the contrary opinion, were bitterly reprehended by the Duke. And thus the Pope remained in prey, not one Lance being broken to recouer out of priſon, him who to ſuccour others, had leuied ſo many bands of ſouldiers, ſpent huge maſſes of money, and ſtirred vp to warre almoſt all the world. Neuertheleſſe they diſputed, if that which they did not preſently, might be done afterwards with more forces; to which deuice propounded by the Duke, he anſwered himſelfe, that vndoubtedly the Caſtle might be ſuccoured, whenſoeuer the armie were poſſeſſed of a ſtrength of fixteene thouſand Swiſſers leuied by decree of the Cantons, not reckoning thoſe that were there already, as being become vnprofitable by their long abiding in Italy: and beſides the Swiſſers, ten thouſand harquebuziers Italians, three thouſand Pioners, and fortie peeces of artilleries: requiring the Lieutenant to perſwade the Pope, whom he knew to be furniſhed with victuals for ſome weeke, that he would deferre to make any accord till theſe forces could be gotten together. And the Lieutenant anſwering, that he vnderſtood his propoſition, in caſe the eſtate of affaires changed not in the meane while, but for that it was very likely that thoſe within Rome would make the reſcue more hard with new trenches and fortifications, and alſo that from Naples would come to Rome the bands which the Viceroy had led thither by ſea, he deſired to know what hope could be giuen to the Pope if matters ſucceeded in that ſort (as in all likelyhood they would:) he replied, that in ſuch a caſe all meanes poſſible ſhould be vſed; adding, that if the bands that were at Naples were ioyned with thoſe of Rome, they would be in all more then twelue thouſand Lanceknights, and eight or ten thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and that if the Caſtle were loſt, there could be made no reckoning to remaine maiſters of the warre, if indeed they had not at leaſt two and twentie or foure and twentie thouſand Swiſſers. Which demands being contemned of all the Captaines, as impoſſible, the armie being much diminiſhed in footmen, retired the firſt day of Iune to Monterooſi, notwithſtanding the Pope made great inſtance that they ſhould not depart ſo ſoone, to the end to make his aduantage thereby in the practiſes of accord: and the ſame night Peter Maria Roſſa and Alexander Vitelly with two hundred light horſemen paſſed vp to Rome towards the enemies. But now it is to be vnderſtood, that the Pope hauing ſmall expectation of ſuccours, and no leſſe feare and iealouſie of his life becauſe of the Colonnois and the Lanceknights, ſent for the Viceroy who was at Sienna to come to Rome, hoping to obtaine of him better conditions, who, for that he hoped to be made Captaine general of the armie, went willingly. But when he was come to Rome, whither he paſſed vnder ſafeconduct of the Captaines of the armie, and found the minds of the Lanceknights and Spaniards eſtran-

eſtranged from him, who after the death of the Duke of Bourbon had choſen the Prince of Orange for their Generall, he had not the heart to ſtay there: but as he was going towards Naples, he was met in the way by the Marquis of Guaſt, Don Hugo, and Captaine Alarcon, by whoſe counſels he returned againe to Rome: neuertheleſſe for that he was not agreeable to the armie, he bare no more authoritie, either in the affaires of the warre, or in the negociation of accord with the Pope, who in the end being made naked of all hope, compounded the ſixth day of Iune with the Imperials, almoſt vnder the ſame conditions with the which he might haue accorded before: That the Pope ſhould pay to the armie foure hundred thouſand duckats, to wit, one hundred thouſand preſently, to be defrayed of the gold and money reſerued in the Caſtle; fiftie thouſand within twentie dayes; and two hundred and fiftie thouſand within two moneths, aſſigning the paiment hereof to an impoſt of money to be charged vpon the whole State of the Church: That he ſhould deliuer into the power of the Emperour, to retaine them ſo long as he ſhould thinke good, the Caſtle Saint Angelo, the Rockes of Oſtia, of Ciuittauecchia, and of Ciuita Caſtellana, together with the Cities of Parma, Plaiſance, and Modena: That the Pope together with all thoſe Cardinals that were with him, which were thirteene, ſhould remaine priſoners within the Caſtle, vntill the firſt paiment of an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats were ſatiſfied: and that afterwards they ſhould go to Naples or to Caietta, to expect what the Emperour would determine of them: That for aſſurance of the paiments, whereof the third part appertained to the Spaniards, he ſhould giue in hoſtage the Archbiſhops of Siponto and Piſa, the Biſhops of Piſtoia and Verona, Iames Saluiati, Simon de Ricaſola, and Laurence brother to Cardinall Rodolfo: That Ranſe de Cere, Albert Pio, Horacio Baillon, the Knight Caſalo Embaſſadour of the King of England, and all the reſidue that were ſaued in the Caſtle, except the Pope and the Cardinals, ſhould depart in ſafetie: That the Pope ſhould abſolue the Colonnois of the cenſures which they had incurred: and that when he ſhould be led out of Rome, a Legate ſhould remaine there for him, and a Iudge to adminiſter iuſtice. Which accord being made, Captaine Alarcon entred within the Caſtle with three bands of Spaniſh footmen, and three companies of Lance-knights; and for as much as he was appointed for the guard of the Caſtle and the Pope, he performed it very carefully, holding them ſhort, and giuing them ſmall libertie. But the other caſtles and townes promiſed, were not ſo eaſily conſigned, for that the Caſtle of Ciuita Caſtellana was kept in the name of the Confederates, and Andrew Doré refuſed to deliuer vp the Caſtle of Ciuittauecchia (notwithſtanding he had receiued commandement from the Pope) vnleſſe he were firſt payed fourteene thouſand duckats, which he ſaid were due to him for his pay. Iulian Leno a Romane, an Architect, went to Parma and Plaiſance in the Popes name, and Lodewike Count of Lodron went thither in the name of the Captaines, with commandement to thoſe Cities to obey the will of the Emperour, notwithſtanding on the other ſide the Pope had giuen them ſecret aduertiſement to the contrary: which Cities abhorring the iuriſdiction of the Spaniards, refuſed to receiue them. And touching them of Modena, they were not now in their owne power, for that the Duke of Ferrara letting paſſe no occaſion which the calamities of the Pope offered him, & threatning to waſte all their corne which was now ripe, he conſtrained them to render vp to him the towne the ſixt day of Iune, not without the infamie of Count Guido Rangon, who, notwithſtanding the Duke had but a ſmall ſtrength with him, left the towne abandoned, without making any ſigne of reſiſtance: and in this action the Duke reſpected not the authoritie of the Venetians, who perſwaded him to attempt or innouate nothing againſt the Church at ſuch a time. And yet they themſelues entertaining intelligence with the Guelfes of Rauenna, after they had ſent certaine bands of footmen vnder colour to defend the towne for feare of thoſe of Cotignola, made themſelues Lords of Rauenna, and withall tooke the Caſtle, after they had ſecretly cauſed the Captaine to be ſlaine, publiſhing that they would hold it in the name of the whole League: and not many dayes after they ſeized vpon Ceruia, and the ſalts that were there appertaining to the Pope, whoſe Eſtates being neither guarded nor defended, any otherwiſe, then ſo farre forth as the people did it of themſelues and for their owne intereſts, Sigiſmond Malateſta with the ſame facilitie ſeized vpon the Towne and Caſtle of Rimini.

But the affaires of the Pope had no better ſucceſſe in the Citie of Florence. For when the newes of Rome was brought thither, the Cardinall of Cortona, who was in feare, when he ſaw himſelfe abandoned of thoſe Citizens who made profeſſion to be the friends of the Medices,

it being vnpoſſible for him to prouide mony without vſing violent and extraordinary means,& by reaſon of his couetouſnes being vnwilling to put his hand to his purſe,at leaſt vntil he ſaw the euent of the armies that went to ſuccour the Pope, and without being vrged by ſome neceſſitie (for there were many ſouldiers in the Towne, and the people aſtoniſhed for the accident happened by the occaſion of the Pallace, had not the courage to ſtirre) he determined to giue place to fortune: and when he had aſſembled the Citizens together, he left vnto them the free adminiſtration of the Commonweale, hauing obtained certaine priuiledges and exemptions, and leaue for the Popes Nephewes to remaine at Florence as priuate Citizens, with pardon to euery one for all things paſt committed againſt the Eſtate. And theſe things being concluded the ſixt day of May, he went to Lucques with the Popes Nephewes, where quickly repenting himſelfe of the courſe he had taken with ſo great timorouſneſſe, he aſſayed to retaine to himſelfe the Caſtles of Piſa and Liuorne,which were in the hands of Captaines whom the Pope truſted, and yet theſe Captaines hauing no hope of ſuccours by reaſon of the Popes captiuitie, and receiuing withall ſome ſumme of mony, deliuered the Caſtles to the Florentines: who in the meane while hauing reduced the Citie to the popular gouernment, created Gonfalonnier of iuſtice for one yeare, and with facultie to be confirmed for three yeares,Nicholas Cappony,a Citizen of great authoritie,and a louer of the publike libertie: who deſiring maruellouſly the concord of the Citizens, and that the gouernment might be reduced to the moſt perfect forme of a Commonweale that was poſſible,the firſt day,when he had called together the great Councell,in whom reſted the abſolute power to eſtabliſh laws and to create all the Magiſtrates, he ſpake in this ſort:

* * * *

The words of the Gonfalonnier were very graue,and his counſell indeed very wiſe,whereunto if the Citizens had giuen credite, the new libertie had haply endured longer: but diſdaine for the moſt part being ſtronger in him that recouereth libertie,then in him that defendeth it, and the hatred ſtrange againſt the houſe of the Medices for many cauſes,and eſpecially for that they had bene driuen to beare out for the moſt part with their owne money,all the warres begun by the ſaid Medices: (for it is manifeſt that the Florentines had expended not onely in the winning, but alſo in the defence of the Duchie of Vrbin,more then fiue hundred thouſand duckats, and as much in the warre which Pope Leo made againſt the French King; and for matters happening after the death of Leo, depending vpon the ſame warre,three hundred thouſand duckats, which were payed to the Imperiall Captaines and the Viceroy, before the creation of Clement: and after his creation, for the preſent warre againſt the Emperour, ſixe hundred thouſand duckats.) For theſe reaſons they began to perſecute very ſharply thoſe Citizens that had bin friends to the Medices, and to aboliſh the memory of the Pope. They defaced and reuerſed through all the Citie,the armes of the houſe of the Medices, ſpecially thoſe that were affixed to the publike Pallaces builded by them. They brake the images of Leo and Clement, that were in the Temple of Annunciata, famous through all the world. They made the Popes goods ſubiect to the exaction and paiment of old debts: the moſt part of them omitting nothing that appertained to moue the Popes diſdaine,and to nouriſh diuiſion and diſcord in the Citie;and they had done yet more,if the authoritie and wiſedome of the Gonfalonnier had not bene interpoſed,the which notwithſtanding was not ſufficient to remedy many inſolencies. But at Rome there arriued with the Marquis of Guaſt and Don Hugo, all the Lanceknights and Spaniards that were in the Realme of Naples; ſo that it was ſaid there was together within Rome eight thouſand Spaniards, twelue thouſand Lanceknights, and foure thouſand Italians; an armie ſufficient to do in Italy what they liſted,as well for the reputation they had gotten, as for the aſtoniſhment of others, and the weake prouiſions that were made to reſiſt them. But the Prince of Orange being their Captaine onely in title and name, the armie in effect being gouerned by it ſelfe, and wholly diſpoſed to make prey, get ranſomes, and to receiue the money that was promiſed by the Pope, they tooke no care at all of the intereſts of the Emperour. Therefore they would not go out of Rome, where gouerning themſelues tumultuouſly, the Viceroy and the Marquis of Guaſt,who feared leſt the footmen would fall vpon them, fled away, leauing the ſouldiers to the ſtroke of the plague,which being already begun, did afterwards great domage. For which reaſons the Imperials loſt the occaſion of many enterpriſes, but ſpecially of the conqueſt of Bologna; wherein albeit Count Hugo de Pepoly was gone thither after the loſſe of Rome

with a thouſand footmen payed by the Venetians, it could hardly haue bene kept in the obedience of the Sea Apoſtolike, by reaſon of the tumult which Laurence Maluezzi made by the ſecret conſent of Ramazzatto, and with the followers of the faction of the Bentiuoleys: and (which was a matter of no leſſe importance) they gaue time to ỹ French king to diſpatch into Italy a moſt mightie armie, with great danger of the Emperour, after he had gotten ſo great a victorie, to loſe the realme of Naples. For matters being in hand a long time before in France for the preparation of a new warre, the foure and twentieth day of Aprill the confederation ſolicited many moneths betweene the French King and the King of England was concluded, with condition That the daughter of the King of England ſhould be maried to he French King, or to the Duke of Orleans his ſecond ſon; and that at the enteruiew of the two Kings, which was to be performed at Whitſontide betweene Caliet and Bolleine, it ſhould be reſolued to which of the two ſhe ſhould be giuen: That the King of England ſhould renounce the title of King of France, receiuing in recompence a yearely penſion of fiftie thouſand duckats: That the King of England ſhould enter the league made at Rome, and be bound to moue warre againſt the Emperour out of Italy, in the moneth of Iuly next, with nine thouſand footmen, and the French king with eighteen thouſand, and with a conuenient number of lances and artilleries: That in the meane while both the one and the other of them, ſhould ſend Embaſſadours to the Emperour, to ſignifie vnto him the confederation made by them, and to ſummon him to reſtore the Kings children, and to enter into the peace with honeſt conditions, and in caſe he would not accept it within one moneth, to denounce the warre, and begin it. As ſoone as this accord was paſſed the King of England entred the League, who together with the French king ſent two Gentlemen in poſt to preſent to the Emperour conuenient ſummons; which acts were performed by the French and Engliſh Embaſſadours with farre greater readineſſe then they had bene before on the Popes behalfe: for that his Nuncio Baltaſar Caſtillon, alleaging that he ought not to exaſperate the mind of the Emperour ſo much, would not conſent to denounce warre againſt him. But afterwards when newes was come into France of the loſſe of Rome; and the diſcontent for the accident of the Pope ſomewhat qualified, by the ioy which was greater, for the death of the Duke of Bourbon; the King holding it not good to ſuffer the matters of Italy ſo to decline, he contracted the fifteenth day of May with the Venetians, to entertaine in common ten thouſand Swiſſers, he to furniſh the firſt pay, and the Venetians the ſecond, and ſo from that time forward. Furthermore it was agreed, that the King ſhould ſend into Italy ten thouſand French footmen vnder Peter of Nauarre: That the Venetians ioyntly with the Duke of Millan ſhould wage ten thouſand footmen Italians: That he ſhould ſend thither againe fiue hundred Lances and eighteene peeces of artilleries: And for as much as the King of England, notwithſtanding the articles of the contract, ſhewed no great readineſſe to make warre out of Italy, which alſo diſpleaſed the French king, euery one of them deſiring to keep it far frõ their owne Realmes, they diſpenced with that obligation, and couenanted: That the King of England, to furniſh the warre of Italy, ſhould pay ten thouſand footmen for ſixe moneths: And at the ſpeciall inſtance of the ſaid King of England, Monſieur Lautrech (yet almoſt againſt his will) was declared Captaine generall of the whole armie: and whileſt he prepared himſelfe with conuenient prouiſions of money and other neceſſaries, there was nothing done in Italy that was of any conſequence. For the Emperours armie ſtirred not out of Rome, notwithſtanding many of them died dayly by the rage of the plague, which at that time alſo was very hote in Florence and many parts of Italy: and the armie of the League (into which at the inſtance of the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Venetians, the Florentines were entred againe with obligation to pay fiue thouſand footmen, wherewith the Emperour found himſelfe much offended, for that hauing at their inſtance giuen to the Duke of Ferrara authoritie to compound with them in his name, he was almoſt as ſoone aduertiſed of the contrary deliberation,) being greatly diminiſhed in numbers, for that the Venetian footmen, thoſe of the Marquis, and the Swiſſers, were ill payed, was retired neare Viterba, and by temporiſing, they laboured to hold in the deuotion of the League, Perouſa, Oruietta, Spoleto, with other places adioyning. But afterwards hauing heard in that place, that part of the Emperours armie was iſſued out of Rome (which notwithſtanding they did to take the freſh aire,) fearing leſt the reſidue ſhould do the like, after the firſt payment was made, they retired to Oruietta, and afterwards neare to the borough of Piena; and would haue retired vpon the lands of the Florentines, if they would haue giuen conſent. The plague was gotten alſo into the Caſtle of Saint Angelo, to the great danger of the life of the Pope, about whom died some of those that serued his person: who amid so many afflictions and aduersities, hauing no other hope then in the clemencie of the Emperour, he appointed for Legate (with consent of the Captaines) the Cardinall Alexander Farnese, who notwithstanding being gotten out of the Castle and Citie by that occasion, refused to go in that legation. The Captaines desired to bring the Pope to Caietta, and the thirteene Cardinals that were with him; but the Pope vsed great diligence to turne them from that resolution, with petitions and art.

Monsieur Lautrech Captaine generall of the League.

At last Monsieur Lautrech, when he had taken order for things necessarie, departed from the Court the last day of June, with eight hundred lances, and with the title (for the King would haue it so) of Captaine generall of the whole League: and the King of England in stead of ten thousand footmen, was taxed to pay in money for euery moneth (beginning the first day of June) the summe of thirtie thousand duckats, for the payment of ten thousand Lanceknights vnder Monsieur Vaudemont, which was the best band and well exercised, for that they had many times ouerthrowne the Lutherans. Furthermore, the French King tooke into his pay Andrew Dorie with eight Galleys, and promised him sixe and thirtie thousand crownes for euery yeare. But before Monsieur Lautrech had passed the Mounts, the companies of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan ioyned together, & marched to Marignan; and Anthonie de Leua who for that cause issued out of Millan with eight hundred Spaniards and the like number of Italians, together with a few horsmen, constrained thē to retire. At which time Iohn Iaques de Medicis Captaine of Mus, who was in the pay of the French king, and expected vpon the Lake the coming of the Swissers, made himselfe Lord by subtill meanes of the Castle of Monguzzo seated betweene Lucques and Coma, wherein dwelt Alexander Bentiwley as in his owne house: for the recouering whereof, Anthonie de Leua sent thither Lodowike de Belgioioso, who hauing in vaine assaulted it, turned to Monce: but afterwards Anthonie de Leua hauing gotten knowledge that the said Captaine Mus with fiue and twentie hundred footmen was come to the village of Carate, foureteene miles from Millan, returned to Millan: where leauing onely two hundred men (notwithstanding the Venetians were almost ten thousand) and issuing out by night with the rest of the armie, he charged sodainly (vpon the rising of the Sunne) the bands of Captaine Mus, who at the alarme leauing their houses wherein they were lodged, they retired into a plaine place enuironed with hedges not farre from the village, not thinking that all the bands of the enemies were there: and albeit they cast themselues into order, yet by the disaduantage of the place, being low and as it were a prison, they were all either taken or slaine, without making any resistance, except many who fled at the first, when they perceiued the Captaine had done the like.

In the meane while the Emperour had aduertisement of the taking of the Pope, by letters which his high Chancellor wrote vnto him from Monaco, as he went into Italy whither he had sent him: and albeit he made shew in words that he was much displeased therewith, yet it was well discerned that in secret he was glad of it; chiefly in that without abstaining altogether from outward demonstrations, he left not off the feasts and tourneys begun before for the birth of his sonne. But the deliuery of the Pope being vehemently desired by the King of England and the Cardinall of Yorke, and for their authoritie the French King also desiring the same, who in case he could other waies haue recouered his children, would haue taken litle care and griefe for the domages of the Pope and all Italy: the two Kings sent Embassadours together to the Emperour, to demand his deliuery, as a matter appertaining in common to all Christian Princes, and particularly due by the Emperour, vnder whose faith he had bene reduced to so great misery by his Captaines and his armie: and at the same time they requested the Cardinals that were in Italy, that they would assemble together at Auignion with the other Cardinals, to consult in so troublesome a time, what was to be done for the good of the Church: who, because they would not all put themselues in the power of so mightie Princes, refused to go thither, although with diuers excuses. And on the other side, the Cardinall Saluiati Legate in the Court of France, being required by the Pope to go to the Emperour to helpe his affaires at the comming of Don Hugo, who according to the capitulation, was to go to the Emperour, he refused so to do, as though it had bene a dangerous matter that so many Cardinals should be in the power of the Emperour: but he sent by one of his Chamberlaines the instructions he had receiued from Rome, to the Auditor of the Chamber resident with the Emperour, to the end he might

negociate with him, who brought from him very gracious words; but a doubtfull and vncertaine resolution. The Emperour could haue bin content that the Pope should haue bin brought into Spaine: but for that it was a matter full of infamie, and that he would not so much incense the King of England; and for that all the Realmes of Spaine, and principally the Prelates and Lords, detested not a litle, that the Emperour of Rome, Protector and Aduocate of the Church, should with so great indignitie to all Christendome, hold in prison the man in whom was represented the person of Iesus Christ on earth, he made a gracious answer to the Embassadours that were sent vnto him: and to the instance that was made vnto him touching peace, he said he was content it should be negociated by the King of England, which was accepted by them: & he sent into Italy the third day of August the Generall of the gray Friers, and foure days after him Veri de Migliau, each of them (as it is said) with commission to the Viceroy for the deliuery of the Pope, and restitution of all such townes and Castles as had bin taken from him: and consented withal, for the better relieuing of the Pope, that his Nuncio should send him a certaine summe of money, drawne from the collection of those Realmes, which in the assemblies which they call Courts, had refused to contribute money to the Emperour.

The Cardinall of Yorke in France.

At this time about the end of Iuly, the Cardinall of Yorke passed to Calice with twelue hundred horse: to meet whom, the French King, who desired to receiue him very honourably, sent the Cardinall of Lorraine, and went afterwards in person to Amiens, where the Cardinall of Yorke made his entrie the day after with very great pompe: and that which much augmented his reputation, was that he had brought with him three hundred thousand crownes, for the expences occurring, and to lend to the French King if need were. They debated betweene them as well of matters appertaining to peace, as of occasions tending to warre: and albeit the intentions of the French King were different from the purposes of the King of England, for that to haue his children restored, he would haue left the Pope and all Italy in prey; yet by necessitie he was driuen to promise to make no accord with the Emperour without the deliuery of the Pope: and therefore the Emperour hauing sent to the King of England the articles of the peace, he was answered in the behalfe of both the Kings, that they would accept the peace with the restitution of the children, for whom there should be payed two millions of duckats within a certaine time, with the diliuery of the Pope and the State Ecclesiastike, together with the conseruation of all the gouernments and Estates of Italy, as they were at that present; and finally with an vniuersall peace: and it was agreed betweene them, that the Emperour accepting these articles, the daughter of the King of England should be maried to the Duke of Orleans, to the end the mariage of the French King to the Emperours sister might continue; but if the peace succeeded not, the King himselfe should take her to wife. These conditions being sent, they refused to giue safeconduct to a man whom the Emperour would send into France, answering that they had done enough to haue sent him the said articles: the which being not accepted by the Emperour, the peace and confederation betweene the two Kings was sworne and published solemnly the eight day of August: and they determined to employ all their forces in the warre of Italy, hauing for their principall obiect the deliuery of the Pope: and for the maner of proceeding in that warre, they reposed themselues vpon Monsieur Lautrech, to whom they gaue full power; and before he tooke his leaue to depart, he obtained of the King all his demands, for that the King purposed to vse his vttermost endeuour. The Cardinall of Yorke desired that the Knight Casale might go to the campe on the behalfe of his King, and that the thirtie thousand duckats that were to be payed monethly should be deliuered to him, to the end to be assured that the number of Almaines were there complete. Thus after they were resolued of the meanes to make warre in Italy, the Cardinall of Yorke returned, and at his departure he sent the Pronotarie Gambaro to the Pope, to perswade him to make him his Vicar generall in England, France and Germanie, so long as he was in prison: whereunto the French King made demonstration to consent, but in secret he was against it.

In this meane while there passed but few actions of warre in Italy, the expectation of the coming of Monsieur Lautrech being very great, for as much as the Imperiall armie being in disorder, and yeelding no obedience to their Captaines, and being chargeable to their friends and the townes that were rendred, stirred not at all, nor gaue any feare to their enemies: and the footbands of Spaniards and Italians flying from the infection of the plague, lay dispersed about the confines of Rome: and the Prince of Orange with an hundred and fiftie horsemen was gone to Sienna, as well to eſchue the plague, as to keepe that Citie in the deuotion of the Emperour, whither he had ſent before certaine bands of footmen, for that the people being drawne into commotion at the incenſing of certaine ſeditious Chieftaines, had tumultuouſly ſacked the houſes of ſuch Citizens as were of the family of Montenouo, and ſlaine Peter Borgueſi a Citizen of authoritie, together with one of his ſonnes, and ſeuenteene or eighteene others. There remained within Rome onely the Lanceknights, full of infection, who being with very great difficultie ſatisfied by the Pope of the firſt hundred thouſand duckats, partly with money, and partly with agreements made with the Merchants of Genes for the tenths of the Realme of Naples, and for the ſale of Beneuent, required for the reſidue of the mony that was due, other ſureties, and other aſſignation then the impoſition of the State Eccleſiaſtike; matters impoſſible to the Pope, being a priſoner. By reaſon whereof, after many threatnings made to the hoſtages, whom with great crueltie they kept in chaines, they led them ignominiouſly to the field of Flora, where they ſet vp a gibbet, as though they would haue executed them preſently: and afterwards iſſued all out of Rome without any Captaines of authoritie, to lodge abroad, and to refreſh themſelues, rather then to execute any exploit of importance: and when they had ſacked the Cities of Terni & Narni, Spoleto agreed to giue them paſſage and victuals. Therefore the armie of the Confederates, for the ſuretie of Perouſa, went to lodge at Pontenouo beyond Perouſa, which incamped before vpon the lake of Perouſa, but was much diminiſhed in numbers in regard of the obligation of the Confederates. For the Marquis had with him three hundred Lances, and three hundred French archers, three thouſand Swiſſers, and a thouſand Italians. The Duke of Vrbin had with him, fiue hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, a thouſand footmen Almaines, and two thouſand Italians. The Venetians alleaged for their excuſe, that they ſupplied their promiſe with the bands of ſouldiers whom they held in the Duchie of Millan. The Florentines had foureſcore men at armes, an hundred and fiftie light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen; and were conſtrained to be better prouided then all the reſidue, for a continuall feare they had leſt the Emperours armie ſhould aſſaile Tuſcan: and for this reſpect they failed not to pay their ſouldiers in due time, which the others did not. But the Duke of Vrbin, beſides his ancient difficulties, was in great griefe and almoſt deſpaire, knowing that the French King and Monſieur Lautrech ſpake not honorably of him, but much more for that the Venetians had a very ill opinion of him: who being entred into ſuſpition either of his fidelitie or his inconſtancie, had ſet a diligent guard vpon his wife and his ſonne that were at Venice, leſt they ſhould depart without their leaue: and reproued openly his counſell, which was, that Monſieur Lautrech ſhould draw directly to Rome, without attempting any thing in Lombardie.

Therefore all matters of action lay aſleepe in that armie, holding it a ſpeciall grace that the Imperials paſſed no further, who a litle after hauing receiued two crownes a peece of the Marquis of Guaſt that came to the armie, the Lanceknights (who agreed not well with the Spaniards) returned to Rome, and the Italians and Spaniards were diſperſed to Aluiano, Tigliano, Chaſtillon de Teuerino, and Bolſena, but ſo much diminiſhed in numbers, ſpecially the Lanceknights by reaſon of the plague, that it was thought there remained in the whole armie of the Emperor not aboue ten thouſand footmen. But before their departure, the Captaines of the League committed an act ſtained with perpetuall infamie. For when Gentil Baillon was returned to Perouſa with the will and conſent of Horacio, who affirming that the diſcords betweene them were hurtfull to euery one, had made ſhew that he would be reconciled to him; Federike de Boſſolo went thither with conſent of all the Captaines, to ſignifie vnto Gentil, that foraſmuch as they had diſcouered that he practiſed ſecretly with the enemies, they would be aſſured of his perſon; and notwithſtanding that he iuſtified himſelfe, & promiſed that he would go to Chaſtillon of the Lake, he was left in the guard of Gigante Corſo Colonell of the Venetians: but he was ſlaine the ſame night with two of his Nephewes, by ſome of Horacio his guard, and by his commiſſion: who at the ſame time cauſed Galeotto brother to Braccio and one of the nephewes of Gentil, to be ſlaine without Perouſa. After this the Confederates ſent ſouldiers to enter into Camerino, by reaſon they had aduertiſement that the Duke was dead; but Sforce Baillon preuented them in the name of the Imperials: and afterwards Serra Colonno made his entrie on the behalfe of Rodolph his ſonne in law, baſtard to the late Duke. After that, the Marquis of Saluſſa and Federike with many horſemen and a thouſand footmen aſſaulted by night the Abbey of Saint Peter, which is neare Terni, wherein were Peter-Maria Roſſa and Alexander Vitelli with two hundred horſemen

and foure hundred footmen: which enterprise, rash of it selfe, (for there being such a garrison, it was not pregnable without artilleries) succeeded well to them, either by fortune, or by the indiscretion or couetousnesse of the Captaines, who hauing sent out the same day an hundred & fiftie harquebuziers to make pillage of a towne fast by, had made themselues destitute of men sufficient to defend it: in so much as after they had made defence for certaine houres, they yeelded to discretion, but with reseruation of the persons and goods of Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelli, who had receiued hurts with the bullet, the one in the leg, and the other in the hand. About this time the riuer of Tyber surmounting the bankes in two or three places, ouerflowed with great detriment the campe of the League, which went to lodge at Asceſi, the Imperials being as yet betweene Terni and Narni: and then passing further, the Duke of Vrbin lodged at Narni, the French men at Beuagna, and the blacke bands commanded by Horacio Baillon Captaine generall of the infantery of the Florentines, seeing there was no lodging prepared for them, entred into the towne of Montfalcon and sacked it. Shortly after certaine bands of those footmen assailed Presse, whither were retired Rodolfo de Varano and Beatrice his wife, who hauing no meanes to defend themselues, yeelded to discretion, and yet not long after recouered their libertie, for that Sero being not able to remaine longer within Camerino for the displeasures he receiued of the armie, agreed to abandon it, vpon condition to recouer his sonne in law and his daughter. The Marquis of Saluſſa and Federike assayed againe with the French horsemen & two thousand footmen to surprise and strip the Spanish horsemen who were lodged at Monte Rotondo and Lamentano without guard and without Sentinels, as Maria Vrsin reported: and to come thither it was three dayes marching. But being discouered (for they proceeded with small order) they returned without doing any thing, notwithstanding they had determined, the better to take from the Spaniards all meanes to flie away, to breake downe at the same time the bridge of Teutrone.

During the whole time of the Sommer, the actions of the souldiers that were in Lombardie were not much different from these. The band of the Venetians and the Duke ioyned together neare Millan, with intention to cut and carry away the corne of that country, had ouerthrowne the conuoy of victuals, where they slue an hundred footmen, tooke thirtie men at armes and three hundred horse, as wel of seruice as others: but they proceeded no further against the corne, for that the bands of the Venetians (according to their custome) diminished presently. Andrew Dore was retired with his fleet towards Sauona. The Genowayes by this occasion had recouered Spetia. But afterwards the affaires of Lombardie began to be more hote, by reason of the descending of Monsieur Lautrech into Piemont with part of the armie: who hauing no mind to remaine idle whilest he expected the residue of his forces, went to incampe in the beginning of August afore the towne of Bosco in the countrey of Alexandria, wherein there was a garrison of a thousand footmen, the most of them Lanceknights, who defended their liues with so much the more obstinacie & resolution, by how much Monsieur Lautrech made angrie for that they had slaine certaine Swissers, would not receiue them to rendring, vnlesse they would referre themselues wholly to his discretion; and Lodowike Count of Lodron, to whose charge Alexandria was committed, sent to them oftentimes aduertisements, and encouraged them, for that his wife and children were shut vp within Bosco. At last, for that they were tormented night and day with the artilleries, and that they were fearfull of mines, when they had for the space of ten dayes endured so great trauell, they referred themselues to the will of Monsieur Lautrech, who retained the Captaines prisoners, and saued the life of the footmen, but with this condition, that the Spaniards should returne into Spaine through France, and the Lanceknights into Germanie by the countrey of Swisserland, and euery of them (according to the brauery of warre) to issue out of Bosco without armes, with a white staffe in his hand: but he restored freely to the Count Lodron his wife and his children. This conquest was accompanied with a happie successe of the affaires of Genes. For fiue ships, whereof foure were laden with corne, and the fifth with merchandize which went to Genes, being arriued at Portofino, and to the end they might passe in safetie, nine Galleys being sent out of Genes to accompanie them; it happened by reason of an aduertisement that was giuen that Cæsar Fregosa approched to Genes by land with two thousand footmen, that almost all those that were at Portofino went to Genes, leauing the fleete abandoned, which gaue occasion to Andrew Dore to inclose it with his galleys in the same port: at which place the Genowayes knowing that they were not able to resist, disarmed their Galleys, and set their ſouldiers on land: and by that meanes the nine Galleys (one being burned) the others fell into the power of the enemies, together with the ſhips laden with corne, and the Caricke Iuſtinian, which being come out of Leuant, was ſuppoſed to haue lading worth an hundred thouſand duckats. At this exploit were alſo the other French Galleys, who hauing taken before fiue ſhips laden with corne which were bound for Genes, were afterwards drawne behind Codemont, betweene Portofino and Genes: and alſo at the ſame time certaine bands of footmen which the Adorneys had leuied to put into Genes, were ouerthrowne at Priacroce, a place in the mountains. This calamitie ioyned to infinite other loſſes of money and ſundry veſſels, tooke from the Genoueſes, being now reduced to extremitie, all hope to make any further reſiſtance, notwithſtanding at the ſame time Cæſar Fregoſa being drawne neare to Saint Peter de Rene, was conſtrained to retire. But famine aſtoniſhing them more then the forces of the enemies, and ſeeing themſelues conſtrained by a laſt neceſſitie, they ſent Embaſſadours to Monſieur Lautrech to capitulate; Anthoniot Adorney who was Duke of Genes, retired into the Caſtle: and the tumults being appeaſed principally by Philippin Dore who was priſoner there, the Citie returned vnder the obedience of the French King, who deputed Gouernour there Theodore Triuulce. This being done, Monſieur Lautrech drew neare to Alexandria, hauing in his armie eight thouſand Swiſſers (who diminiſhed continually) the ten thouſand footmen commanded by Peter of Nauarre, three thouſand Gaſcons whom the Baron of Bear had newly brought into Italy, and three thouſand footmen of the Duchie of Millan. There were within Alexandria fifteene hundred footmen, who for the loſſe of the Almaines that were in Boſco were much abated in courage, but fiue hundred footmen being entred afterwards by the hils neare the Citie, guided by Alberig de Belgioioſo, they reſumed courage, and made a valiant defence. Neuertheles the batterie being redoubled in many places, becauſe of the artilleries and Venetian bands that were arriued in the armie (but not in ſuch numbers as they were bound vnto, either by land or ſea) and thoſe within being at the ſame time much trauelled with the trenches and mines which Peter of Nauarre caſt, they were compelled to yeeld with ſafetie of goods and life. The conqueſt of Alexandria bred among the Confederates a beginning of ſome contention. For Monſieur Lautrech laying his plot to leaue there in garriſon fiue hundred footmen, to the end that in all euents, his companies might haue a ſure retrait there, and ſuch as ſhould come out of France might haue the commoditie to reaſſemble and reorder themſelues in that Citie: the Embaſſadour of the Duke of Millan, fearing leſt that would be a beginning to ſeeke to occupie that Eſtate for his King, oppoſed againſt it with many proteſtations and words full of efficacie: and the Embaſſadour of Venice oppoſing againſt it no leſſe then he, and the Engliſh in like manner interpoſing, Monſieur Lautrech agreed (albeit with great indignation) to leaue it freely to the Duke of Millan; a matter haply of great preiudice to the enterpriſe: for that, according to the opinion of many, he caried himſelfe the more negligently in the conqueſt of Millan, either through diſdaine, or elſe to referre it to a time, when without regard of others, he might make his profit of it. After the loſſe of Alexandria, it being out of doubt that Monſieur Lautrech would addreſſe himſelfe either to Millan or to Pauie, it was ſuppoſed that Anthonie de Leua, who had there with him an hundred and fiftie men at armes and fiue thouſand footmen Spaniſh and Lanceknights, diſtruſting to be able to defend Millan with ſo ſmall forces, and amid ſo many difficulties, would retire his companies to Pauie: neuertheleſſe conſidering there was ſmall ſtore of victuals in Pauie, and that in that Citie the armie could not be maintained with robberies and extortions, as it had bene at Millan, he determined in the end to ſtay at Millan, and ſent for the guard of Pauie Lodowike Belgioioſo, and to the Millanois that with money would buy libertie, he gaue leaue to depart. Monſieur Lautrech notwithſtanding he was much diminiſhed in numbers of Swiſſers, marching on tooke Vigeuena, and afterwards hauing made a bridge vpon Theſin, and by the aide of the ſame paſſed his armie ouer, he drew towards Benerola, which is a village within foure miles of Millan, making ſhew as though he would incampe before the Citie, as the Venetians aduiſed him, but being reſolued indeed to follow that courſe which ſeemed vnto him moſt eaſie: and becauſe he vnderſtood when he was within eight miles of Millan, that Lodowike Belgioioſo had ſent thither the night before foure hundred footmen, ſo that there remained no more then eight hundred within Pauie; altering his way, he went the day following, which was the eight and twentieth of September, to the Monaſterie of the Charterhouſe, and then with great celeritie he incamped before Pauie, to the ſuccours whereof Anthonie thonie de Leua as ſoone as he heard that Monſieur Lautrech had changed his way, diſpatched three Enſignes of footmen, who could not enter: in ſo much as for the ſmall number of men of warre that were there, it ſeemed the towne could make no great reſiſtance. And yet Belgioioſo being intreated by the people that he would ſuffer them to make ſome compoſition to auoide the ſacke and deſtruction of the Citie, he refuſed to grant it. But Monſieur Lautrech hauing continued his battery for the ſpace of foure dayes, and reuerſed ſo much of the wall, that the ſmall number of men that were within ſufficed not to reenforce it; at laſt Belgioioſo ſent a Trumpet to Monſieur Lautrech, who hauing no ſpeedie acceſſe to him, by reaſon that he was by chance gone to the Venetian campe, the ſouldiers approching neare the towne, entred into it by the breach: which Belgioioſo perceiuing, he cauſed the gate to be ſet open, and iſſued out to yeeld himſelfe to the French men, who ſent him priſoner to Genes. The Citie was ſacked, in which action the French men ſpent eight dayes with great crueltie, ſetting on fire diuers houſes, for the memory of the battell which they loſt in the Parke. Then they drew into counſell, whether they ſhould execute the enterpriſe of Millan, or draw towards Rome. The Florentines made inſtance to paſſe further, for feare leſt Monſieur Lautrech ſtaying in Lombardie, the Imperiall armie would iſſue out of Rome to endomage them. The Venetians and the Duke of Millan, who was expreſly come from Millan to make inſtance, impugned it, alleaging what great oportunitie there was to take Millan, and the profite that would alſo riſe by it for the enterpriſe of Naples: for that Millan being taken, there remained no hope to the Imperials to haue ſuccours out of Germanie, but ſuch a gate remaining open, it was alwayes to be feared leſt a great armie coming from that part, would either put Monſieur Lautrech in danger, or diuert him from the enterpriſe of Naples: who anſwered, that he muſt neceſſarily paſſe further, by the commandements of his King and the King of England, who had ſent him into Italy chiefly to deliuer the Pope: to which reſolution it was thought he might be induced by ſuſpition, leſt if the Duchie of Millan were wonne, the Venetians thinking themſelues aſſured from all danger of the greatneſſe of the Emperour, would be negligent to aide the King in the enterpriſe of the Realme of Naples: and haply no leſſe for that the King ſuppoſed it would be for the benefite of his affaires, not to ſuffer Francis Sforce to recouer wholly that Eſtate, to the end that retaining the power to offer to the Emperour to leaue it, he might the eaſier obtaine the deliuerie of his children by meanes of the accord, which continually was negociated with the Emperour by the Embaſſadours of France, England and Venice. But in the negociation thereof appeared many difficulties; for the Emperour made inſtance, that the cauſe of Francis Sforce might be referred to the ſentence of the law, and that during the triall, the Eſtate of Millan might be holden by him, promiſing whatſoeuer happened, not to appropriate it to himſelfe. He required that the Venetians ſhould pay to the Archduke the reſidue of the two hundred thouſand duckats which were due to him by the capitulations of Wormes, which the Venetian Embaſſadours refuſed not, ſo farre forth as the Archduke would accompliſh the ſaid capitulations, and render ſuch places as he was bound to reſtore. He demanded of the Venetians that they ſhould giue to their exiles (according to couenant) an hundred thouſand duckats, or elſe aſſignation for fiue thouſand duckats of reuenue: That they ſhould pay that which they ought him for the confederation made with him, which he wiſhed might be renewed: That they ſhould render Rauenna to the Church, and wholly giue ouer all that they held in the Duchie of Millan. He required thirtie thouſand duckats of the Florentines, in recompence of the expences made, and the domages receiued by reaſon of their inobſeruancie. He conſented that the French King ſhould pay for him to the King of England the debt of foure hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and for the reſidue, amounting to two millions, he demanded hoſtages. He required the twelue Galleys of the French King to conuey his perſon into Italy, demanding neither horſemen nor footmen: and that aſſoone as the accord ſhould be reſolued, all the French regiments ſhould depart out of Italy; which the King refuſed, vnleſſe his children were firſt reſtored. And when it was hoped that he would mitigate theſe demands, for the loſſe of Alexandria and Pauie, he ſtood then more firme and reſolute, following his cuſtome, not to yeeld to difficulties: in ſo much as the Auditor of the Chamber being come out of England the fifteenth day of October to ſolicite the Popes deliuerie in the name of the King of England, he anſwered, that he had taken orden for that by the Generall; and that touching the accord, he would not either for loue or force alter the conditions he had propounded before. But indeed it was well diſcerned that the Emperour was not much inclined to peace, for that many things gaue him courage againſt the puiſſance of his enemies. For he was confident that he might make reſiſtance in Italy by the vertue of his armie, and the facilitie to defend the townes: that he could alwaies with ſmall difficultie cauſe new ſupplies of Lanceknights to paſſe: that the French King and the Venetians were drained of money with long expences: that their prouiſions (according to the cuſtome of Leagues) were defectiue and diminiſhed: and that he could draw out of Spaine ſufficient ſtore of money, ſeeing he bare out the warre with farre leſſe expences then did the Confederates, by meanes of the pillage and robbery of the ſouldiers. He hoped alſo by ſome meanes to diſunite the Confederates, and to make them negligent: and laſtly, he promiſed himſelfe much of his great felicitie, proued by the experience of many yeares, and which had bene ſhewed him from his infancie by many predictions.

But at this time Monſieur Lautrech ſolicited that the armies by ſea prepared to inuade either Sicilia or the Realme of Naples, ſhould aduance: of which, the fleete of the Venetians (whoſe prouiſions were not anſwerable to their obligations either by ſea or land) was at Corfu, and ſixteene galleys were to ioyne with Andrew Dore, who expected in the riuer of Genes Ranſe de Cere, appointed with footmen for y enterpriſe. Afterwards Monſieur Lautrech ſent backe into France foure hundred Lances and three thouſand footmen, and contracted with the Venetians (whom he counſelled to render Rauenna to the Colledge of Cardinals) and with the Duke of Millan, that to defend that which had bene conquered, they ſhould retaine their bands (with whom were Ianus Fregoſa and Count Caiazze) in a place well fortified at Landriano, which is a village within two miles of Millan: by reaſon of whoſe vicinitie, when the companies within Millan could not go abroad, it was ſuppoſed they might eaſily guard Pauie, Monce, Biagraſſa, Marignan, Binaſquo, Vigeuena and Alexandria. And when he had eſtabliſhed theſe things, he paſſed the riuer of Po the eighteenth day of October, ouer againſt the borough of Saint Iohn, with fifteene hundred Swiſſers, as many Lanceknights, and ſixe thouſand as wel French men as Gaſcons, with intention to attend there the coming of the Lanceknights, of whom till that day was arriued but a very ſmall number, and another regiment of footmen of the ſame nation, which the French king had newly ſent to leuie in place of the Swiſſers, who were almoſt all gone away: from which place he was driuen to ſend backe ouer Po, Peter of Nauarre with the Gaſcon and Italian footmen, to the ſuccours of Biagraſſa, before which towne, guarded by the Duke of Millan, Anthonie de Leua vnderſtanding that it was ill prouided, was gone to incampe the eight and twentieth day of October with foure thouſand footmen, and ſeuen peeces of artilleries; and hauing gotten it the ſecond day by accord, he prepared to paſſe into Lomellina, to the end to recouer Vigeuena and Nouaro: but being aduertiſed that Peter of Nauarre was come with greater forces, he returned to Millan, ſo that it was eaſie to Peter of Nauarre to get againe Biagraſſa, wherin Francis Sforce beſtowed better prouiſions. It was now manifeſtly diſcerned that Monſieur Lautrech deferred cunningly to depart: & although he alleaged that he was retained by tarrying for the Lanceknights, of whom one band being at laſt arriued vnder the charge of Monſieur Vaudemont, the reſidue were expected, and he complained euery where of the ſlender prouiſions of the Venetians; yet it was ſuppoſed that the cauſe hereof was, that money was not ſent out of France: but the trueſt and moſt ſtrong reaſon was, that the French King hoping in the peace, the negociation whereof was continued very earneſtly with the Emperour, had giuen him in charge, that diſſembling this matter, he ſhould proceed ſlowly: whereupon alſo it came to paſſe, that the King had not bene ready to pay his part of the Almaines which were leuied in place of the Swiſſers, nor thoſe that were appointed before to go with Monſieur Vaudemont. With theſe neceſſities or rather excuſes, Monſieur Lautrech ſoiourning at Plaiſance, and his companies being lodged betweene Plaiſance and Parma, the difficultie which before was had of the Duke of Ferrara, was now taken away, to whom Monſieur Lautrech (as ſoone as he entred Italy) had made great inſtance to enter into the League, which was a matter deſired on the one ſide by the Duke, for the alliance with the French King that was offered him, and wherefrom on the other ſide he was retained, for a diſtruſt he had of the forces of the French, and for doubt leſt the King for the recouery of his children, would at laſt accord with the Emperour: but fearing the threats of Monſieur Lautrech, he demanded that his affaires might be negociated at Ferrara, for that he would in his owne perſon manage a cauſe that imported him ſo much. Therefore the Embaſſadours of all the Confederates went to Ferrara, together with Cardinall

Cibo

Cibo in the name of the Cardinals that were aſſembled at Parma: and the Duke being moued in the end, for the aduancing of Monſieur Lautrech, after he had laboured to perſwade Captaine George and Andrew de Burgo (who being much honoured and entertained by him, were at Ferrara) and made knowne vnto them the neceſſitie that compelled him to compound, at laſt he accorded; but with conditions well ſhewing, either his induſtrie and knowledge how to negociate, and that it was not in vaine that he ſought to draw the action into his preſence, or the great deſire the others had to draw him into the confederation: whereinto he entred with obligation to pay monethly for the ſpace of ſixe moneths, ſix or ten thouſand crownes, according to the declaration of the French King, who reſolued afterwards vpon ſix thouſand, and that he ſhould be bound to deliuer to Monſieur Lautrech a companie of an hundred men at armes payed: and on the other ſide, the Confederates bound themſelues to the protection of him and his Eſtate: To deliuer to him Cotignola (which a litle before the Venetians had taken frō the Spaniards) in exchange for the ancient and almoſt deſolate Citie of Adria, which he inſtantly demanded: To render vnto him the Pallaces which before time he had poſſeſſed in Venice and Florence: To permit him to win from Albert Pio the Caſtle of Nouy, ſtanding vpon the confines of Mantua, which he then held beſieged: That they would pay the fruites of the Archbiſhopricke of Millan to his ſonne, who was Archbiſhop there, if the Imperials would not ſuffer him to receiue them. The Cardinall Cibo in the name of the Cardinals that promiſed the ratification of the Colledge, bound the Pope to renew the inueſtiture of Ferrara: To renounce the rights of Modena, in regard of the purchaſe of it made with Maximilian: To diſanull the obligations made for the Salts: To conſent to the protection which the Confederates tooke of him: To promiſe by Buls Apoſtolike to ſuffer as well him as his ſucceſſors to poſſeſſe all that they now enioyed: And that the Pope ſhould create his ſonne Cardinall, and beſtow vpon him the Biſhopricke of Modena, vacant by the death of the Cardinall Rangon: to which confederation was added, that Reney the daughter of King Lewis ſhould be giuen in mariage to Hercules his eldeſt ſonne, with the Duchie of Chartres for dowrie, and other honorable conditions. The Marquis of Mantua alſo at the inſtance of Monſieur Lautrech entred the league, although before he had put himſelfe into the pay of the Emperour. But at this time the armie of the Confederates was very weake, and lay many dayes without doing any thing; betweene Fuglino, Montfalcon and Beuagna: and the Duke of Vrbin who had aduertiſement of the guard that was ſet vpon his wife and children at Venice, being departed from the armie againſt the commiſſion of the Senate, to go in poſt to Venice to iuſtifie himſelfe, was aduertiſed by the way of their deliuerance, and that the Senate being well ſatisfied of him, deſired him not to paſſe further: by reaſon whereof he returned to the armie, whereīn the Swiſſers and the footbands of the Marquis were not payed: neither did the Venetians either there or in Lombardie, where they were bound to maintaine nine thouſand footmen, aduance the third part. Afterwards they retired to the territory of Tody & the confines thereabout: and the Spaniards vpon the end of Nouember were gone vp towards Corneto and Toſcanello, and the Lanceknights to Rome, to whom the Prince of Orange was returned from Sienna, where he had made but ſmall abode, for that he perceiued he could not reorder that gouernment at he thought he might. And it was not doubted, if the Emperours armie had aduanced, but the Duke of Vrbin and the Marquis of Saluſſa had retired with their forces neare the wals of Florence, although they often vaunted, that to ſtop them from entring into Tuſcan, they would plant a campe either within Oruietta and Viterba, or vpon the territorie of Sienna towards Chiuſi & Sartiano. But Monſieur Lautrech notwithſtanding the bands of Lanceknights were arriued, proceeding, for the expectation of the practiſe of the peace, as ſlowly as he was wont, ſtayed within Parma: of which Citie albeit the Caſtles were reduced into his power, and that he had drawne from thence and from Plaiſance and their territories abour fiftie thouſand duckats, it was beleeued that he had an intention not onely to keepe in his power Parma and Plaiſance, but alſo, to the end Bologna might depend vpon the authoritie of his King, to conuert the iuriſdiction of that Citie into the family of the Peppolies: which deuices ſorted to no effect, by reaſon of the Popes deliuery: whereunto albeit it ſeemed at the firſt, that the Emperour would not eaſily condeſcend (for ſince the newes of his taking, he had ſtayed more then a moneth to make any deliberation,) neuertheleſſe vnderſtanding that Monſieur Lautrech was paſſed into Italy, and how ready the King of England ſhewed himſelfe to the warre, he had ſent into Italy the Generall of the gray Friers & Very de Miglian, with commiſſion to

The Duke of Ferrara entrub into the league.
